So much for the morality of the thing. As a piece of craftsmanship the defects of The Wedding Guest leap at the eyes. The subject is serious, but Mr. Barrie, as we all know, is a humourist, and his humour runs away with him. Even if it were humour always kept under control, and always kept in the right place, it is not, I think, dramatic humour. It is thin, boyish, obvious. An officious "best man" carefully folds up a bridal veil, and so ruins it, to the disgust of the bridesmaids. Two old cronies lose their tempers over a game of draughts, and are pacified by the butler with wine and cigars. When the wine is poured into a minister's glass he studiously looks away until it is full to the brim, and then, with a Spartan air, cries "Stop." These would be amusing "Barrie" anecdotes in a book, with the delight of genial style. But they want the style badly. For they are literary effects, and very poor things in stage pantomime. Here, however, Mr. Barrie's humour, whatever we may think of it in itself, is at any rate in its right place—used, that is, for pause and relief. Elsewhere the humour is used so as to be absolutely misleading as to the progress of the story and the development of character. The husband, who is to play so grave a part in the sequel, is first introduced to us jumping over his bride's train, and cracking jokes about "trouserings." The father, after being a mere amiable nonentity for two acts, is suddenly promoted in the third to a principal place, in order that the question of parental responsibility for filial ignorance may be thoroughly threshed out. These developments are not "prepared"—one is tired of quoting Dumas' dictum on that subject. And, after all, this is not a question of "laws" or "stagecraft" but of common sense. When a puppet is turned into a live person at the close of a play, the transformation comes too late for plausibility. And the question of a man's sin and punishment is only confused by preliminary jokes about "trouserings." These incongruities, again, might be smoothed over in a book, with its leisurely narrative, philosophic reflections, charm of style, and so forth. All through the play I seem to see not so much a dramatist as a novelist out of his element.

Perhaps I speak with the bitterness of disappointment. Dramatically, The Wedding Guest shows no advance on either The Professor's Love Story or The Little Minister. Both those plays, however, were "successful" in the sense of giving pleasure to many thousands of quite worthy people to whom the Barrie humour and the Barrie ethos are of more account than the art of drama. These people, it is safe to assume, will all eagerly flock to The Wedding Guest. They may count upon seeing some good acting—"intense" acting, acting with nerves and heartstrings by Miss Violet Vanbrugh as the mistress, spontaneous acting—or, rather, as I have tried to explain, being—by Miss Dorothea Baird, intelligent, discreet acting by Mr. H. B. Irving as the husband, and absolutely delightful acting by a new actress (new to me, at any rate), Miss Joan Burnett, as a Scotch child of nature, who has a long scene with a baby all to herself. It is, by the way, not only a long but an irrelevant scene, yet so exquisitely is it done that, against my better judgment, I cannot help wishing there were even more of it.

THE TURK AS POET.

A History of Ottoman Poetry. By E. J. W. Gibb. Vol. I. (Luzac. 21s.)

Eighteen years ago Mr. Gibb published a volume of selections from Ottoman poetry, translated into English verse, which attracted some attention. The present work shows that he has not been idle in the interval: indeed, if the succeeding volumes, of which there will be in all probability at least two, are at all advanced in preparation, he must have laboured indefatigably. The death of Sir James Redhouse left Mr.

Gibb the reputation of the leading Turkish scholar of Great Britain, and his present "History of Ottoman Poetry" is an ample justification of his title to the position. Of his capacity to interpret faithfully the finest shades of Turkish idiom there is no doubt, and it is pleasant to find that his learning is joined to a gift of graceful and lucid expression, and that he can write good English as well as understand good Turkish. Such a combination of talents is unfortunately rare among scholars, who are apt to limit their range of instruction to the initiated minds of the erudite. Mr. Gibb is as erudite as one could wish, but he rightly feels that learning that cannot be communicated is useless cult is only half useful, and in this work he addresses himself, not merely to the Orientalist, but to the educated man in general. The result is a decidedly interesting book, and one that will doubtless astonish those whose conceptions of the Turk are founded upon Bulgarian or Armenian atrocities and the Visions of the Canons and the Poets. Ottoman poetry is really the mildest mannered vehicle in which a nation of butchers could express its thoughts. One begins to suspect that the man of blood may possibly be also the man of feeling.

There is nothing perhaps very remarkable in the fact that the Turks borrowed most of their ideas and their culture from other races—such loans have been effected in Western Europe too—but no race probably retains so little of its original possessions (not territorial only) as the Othmanli. The Seljuk Turks came to Persia, and learned Mahomedanism and all that it implied; they came in contact with cultivated Persians and Arabs, fell under the spell of Persian poetry and mystic philosophy, and carried it all along with them when they became rulers of Anatolia and most of Asia Minor. On the decay of the Seljuks, the Ottomans, who had been their vassals, rose rapidly to power, and together with the Seljuk dominion they took over the Persian culture of their age and place. The Turk, whatever politicians may say, has generally been eager for instruction and has proved an apt pupil. He had brought but a small stock of culture with him from his central Asian steppes, and he lost no time in improving himself by the aid of the ancient civilization of Persia, modified by the influence of the Mahomedan Arabs. The adoption of Persian ideas was as thorough as possible—so thorough that it crushed out all attempts at originality. The Turkish popular poetry, crude and unpolished, did not actually die out, but it was wholly neglected by the cultivated artist. To imitate Persian verse to the minutest detail, to copy the metres, forms, symbolism, metaphors, to repeat the national stories, and even to introduce as much as possible of the vocabulary of Persia, was the aim of every Ottoman poet for more than five hundred years. From the fourteenth century to about a generation ago all Ottoman poetry is a conscious imitation of the Persian style: in form and in subject, in idea and in treatment, it might have been written by Jelalu-d-din Rumi or Nizami, if they had happened to write in Turkish. At the same time the masters of Ottoman poetry were not merely slavish copiers. A really great poet like Sheykhi could not take the famous story of the loves of Khusrev and Shirin, and simply translate the celebrated narrative poem of the Persian Nizami on the same theme. He made innovations, he introduced lyrics, to break the monotony of the narrative or mesnevi metre. Yet the effect was absolutely Persian. The manner of Nizami was exactly reproduced, and the innovations were so harmoniously blended that they seemed no novelties at all. From his time onward—he died about 1450—the highest aim of Turkish poets was to rival his successful adaptation of the Persian manner, and to emulate his extraordinary mastery of technique. As Mr. Gibb says:—

> A studied grace of language and a laborious search for curiosity in idea and in expression, almost equal to what already was the rule in the lyric forms, replaces the more homely if ruder vocabulary and the more direct though less ingenious phraseology of the earlier mesnevis. . . . The cultivation of what we may call wit—of grace, refinement, and ingenuity—grew greatly fostered; but this was at the price of not only spontaneity and straightforwardness, but too often, it is to be feared, of sincerity. Naturalness was superseded by affectation.

And so it remained, in a greater or less degree, in the writings of most Ottoman poets down to the last generation. Mr. Gibb divides the history of Ottoman poetry into five periods. The first or formative age extends from 1300 to 1450, when "the Western branch of the Turkish language was being fitted to become a literary medium." The second lasts till 1600, and "marks the time when, the initial difficulties with the language having been overcome, the poets were able to give their chief attention to the study and reproduction of the methods of the contemporary Persian school," then led by no less a light than Jami. In the third period, embracing the seventeenth century, Persianising is carried still further, but the Persian models are no longer Jami, but "Urfi and Sa'ib." In the fourth period, which reaches to the middle of the present century, we find a note of uncertainty, Persian models being alternately followed and evaded, and unsuccessful attempts occurring to introduce a distinctive Turkish character to the poetry. In the fifth period, which is still in its early stages, the young Turks are endeavouring to assimilate Western poetic ideas and modes of expression, and in this new and unexpected phase Mr. Gibb sees the promise of great things. Qui vivra verra.

In his present volume we are taken only as far as the end of the first or formative period, but this is in some regards the most interesting of all. In his thoughtful critical studies of the works of such poets as 'Ashik Pasha, Niyazi, Ahmedi, Sheykhi, Nesimi, and lesser luminaries, Mr. Gibb traces the early development of Ottoman poetry out of the teaching of the Persian mystics, and shows how succeeding influences modified its growth. It is in fact the history of the grafting of a highly polished foreign system upon a very uncouth medium, and the remarkable success of the operation—however regrettable in the interests of original native art—is a proof of the literary talent of the Turk. The numerous examples of this early poetry, translated with no little skill as far as possible in the metres and rhymes of the originals, reveal an excessively polished, technically exquisite, mastery of metrical nicety, and also a large fertility in ingenious metaphor. To the Western reader this artificial symbolical verse is eminently unattractive, but it has always had its fascination for the Eastern mind. To understand and appreciate it one must be not only familiar with the principles of Persian prosody, but steeped in the mystic philosophy which the Sufi impressed upon the Turkish imagination. Mr. Gibb has happily supplied all necessary aids in his admirable introduction, where the technical system of poetic forms and metres are clearly explained, and a most lucid exposition of Sufi philosophy is set forth in a singularly attractive manner. The numerous devotees who worship at the shrine of that popular idol, Omar-Khayyam, would-find their comprehension of that typical pseudo-mystic poet (half his poetic mysticism was a pose) considerably improved by a study of Mr. Gibb's introduction. Oriental mysticism and artificiality have ruled Ottoman verse from its inception, and to our mind both are destructive to the very essence of true poetry. This, however, is not to say that the development of a literature governed by these twin demons is not a curious and interesting study, or that its history is not worth writing. Mr. Gibb's learned volume is evidence enough to the contrary. He has treated his difficult subject with marked ability and critical power, and we look forward to his next volume with confidence that it will be as suggestive and informing as the scholarly book which we are sorry to lay down.

ART.

THE ANGELIC PAINTER.

Fra Angelico. By Langton Douglas. (Bell, 12s. 6d. n.)

This is a beautiful book, well written and well illustrated; the work, we feel at once, of a good scholar and able connoisseur. Professor Douglas has devoted several years to the careful study of Fra Angelico's works and we have no hesitation in saying that he has given us the truest and best appreciation of the Dominican painter's art that has hitherto appeared. Until quite recent times, popular writers and copyists have conspired to give the world a wrong, or, at least, an inadequate, impression of Fra Angelico's art. He has been held up as a saintly friar who had, as Professor Douglas puts it, "a happy knack of illustration," and his paintings have been vulgarized by cheap reproductions and Christmas cards, while the poorest of his works, the Angels playing musical instruments on the altar-piece of the Flax-merchants in the Uffizi, are those by which he is known to the world in general. On the one hand, this great painter is revered and loved as a Catholic saint; on the other, he is despised as a friar who "bolted his monastery doors and sprinkled holy water in the face of the antique." Even serious critics have failed to realize his position and have almost invariably described Fra Angelico as an artist out of sympathy with his times, who adhered slavishly to the methods of the Giotteschi, and belonged rather to the fourteenth than to the fifteenth century. Nothing could be further from the truth, as Professor Douglas shows us abundantly in his careful and minute analysis of the Angelic painter's art. "He was primarily an artist, but an artist who happened to be a Saint." And far from being a reactionary, or "maître en retard," as he has been called, he was from the first an innovator and throughout his career was always learning from other artists, always trying to improve his methods, and making steady progress from first to last.

Professor Douglas demurs, we notice, to the now generally received opinion that Fra Angelico received his artistic training from the painter Gherardo Starnina. In the absence of any of Starnina's works, it is, of course, impossible to speak with certainty on the subject, but the strong resemblance that exists between the works of his pupil Masolino (especially the frescoes at Castiglione d'Olona) and those of Fra Angelico, forms a strong presumption in favour of this theory. That the Camaldolese friar, Lorenzo Monaco, influenced Fra Angelico's early style considerably there can, of course, be no doubt, and the evident likeness in the technique of both of these monastic painters renders it highly probable that the Dominican artist originally learnt miniature painting in the school of Santa Maria degli Angioli. Even more important was the influence exerted upon the young friar by the eager band of youthful sculptors and architects in whose workshops the new artistic movement of the fifteenth century had its rise. In tracing the gradual evolution of Fra Angelico's style, his present biographer points out how strong was his sympathy with this movement, and how such altar-pieces as the Madonna of Perugia and the Madonna of San Marco abound in those details of classical architecture which the Quattrocento masters, Brunellesco and Michelozzo, were the first to introduce. Professor Douglas, again, stoutly resists the frequently repeated statement that Fra Angelico rejected nature. This old fallacy, we hope, is one that hardly needs refutation. The artist's love of nature, his joy in the beauty of the natural world which had appealed so powerfully to St. Francis and his first followers, reveals itself in his earliest pictures—in the Annunciation at Cortona, with its convent-garden full of roses, pinks, and daisies, in the groves of cypress, of pines, and ilex, and the mountain landscapes which adorn the backgrounds of many of his finest works. In the Visitation, which forms one subject of the predella belonging to the Cortona picture, for the first time in Florentine art a scene from nature is actually rendered in the view of Lake Trasimeno as seen from Cortona, with the tower of Castiglione del Lago rising against the evening sky. And other well-known landscapes, the hill of Fiesole, the wooded heights of Vallombrosa, and the lovely valley of the Tiber as seen from Assisi, appear in his later works. The removal of the Dominican community from their old home at Fiesole to the new convent in Florence which Michelozzo built for them, at Cosimo de' Medici's command, between the years 1437 and 1443, forms an important epoch in Fra Angelico's career. The painter was now brought into close connexion with the foremost sculptors and architects of the day, especially with Michelozzo, the builder of San Marco, whose portrait he introduced in his Deposition of the Academy, and he was able to study the frescoes of Masaccio in the Brancacci Chapel. In the great altar-piece which he painted for his own convent church, and in the scattered portions of the predella which tell the story of Cosimo and Damianus, the patron-saints of the Medici family, the return to antiquity and the return to nature, which were the leading features of the new movement, are both happily illustrated. We see "the return to antiquity in the exquisitely designed classical canopy above the Madonna, as well as in the architecture, sculpture, and armour in the predella pictures; the return to nature in the naked child, in the finely-modelled figures of saints, in the beautiful landscape, a reminiscence of the Lake of Trasimeno with its girdle of low mountains."

The famous series of frescoes which Fra Angelico painted during the next seven or eight years on the walls of San Marco reveal the growth of his artistic powers and the development of his style. His knowledge of the nude and fine sense of form are as wonderfully shown in the fresco of St. Dominic at the foot of the Cross, which meets us on the threshold of the convent, in the great Crucifixion of the Chapter-house, and in the Nailing to the Cross, in one of the cells on the upper floor, as in the great Deposition, which he painted for the Trinità church. The Adoration of the Magi, which adorns the cell occupied by Cosimo de' Medici when he paid a visit to his friend, Prior S. Antonino, and by Pope Eugenius IV., when he came to consecrate the church in 1442, was evidently suggested, as Professor Douglas remarks, by the sojourn of the Greek Emperor and Patriarchs in Florence during the Council of 1439, and is full of Oriental reminiscences. It is by studying these later frescoes in connexion with the San Marco altar-piece, and a few other early pictures, that students will be able to reconstruct Fra Angelico's artistic personality and to form a true idea of his position in the history of Florentine art:—

> They will realize that he was, in truth, a pioneer of the new movement, the first of the painters to study seriously antique forms, and one of the first to arrive at a truer rendering of the appearance of natural things. They will see that Fra Angelico's personality developed itself quite regularly, that the influence of the architects and the sculptors on the one hand, and of Masaccio on the other, is constant throughout the San Marco period. The one influence can be seen most clearly in the San Marco altar-piece . . . in the carefully-drawn Ionic capitals of one of the "Annunciations," in the beautiful architectural background of the Madonna of the Corridor, and yet more in the admirable spacing of the same picture. The influence of Masaccio is most obvious in the Crucifixion of the Cloister, in the great Crucifixion of the Chapter-house, in the Deposition of the Academy, in the Nailing to the Cross, and in the Adoration of the Magi. Here, as elsewhere, Fra Angelico's general sympathy with the Renaissance is not only shown in his return to the antique, and in his study, under Masaccio's guidance, of the human form; it is also manifest in the keen interest that he continually takes in man, in nature, and in the moving world around him. We see it in the portraits scattered here and there through his frescoes, in the careful rendering of landscape, of trees and flowers. We see it in his fresco of the Last Supper, where, so far from allowing his imagination to look to other worlds for a setting to the picture he chooses for his background part of the convent itself, the actual building in which he was. . . . At San Marco, as throughout his whole career, the master was preparing himself for his culminating achievement.

This culminating achievement was the decoration of the studio or oratory of Pope Nicholas V., in the Vatican. Fra Angelico was summoned to Rome early in 1447 by Pope Eugenius IV., who had spent many years in Florence and had been intimately associated with the Medici; but the only works by his hand in the Eternal City which have escaped destruction are the frescoes on the lives of St. Stephen and St. Lawrence, which he painted after the death of that Pontiff, in the Vatican Chapel. These admirable works are the crowning triumphs of the Dominican painter's long career, and reveal that strong sympathy with the Renaissance which, as we have already seen, was so prominent a feature of his frescoes in San Marco. His passion for classical architecture, his delight in picturesque scenery, his tender human interest in mothers and little children are all displayed in the fullest measure, together with a knowledge of the human form and a technical mastery that surpass anything we see in his earlier works. Unfortunately, these beautiful frescoes are far less known and appreciated than Fra Angelico's work in Florence. The mere fact that they lie in such close proximity to Raphael's Stanze has been one chief cause of this neglect. As a rule travellers come to them already tired with sight-seeing, and often, it is to be feared, they miss the chapel altogether, and never even discover the existence of Fra Angelico's rarest and loveliest creations. In conclusion, we must not forget one last point that is especially worthy of notice in Professor Douglas' able and exhaustive work. This is his account of Alessio Baldovinetti's connexion with the Angelic painter. This interesting artist is now generally recognized to be the author of three panels in the series of small pictures on the Life of Christ, painted by Fra Angelico for the silver-press of the Annunziata. Professor Douglas declares his conviction that he was a pupil of the Dominican master. He advances many excellent arguments in support of this theory, and points out how Baldovinetti inherited from Fra Angelico that love of landscape which he passed on to Andrea Verrocchio, and through him to Leonardo da Vinci, while another of his pupils, Benozzo Gozzoli, transmitted the same delight in natural beauty to the Umbrian master, Fiorenzo di Lorenzo, and through him to Perugino and Raphael.

The Artists' Library.

The latest additions to the series of the Artists' Library, published by the Unicorn Press, are ALTDORFER, by J. Sturge Moore (2s. 6d. n.), and GOYA, by Will Rothenstein (2s. 6d. n). It would be hard to find a greater contrast than which exists between the prosperous and well-to-do burgher of Ratisbon, who led a quiet and peaceful life in the old German city on the banks of the Danube in the early years of the sixteenth century, and the restless, intriguing adventurer who represents the art and life of Spain in the eighteenth century. Yet both were true artists whose names deserve to live, and whose work is full of interest and originality. Albrecht Altdorfer, whom the French call "the little Albrecht," by way of contrast with the great Nuremberg master, was an architect as well as a painter, who built the market Thurm and Neue Kirche in his native city, worked diligently with brush, pen, and burin, and designed processions and illuminated prayer-books for Kaiser Maximilian. His sacred pictures, the Nativity in the Snow at Vienna, the quaint Holy Family resting by the fountain at Berlin, and the delightful little St. George at Munich, show a delicate fancy, homely pathos, and romantic poetry of conception which place him next to Durer and Holbein among German painters, while the large Battle of Arbela, which he executed for Duke William of Bavaria, impressed Napoleon so much that he carried it off to Paris and hung it in his bath room at St. Cloud. Mr. Sturge Moore gives a pleasant picture of this worthy burgher and excellent artist of Ratisbon, and the twenty-five productions of his pictures, drawings, and engravings help the reader to form a good idea of Altdorfer's art.

Mr. Rothenstein, being himself a painter, and one moreover who is thoroughly in touch with the modern French school, fully appreciates the strangely-mingled elements of Goya's art, and recognizes the frankness and brutality that go hand in hand with the rarest delicacy and keenest insight in so much of this curious master's work. The son of a poor working man in a remote village of Spain, he rose by his talents and force of character to be Court-painter to Charles IV., and became the petted favourite of the high-born ladies of Madrid. When fear of the Inquisition drove him from his native land, he worked his way south as a bull-fighter, and when he carried off a young girl from a convent in Rome, he was only saved from the hands of the monks by the intervention of the Spanish Ambassador. In due time he returned to Madrid to become the leader of Spanish painting and director of the Academy of San Fernando. But his last years were spent under gloomy circumstances. He left Spain in 1822, feeling that he no longer belonged to the new Court of the restored King Ferdinand VII., and lived chiefly at Bordeaux, being quite deaf by this time, and having lost most of his old associates. Often he would sit for whole days sunk in silent apathy. Then the old passion would come upon him and he would draw furiously for a few hours. But he lived to see the beginning of the romantic movement which he had helped to bring about, and was delighted with the works of Gericault and Delacroix. The last-named artist copied every one of the eighty plates known as Los Caprichos, and always acknowledged how much he owed to the Spanish master whose works reveal so strong a sense of composition and style, and at the same time so amazing a vitality. The reproductions of Goya's pictures at the end of Mr. Rothenstein's volume are unequal in quality, and strike us as being less successful than most of the illustrations in this series; but among them we are glad to see the admirable drawing of the Duke of Wellington in sanguine, which is quite the finest and most interesting portrait of the great commander of the Peninsula. On one occasion, while Goya was painting the larger portrait of the Duke, now at Strathfieldsaye, he became so exasperated by his sitter's remarks on his work, that he seized a sword hanging on the wall, and made a sudden onslaught on the Duke, who was obliged to beat a hurried retreat from the room, and took care in future not to excite the rage of this passionate master.

On the practical side of Art mention should be made of Mr. McWhirter's LANDSCAPE PAINTING IN WATERCOLOUR (Cassell, 5s.). It does not attempt to enter very closely into the innumerable difficulties which face the watercolourist, but the advice it gives is sound. The coloured reproductions of Mr. McWhirter's own sketches are admirable, and the student will be interested in learning what palette and colours he makes use of. Three more of Messrs. Dawbarn and Ward's "Useful Arts and Handicrafts Series" (6d. n. each) now published are STENCIL CUTTING AND STENCILLING, PASTEL OR CRAYON DRAWING, and FIRST STEPS IN PAINTING. They are slight but thoroughly practical, and will undoubtedly assist those who are at the first stage in these arts.

A RUSSIAN PROPHET.

WAR AND LABOUR. By MICHAEL ANITCHOW. (Constable, 18s.)

Whether this volume is translated from the Russian, or whether M. Anitchow originally wrote it in English, does not appear. In either case the publishers ought to have employed as a proof-reader some one sufficiently acquainted with the names of writers on political economy and philosophy to have avoided such spellings as "Gratius," "Richard" and "Rickardo," "Torrents," "Leon Levy," "Carl Marks," "Sheffle," "Bluechly," &c., which disfigure its pages with distressing frequency; and some textual eccentricities might also have been removed, though as a whole the English is lucid and idiomatic.

M. Anitchow has read widely, and done his best to bring his reading up to date. He evinces a shrewd intelligence and some power of judgment; and, although for the most part, he sees things through Russian spectacles, there is a breadth about his views, and a frankness in his way of stating them, which prepossess the reader in his favour. But he is too apt to be dominated by abstractions, too anxious to see causes at work where most people would notice nothing but the inertia of events, and far too sanguine in his expectations of the immediate future. "The nineteenth century," he begins, put an end to slavery, the twentieth ought to do the same for war. We soon gather that this is not exactly what is meant. M. Anitchow does not suppose that the coming century will see the sword generally converted into the plough-share and the spear into the pruning-hook. He is too clear-sighted not to see through the rubbish put forth not long since about war becoming impossible by reason of the improvements in its methods, and too logical to think that it can be superseded by international tribunals of arbitration. What he means is that the appeal to arms between civilized nations is already obsolescent, and must in due time become obsolete. None the less, he argues, must civilized nations go on arming, and even improving the art of arms to the utmost. Civilization is always on its defence. Not only has its message to be carried into the darkest parts of the earth, where its apostles hold their lives in their hands: it is ever menaced by barbarism, by retrograde societies directed by ambitious and ignorant schemers, and by lawlessness and socialism within its own borders. As long as the reign of right is not firm everywhere, says M. Anitchow, force will have to be applied more than once. But will future wars, as he predicts, be concerned only with Asiatic despots, savage tribes, and corrupt transmarine states of European origin? We wish we could think so.

In common with many shrewd Continental observers, M. Anitchow believes that the time is coming when some one of the nations of Europe will actually immolate itself on the altar of socialism. It is amusing to see how ready each of them is to yield the pas, in this respect, to its neighbour. Believing that national collapse must be the inevitable result of a dominant socialism, the great nations are anxious that the experiment should be made by some small one—say Belgium, in whose case Germany and France would step in to restore order, and ultimately to fight over the carcase. Assuredly socialism will never fall into this trap. It will bide its time, sapping secretly and steadily, until the mine can be simultaneously exploded in two or more nations, the larger and the more powerful the more hopefully for the success of the movement. Meanwhile many changes, which according to M. Anitchow are well on the way, will facilitate its triumph. There is to be general free trade, freedom of frontiers, and transmigration, Government help for labour, Government appropriation of railways, and as quickly as possible, following on this, government "resumption" of the land. How advanced M. Anitchow's anticipations are with regard to our own country will be seen from the following extract:—

> The ethical and political consequences of the purchase and sale of English entailed property would be very great. The unpopularity of the landed aristocracy would disappear, and, preserving all forms of hereditary revenue except lands, this aristocracy would lose nothing. The useful sides of influence would be preserved, the injurious would disappear. The democratic feeling is strong in the English populace, but it is joined with historical feeling. All know what the nobility and gentry did for English freedom, and therefore titles and family wealth, if they do not threaten general interests, do not rouse in the farmer and labourer that animosity which is so strong and fiery in many Continental countries. There will be no landlords, but lords will remain. Rich dukes and barons and wealthy squires will still dwell upon the family estates in the midst of ancestral gardens and parks. But they will be freed from their present and not very elevating relations to farmers and farm-labourers. Extortions, foolish lenience, and oppressions would cease. Country squires would be surrounded by friendly neighbours, by a class of owners and agriculturists among whom the wealthy, educated, and noble inheritors of the ancient halls, by force of English traditions, will always enjoy an honourable influence. The sad aspects of rural life in the counties will disappear, and the best customs of old and merry England will reappear, as soon as English land becomes the property of the English nation.

M. Anitchow evidently knows little of England, and nothing of the best English opinion on these matters. He is more at home in Russian affairs; and we are indebted to him for a very candid account of something which Russia expects in the near future. Who is to possess the Bosphorus? For of course the Turk is to go, and Turkey is to be partitioned between Austria, Russia, and Greece. When frontiers are abolished this question will be settled quite amicably. So far as Russia is concerned, "the possession of Constantinople and the Dardanelles, from a vital interest, will become a platonic and historic tradition." Russia, in fact, will be perfectly indifferent to the matter. She would not care who got Constantinople, provided it were only a civilized Power. But in the good time coming the prize she has coveted for two centuries will be positively thrust upon her by general consent. "England, Austria, and Germany will see nothing dangerous in the tradition of St. Oleg's shield being renewed, the Mahomedans driven away, St. Sophia re-established, and a Russian governor residing at Constantinople"—simply because under the new constitution of things the Russian Empire will become "one vast free port." It will be time enough to consider this question from a practical point of view when the last-named little change has been made—or, at all events, when there is the least sign of it.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Africa.

Twice Captured (Blackwood, 10s. 6d.), the Earl of Rosslyn's record of his adventures in the Boer War, is not literary, and is often ungrammatical, but it is interesting because the author speaks his mind, and seldom refrains, when repeating camp gossip, from putting the dots on the i's. Concerning General French's early successes, for instance, we are told that "if you had been in South Africa you would have heard it said that his Brigade-major, Haig of the 7th Hussars, had done it all!" and of General Buller we read that his "inaction in coming through to help Lord Roberts points to an unnerved man whose great strength of tenacity has been severely shaken." Then comes a strong comment on the Sanna's Post business:—"Nor was it pleasant to hear aspersions cast on the fighting qualities of the 10th Hussars and composite regiment, who are reported to have deserted the guns in their mad flight to such an extent that an officer remarked that he hoped the 10th Hussars would never again be detailed to escort his guns"; followed by a statement that "There is a rumour prevalent that General Broadwood asked twice for reinforcements, which were not forthcoming, and that on being summoned by the Commander-in-Chief, the whole matter was hushed up because General Broadwood fired up to Lords Kitchener and Roberts and attributed neglect to them." And a good deal more in the same strain. We do not of course take it very seriously as military criticism; for we have no reason to suppose that the Earl of Rosslyn possesses the qualifications of a military critic. But no doubt it echoes the voice of the local malcontents, and will probably start some fresh controversies.

The chapters in which Lord Rosslyn relates his detention at Pretoria are also interesting and in places provocative, and we should be surprised if Mr. Winston Churchill and Mr. Richard Harding Davis have not something to say in reply to them. The account of the Courts of inquiry held after the recovery of the prisoners furnishes more painful reading on a subject on which little has so far been heard:—"Only two or three days ago an officer, whose name shall be unwritten, committed suicide after he had stood the formal trial. I do not suggest that the deed was due to harsh treatment, as he had shown signs of melancholy during his incarceration. Another officer, lately a fellow-prisoner of mine, was also insulted after he had been before the Court, not by the members themselves, but by an officer of high rank who should have known better."

On the whole we think it likely that Lord Rosslyn's book will attract more attention than most of the war-books, not because Lord Rosslyn's name carries any particular weight, but because he has audaciously printed a great many statements—inaccurate statements we trust—which have hitherto only been whispered darkly in the Service Clubs. They will be new to the public, and the public will probably want to know whether they are truths or slanders.

We have had various books about the siege of Mafeking. Now we have THE RELIEF OF MAFEKING (Methuen, 6s.) by Mr. Filson Young, who was permitted to accompany Colonel Mahon's flying column. It is much like most of the other war books, a narrative of interesting events written in a common-place manner. The author has the advantage of being first in the field of the chroniclers of the episode which he relates.

SOUTH AFRICAN STUDIES, by Alfred Hillier, B.A., M.D. (Macmillan, 6s.), consists mainly of a reprint of lectures delivered before the Royal Institution and the Royal Colonial Institute, articles contributed to the Fortnightly Review, and letters written to The Times. Dr. Hillier's name is a sufficient guarantee of their interest and value. They establish various important propositions bearing upon the justice of the British case: that the Boers began to arm long before the raid; that the Reform movement was not fomented by capitalists, &c. We have been over the ground so often in connexion with so many books that we are reluctant to traverse it again, but must content ourselves with remarking that Dr. Hillier is a safe and judicious guide. His final essay is in favour of straight shooting for British soldiers, and incidentally discusses the alleged deterioration of Boer marksmanship. There are, he admits, bad marksmen among them; but he cites the exploit of the Ermelo commando at Colenso to show what good marksmanship can accomplish.

> Not only did they shoot down all our men manning the guns, but they were apparently able to prevent our force from even defending these guns from subsequent removal by the Boer forces. In this feat these Ermelo Boers relied almost entirely on their rifle fire, and knowing the facts I have referred to as I do, I have little doubt their rifle fire was accurate and deadly.

HOW WE ESCAPED FROM PRETORIA, by Captain Aylmer Haldane (Blackwood, 1s.), has already appeared in Blackwood's Magazine. It is a stirring story admirably told.

SHOULD I SUCCEED IN SOUTH AFRICA, by A Successful Colonist (Simpkin, Marshall, 1s), is addressed to intending emigrants. It points out lucidly and with plenty of detail, what are the prospects of different classes of colonists, and warns off those who are only capable of work that can be done just as well by Kaffirs. A useful and opportune manual.

The East.

THE ATTACHÉ AT PEKING, by A. B. Freeman Mitford (Macmillan, 6s.), consists of letters written home from China—most of them from the capital—some thirty-five years ago. They are bright and picturesque, though superficial and unpretentious. Readers who prefer argument to gossip will find it in the preface. The author's examination of the causes of the hostility of the Chinese to Christians is thoughtful and worth weighing. It cannot, he says, be religious fanaticism, seeing that "a colony of Jews has dwelt among them unmolested for 2,000 years," and that both Buddhism and Mahomedanism flourish in their midst. It is, therefore, political antipathy—the fear of the Mandarins that the triumph of Christianity means the downfall of their power. As regards the urgent problems of the moment Mr. Mitford shows the difficulties which attend the solution gravely recommended by our leader-writers:—

> "The murderer Tuan must be executed" is a favourite cry. By all means; but we know what is the first postulate in the cooking of a hare. Prince Tuan will hardly be more easy to catch than Nana Sahib in 1857. If the Emperor, a weak-kneed boy, be left at Peking, in a hot-bed of harem intrigues and secret societies, how can he be protected? Will his life be worth many days' purchase? Will a progressive Ministry be able to overawe any authority over the great provincial [illegible]? The Foreign representatives will be locked up in the old deathtrap, and in ten, twenty, thirty years, history will repeat itself.

The matter could not be better stated. We do not blame Mr. Mitford for not undertaking to solve (it as well as to state it.

Mr. James M'Carthy spent twelve years (1881-1893) in collecting material for the compilation of a map of Siam, to form the foundation of a national survey system. A number of notes and observations relating to this great task are published under the title SURVEYING AND EXPLORING IN SIAM (Murray, 10s. 6d. n.), under the auspices of the Royal Geographical Society. Those who know something of the subject and are anxious to know more will welcome the book, though any one who picks it up under the impression that it is a narrative of adventure will be disappointed. There is nothing in it more exciting than triangulation, but it has a magnificent map, printed on copper at the cost of the Siamese Government.

FICTION.

War Stories.

If we had to class Stephen Crane's work in his collection of stories of the Spanish-American war—WOUNDS IN THE RAIN (Methuen, 6s.)—we should be disposed to describe it as Kiplingism with a strong American flavour and a certain lack of seriousness. There is much of Mr. Kipling's vigour, vividness of presentation, and unconventional vocabulary. Mr. Kipling might very well have written such a sentence as—

> Havana was happy, for it was known that the illustrious sailor, Don Patricio de Montojo had with his fleet met the decaying ships of one Dewey, and smitten them into stuffing for a baby's pillow.

On the other hand, Mr. Kipling's brutality is always redeemed by a certain underlying earnestness of conviction. It symbolises strength put forth on the whole for the advancement of the world through the aggrandisement of the race best qualified to rule the world. Stephen Crane's brutality is more of an end in itself. He writes like an acrobat performing feats of strength just to show what he can do—to say which is not quite the same thing as saying that he pursues art for art's sake, though it may sound as if it was. There is a place for this sort of thing in literature, but it is not the highest place by any means. It results in the detached episode whereas Mr. Kipling's episodes, with rare exceptions, elucidate life as a whole. To put it differently, Crane gives us many feasts of horrors, but shows little sense of the continuous drama of life in which those horrors are startling and impressive incidents. His work, at its best, is perhaps as good as cynical work, lacking insight, can be. He makes the reader see what he sees, though he himself often fails to see all that he should; he can draw pictures, though he cannot draw characters. But the stories before us are very unequal. "Virtue in War" and "The Second Generation" are at least pungent satires on the American military system and the American political soldier. "The Majestic Lie" is very trivial, and it is not the only trivial story in the book.

Miss Violet Hunt.

No doubt Miss Violet Hunt would laugh at our optimism and simple faith, but we will still confess that we turn to each of her books as it arrives with a sense of relief and a moment of hope. We say in our hearts—Miss Hunt will give us sincerity and wit—and of how few novelists can that be expected. But there was "Unkist, Unkind," one of the poorest novels by a clever lady we have ever read, to crush the promise of "A Hard Woman" and "The Maiden's Progress." But that was followed by the careful and convincing book, "The Human Interest." This prepared us again for more successes by Miss Hunt, and we looked forward to AFFAIRS OF THE HEART (Freemantle, 6s.) as a refreshment. Can anything be made more amusing than the affaires de cœur of one's neighbours when they are recounted by an observant and cynical passer-by? But these fifteen short detached stories suffer somewhat from the method Miss Hunt has chosen; read close upon each other's heels they leave a sense of disappointment. But if the reader be wise, and that much one must always presuppose, he will select a story or so from the bulk and preserve his ideal of Miss Hunt as a writer of high artistic merit, vivacious but discreet. The sketches which please us most are in the dialogue form of drama, such as "The Way to Lose Him," a gay and effective form in which Miss Hunt excels. She is not always quite so pleasing in her descriptive passages: such a sentence as "curiosity prompted, while scruples of fastidiousness deterred, the young man from speaking to her" is much too slovenly to come from the pen of the author of "A Hard Woman." The short study, "The Encore," is perhaps a little out of place among its amusing and flippant neighbours, but it has the merit of that tragic note, unforced but clear and certain, which is a sign of a fine imagination. We trust that Miss Hunt will continue to study the affairs of the human heart. "For," as she quotes, "many loves are good to see, Mutable loves, and loves perverse"; and no one can give us a more entertaining account of them than Miss Hunt at her best.

Senator North.

Although also dealing with modern life and beautiful women, Mrs. Atherton's method is in marked contrast to that of the author of "Affairs of the Heart"—where the latter is light and flippant, the former is serious, almost severe—both ladies give us admirable pictures of the life they know, but their appeal is made to widely different audiences. A bold and careful picture of fashionable life in Washington, sharp sketches of perhaps well-known political personages, the tragedies that attend mixed blood in America, the love that is born in woman at the sight of the strength of man, the development of strong individual qualities, these subjects Mrs. Atherton handles with freshness and frequently with power. But her latest novel is not without certain artistic faults. SENATOR NORTH (John Lane, 6s.) is prefaced by a long quotation from what William Pitt Fessenden said in the memorial address before the Senate, 1866. This sort of thing is a little embarrassing. In a pusillanimous age there will be many readers who take affright at this serious and political note at the very outset of a stout volume. But they would do well to be bold and go forward, for the work is both interesting and sincere. Mrs. Atherton gives us of her best, and means to entertain and enlighten us. But before she can do this with complete success she must learn, we think, something more of the advantages of compression and literary reticence. If she would also care to cultivate that sense of humour about which she writes, no great harm would come of it. In reading of the political surroundings of Miss Betty Madison, a daughter of an aristocratic Southern family, and of the accomplished Senator North, the thought has once or twice occurred to us that Mrs. Atherton had decided to show how a clever lady might write a dull book; but the idea passes, and, despite the local note, this latest work will add to the author's already considerable reputation. It contains two principal motives and many subsidiary political points: the first is the development of the life of Betty Madison's illegitimate half-sister, Harriet Walker. This beautiful girl has a drop of black blood in her veins, and the story of her life is, of course, the story of an immense American problem. The second motive is the love of the heroine, Betty, for Senator North, and the love of others for Betty. Mrs. Atherton leaves her heroine happy and draws down the curtain on a fairly satisfactory dénoûment. There are times when the details of parties and bills are tedious and the story drags, but the picture of higher politics in Washington is carefully observed and clearly told. But it does not incline us to learn more of that body of which one of the characters says, without much originality, that it is "the most delightful club in the United States." Betty Madison is elaborately drawn from the outside. We are told that she has a "keen sense of humour" (always a dangerous thing to say of a woman), but she does not display it. We are told that "she belonged to that small class of Americans whose ear-mark is the absence of all Americanisms," and she speaks to her admirer, Senator Burleigh, of her mother as "a lovely intelligent woman." We are told that she radiated magnetism, and yet one learns of the "most momentous decisions of her life" without a thrill. Mrs. Atherton is inclined to crowd her picture with detail, and she might do well to remember that the half is greater than the whole. But if there be a tedious page or two, "Senator North" shows that its author is a gifted writer on public events and a keen observer of social life. This we think is distinctly different from being an entertaining novelist or an enthralling writer of romance.

Annals of a Dull Town.

Miss Julia M. Crottie calls her simple and unaffected book NEIGHBOURS (Unwin, 6s.), "annals of a dull town," but there could be no tedium in a place where so much keen observation, so much humour and sympathy are constantly working. These Irish stories of the town of Inisdoyle are "racy of the soil" in the best meaning of the worn phrase. Miss Crottie is an artist who can vividly reproduce her impressions. The same characters run through each of the sketches, yet each story stands apart. Miss Crottie captures the true spirit of her people. That unintentional humour of the peasant class which is so remarkable a product of Ireland is here displayed with no varnish nor affectation. The melancholy that underlies the Celtic temperament shows through the veneer of wit and gaiety which is often supposed to be the outward sign of an Irish mind. The smile and the tear follow quickly in Irish eyes, and in this volume one feels that the rapid changes are thoroughly suitable to the environment—that life, under the circumstances depicted, must snatch its pleasures at the very mouth of death. Miss Crottie and her readers are to be congratulated on both the matter and manner of the stories in "Neighbours."

Miss Braddon.

The author of THE INFIDEL (Simpkin, 6s.) is also the writer of at least 60 successful novels. Before such an array of victories the critic stands aghast. How is he to attain the detachment necessary to his avocation when the author has such a history? But if one may venture to judge Miss Braddon's book without thought of the list from "Lady Audley's Secret" to "His Darling Sin," we should say it is an admirably machine-made story, certainly to be enjoyed by that highly normal person the average reader. Miss Braddon's choice of a period falls "in the days when George the Second was King and Grub Street was a reality." It is a time which a thousand memoirs and biographies have made familiar to us and to Miss Braddon. The story of Antonia Thornton and her loves fits excellently into the picture of the period. The heroine's father, "the Socrates of his vulgar Academy," if not remarkably original, is equally in the spirit of the times. We meet a vast number of semi-historical characters, we have more than one lively intrigue. The colours are laid on with great freedom, there are no "fine shades" here, no subtleties, no analytical fuss. Miss Braddon does not hesitate at dislike of the superlative. She writes:—"As she outshone every woman he had ever seen in loveliness, mental and physical, so his love for her surpassed any love he had ever imagined." Yet one does not feel that the matter is overdone. But then we are in the eighteenth century, and have all the assistance of well-managed stage effects and of the skill and tact of an accustomed and cunning story-teller.

THE FLOWER OF THE FLOCK (Nisbet, 6s.) is one of Mr. W. E. Norris light and bright romances, full of pleasant, leisured people. His gifted Charlie is a delightful young fellow, with as much reliability and honour as shifting sand, but charming and lovable so long as life runs smoothly with him. A rich, humorous, and tenderhearted widow with no illusions is the very note for him, and Mr. Norris probably thought of his feminine readers and their feelings when he consigned Charlie to Mrs. Van Rees rather than to the felon's cell he had earned by making use of his widowed mother's trust money. There is nothing subtle about the book, and there is nothing crude. It is typical of its author's readable work.

WINIFRED: A STORY OF THE CHALK CLIFFS, by S. Baring Gould (Methuen, 6s.), is a good, spirited tale of love and smuggling and the cliffs, varied with pictures of Bath in its salad days when a gentleman had a leg and loved to show it; but it is poor work compared with "Mehalah," or, indeed, with most of Mr. Baring Gould's earlier work. His heroines, the girl Winifred of the title and her scarcely less attractive mother, are bold conceptions, original in character and in treatment, and the smugglers and their doings have all the old picturesqueness. Still, it is a falling off. The fire and verve of the early work have sadly died away.

THE DISHONOUR OF FRANK SCOTT, by M. E. Hamilton (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.), is hardly so good as "A Self-Denying Ordinance," or as "McLeod of the Camerons," but it has a good plot, and the author's style is pleasant. The dishonour of Frank Scott was incurred by his indiscreet habit of marrying without sufficient reflection. A beautiful, penniless woman, with more than a touch of the adventuress about her, works upon his feelings, and he marries her. Then a dying girl who has loved him for years appeals to his pity, and he marries her also, trusting to her early death to reunite him to Number One, whom he passionately adores. Matrimony with Number Two alienates his somewhat nimble affections from Number One; and the coil grows. The end is depressing.

Correspondence.

THE ABUSE OF THE POSSESSIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—When in a letter on this subject I stated that "Personification alone, as a rule, justifies inflection," I thought in my innocence that I was stating a truism, and had no intention of announcing a discovery, or of laying down the law, or even of setting the ball of discussion rolling. Mr. Rouse's request, therefore, I might almost say his demand, for quotations in support of "this rule" comes upon me as a surprise. It is just possible that we are at cross purposes, and that, if I had been a little more explicit, I should have had Mr. Rouse for a supporter instead of an opponent. For my phrase "as a rule" only meant "in a general way," and implied the existence of exceptions, and in speaking of inflection I was referring only to the possessive case of the noun, and that in modern English prose. But, if we are speaking of the same thing, I shall have no difficulty in complying with his request.

I presume that your pages will be accepted as fairly representative of good English, and on that hypothesis I have compiled a list of the inflected possessives to be found in your current number. In the twenty-two pages of this number there occur 191 of these possessives, and these, with the possible exception of nine, all belong to one or other of the four following classes:—1. Personal names—138. 2. Designations of persons, as "father," "stonemason."—forty-seven. 3. Names of animals—two. 4. Obvious personifications, as "Concord's portals."—seven. The nine possible exceptions are the following:—1. "A day or two's fasting." 2. "The last minute's impression." 3. "A mere five minutes' rest." 4. "Last week's Literature." 5. "Last year's volume." 6. "To-day's issue." 7. "For old sake's sake." 8. "The struggling moonbeam's misty light." 9. "A stone's throw."

Now we are at once struck by the fact that six out of these nine instances fall under the head of "Divisions of Time," and it might very well be argued, having regard to our habit of personifying time in general, and days and months in particular, that these are all due to the same habit. As regards the three remaining instances, the first, "For old sake's sake" might still have been included in the obvious personifications, for such it is, albeit of a humorous complexion; of the second, "The struggling moonbeam's misty light," it may at least be said that it savours of personification, inasmuch as the "moonbeam" is near akin to the "moon," and the epithet "struggling" is distinctly metaphorical; while the third, "A stone's throw," was quoted, curiously enough, in my letter as an "idiomatic survival," fully justified by the fact that it has survived and is void of association. Thus the analysis, so far from disposing of my proposition, bears it out in a very remarkable way, for, even if I were to make an opponent a present of the nine possible exceptions, I should still have ninety-five per cent. of a large number of instances, impartially chosen, in my favour, and I have shown that the testimony of the remaining five per cent. is, to say the least, not very damaging.

I am sure with Mr. Rouse that Mr. Andrew Lang is well able to take care of himself, but I am equally sure that if my appeal ever meets his eye, he will not regard it as an attack. In the Free State of Letters, the President is not omnipotent, but he wields great influence, while the humblest burgher need not fear to express the hope that that influence will be used on what he believes to be the right side.

Yours faithfully,

E. D. LITTLE.

IS SWINBURNE "A GREAT POET?"

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It seems to be the fashion nowadays to fix a writer's position rather prematurely. Sovereigns are not canonized by the term "great" until they are dead, and a generation at least should pass away before the epithet can be attributed to a writer. But I notice that a book about Swinburne is just going to be published, and that can hardly be considered premature when we have books about Mr. Kipling and Mr. Barrie.

Mr. Noyes claims to anticipate the judgment of posterity by calling Swinburne a great poet; and if we are beginning now to settle the question, I for one should dispute it. Greatness implies self-restraint—that is, literary self-restraint. Mr. Swinburne, as it seems to me, makes very little appeal to the mind because he is always in superlatives. He adds nothing to our knowledge of Shakespeare or our appreciation of him by saying that he is

> All praise, all adoration, save of love,
> As here on earth above all men he stood,
> That were or are or shall be—great and good
> Past thank or thought of England or of man.

Such a eulogy is a mere shout, it fills the ears only and deadens the brain. In the same way the volubility with which he pours forth musical verse makes him lose all sense of effect. It is reserve of force, concentration, which makes a great poet. As you yourself suggested some time ago, Tennyson could probably have put the whole of Shelley's "Sensitive Plant" into a stanza of four lines; and Shelley and Swinburne have much in common. Both, to use the language of Mr. F. W. H. Myers, on the former poet, show us "forms that luxuriate into arabesque, colours that shimmer into iridescence, speech that kindles into imagery," but all Mr. Swinburne's smooth and silvery torrent of words, flowing on for page after page with tireless facility, are worth nothing in comparison with one wise and pregnant thought succinctly uttered, or one fine image brought to life in a terse and striking phrase.

I am, Sir, yours, &c., C. C. C.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Were it not for Mr. Alfred Noyes' assurance that "a small critic cannot hurt a great poet" one could almost be annoyed with him for his clamorous advocacy of Swinburne's claims to the distinction; but he certainly goes very near marring our enjoyment of the exquisite melody which that poet's name brings back to us. It can, indeed, matter nothing to Swinburne what the present generation thinks of him: time is on his side.

Tennyson's modesty and Stevenson's powers of memory are not in themselves sufficient to establish any poet's position, and their citation "is very ridiculous in the eyes of all who know what great poetry is." May it be suggested to Mr. Alfred Noyes that the dogmatic fashion in which he unpacks his soul is distinctly at variance with the spirit which was so dear to the critic whose words he appropriates at the close of his letter?

Yours very truly,

P. A. SILLARD.

THE SIN-EATER IN SOUTH WALES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Some recent wanderings in the reputed country of the Sin-Eater must account for my not having at once seen Mr. Owen's interesting letter to you on the subject. Need I say, that in putting the "Song of the Seven Candles" into the mouth of a Welsh glee-woman I did not ask the readers of "The Whistling Maid" for more faith than goes with the pleasures of romance? But it happens that neither Mr. Sidney Hartland's always suggestive treatment of Welsh Folk-lore, nor any literary allusions in the Sin-Eater, had much to do with my song. It was prompted indirectly, and so far as I can account for it, by my hearing from a gentleman, native to Cardiganshire, a very striking account of the custom of Sin-Eating as seen in that county by his own people. This was enough for romance and its freer purposes, if not for Folk-lore. But I hope my authority will be able to do as I ventured to ask him at the time, and write down (if he has not already done so) a matter of fact, literal account of the custom as witnessed within the last fifty years, so that the doctors may presently decide on its value for themselves. I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

Abbey-cwm-Hir, 1st Oct., 1900. ERNEST RHYS.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

A correspondent writes:—Apropos of the projected collected edition of Ruskin, alluded to in Literature last week, I am in a position authoritatively to state that such a scheme is contemplated. Nothing as yet, however, is definitely settled, for one reason, if I mistake not, because Professor C. E. Norton, who lives in America, co-literary executor with Mr. Wedderburn, Q.C., has not had an opportunity of stating his views.

Miss Bailey's Monthly Index to The Times began its course last year, and we have now before us what is likely to be an invaluable work of reference—the first Annual Index to The Times. It is published by Messrs. Spottiswoode, and printed in clear type on a large page. Miss Bailey has taken much pains with her classification. Thus, under "Law," which is very carefully done, we have the class "Appeal" and the subhead "Applications for Leave to Appeal." This is as far as classification could conveniently go, and the same double classification appears in other cases, such as "Literature."

Mr. Leslie Stephen's new book on "The English Utilitarians," to which we have before referred, is now promised by Messrs. Duckworth very shortly. Mr. Stephen told us long ago that his own ethical theory, so soon as he became the conscious possessor of an ethical theory at all, was that of the orthodox Utilitarians. John Mill was the Gamaliel at whose feet he sat, wherein, he said, he simply followed the example of the majority of the more thoughtful lads of his generation. Later came the influence of Darwin's work, and then of Mr. Herbert Spencer, and, lastly, the stimulus of the "Methods of Ethics" of Henry Sidgwick, and the general aim of his work in this department has been to bring ethical truth as he saw it into harmony with the prevailing scientific doctrine of evolution. The forthcoming book, however, is understood to be rather historical and biographical than philosophical, Mr. Stephen having already given expression to his own philosophical views in his "Science of Ethics," published now nearly twenty years ago.

In the review of "The Third Salisbury Administration," in our last week's issue, we said that the book was "a convenient compendium of recent political history, which would be still more convenient if it had an index." We understand from Messrs. Vacher, the publishers, that this criticism can only apply to the first fifty copies sent out. An index which Messrs. Vacher have sent us, and which seems to be very complete, is now part of the book.

The keen interest which is being aroused by the newly-published letters of the poet of "Fo'c's'le Yarns" and the sympathetic portraits of the man to be found in Mr. Quiller-Couch's article in the Monthly Review and Mr. Tarver's in Macmillan's ought to prepare a wide welcome for the new collected edition of Mr. T. E. Brown's poetry which Messrs. Macmillan are about to issue. Mr. Brown's circle of readers has hitherto been hearty rather than wide, the British public being doubly shy of poetry in a provincial dialect; but the poet who had Mr. W. E. Henley, Mr. Quiller-Couch, and Mr. Newbolt for pupils has good ambassadors to the public, even were his own poetry a less authentic passport to posterity than it is. It is only to be hoped that he has not posthumously trod on too many literary corns by the very frank criticism of contemporaries now revealed in his published correspondence.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. LXIV.
By B. G. LAWS, London.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play and mate in two moves

PROBLEM No. LXV.
By J. FRIDIZIUS, Sweden.
BLACK

WHITE.
White to play and mate in three moves.

It is highly interesting to observe how problemists imitate each other. Whether it is done unconsciously or not the fact remains that in many instances the similarities are glaring. Take No. 65, for example, a prize-winner years ago in the Manchester Weekly Times, and compare with it the following, which curiously enough is a competitor in the present tourney of the same journal:—PROBLEM No. 66.—White (6 pieces), K at Q Kt 2; Q at K Kt 8; B at K B sq; Kts at K 4 and Q 5; pawn at K B 3. Black (6 pieces), K at Q B 5; B at Q R 5; pawns at K 4, Q 5, Q 6, Q B 3. Two moves.

The present writer gave in the American Chess Magazine a number of examples, of which the following may suffice at present:—

PROBLEM No. 67, by F. M. Teed.—White (7 pieces), K at K R 5; Q at Q Kt 6; B at K Kt 6; Kts at Q Kt 4 and Q B 8; pawns at K B 3 and Q 5. Black (5 pieces), K at K 4; B at Q R 3; pawns at K R 3, K B 5, Q Kt 2. Two moves.

PROBLEM No. 68, by Dr. S. Gold.—White (6 pieces), K at Q B sq; Q at Q Kt sq; B at Q 5; Kt at Q B 8; pawns at K Kt 3, K 4. Black (5 pieces), K at K 4; B at Q R 3; pawns at K Kt 3, K Kt 4, K Kt 5, Q Kt 2. Two moves.

PROBLEM No. LXIX.
By J. K. HANSHEW, U.S.A.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White mates in three.

It is easy to miss the key of these little tit-bits, and thus lose the whole point of the argument. Various explanatory theories may be suggested, but nothing really satisfactory occurs to us. We have far too much confidence in the honour of problemists generally to suppose that flagrant plagiarism is possible in any but exceptional cases. The sneak move of the Queen, which is the feature of Nos. 67 and 68, originated, no doubt, in Mr. Hanshew's three-mover, which is appended. The solution is 1. P - K 6, P × R; 2. Q - Kt 8, getting behind B and Kt. One must move, and then comes mate by Q - R 8 or Q Kt 2.

20. Q R - Q sq	R × R	40. Q - R 5	Black wins (a)

(a) This singularly interesting contest, which is, we believe, unpublished in this country, is one to be followed in detail. The fight was singularly close and keen until move 40 when of course the blunder came. It could be called. 42. Q - K 4 ch, 41. K × P, R × P ch and wins. Note at move 27 the pretty P - K 6, threatening to win the queen.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The death of the Marquis of Bute removes a figure no less renowned in fiction than in real life. Disraeli did but scanty justice to him. Side by side with the spirit of piety and devotion which led "Lothair" into the bosom of the Roman Church, there was in the late Marquis a keen business capacity which enabled him to carry out large schemes for the benefit of his fellow men. He made Cardiff prosperous, and Cardiff in return made him its Mayor. A rather shy man, he was a scholar by temperament and a recognized authority on ecclesiology and Byzantine art and history.

* * * *

His contributions to literature included "The Early Days of Sir William Wallace," originally delivered in the form of a lecture at Paisley, the "Burning of the Barns of Ayr," the "Altars of St. Columba," a translation into English of the "Coptic Morning Service for the Lord's Day," and another of "The Roman Breviary." Lord Bute's books figure in the autumn announcements—a new edition of his translation of the "Roman Breviary," and a new work on "The Arms of the Baronial and Police Burghs of Scotland," of which he was joint author with Mr. J. H. Stevenson and Mr. H. W. Lonsdale. Messrs. Blackwood are the publishers of both volumes.

* * * *

One of Lord Bute's most recent adventures in the world of letters was a volume entitled "The Alleged Haunting of B— House," published last year. The book, edited by him in association with Miss Goodrich Freer, gave little scope for literary talent. In effect, it was issued to confute certain statements made in an anonymous article, entitled "On the Trail of a Ghost," which appeared in The Times of June 8, 1897. Lord Bute—who for some time previously gave money-aid to the Society for Psychical Research in order that it might carry on investigations into second sight—heard in the autumn of 1892 from a certain Father H. of psychical disturbances alleged to have been witnessed by him at Ballochin-house, which lies a few miles above Dunkeld. Desirous that these phenomena should be investigated in a scientific way, the Marquis became responsible for the rent of the house for a given period, during which several persons were invited by the Psychical Research Society to stay there. In order that the property might not suffer by reason of its supposed ghostly tenants, secrecy was enjoined, and not even in conversation with outsiders were guests to give the name of the house. To the end Lord Bute refused to publish the name, and his book shows that his paramount desire was, not to prove the existence of the ghosts, but that scrupulous investigation should be made into the alleged phenomena.

* * * *

We commented the other day on the novelist as politician; and we are sorry to note that Dr. Conan Doyle has had the experience, to which the names of Thackeray and Trollope give distinction, of seeking in vain the suffrages of the electorate. The irony of fate decreed that the creator of Sherlock Holmes should be defeated by a publisher. He had, at any rate, the satisfaction of knowing that he made a good fight for victory. The majority at the last contested election was reduced by more than 1,400 votes. And no doubt he has secured material, as some one has already suggested, for a new novel on Parliamentary life.

* * * *

Our congratulations, on the other hand, are due to Mr. Henry Norman, the elect of South Wolverhampton, and to Mr. Gilbert Parker, who defeated a strong local candidate in Mr. Harmsworth at Gravesend. Both are men of wide travel, but while Mr. Parker's specialty, so to speak, is Northern Canada, Mr. Norman has done his exploring chiefly in Russia, Siberia, China, and the East. Though not himself a novelist, the late assistant-editor of the Daily Chronicle connected himself with fiction by marrying, in 1891, the authoress of "Gallia" and "The Crook of the Bough." Of Mr. Parker's stories it is hardly necessary to speak, but we may perhaps hail as a happy omen, for the outset of his Parliamentary career, the title of his latest work "The Lane That Had no Turning."

* * * *

The closure during the whole month of September of the Print Room at the British Museum was a source of much inconvenience to several editors and publishers. In consequence, the intention of illustrating, from old prints and the like, some articles in the October monthlies had to be abandoned, and at least one important book has been delayed. But, then, the room must on occasions, however few, be cleaned and repainted.

* * * *

The rather sensational statements which have recently appeared regarding the Broughton papers at the British Museum are, we understand, beside the mark. The papers are simply withheld from the public, because they are in the binder's hands—every reader in the British Museum knows what that means—and will therefore not be available for two or three months. They were directed to be opened in 1900, which was done. They might have been made public in the earlier part of the year, but for the nine hundred and thirty volumes of the Hardwicke papers, which had to be brought out first. The Broughton papers, though of considerable value as State papers, have little or no interest for the general public. They contain no reference whatever to the Byron case. Their contents are pretty well known.

"After some small search," says Rousseau in his "Confessions," "we fixed on an estate at a very small distance from Chambéry, but as retired and solitary as if it had been an hundred leagues off." This house, Les Charmettes, to which he retired with Mme. de Warens "towards the latter end of the summer of 1736," is now advertised for sale. It is still in much the same state as it was at that famous period of its history. The garden, with the pavilion where the philosopher was wont to write, is much the same now as when he first saw it. We must hope that it will not fall into the hands of any proprietor who will alter it or pull it down.

* * * *

The story of Rousseau's sojourn there is one of the most fascinating episodes related in the "Confessions," though it is also a story in which it is hard to place implicit belief. The generally accepted allegation that the philosopher lived on terms of privileged intimacy with his middle-aged benefactress is not borne out by his published correspondence. His tone in his letters to Madame de Warens is always that of the adopted son, and never that of the accepted lover. Moreover, though the fact is generally ignored, the whole story was flatly contradicted by the "Memoirs of Madame de Warens," set forth and edited, after the appearance of the "Confessions," by General F. A. Doppet. These memoirs are, no doubt, a "fake" and a very dull "fake," too, but they evidently represent the contemporary public opinion of Chambéry, and are hardly less worthy of credence than Jean Jacques' irresponsible and vainglorious boasts. Rousseau's biographers have paid too little attention to them; and it is at least a tenable view that the love story in the "Confessions" was as pure romance as the love story in "La Nouvelle Heloise." One searches in vain for any independent confirmation of it. There certainly is none in the "Memoirs of Madame de Warens," written by her intimate friend M. de Conzié, and published some years ago by the Historical Society of Savoy.

* * * *

A pleasant, discursive little volume is "Cranford Souvenirs," by the Hon. Mrs. Lionel Tollemache (Rivingtons). The "souvenirs" of the title occupy but seven pages out of 148. The longest study is on Charles Victor de Bonstetten, the Swiss statesman and writer, and the friend of the poet Gray. We talk of Cranford nowadays just as we talk of the houses in Rochester and in London to which Pickwick and Sairey Gamp, and the Grandfather and the rest have given an immortal fame. We can locate them all, and so familiar are the incidents of which they were the scenes that they no longer seem to belong to the world of fiction. Mr. E. V. Lucas has lately introduced us once more to Cranford in a pleasant introduction to the last volume of Messrs. Methuen's "Little Library," containing a reprint of Mrs. Gaskell's novel. Mrs. Tollemache has a special proprietary interest in Cranford, for it was her home. Outside the gates of Tatton-park, where she lived before her marriage, stood the little town of Knutsford, and she knew Captain Brown and Mr. Holbrook, as well as Mrs. Gaskell herself. Mr. Holbrook is found by Mrs. Tollemache in the person of a Mr. Peter Leigh, a small squire with a penchant for weather prophecy. We should like to have heard something from her of Mr. Holland of Sandlebridge, near Knutsford. His grandson, Sir Henry Holland, gives in his "Recollections" an agreeable sketch of the yeoman of Sandlebridge, which certainly seems to bring Mr. Holbrook nearer to him than to Mr. Leigh, especially as Mrs. Gaskell tells us nothing of the Almanack and the Observatory. But she was doubtless loth to bite the picture in too accurately.

* * * *

There may be seen just now at Mr. W. T. Spencer's a characteristic letter by Ruskin, addressed to "My dear Dallas." One passage warrants transcription:—"One thing you said when I saw you last which I have had in mind to write to you concerning ever since—that 'Wordsworth's reputation was owing to Wilson.' Now Wordsworth's reputation so far as it is worth anything consists in the honour given him by men who owe to him the teaching of all that has been most precious to them in their modes of thought—as, for instance, myself among thousands more, and the men who do owe this to him would pay no more attention to any of Wilson's opinions on any subject than they would to those of the clown at the Surrey Theatre." The idea of the opinions of John Wilson—the "Christopher North" of Blackwood, it need hardly be said—being of no more account than those of a clown at a second-rate London playhouse would have shocked thousands at the beginning of the century; now it serves to raise a smile.

* * * *

Speaking of Ruskin we are reminded that the Society of Arts has been more prompt than is its wont in placing a tablet on the front of No. 54, Hunter Street, Brunswick-square, to the memory of Ruskin. The inscription, as usual, is of the simplest kind:—

John Ruskin,
Artist and Author,
Born Here.
D: 1900.

Ruskin, who had a good memory, tells us that "by the time I was four years old . . . there was just the least possible shade of shyness on the part of Hunter-street, Brunswick-square, towards Market-street, Croydon," where lived his maternal aunt. "But whenever my father was ill—and hard work and sorrow had already set their mark on him—we all went down to Croydon to be petted by my homely aunt and walk on Duppas Hill and the heather at Addington." Hunter-street, now a noisy thoroughfare through which omnibuses pass, has little attraction to-day.

* * * *

Mr. Beatty Kingston was what it is the custom to call a journalist of the old school. His books about the Kings and other great people whom he knew had a certain anecdotal value. He had represented the Daily Telegraph in various European capitals, and was a man of multifarious accomplishments. He could probably have earned his living as a professor of languages or as a pianist no less easily than as a representative of the Press. His polyglot attainments are the subject of enthusiastic comment in "Edmund Yates' Recollections." In Berlin he came to loggerheads with Prince Bismarck. He generally "did" International Exhibitions for his newspaper; and he had latterly acted as its foreign news editor.

* * * *

London seems to afford a fertile soil for the growth of new weekly papers, which spring up with a quite surprising suddenness. Mr. Clement Scott is responsible for the latest of our penny weeklies, which he has called the Free Lance, and decorated with a preface explanatory of his choice of title. Miss Marie Corelli is allowed to turn the full flood of her invective upon the unhappy journalist, passing at the end of her article, by an easy transition, to "The Master Christian" and its critics. Mr. Clement Scott himself criticizes, in his customary style, two plays—The Lackey's Carnival and The Wedding Guest, and Mr. Godfrey Turner provides a column or so of persiflage.

* * * *

The story of the poet Gray and his migration from Peterhouse is affording material for discussion in the New York Nation. With many other tales of eminent persons, it seems to have grown considerably by the lapse of time. Even Mr. Leslie Stephen, in the "Dictionary of National Biography," makes the poet descend his rope-ladder and find himself immersed in a tub of water. But Nichol's "Illustrations" publishes a letter from the Rev. John Sharpe, who was a fellow of Corpus Christi College when the affair took place, in which he makes no mention of the tub. These are Mr. Sharpe's words, written only six days after the date of Gray's admission to Pembroke:—

> . . . The other morning, Lord Percival and some Petrenchians, going a-hunting, were determined to have a little sport before they set out, and thought it would be no bad diversion to make Gray bolt, as they called it, so ordered their man, Joe Draper, to roar out fire. A delicate white night cap is said to have appeared at the window, but finding the mistake, retired again to the couch. The young fellows, had he descended, were determined, they said, to have whipped the butterfly up again.

The tub and the immersion appear to be later accretions. But the correspondence in the Nation adds a sting to the reproach that Americans seem to take a far closer interest in the lives of our famous men than we ourselves do.

* * * *

We gave the other day details of the decree of the French Minister of Education upsetting the traditional rules of French syntax. The Academy immediately decided to appoint a special committee on the matter, and M. Hanotaux was chosen reporter. His report, although not yet officially made public, is known to be conciliatory, so that those who anticipated a conflict between the Academy and the State will be disappointed. The chief item in M. Leygues' decree was the question of the agreement of participles with noun and verb. M. Hanotaux reports in favour of an important alteration in the rigour of the rules which govern this agreement. We hope to return to the subject when the report appears.

* * * *

Mr. Alfred Hamonet writes on this subject from 85, St. Helen's-gardens, North Kensington, W.:—

> Your readers are perhaps already aware that all minds do not agree on this subject. M. Michel Bréal, no mean authority, in a letter published in Le Temps of September the 7th, says:—
> Les réformateurs se trompent s'ils croient servir la cause du Français à l'étranger. Anglais, Allemands, Italiens, Suédois, et, je crois bien, tous autres maîtres, hors de France, ne veulent pas qu'on se mette à leur portée; ils prétendent enseigner le Français avec ses délicatesses et ses difficultés.
> Allow me, Sir, to ask you whether any of your readers could explain why foreign teachers should wish to retain the blocks causing their pupils so many tumbles in their walks over the French language. It is hardly credible.

* * * *

Mlle. de Menant is the first woman who has ever been sent on a mission by the French Academy and Government. She left for India a few days ago to continue her studies of the Zoroastrian community in Guzerat and to collect documents, &c., concerning the aborigines of the Travancore Hills. The collections she makes will be placed in the Natural History Museum. The French Ambassador in London has been instructed to request the English Government to give her all possible assistance in her researches. Mlle. de Menant is the authoress of a History of the Parsees.

School Books.

It is impossible to contemplate the immense number of school books published nowadays—a further instalment of which we review in another column—and not to realize that they have opened a new chapter in the history of education. The facility with which books are printed and published is as important an influence in that history as the teaching of Ascham or Pestalozzi. That, however, is rather too large a subject to discuss at the moment. The lay person may sometimes wonder why a new French grammar should appear every month, and a new edition of Virgil almost as often. When the current has once begun to flow it is not surprising that it should increase rather than diminish in volume. School books in the first place are a source of much profit; for if they once secure a sale, the sale is necessarily a large one. The question is not whether Jones maximus shall have a new book on Latin prose composition, but whether the entire form to which he belongs shall have it, and that means a large and continuing sale. Also the old books, useful as they may be, become exhausted, and the master wants a new stock of examples. The growth of specialization and of new educational subjects—such as English literature—also tend to the multiplication of books. It is, at any rate, satisfactory that they should increase not only in number but in quality, though the advance in this particular is more noticeable in some cases than in others. "Notes," generally and rightly placed nowadays at the end and not under the text, have become far more workmanlike, and far less demoralizing, during the quarter of a century which separates Anthon from Sidgwick. The teaching of French and German, though we should regret as much as any one the neglect of the rigorous grammatical method, has certainly gained by the large number of selections now published from contemporary literature. The exponents of English literature for schools must be said at present to be feeling their way towards a right method. The modern history text-book has not, to our thinking, improved upon the model set by Collier, and later by Professor York Powell. The science text-book must always leave a good deal to the teacher. But the pupil must rely partly upon his own book work, and it is doubtful whether the exactitude and lucidity of the best recent school books is really so helpful as the method adopted in the excellent little science primers published twenty years ago under the eye of that master of exposition, Professor Huxley. In pure mathematics, on the other hand, the present tendency to simplify processes is certainly a step in the right direction. Generally speaking the note of the modern school book is to do more and more for the pupil, in the way of intelligent help, and leave less and less to the teacher. A proper system of training of secondary teachers might very likely act in the other direction. There ought certainly to be less hearing of lessons from a book and more discussion. Bacon's maxim that "Conference maketh a ready man" should be followed in the interest of both master and scholar. But if supplemented by oral instruction notes such as we generally get in a school edition of to-day are invaluable. They are great time-savers. They subserve the purpose of what has been called sign-post criticism, and if the dangers of learning by rote are avoided, they stimulate faculties of thought and observation. A thorough study of Conington's Virgil is an indelible lesson in critical analysis, and in a less degree smaller books achieve the same result. The cry for the pure text, the complaint that literary taste and enjoyment are smothered under a mass of commentary may easily be exaggerated. Even Shakespeare without a commentary must often be grievously misunderstood. And after all literary taste is not a spontaneous growth. A good deal of scorn has been poured on the head of those commentators who point to and explain the beauties of literary masterpieces. Yet an Art teacher does not leave his pupils to find out for themselves the beauties of artistic masterpieces. The commentator's function is to develop the literary judgment of boys by spurring it into exercise, and he will do it better than an indifferently equipped teacher "spooning literary jargon into their mouths." There is at any rate a chance of his making them think, a process in which they would not otherwise engage. We only wish the principle were adopted in the official catalogues of our art galleries and museums. We should not then see a crowd of aimless wanderers pathetically seeking guidance from the directors and finding nothing but a bald and unmeaning description with names and dates. The tendency of educational books is to give as much help as possible to the pupil—not only to instruct and explain, but to educate and stimulate—and until we have a supply of "heaven-born teachers" for every form in every secondary school, the tendency must, we believe, be regarded as the right one.

Personal Views.

ON BATTLES AND THEIR NARRATORS.

"Every battle of the warrior," wrote the prophet Isaiah, "is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood." Between his age and our own there have been plenty of worthy folks who have never arrived at any clearer notion of military operations than that they involve many loud and discordant sounds, abhorrent to the philosophic ear, and that they are attended with a lamentable loss of human life. Thus felt many a cloistered chronicler of the Middle Ages, and thus, too, some of our modern historians, who by their denunciation of the emptiness of "drum and trumpet history" have tried to conceal from themselves and their readers the fact that they have never succeeded in grasping the meaning and the inwardness of a battle. Military history, nevertheless, has to be written, and it has occurred to me that it may not be uninteresting to set down the way in which it must be constructed, and the limitations that exist to our power of gaining accurate and useful information as to its details.

Before the special correspondent was invented there were three main sources from which the tale of a campaign could be worked out—official despatches and reports, the letters and memoirs of the soldier, and the books of the professed historian.

Of these the first class is in many ways the most unsatisfactory. All through history, ancient and modern, official documents have erred both in the direction of the suppressio veri and in that of the suggestio falsi. Napoleon's camp can not have been the first in which the phrase "to lie like a Bulletin" was current. Sennacherib, as his inscriptions show, was a past master of the art of suppressing "untoward incidents" and "regrettable occurrences." Sulla's despatch on the battle of Chæronea, wherein he declared that he had defeated 80,000 good troops and slain three-fourths of them, with a total loss to his own legions of twelve killed and two missing, must have moved Napoleon to envy when he read his Plutarch. For the Emperor was not accustomed to divide his own casualty list by more than two or three on publication, and he seldom did more than double the losses of the Austrians or Russians whom he had beaten. Sulla put him to shame.

Of course there have been, and there are, plenty of generals who have written their despatches in perfect good faith, and with a fixed intention of telling the truth. But over and above the usual causes of human error in narration, the general is afflicted by special ones of his own. He must not frighten his Government at home, but must put the best face on affairs, lest he be perchance recalled. He must not discourage his army, who will sooner or later read what he has written. He must not give information that may, even after some lapse of time, be useful to the enemy. Wellington used to declare that one of the most valuable sources of news which the French in Spain possessed consisted of official documents republished in the English journals. This was perfectly true; there is a letter extant in which Napoleon upbraids one of his Marshals for concealing the fact that he had lost guns in a battle. "The English despatches," wrote the Emperor, "give the number of cannon that they took; why has this fact been concealed from me?" This is a fine testimony to the confidence which Bonaparte placed in the relative veracity of his own lieutenant and of Wellington. But it has other morals also.

But it is not only political and military reasons that often prevent a general in the field from writing the whole truth. There are many disturbing causes of a personal nature. A beaten commander is often on the look-out for a scapegoat among his subordinates, on to whose back—rightly or wrongly—he may transfer a portion of his own responsibility. On the other hand, when things have come right in the end, it often seems a pity to dig up old grievances, and the offender gets off lightly. To avoid the necessity for present unpleasantnesses and future discussions, many a commander has bottled up his wrath, and refrained from any public censure of an incompetent lieutenant or a battalion which has disgraced itself at the front. The former can be quietly "Stellenbosched," and the latter sent back to guard lines of communication. Let those who need an example read Wellington's mention of the Prince of Orange and the Dutch-Belgian army in his Waterloo despatch, and compare them with the Duke's private expressions concerning the "d — d D — h," to use the expressive euphemism of 1815. The rash and meddlesome young Prince and his evasive troopers got no word of blame; but public opinion quite understood the situation. It is curious to reflect what a strange and distorted picture of Waterloo would be produced by an attempt to reconstruct the battle by patching together Wellington's official report and Napoleon's bulletin of June 21. Yet there is many a battle in history whose tale has to be told from documents of a similar nature, simply because no independent narrative of it has chanced to survive.

With all their faults commanders usually endeavour in their despatches to give some sort of a general account of the operations for which they have been responsible, though with reticences and euphemisms which often make it valueless. Quite other are the faults and merits of the second class of documents from which military history has to be reconstructed—the letters, memoirs, and reminiscences of eye-witnesses. It is almost impossible for any one outside the staff of the commanding officer to get a comprehensive view of the whole of an action. Even when battlefields and armies were small, and when the engagement which settled the fate of a campaign could be fought within the limits of a single square mile, the regimental officer could rarely see anything that went on beyond the flanks of his own battalion. He had too much to do in looking after his own corner of the field, and keeping his own men together, to allow him the wish or the leisure to find out what was going on a few hundred yards to the east or the west of him. Panoramic battles like Balaclava—where 40,000 men could watch the result of a charge—are the rarest things in history. But when the military eye-witness is content to describe exactly what went on in his own quarter of the fight, and does not launch out into tales of what happened in other parts of the line, he is invaluable. The ideal account of a battle is that which is constructed by a competent author carefully putting together and comparing the evidence of as many eye-witnesses as he can catch and cross-question. He will find that it is impossible to make them all agree, but the main facts will emerge from the evidence of the majority. This, we cannot doubt, is how Thucydides worked in ancient days. In modern times the best example of the proper use of the method that I know was made by Captain Siborne in constructing his admirable account of the campaign of 1815. The raw material contained in the vast bulk of "Waterloo Letters" that he gathered together contains some of the most interesting reading in the world. He worked by collecting the written evidence of hundreds, rather than scores, of witnesses, with the most admirable results. If he had but possessed a tithe of the literary skill and narrative power of some of his contemporaries, he might have been placed among the best of military historians. As it is, not one-fifth so many readers peruse him as go through Napier's "Peninsular War." For Napier, the most inspired but not always the most accurate of military writers, made every page of his six volumes glow with his own energy and eloquence. His versions of the charge of the Fusiliers at Albuera and of the storming of the great breach at Badajoz will live as models of vigorous narrative as long as the English language is spoken.

In going through the mass of evidence given by eye-witnesses, which is available for the reconstruction of a modern battle, two or three sources of error soon strike the compiler. The first is that even an honest witness has a tendency to improve his story when once he gets into the habit of retelling it. This it is which makes the version of any fight written down a few days after it has occurred so much more valuable than the version which is only compiled after a long interval. There are plenty of books of memoirs in which the author, apparently in all good faith, represents himself as having seen things which it was physically impossible that he should have witnessed—occasionally things that never happened at all. Many a man has such an instinctive tendency to turn all his experiences into a kind of epic, with himself as the hero, that in the course of a few years he succeeds in persuading himself that he remembers that which he has really invented. I do not quite credit the famous old story that George IV. talked himself into the belief that he had been present at Waterloo. But there are things almost as absurd in the memoirs of Marbot and Thiébaud, both of whom only wrote out their reminiscences in their old age, when they had well "rounded off" all their more thrilling adventures.

Another not unfrequent source of error is the fact that after a day of intense excitement and fatigue the memories of many men play them strange tricks. Just as there are instances of those who profess to have seen that which—as a matter of fact—never occurred, so there are others of those who retain no recollection of stirring episodes which must have passed under their very eyes. Stranger still is it to find in some cases a complete inversion of the order of time, a fixed belief that the first of two events occurred after the second, in spite of conclusive external evidence to the contrary. It would seem that in the storm and stress of conflict some minds retain a vivid memory of incidents, without being in the least able to place them in their proper relation to each other. Still more common is a clear recollection of the early part of an engagement, combined with a practical oblivion of its later stages, when the brain has grown dazed and fatigued by the long-protracted excitement of battle. I have never met with the opposite phenomenon—a confused memory of beginnings, and a precise impression of later incidents. The man who loses his head early seems seldom to recover his power of accurate observation; it is quite usual for a witness to confess that after the first wave of battle-fever passed over him, he has no clear and definite memory of any subsequent incidents.

For much the larger half of history we have practically no assistance from either official despatches or the notes and memoirs of eye-witnesses. Only the formal narrative of the historian survives. From the old days of classical antiquity there has come down to us only one contemporary letter describing the author's personal experiences in a recent fight—that in which Galba related to Cicero his adventures at Forum Gallorum. We would give anything for a dozen such documents scattered across the wars of the elder world, from Thermopylæ to Adrianople; but we cannot get them. The next best evidence—the first-hand narratives of military men describing their own campaigns—that have survived are not much more numerous; Xenophon's "Anabasis" and Cæsar's "Commentaries" are the only prominent examples. Thucydides, Josephus, Ammianus, and Procopius had seen part, but only part, of the vast scenes of strife that they describe. The larger portion of the ancient history of the Art of War has to be collected from the works of men who were not professional soldiers, like Herodotus, Plutarch, Sallust, Livy, or Tacitus. Some of these writers had not the "military eye," others were writing with a view to rhetorical effect rather than accuracy, others to support some political thesis. We can never be sure that they selected the best evidence available, or went to work with an unprejudiced mind and a single-hearted wish to arrive at the real facts.

Matters grow even worse in the early middle ages; between Procopius and the First Crusade there is a gap of over 500 years, during which we have hardly one single detailed narrative by a competent eye-witness of any single campaign. The art of writing had fallen into the hands of the clerical caste, and even when the monk or priest saw some fragment of a campaign he was not competent to describe it. Instead of tactics we get banal generalities and moral reflections. With the Crusades things begin to improve; the first great military narratives of the modern world are Villehardouin's "Conquest of Constantinople" and Joinville's account of St. Louis' campaign in Egypt. The layman and the soldier had at last ceased to be dumb, and our knowledge of the military art at once expands. But besides these well-known works there are other records of eye-witnesses, like Fulcher of Chartres, Odo of Deuil, and the author of the French poem on Richard Cœur de Lion's exploits in Palestine, which give us interesting accounts at first-hand of the battles which we desire to investigate. The later Norse Sagas have the same value, though those which claim an earlier date are not to be trusted; we may gain some certainty as to the details of the campaigns of King Sverri, but not as to the exploits of Harald Hardrada and his predecessors.

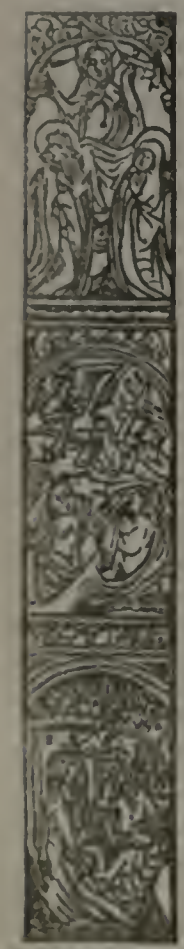
From the twelfth century onward the reconstruction of the history of the Art of War is comparatively easy, though there are plenty of dark corners where the want of an intelligent contemporary historian is sadly evident. The Wars of the Roses, for example, are not nearly so well known to us as the wars of Edward I. or Simon de Montfort, simply for want of good first-hand witnesses. The blight which fell upon English literature in the fifteenth century extended over every branch of composition, and the received accounts of Towton or Hexham are largely borrowed from Tudor historians of doubtful authority. It was not till the reign of Elizabeth that modern conditions as regards the evidence for things military began to prevail. But from the opening of the wars in Holland we are in a well-lighted path, and despatches, memoirs, letters, and formal histories all became available in plenty. The difficulty is no longer to obtain information, but to estimate the relative trustworthiness of each writer; and the ordinary canons of historical criticism are perfectly at our disposal. By the time of the great war between Charles I. and his Parliament, the difficulty in writing military history has already begun to be the same which we meet in the campaigns of to-day. The sources of evidence are so many that there is a danger lest we may "not see the wood for the trees." But this is the peril to which all modern research is exposed, and the History of the Art of War must take its chance no less than all other branches of historical study.

C. OMAN.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

BEFORE the age of William Pitt, its eponymous hero, the Cambridge University Press went through many vicissitudes. Its earlier history—the traditions of John Siberch, who set up the first press in Cambridge in 1521, the struggle against ecclesiastical prejudice and commercial jealousy which succeeded the appointment of Thomas Thomas as University printer some sixty years later, and the ups and downs of the press during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries—are all but forgotten nowadays. The facts are scattered, but, collected and strung together consecutively, they make one of the most interesting chapters in British typographical history.

Oxford had produced books more than forty years before Siberch came to Cambridge, but printing was not permanently established at either University until towards the end of the sixteenth century. Siberch has usually been identified with Siber or Sibert, who printed at Lyons between 1482 and 1498, but Mr. Graves, in the "Dictionary of National Biography," considers it more probable that he came to England from Cologne. There is no doubt, however, that he was a friend of Erasmus. Erasmus greets him in a letter, written from Basle on Christmas Day, 1525, to Dr. Robert Aldrich, of King's College, afterwards Bishop of Carlisle. The printer had apparently ceased operations at Cambridge when the great scholar's letter was written; at all events we lose sight of him after 1522, and the nine or ten books recorded under his name are the only fruits we have of the two years' work of his press. Erasmus' "De Conscribendis Epistolis" had been printed by him at Cambridge in 1521.



Siberch styled himself the first Greek printer in England, and one of his earliest productions, Linacre's Latin translation of "Galen de Temperamentis"—the prescribed text-book in the medical course of study—contains a little Greek matter which is believed to represent the earliest appearance of Greek metal types in England. But he left no book entirely printed in that character. Two years previously Caxton's pupil and successor at Westminster, Wynkyn de Worde, had introduced a few Greek words, cut in wood, in his edition of Whitenton's "Grammatica." Siberch worked his press at the sign of the Arma Regia (a fact which explains how he stamped the Royal arms of England and France on the sides of some of his books) facing St. Michael's Church, now part of Gonville and Caius College. The Bodleian contains a splendid example of the Linacre volume, printed on vellum in the original binding, and bearing the Royal arms, the identical copy presented by Linacre to Henry VIII. That Monarch in 1534 gave the University a special licence to appoint from time to time three stationers or printers—the terms were virtually synonymous in those days—empowered to print all manner of books approved of by the Chancellor and his vice-gerent or three doctors, and to sell these and any other works passed by the same censors. By means of this censorship the opponents of the Reformation hoped to suppress heretical literature in the University, but it is curious that one of the stationers appointed in pursuance of the Royal decree was Sygar Nicholson, of Gonville Hall, who had been charged in 1529 with holding Lutheran opinions and harbouring Lutheran works. The proctors' accounts mention that fagots for burning Nicholson's books on that occasion cost the University a groat.

The Raid of 1583.

The licensed press was strangely unproductive. After Siberch's last volume in 1522, there is no record of another book from a Cambridge press for sixty-two years. The Oxford press was barren for a very similar period. Printing in England had, at first, developed too rapidly; the intolerant Church, which began by countenancing the art, grew fearful of its possibilities, and the censorship established in 1530, together with the Reformation tumult, led to serious deterioration both in the quantity and quality of the books printed in England. Printing, during Mary's reign, was confined to the members of the Stationers' Company, founded about 1556, and trade jealousy on the Company's part seems to have had something to do with the delay in re-establishing the press at Cambridge. When Elizabeth had reigned some eighteen or nineteen years, however, the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of the University determined to assert their independence in the matter. In 1577, Lord Burghley, objecting "to prejudice the Queen's Grants," discouraged their proposal to restore the art of printing in the University, but they settled the question in 1582 by appointing Thomas Thomas, a Fellow of King's College, as University printer, the first of a long and honourable line which has remained unbroken to the present day. "The circumstances that attended Thomas' first year of office," writes Mr. Mullinger, in his invaluable history of the University to the accession of Charles I., to which we are indebted for much of our information, "were by no means of favourable augury. Among the most rising scholars at Cambridge at this time was the eminent William Whitaker, Fellow of Trinity College, who had succeeded in 1580 to the Regius Professorship of Divinity. In 1583, Thomas was entrusted with a work by Whitaker for publication, and the reputation already acquired by the author caused its appearance to be awaited with some interest. Other books were also in preparation, when suddenly the agents of the Stationers' Company appeared upon the scene and seized the press, the whole plant, and all the printed sheets on which they could lay hands. The humiliation and pecuniary loss inflicted by this summary proceeding roused the spirit of the University, and a formal demand was despatched by the Vice-Chancellor and Heads to the Bishop of London (by whose authority the seizure had been sanctioned), for the restitution of the property, and at the same time an urgent appeal was addressed to Burghley, imploring his good offices for the protection of the University in the exercise of its ancient privileges." The Bishop was John Aylmer, hardened since the time when he watched over the education of Lady Jane Grey, and now distinguished by his zeal against the Puritans. The correspondence which followed upon the Cambridge raid reads rather curiously in days when the liberty of the press is merely a matter of historic interest.

"That Puritan Cambridge Printer."

In their report to Burghley, the Bishop and the wardens of the Stationers' Company added insult to injury by describing Thomas Thomas as "a man utterlie ignorant in printing and pretending to be the printer to the Universitie of Cambridge," and also pointed out the danger to the commonwealth involved by the activity of a press "farre from ordinarie research." There were already fifty-three printers in London, urged the wardens, and on that account alone a press at Cambridge was less necessary than it had ever been. Then follows a delightfully naive proposal to the Bishop on the part of the wardens:—"And we will recompense the said schollar for all his charge that he hath been in the suite aforesaide, and also paie him to the full for all such instrumentes as he hathe already provided, and withal be most ready to doe to the saide Universytie or arrange there such acceptable service in printinge as anye waie he is or mighte be able. And herein we proteste and think in our consciences we doe the said schollar a greate good turne and are a meane that he doe not undoe himself." The University authorities, on their part, stoutly defended their printer, "whom we know to be a very godly and honest man," but it was not until the following March that Burghley, having been assured as to the validity of the charter of Henry VIII. by the Master of the Rolls Sir Gilbert Gerrard (himself a Cambridge M.A.), wrote authorizing the reinstatement of Thomas.

Thomas, besides being "a very godly and honest man," and printer to the University, was an accomplished scholar, like many other early printers. He compiled a Latin dictionary with such assiduity that his health broke down and he died shortly after its completion—not, however, before the Stationers' Company had pirated the work, together with other books printed by him, whereby, to quote the letter which the Vice-Chancellor and Heads wrote to Lord Burghley on the subject, he was "almost utterly disabled." Thomas, by the way dedicated his dictionary to Lord Burghley. It went through five impressions in eight years, and in 1611 had reached its fourteenth edition.

In the dedication to Lord Chancellor Bacon of the eleventh edition of the dictionary, published in 1619, the following tribute was paid to Thomas' memory by John Legate, his successor:—

> He was about thirty years ago a famous printer among your Cantabrigians; yes, something more than a Printer such as we now are, who understand the Latin that we print no more than Bellerophon the letters he carried, and who sell in our shops nothing of our own except the paper black with the press's sweat. But he, a companion of the Stephenses and of the other, very few, printers of the true kind and best omen, was of opinion that it was men of learning, thoroughly imbued with academic studies, who should give themselves to cultivating and rightly applying that illustrious benefit sent down from heaven and given to aid mankind and perpetuate the arts. Accordingly what more fit than that when he had wrought what was worthy of type, he should himself, needing aid of none, act as midwife to his own progeny?

Meantime the University had increased the suspicion and mistrust with which both Aylmer and Whitgift regarded its printing operations by producing a new translation in English of Travers' heretical "Disciplina." "Ever sens I hard," wrote the indignant Archbishop, "that they had a printer at Cambridge I did greatlie fear this and such like inconveniences wold followe," and at his urgent request every impression of the work that could be traced was burned. If Whitgift could have had his way he would probably have put an end to the press as well; he did suggest that it should be subjected to the same strict rules under which her Majesty's printers worked; but nothing came of it. In 1586, two years later, Thomas Thomas, whom "Martin Marprelate" called "that Puritan Cambridge printer," made matters worse by undertaking to publish "The Harmony of the Confessions of Faith of Christian and Reformed Churches," which Aylmer had previously condemned in London. "The Harmony," being subsequently pronounced an illegal publication, was in due course printed; but the incident did not improve the relationship existing between the press and the ecclesiastical powers.

Still Working Under Difficulties.

University publishing, indeed, was never more grievously handicapped than in those days. Besides being opposed by the Church the sister presses of Oxford and Cambridge were systematically victimized by the unscrupulous publishers of London, who pirated the University volumes (there was no copyright law to prevent them), and undersold the legitimate publishers. The Universities retaliated by forbidding the local booksellers to buy or sell any books printed in London or elsewhere in England when an edition had already been produced or was in contemplation at either Oxford or Cambridge, "under pain of perpetual banishment and confiscation of such books," the students being also prohibited the purchase of these editions. That was in 1585-86, and the Star Chamber added to the hardships by restricting the number of presses and apprentices at each University to "one at one tyme at the most."

Thomas' successor at Cambridge was John Legett or Legate, a London stationer, who was the first to use the device of the "Alma Mater Cantabrigia" and "Hinc lucem et pocula sacra" round it. He remained at the head of the press until the seventeenth century was seven or eight years old—hindered continually by the jealousy of the Stationers' Company and worried repeatedly by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. His immediate successors for many years fared no better, and the Great Rebellion brought other excitements to distract their attention. When Cromwell seized Cambridge in 1643, Thomas Buck and Roger Daniel were partners as University printers, and only a year previously had printed their fine edition of Beza's Greek and Latin Testament. Last year, it will be remembered, the Cambridge University Press published a facsimile reproduction of the "Codex Bezæ," as it is generally called, the manuscript of which is preserved in the University Library. In 1628-29 Buck and his partner were accused by the Stationers of having broken a decree of the Star Chamber, but the Lord Chief Justice, after consulting with six other Judges, advised the Privy Council that no patent for sole printing restrained the privilege of the University Press under the licence of the Chancellor, or the Vice-Chancellor and doctors. Two years later, however, the Privy Council limited the privilege of the University to a yearly impression of 3,000 "Lilly's Grammars" and "Common Prayers with Singing Psalms," without restraint of number, the only condition being that the Bible was to be bound with them. The Long Parliament abolished the Star Chamber, but fresh restrictions continued to trammel the printing press throughout the country. These restrictions were succeeded by the Licensing Act and its renewals, which did not expire until 1694. Then the art of printing gradually revived, presently encouraged by the passing of the first Copyright Act, and greatly aided in another forty years or so by the improvements in type-founding. At Cambridge, as we shall presently see, the end of the seventeenth century brought a much-needed change in the prospects of the University Press.

The "Pitt Press" Building and its Predecessors.

In its early days the press had no home of its own; its work was done at the houses of the University printers. One of our illustrations shows Mr. Buck's building—"which said house," wrote the Rev. William Cole, who preserved the sketch, "tho' just behind the east end of St. Benedict's Church and Corpus Christi College, is nothing more than the Refectory of the Austin Friars, and is complete, only made into 3 stories." The first attempt of the press to start its own building was made through John Field, who succeeded Buck—then sole printer—in 1650. Field, on behalf of the University, took a lease of the ground near Queen's College, and built the printing house which was in use until the present century. Another building was added to the north of this in 1690, when, thanks to the energy of Mr. Bentley, and the patronage of the Duke of Somerset, new life was instilled into the press. The Duke had been elected Chancellor in 1689, and he came to the assistance of the press of his University in much the same way that Bishop Fell went to the rescue of the Clarendon Press some thirty years before. Contributing considerable sums of money himself and obtaining benefactions from others, he helped largely to improve and renovate the business. The two buildings were used until 1716, when the more modern house was made over to the Professors of Anatomy and Chemistry, a Grace of the Senate stating that it was of no other use to the University. The press then confined its operations to the older building, which stood at the corner of Silver-street and Queen's-lane, with a range of warehouses extending eastward from it.

From ALTAR SERVICE, 1714. 4to. By J. Smith.

The circumstances which led to the adoption of the name "Pitt Press" are best set forth in Clark and Willis' 'Architectural History of the University.' Strictly speaking, the name "Pitt Press" only applies to part of the existing buildings, which were erected in 1831, with the balance of the money subscribed for the Pitt Statue in Hanover Square. The University had already shown a disposition to honour the memory of her distinguished son, first by allowing a statue to be placed in the Senate House, and afterwards by accepting £1,000 offered by the Committee for managing the Statue to found a Pitt Scholarship. It is suggested in the "Architectural History" that circumstances may have induced the London Pitt Club to turn their attention to Cambridge when considering the purposes to which the surplus fund at its disposal might best be devoted. Dr. Monk, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who had been Professor of Greek at Cambridge from 1808 to 1822, is believed to have originated the idea, but the first definite proposal came in a letter to Vice-Chancellor Lamb from Lord Camden, chairman of the Committee and Chancellor of the University. The Committee, he said in a subsequent letter, "feel that it will be a most flattering addition to the character and reputation of Mr. Pitt that his name should be connected with that press from which emanate works of enlightened literature and profound learning, and they trust they will be able to add to the magnificent improvements now proceeding at Cambridge by the erection of a building which will adorn and decorate the University." That was in June, 1821, but four years elapsed before the committee began seriously to consider the nature of the proposed building. The design submitted by the architect, E. Blore, was accepted towards the end of 1829, and the first stone laid by Lord Camden in October, 1831. The committee meantime, had discovered that the Hanover-square statue would cost more than the members anticipated (Chantry received £7,000 for it), and they were unable to carry out their original plan of paying for all the additions required for the completion of the press. The cost of the buildings which could not be included in the range next Trumpington-street was accordingly defrayed by the University. The new home of the press took about eighteen months to build and cost exactly £10,711 8s. 9d. On April 28th, 1833, in the presence of the undergraduates and the dignitaries of the University, Lord Camden handed the key to Dr. Webb, the Vice-Chancellor. "Like the building in our sister University," said the Vice-Chancellor in reply to Lord Camden's speech, "which bears the name of Lord Clarendon, this is dedicated to the memory of him whose counsels upheld and whose guidance preserved this country amid the torrent of anarchy and infidelity which overwhelmed the neighbouring nations, raising it to a dignity and eminence which rendered it the refuge and sanctuary of religion and virtue." Undergraduates have since dubbed the impressive-looking building in Trumpington-street the "Freshman's Church," and the gateway tower at a first glance certainly gives one the impression that it is an ecclesiastical structure of some sort. It used to be a favourite hoax with Cambridge students to send the uninitiated newcomer to church there, but the meaning of the epithet is too well known to make the trick worth playing nowadays.

Bibles and Other Books.

Cambridge University, until 1873, had its publishing done through the agency of various London firms, but in that year the press established its own publishing warehouse in Paternoster-row, removing the business in 1881 to the present address in Ave Maria-lane. In the first instance this branch of the business was conducted by Mr. C. J. Clay, who was University printer from 1854 to 1891. It is now managed by his sons, Mr. J. Clay and Mr. C. F. Clay, though the publishing imprint of the firm remains C. J. Clay and Sons.

At the time of the revision of the Bible in 1870-1885 Cambridge was represented by Mr. C. J. Clay and Dr. W. Aldis Wright; Oxford by Mr. Frowde and the Rev. Bartholomew Price. It is hardly necessary to repeat that the Revised Version is the joint property of the two Universities, which voted £20,000 to the expenses of publication, or that the copyright of the Authorized Version and the Book of Common Prayer are vested in the Crown, the right to print them in England being granted by charter to Oxford and Cambridge and by licence to the Queen's printer. The Cambridge Press, like that of Oxford, uses its privilege to the full, issuing Bibles in almost every variety of size and type. One of its historic possessions is a facsimile of the massive Bible, originally printed on vellum, and splendidly bound, for the use of William IV. The chief interest attaching to this volume lies in the fact that its first eight pages were taken off the press at Cambridge by Lord Camden (then Chancellor of the University), the Duke of Northumberland (High Steward of the University), the Duke of Cumberland, Prince George of Cambridge, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Hardwicke, and the Vice-Chancellor of the University. The Press has lately given special attention to the correct printing of the Prayer-book and the present standard for printing all Cambridge editions is the new Minister's Prayer-book in large octavo (1896), to which the late Archbishop Benson, who was anxious that his University should move in the matter, gave his approval. The press to-day is also very active in the production of mathematical literature—a branch of printing which obviously calls for exceptional skill; and the Cambridge printers have reason to be proud of their achievements in this direction. Yet towards the end of the last century William Ludlam, who published his "Mathematical Essays" and "Rudiments of Mathematics" at Cambridge, complained that the press was so extremely defective in mathematical types that he was obliged to make many a brass rule himself. This, however, had been fully remedied before 1824, and the collected scientific papers which the press is now producing are worthy monuments to the memory of the University's greatest mathematicians. It would make our record wearisome to give a list of the masterpieces of erudition produced under the parental care of the Cambridge Press; we need not go beyond Professor Jebb's edition of Sophocles, now nearing completion, to mention a work which is representative, in the best sense, of the Cambridge scholarship of to-day. And the "General History of Modern Times," which Lord Acton is editing, and which, it is hoped, will make a start this year, is one of the greatest literary enterprises ever undertaken in this country.

GERMAN PLAYS IN LONDON.

Iphigenia, Nora, Magda! They are the three heroines of the plays presented last week at St. George's-hall by the German Dramatic Society. At first sight it seems a strange combination and a far cry from Greek mythology to the modern problem play. But one feature is common to all these dramas—it is the woman who is paramount, it is the woman who solves the knot in so far as it may be solved. Iphigenia and Magda, though each in a very different way, are at war with circumstances; Nora, through lack of wise training, is overcome by them. And Goethe's Iphigenia is not the demi-goddess of classical antiquity, but a living, breathing woman, the pure, innocent member of an accursed race (exactly as Helene is in Hauptmann's play Before Sunrise), a woman feeling the loneliness of exile, the uselessness of her life. And yet it is not all useless, since by what she herself names the not ignoble weapons of a woman—dignity, love, tenderness, unselfishness—she saves her brother from physical and moral ruin. The happy ending, the generally domestic tenour of the story, lend themselves particularly to modern treatment, and indeed make the fable attractive in every guise. "How many Iphigenias have been written!" said Goethe. "Yet they are all different, for each writer manages the subject after his own fashion."

The literary beauty of Goethe's play is of the highest kind. In language of the greatest charm and simplicity, in the most melodious verse, are embodied various emotions—rage and fury, love and tenderness, religious faith, patriotism and family affection. The lines were exquisitely rendered by Maria Pospischil, of Hamburg, and she succeeded in imparting a melodious charm to the German language that was as delightful as it was unexpected.

Poor Nora Helmer! Life had made a fool of her. Most of the women who discover that fact—and they are not few—acquiesce in it and endure their lot silently to the bitter end. Ibsen had the courage to solve the problem in the only logical way. Nora's one firm conviction had been her husband's love for her—no matter what might change or disappear or have end, that would last for ever; she feared his anger, she dreaded the sacrifice he would naturally make in her behalf should he learn her fault, but one thing she did not fear—the failure of his love.

> Nora. When this crushing blow threatened me, I said to myself confidently, "Now comes the miracle." . . . I firmly believed that you would come forward, take everything upon yourself, and say, "I am the guilty one."
> Helmer.—Nora!
> Nora. You mean I would never have accepted such a sacrifice? No, certainly not. But what would my assertions have been worth in opposition to yours? That was the miracle I hoped for and dreaded. And it was to hinder that that I wanted to die.

The Doll's House is in many ways the best of Ibsen's plays in the more literary sense. Indeed, it is so good a play that bad acting could not entirely spoil it for any intelligent spectator. The most trifling incidents have their value, and even if we dislike the subject and the dramatist's portrayal of it we are bound to recognize in Nora and her husband persons whom we know; we are compelled, almost against our will, to pause and consider seriously things hitherto set aside as of no importance.

The character of Magda has been made familiar to London playgoers by the genius of Mrs. Patrick Campbell. And most persons are agreed that the rendering of the part by the English actress surpasses that of her German, French, and Italian sisters. And yet in some ways, despite even inferior acting, the play goes better in German than in French, English, or Italian. Although the main problem of the drama is the universal one of egoism versus altruism, the setting is purely German and provincial. In the translations that milieu is eliminated as far as possible, but its retention helps to explain Magda's character, especially the motives which lead her to revisit her home. Few persons can shake themselves free from their early influences. In a great play—and Heimat is a great play of its kind—the spectator is often struck on a second or third hearing by some fresh aspect hitherto unperceived. Thus the psychological interest of the play is considerably heightened if we regard the conflict as one not only between parent and child, but between two strong characters of similar obstinacy, of similar limitations, and both of them pure egoists.

The German actors take their art seriously and make up in careful training what they lack in inspiration. Maria Pospischil has genius, and we should like to see her in some tragic part. Irene Triesch, who played Nora and Magda, was in both cases too hysterical, and her alternations of mood were too sharply distinguished. Her best performance was in the scenes of the Doll's House after Nora's awakening. There she showed herself capable of real dramatic power.

Herr Schönfeld has issued a notice stating that his original intention to give a performance of the German favourite, Gespenster (better known perhaps as Ibsen's Ghosts), has been compulsorily abandoned, owing to its having been vetoed by the censor. Commenting upon this, a Berlin paper indignantly assured its readers that their compatriots in London were being deprived of the opportunity to witness this drama by the puritanical tyranny of Mr. Chamberlain! Evidently our contemporary's correspondent was confusing the Lord Chamberlain with the Colonial Secretary.

There is a certain ambiguity in this announcement in the prospectus of the Society:—

> As under the agreement existing between Germany and England the right of performing plays is freely granted to societies and clubs, the German Dramatic Society is in a position to select its repertoire, regardless of considerations as to whether the respective plays have been secured for performance by other parties.

If this merely means that authors and their assignees are so interested in the work of the Society that they are willing to waive their claims, there is nothing to be said except that they are very obliging. If, on the other hand, the Society considers itself entitled to over-ride those rights because it is a "club" and not a theatrical company, the voices of learned counsel demanding injunctions will probably be heard in the Courts. It is not possible to drive a coach and four through the Berne Convention, and deprive authors of their fees, by calling yourself a club any more than by calling yourself an amateur. If money is taken, whether at the doors or elsewhere, the fees must be paid; and we gather that the Society does propose to take money for its services.

THE DRAMA.

"THE LACKEY'S CARNIVAL."

For obvious reasons novels and plays about domestic servants can hardly be expected to give a true picture of their subject. In the first place the people who know all about it, the domestic servants themselves, do not write them. And the people who do write them, the people "upstairs," are prevented by class prejudice (not to mention the disgraceful way in which the horse-radish sauce was sent up to table last night) from taking an entirely unbiased view. It especially behoves them, therefore, to take for their motto "Noblesse oblige." To dwell upon the foibles and ignorance and vulgarity and knavery of their domesties hovers on the outer edge of snobbery. There is something too much of this, as we all feel, in Thackeray. And we like Dickens all the better because his sympathies extend to the kitchen. If I had a valet, I would not mind asking his opinion of Sam Weller, but if I had a French cook I should blush were he to catch me reading about M. Mirobolant. And if my housemaid gets a night out at the theatre, I can only hope she will not go to see The Lackey's Carnival at the Duke of York's. The play is not fair to the servants, who are represented as all vicious or ill-mannered, whereas, I take it, their class exhibits just about the same admixture of good and evil as any other section of the community. We have recently seen the proper—that is to say, the fair and kindly—treatment of the kitchen in Mr. Carton's play, Lady Huntworth's Experiment. The cook in that play (who, to be sure, is a Countess in disguise, but knows her place and is not above it) is a sensible, quiet, "comfortable" woman, as a cook should be. The housemaid is a giggling creature, with a shocking taste in hats, but honest and not more silly in her way than her mistress upstairs. If we are invited to laugh at the butler it is because of his oddities as a man and not because of his position as a menial. In a word, there is no touch of condescension in Mr. Carton's treatment of his subject, merely kindness and a sense of humour. Now, Mr. Jones satirizes the servants' hall as though he owed it a personal grudge. Here is a stage-direction characteristic of his temper:—

> Enter from ball-room, fanning herself, Mrs. Bissett, the housekeeper, a stout, panting, perspiring matron of forty-five, in her best silk dress.

No doubt stout housekeepers (like stout mistresses) "pant" and "perspire," but why insist upon it? And no doubt a panting and perspiring housekeeper might say, as Mrs. Bissett says, "If we'd eat as much supper as we've made noise we should have hurt ourselves"; but does any one (except Mr. Henry Arthur Jones) see the fun of making her say it? She says it at a servants' ball, and the ball is a pandemonium where every one gets tipsy and the maids kick up their heels, and the public in the stalls are invited to note what crude colours delight Mary Jane on festive occasions. Was this worth showing? I submit that it was not. I feel that not only this scene, but the whole treatment of the servants in the play, is in bad taste. It so happens that the autumn publishing season has produced in Paris a book, a too notorious book, by M. Octave Mirbeau, "Mémoires d'une Fille de Chambre," which also deals with the seamy side of domestic service. There are obscenities in it, and of course there are none in Mr. Jones' play; but the two works have much in common—a certain savageness of tone, a persistent pretence that the servants' hall and the drawing room are in a state of internecine warfare. If I mention the French book it is to show into what queer company a lapse of taste may lead even so generally wholesome and manly a writer as Mr. Jones.

The lackey of his title is a worthy companion to M. Mirbeau's fille de chambre. Thomas Tarboy is a mere scoundrel who has just enough veneer to masquerade as his master, and in that disguise to become possessed of foolish letters from an indiscreet lady. The lady becomes by marriage a member of the household in which Tarboy is valet, and the sequel may be guessed—a sequel of blackmail, leading, of course, to grave misunderstanding between the lady and her husband, and only terminated by the "peaching" of a fellow-servant whom Tarboy has seduced and abandoned. It is impossible to sympathize either with the foolish lady who has written love-letters to a plausible ruffian or with a husband whose jealousy prompts him to throttle her rather than to insist upon a disclosure of her secret. It is, indeed, impossible to sympathize with any one in the play, all the people upstairs being as fatuous and nearly as vulgar as the people in the servants' hall. Mr. Allan Aynesworth acts very cleverly as Tarboy, and a new actress, Miss Edith Wynne Matthison, makes a favourable impression in the ungrateful part of his foolish victim; but the whole thing leaves a nasty taste in the mouth.

An incident connected with the production of this play calls for passing comment, because it is a sign, and not an encouraging sign, of the times. The actress originally cast for the part of the wife threw up her part because the wife has to allude to her unborn child (the line is really essential to the piece) and the actress happened to have been lately married. If the private affairs of a lady were allowed to remain private affairs, the difficulty would never have occurred. But the public was either invited or invited itself to take note of the actress's marriage; it was chronicled (and I believe was illustrated) in the newspapers as though it were an event of public importance. Consequence: an artist is checked by curiosity and tittle-tattle about her private life in the full and free exercise of her art. Moral: obvious.

CHAUCER.

CHAUCER MEMORIAL LECTURES, 1900. Read before the Royal Society of Literature. Edited, with an Introduction, by PERCY W. AMES, F.S.A. (Asher and Co. 5s.)

The Royal Society of Literature has published a series of popular lectures on the work of Chaucer, as it appears "in the new light of modern criticism," to commemorate the quingentenary of the poet's death. Readers who are only slightly acquainted with Chaucer's Life and Times will find the most necessary data set out for them in an unpretentious and entertaining form. More advanced students may perhaps think that the lectures have sacrificed rather too much to their fear of being tedious; that when they concluded no further opportunity could arise for original work upon the poems they were "too quick despairers."

For, though the qualities of Chaucer's genius have been amply described over and over again, and though the features of his society are as familiar to us as Shakespeare's men and women, there is a number of questions which the critic may still put to himself and others without feeling guilty of vain repetition—put to himself, but perhaps not get answered. What was Chaucer's sincere and undissimulated attitude of mind to universal and serious interests—Love, Religion, Art, the value and significance of Life? These questions may be asked without falling into an excess of solemnity—into priggishness. Indeed, against a temperament so invariably arch as Chaucer's, an excess of seriousness defeats itself. No one has held himself less bound than Chaucer to express his own sentiments, even when professing to speak from his own mouth. There is not in these lectures such a misdirection of seriousness as in Dr. Morris' discovery of Chaucer's esteem of marriage, expressed by January's liquorish encomium of the matrimonial sacrament, but—lightly as the intellectual and psychological side has been dealt with—Mr. Ames has erred in the same manner when he twists Chaucer's humorous reminder that no one has ever returned from heaven or hell, to say how men fare there, into a distinction "between knowledge derived from tradition and taught by authority and knowledge capable of verification."

For a rapid survey, then, of Chaucer's poetry, its origins, and its social setting, these lectures may be fairly commended. Mr. Imbert Terry has discoursed of Langland, Gower, Hoccleve, and Lydgate. Mr. Davey has illustrated the "Canterbury Tales" from the "Paston Letters." Mr. Axon has compared most of the passages in Chaucer's works, which are derived from the Italian, with their originals. Mr. Percy Ames, the editor, has worked up into a very readable form the biographical details given in Professor Skeat's "Student's Chaucer."

A really valuable article, involving much research, has been contributed by the editor of the Magazine of Art, dealing with the extant portraits. He draws special attention to the Seddon, or Fairfax Murray, portrait, the only one, after Hoccleve's, which can make any claim to authenticity. Of this Mr. Holman Hunt had said that "not being by a highly-skilled painter, it had so many delicate touches about the eyes and nostrils that such a painter could hardly have produced it except from life." Mr. Spielmann believes it may be identical with a traditional portrait said to have been "in the possession of George Greenwood, of Chasleton, in Gloucestershire." The reproductions of the various portraits are exceedingly interesting, and the printing excellent throughout the book.

THE HERO AS DANDY.

THE PAGEANTRY OF LIFE. By CHARLES WHIBLEY. (Heinemann. 6s.)

Mr. Charles Whibley is a very clever young man, and like a great many other clever young men he is not proof against the temptation to adopt a pose. Whether he always adopts the same pose we do not know; but here, at all events, we have him in the attitude of an awestruck admirer of the Beaux and Dandies. Ostensibly, indeed, the scope of his hero worship is a little wider than this. He presents us with a gallery of more or less notable persons whom he introduces as Artists in Life; and by an Artist in Life he generally seems to mean the sort of man who conceives of life as a kind of Lord Mayor's Show with himself in the most prominent place on the most gorgeously appointed car—a type which finds its supreme expression in such types as Beau Nash and Beau Brummel. Before these dandies, therefore, Mr. Whibley bows down in homage as before great men. We do not admire the posture, though no doubt it is only adopted for the purpose of making sport for us; but of course the dandies, no less than the Prince of Darkness, should be given their due.

What is their due? Though the world, differing from Mr. Whibley, despises them, it would be unjust to deny that they must have had many great qualities in common with the great men whom the world does not despise. A man cannot become a great dandy merely by giving a free hand to an expensive tailor. Were it so, Beau Brummel would have been no more remarkable than Mr. Toots. The dandy must invent, and must impose his inventions upon the public—if he cannot impose them he is merely a fop or an eccentric. But in order to impose his inventions he must first impose his personality, and persuade a hostile and envious world to accept him at his own valuation. A Beau Brummel, in short, like a Napoleon, must be a born leader of men. Nor can he attain his pre-eminent position without self-discipline and self-denial. Not for him are the ordinary affections of humanity. He dares not love; he dares not even unbend. Though his triumphs are in Society, he must dwell in it in the stately isolation of the captain of a man-of-war, with this difference, that while the captain gets a holiday when his ship goes out of commission, the dandy gets no holiday at all. And all this for what reward? All merely in order that the gaping crowd may say, with the American humourist, that there never was any single man who managed to look more like a procession. It is a poor end, considering the trouble that has to be taken to attain it; and at the same time it is an end which no man can pursue without making himself ridiculous if he fails to attain it. A soldier is not ridiculous because he is not so great a soldier as Wellington, nor a poet because he is not so great a poet as Shakespeare. But an unsuccessful Beau Brummel is merely comic. It was at such an one that the Master of Trinity launched the stinging epigram:—"The time that he can spare from the adornment of his person he devotes to the neglect of his duties."

These observations have led us somewhat away from Mr. Whibley's book. It is a book of strangely uneven merit. Some of the studies—notably those of Pepys (who has not much business in the galley), of Beckford, and of Barbey d'Aurevilly—strike us as thin and inadequate. On the other hand, the final paper on "Disraeli the Younger" is brilliant, and contains ample proof that Mr. Whibley really knows better than to stand agape in admiration of his Artists in Life. Disraeli, who described himself in a well-known anecdote as a "developed Jew," was also a developed dandy. He might also be described as a dandy with a purpose, who adopted dandyism as a means of imposing his personality, and who never imagined, as the Beaux did, that it was an end in itself. This Mr. Whibley perceives, and when he follows Disraeli into politics, he criticizes with an intelligence and a sympathy which he could not conceivably have shown had he been in earnest in his earlier exaltations of the dandies who, when all is said and done, came to bad ends because they had made fools of themselves. This, for instance, is a fine piece of political criticism:—

> The sternly orthodox of all shades were quick to denounce Disraeli for a charlatan, and all the while he was a political philosopher, profoundly inspired. He stood not for a party but for his opinions, and when once his opinions were shaped he created a party which should hold them. By a subtle irony he chose for his adherents the nobles and squires of England, and it is small wonder that they looked with suspicion upon his support, which soon grew into dominion. But he was a statesman who could not live from hand to mouth, upon political intrigue, which, said he, was the resource of the second-rate. He would sustain himself upon "great truths," and unpalatable as they were, he forced those "great truths" upon his colleagues.

This sort of thing, surely, or the fine literary criticism he has recently given us on Rabelais, is Mr. Whibley's métier, rather than posing as an admirer of men who were only not contemptible because they were audacious.

TRAMPS: SCIENTIFIC AND FICTIONAL.

All women are opposed to the nomad life, but most men, the staid and portly citizens no less than the imaginative, undeveloped artists, have something of the vagrom man in their composition. Even highly respectable and remunerative employments do not always close the ears to the fluting on ahead of Stevenson's gauger or prevent dreams of mysterious fertile lands beyond the hills without name or latitude or longitude—

> For who would gravely set his face
> To go to this or t'other place?
> There's nothing under heaven so blue
> That's fairly worth the travelling to.

It is the joy of travelling that is desired, not the arrival, and so it is well to follow

> . . . . . wherever hie
> The travelling mountains of the sky.
> Or let the streams in civil mode
> Direct your choice upon the road.

But the forces of the world are against the Wanderlust. We would recommend those afflicted with the cacoethes ambulandi, with an inclination to attempt the cure of life's malaise by going afoot to the mountains of the moon, to read, before starting, Mr. Josiah Flynt's admirable studies, TRAMPING WITH TRAMPS (Unwin, 6s.), and when this work has convinced them of the barrenness of the pleasures of "the road," to turn to Mr. J. le Gay Brereton's Australian sketches, LANDLOPERS (Unwin, 3s.6d.), and refresh his chastened beliefs in this more agreeable picture. Mr. Flynt's book is a serious attempt to give us a picture of the tramp world, with, as he says, incidental reference to causes and occasional suggestion of remedies. The book is of undoubted value as a scientific study. Mr. Brereton, too, has taken to the road, but in quite a different spirit—rather, we should say, from the bon motif of having "a good time" and writing an agreeable book about it than with any serious sociological intention.

In "Tramping with Tramps" a new and little-known world is laid bare. Mr. Flynt has spared neither himself nor the subject of his penetrating investigations in any particular. As a tramp he lives among these wastrels of the world—America, Russia, Germany, England, all countries knew him—notes their motives and their moods, and "partly sounds their policy." After many labours and not a few dangers he spreads before us his observations and his frequently profound deductions. His researches among the good and evil among tramps leave us with a melancholy feeling that the world has lost many a good fellow whom "Hololand" has captured. "Our first scrape" (we quote from "Contarini Fleming") "generally leads to our first travel." It is some early false step in the lower ranks of society which leads a promising boy to take to the road. But, as Mr. Flynt points out, the ranks of trampdom are filled from all possible sources and the "discouraged criminal" and the unsuccessful rogue send a large contingent. There are tramps and tramps, but to learn of all the small distinctions and delicate nuances of this ragged world you must read Mr. Flynt's entertaining pages. When he has exhausted the scientific side of his inquiries he gives some extremely vivid sketches of individual members of the fraternity, such as "Old Boston Mary," a remarkable type, and "Jamie the Kid." His article, too, on "Tramps' Jargon," with glossary, is full of curious information. The interest of Mr. Flynt's book is assisted by many excellent illustrations; such pictures as those of the "Old Bucks" and "Telling Ghost Stories" show that the artist is as full of his subject as the author.

Mr. Brereton's experiences are touched up to make them appear just a little more agreeable than is altogether probable. Roughly speaking, his view is that for certain months of the year, and in Australia, the "Landloper's" life is one of delight, of primitive, elemental joy. At the end of a chapter he writes his credo:

> Abysmal ease received us both,
> The Boy and me beneath the trees—
> An unimaginable sloth,
> Abysmal ease.
> The rush of water, hum of bees,
> And air to slumber nothing loth
> Made silence quick with mysteries.
> To Nature we had sworn our troth,
> And whose to her bosom flees
> Is given, till he break his oath,
> Abysmal ease.

Thus the man who, like Stevenson, would join the nomads and wayside adventurers may learn much from these two books of the shady and the sunny side, and find, without the sharp test of actual experience, the secrets of the Wanderlust. After Mr. Flynt's scientific facts and Mr. Brereton's romantic pictures come Mr. J. H. Crawford's realistic work, THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A TRAMP (Longmans, 5s. n.), which one is a little doubtful whether to class as a book of research or a work of imagination. But neither category would quite fit this curious, interesting, disappointing volume. Dick, a son of tramps, tells the history of his early life from the time of his birth in a dialect that is occasionally unintelligible and always tedious. This is a pity, as his matter, although sometimes rather too trivial, is often convincing and dramatic. The "Autobiography" seems to us too realistic for a work of art and too sentimental for a "human document." Mr. Crawford's Dick is allowed too free a hand and becomes disjointed, confused, and irritating just at those moments when he has something very well worth telling. This is, no doubt, just what a tramp would do, but a literary artist would do otherwise. The impression one gains of his father, another Dick, and of his mother, is sufficiently vivid, but three generations of ladies named Bess and even Dick's love, The Kelpie, are drawn in vague lines and their stories so much involved as to leave them rather mysterious even at the close of the book. Dick writes of his father's method of speaking, "We ne'er liked to ask what he was driving at, but just waited, and all came out." We hardly like to ask Mr. Crawford sometimes what he is driving at, but trust that to some of his readers it will "all come out." The author of "The Autobiography" has keen observation and a strong sense of pathos, but he appears to lack humour. Dick tells us that his father and mother never laughed and, indeed, that tramps seldom do. If the dialogue in this book is up to the usual standard of wit among nomads we can well believe this statement. Although Mr. Crawford possesses as sound a knowledge of tramp life as Mr. Flynt, and although he has a far higher sense of poetic beauty than Mr. Brereton, his book is not so satisfactory as theirs. In the forefront of the volume is an excellent reproduction of Walker's "The Vagrants," in which it will be remembered the real and the ideal are, for once, cleverly blended. The other illustrations are photographs taken at various times and places and made to fit into the letterpress in a way which does not make for the vraisemblance of the "Autobiography," though as photographs of scenery and of tramps they are well enough.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Reprints.

Among reprints just arrived are a LAVENGRO (2s. n.), the first of Mr. John Lane's Borrow Series, a pleasantly-bound little book. Mr. H. M. Brock's skill as an illustrator will no doubt help the reader through our old friend THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.) in case he does not, in these degenerate days, find the interest of Fenimore Cooper's masterpiece "so unflagging, so breathless, so bewildering almost," as Mr. Mowbray Morris says he is. Mr. Mowbray Morris' introduction is well written, and he retells the interesting story of Cooper's tour up the Hudson with Mr. Wortley and Edward Stanley (afterwards Lord Derby), to whose suggestion "The Last of the Mohicans" was due. It is an interesting experiment which will certainly attract the student of English literature, if not the "general reader," to reprint THE SCOTTISH CHIEFS. It is published without note or introduction, and the only modern features are Mr. T. H. Robinson's really beautiful illustrations and the pleasant format which Messrs. Dent have given to it (5s. n.). Miss Jane Porter, who published the book in 1809, was one of the chief pioneers of the novel of historical romance, and "The Scottish Chiefs" was admitted by Sir Walter Scott to have been the parent in his mind of the Waverley Novels.

Few books have been so copiously and variously illustrated as THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. It is interesting to see the modern black-and-white artist turned on to it, and Mr. H. M. Brock is as successful as he is with Fenimore Cooper. Apart from the good technique of the drawings, he grapples very happily with the exceptional demand Bunyan makes on the artistic delineation of character. The volume belongs to Messrs. Pearson's "Illustrated Scarlet Library." (2s. each volume.)

The seventh volume of Mr. John Lane's diminutive quartos entitled "Flowers of Parnassus" is Tennyson's DAY DREAM (1s. 6d.) with sympathetically conceived drawings by

Amelia Bauerle. The sixth volume of the New Century Thackeray, which we have already commended once or twice, contains THE BOOK OF SNOBS, CHRISTMAS BOOKS, and SKETCHES AND TRAVELS IN LONDON. (Nelson, 2s.)

Three little volumes of Meredith, beautifully bound, come from Messrs. Constable. Two contain his less known TALE OF CHLOE and THE STORY OF BHANAVA THE BEAUTIFUL, and the other is a volume of SELECTED POEMS—the selection being made "under the supervision of the author." The volumes cost 3s. 6d. each. Equally dainty are the two volumes in which Messrs. Isbister reissue Mr. Stopford Brooke's TENNYSON, HIS ART AND RELATION TO MODERN LIFE, 5s., first published in 1891. From Mr. Murray we have a new impression, with portrait, of the sixth and last edition (1872) of that classic of science, Darwin's ORIGIN OF SPECIES; while Darwin's CORAL REEFS (2s.), with Illustrations and introduction by Prof. J. W. Judd, is added to Messrs. Ward, Lock's "Minerva Library."

A new edition of Burke's REFLECTIONS ON THE REVOLUTION IN FRANCE is published, with an introduction by Mr. George Sampson (Scott, 1s. 6d.). Perhaps the best thing in the introduction is the intimation that those who wish to see Burke refuted should not turn to the works of Paine or Mackintosh but to Arthur Young's Journal of his travels in France. Like so many great orators Burke often obscured the issues which he was professing to illuminate and stirred the emotions instead of persuading the intellect. This is not a reason, of course, for consigning his speeches to oblivion, but it is a reason for reading something more solid and temperate side by side with them.

Mr. A. E. Gathorne Hardy's recent AUTUMNS IN ARGYLESHIRE WITH ROD AND GUN (Longmans, 10s. 6d. n.) is a notable addition to the recent literature of sport, remarkable for its variety. Deer, seal, sea and fresh water fish, grouse and many other birds and beasts contribute to Mr. Gathorne Hardy's experiences, and Mr. Archibald Thorburn supplies some of his admirable work in illustration of them. The only incident we did not read with pleasure was one which Mr. Gathorne Hardy gives at second-hand, describing it only as a "curious" one—viz., that of a friend of his who came upon a roebuck standing looking at him, which, "to his unbounded surprise, allowed him to walk right up to it, take it by the horn, and put the knife into its throat." He thought it must have been wounded, but it turned out perfectly healthy.

Miss Coleridge's book of sketches, called NON SEQUITUR (Nisbet, 6s.), should be among those books the author recommends one to put in one's portmanteau on leaving town. The subjects of the articles are widely diverse, being grouped under such all-embracing titles as "Hither and Thither," "The Treasure House," "Travellers' Tales," and "By the Fireside." In each division there are graceful essays, but nothing startlingly brilliant—just a pleasant flow of literary small-talk and a delicate knowledge of worldly affairs. It is a book to which one may turn for refreshment and the repose which can only be obtained from the light, easy essayist.

The SUPPLEMENT TO A HANDBOOK TO POLITICAL QUESTIONS OF THE DAY, by Mr. Sydney Buxton (Murray, 2s. 6d.), which deals with Old Age Pensions, Elementary Education, and Intoxicating Liquor Laws, though issued in connexion with the general election, will be of more value when the public interest revives in these questions, and would have guided the electors more directly if it had included a discussion of Imperialism and Army reform—or even the threatened changes as to Secondary Education. The subjects chosen are treated with the acuteness and impartiality which were conspicuous in the Handbook itself. Our only criticism is a formal one—viz., that the book would be much more readable if all the reasons for and against did not begin with the word "That."

FABIANISM AND THE EMPIRE (Grant Richards, 1s.) is the election address of the Fabian Society, written out by the society's "literary expert," Mr. Bernard Shaw. The society apparently desires to municipalize most things and nationalize the little that is left. As neither party in the State is at present much interested in these objects the manifesto could hardly be of much use as a practical guide to the disposition of a vote. The elector who tried to apply the principles to any given case would probably be left gyrating in true Fabian fashion. In the meantime, however, he would have been amused by the perusal of an exceedingly entertaining pamphlet.

Any capable writer who took the trouble could, we suppose, write a book (from the layman's point of view) on the conduct of life, and though his readers would know beforehand all he had to say they might like to have it put before them in an orderly and exhaustive way. This is what Mr. Lecky did in his "Map of Life." To do more requires exceptional brilliance and originality. These qualities, we are afraid, are not possessed by Mr. A. Stodart Walker, the author of THE STRUGGLE FOR SUCCESS (Grant Richards, 6s.). Nor has he any of the charm of Mr. Lecky's style. His watchwords are "compromise, expediency, and adaptability." In the exposition of his scheme of life, he is constantly on the verge of the platitudinous; and though his advice, platitudinous though it be, is generally sound, he envelops his ideas in so many words that not many of them are likely to stamp themselves on the minds of the reader.

EDUCATIONAL.

English.

The art of writing fine English prose is one thing; the art of writing an English essay for an examination is another. For the cultivation of the latter it would be difficult to find a better guide than Mr. A. W. Ready's ESSAYS AND ESSAY WRITING FOR PUBLIC EXAMINATIONS (Bell, 3s. 6d.). Style means for him nothing but graphicness and lucidity. You must break your long sentences up into short statements. You must not ape Gibbon or Ruskin or Johnson. You may study Stevenson. You may also get help from "Mr. Stanley Weyman, and Mr. Henty, and Mr. Anthony Hope"—rather a strange "derangement" of authors. But Macaulay is the model of all others to follow; and you must be careful, therefore, not to speak of "the genius of the greatest of war ministers and the energies of the greatest of generals," but rather of "the genius of a Carnot or a Pitt, and the energies of a Marlborough or a Wellington." We should be sorry to believe, with Mr. Ready, that at the present day "style is at a discount," and that "you can hardly dismiss a writer with more contempt than by designating him a stylist." There Mr. Ready goes beyond his last. But in his particular line he is excellent, both in his advice and his examples. He includes the smallest details to be observed by an examinee. We only hope that examinees will observe these rules, which are intended to make matters easy for the examiner; and that if they ever become journalists they will not forget them when they send contributions to editors. A less minutely practical book is ENGLISH COMPOSITION, by L. Cope Cornford (Nutt, 3s. 6d.). Its collection of extracts from English authors to illustrate the different kinds of composition is good and extremely varied. The author's own contribution, consisting of short chapters on composition generally and notes on the extracts, seems to us to deal too much in mechanical classification and unnecessary definition.

It may be true, as Mr. Logie Robertson says in his ENGLISH DRAMA FOR SCHOOL AND COLLEGE (Blackwood, 2s. 6d.), that in the school curriculum the range for this particular study has been too long confined to Shakespeare. His idea is to give passages from representative writers, from Marlowe to Sir Henry Taylor, with notes and introductions. The latter are useful, and if we are to have selections at all—which is questionable, for they can teach nothing about drama—these given are of the right length, and, except in the case of Shakespeare, well chosen. The drunken scene in Antony and Cleopatra, the Falstaff scenes in Henry Fourth, Part I., and a passage from the Winter's Tale are, for Shakespeare, most inadequate. The notes do not impress us. Neither teacher nor pupil is allowed to smile at the humours of Lepidus. "Lep. You have strange serpents there. Ant.—Ay, Lepidus." "The frivolous remark of Lepidus, who is intoxicated," says Mr. Robertson, "is treated by Antony in a different spirit from that with which he received the question about the resources of Egypt." "Lep.—I am not so well as I should be, but I'll ne'er out." Note. "So well. So sober. But I'll ne'er out, I will pledge it (see L. 76, infra); out means separation or cessation; as in the expression 'to give out' in the sense of ceasing from a contest, or yielding." Can anything be more ponderous? And there is much more of the same sort. Surely some intelligence may, and should be, credited to the pupil? No; what says the note on "Enter Falstaff, Gadshill, Bardolph, and Peto"? "Gadshill.—Not the place, but a member of the thieves' gang."

Mr. E. E. Speight's New English Series has received general commendation, and the JUNIOR TEMPLE READER (Horace Marshall, 1s. 6d.), which he now issues in collaboration with Miss Clara Thomson, shows the same spirit of careful and wide selection and of real knowledge of children's requirements. We fancy there is a real need for such a book as this, putting children as it were near the portals of really good literature, without expecting them to reveal the tastes of grown up literature. The many illustrations are mostly original and very well drawn. They are a little above the artistic perception of a child; but that is better than being below it.

French.

EXCERPTS FROM FRENCH AUTHORS, by Henri Blouet (Allman, 1s.), will be a welcome relief from the selections from classical writers. All the pieces are from contemporary literature, and touch on the Exhibition, on the Boer War, on cycling, &c. One of them is Sarah Bernhardt's letter to the Daily Telegraph on Hamlet, written in June of last year. This is a good idea; it brings actuality into the class-room and teaches the student what he is most likely to want, the French manner and idiom of the moment. There is a vocabulary.

UNE JOYEUSE NICHÉE (3s. 6d.), by Mme E. de Pressensé, has the merits of others of Dent's "Modern Language Series." The story is new, simple, and charming, and we feel sure it will be as much liked in this country as it is in Switzerland. There are grammatical and other questions, a short grammar, and a vocabulary, all in French; and the last is so arranged that by an ingenious succession of phrases the pupil is often taught what a word means without being told. This is, indeed, to train the intelligence.

ASINETTE, by Mrs. T. G. Fraser (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.), is described as a French story for English children, though it is, as a matter of fact, written in the form of dialogue. It has, we think, too many hard words, and we should have thought that a story by a French writer would have served the purpose better. But the book is exquisitely illustrated, and may lure young students on.

A CHILD'S FIRST STEPS IN FRENCH, by Arthur Vizetelly (Pitman, 6d.), is an elementary reader. It is so composed as to repeat useful words over and over again with the view of locating them definitely in the memory cells. A commendable little book.

German.

Mr. Richard Kaiser's EXERCISES IN GERMAN COMPOSITION (Arnold, 1s. 6d.) is intended for candidates for the leaving certificates of higher-grade schools. The pieces are well chosen and arranged so as to introduce the student gradually to the idioms. There is a list of idiomatic phrases and a vocabulary.

GERMAN WITHOUT TEARS (Arnold, 1s.), translated from the French of Mrs. Hugh Bell by A. H. Hutchinson and S. Beisch, is an elementary reader for small children. The exercises are stories of the sort that will cause amusement in the nursery, and words are repeated over and over again so as to minimize the fearful task of referring to the dictionary. There are pictures.

The passages in Mr. S. E. Bally's GERMAN COMMERCIAL READER (Methuen, 2s.) are selected with a view of giving the commercial student a wide vocabulary of the sort that he is likely to want. There are pieces, for instance, about railways and the various arts and industries. A useful book for its somewhat limited object.

Miscellaneous.

THE OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY FOR YOUNG STUDENTS, by the Rev. C. J. Hamer (Allman and Son, 1s.), is simply told, and seems to be well suited for its purpose, being more attractive for the young, we think, than the well-known work of Maclear. Moreover, in Scripture quotations it calls attention to the alterations in the Revised Version. The author does not indulge in the higher criticism; and the only criticism we make is that Old Testament stories when they are clearly legendary are better told in the old-fashioned style of the Authorized Version. To retell them as history implies a belief that they are all equally historical. Yet Gideon's fleece is perhaps hardly on a par with the siege of Samaria.

Mr. W. A. Kessen's SPANISH GRAMMAR (Blackwood, 3s. 6d.) is written on a more simple and practical plan than Schilling's, which we reviewed last year. If the new book contains less than the old, it should do all the better for beginners. Only a few new words are given with each exercise, instead of Schilling's long string of them. The exercises lead up to easy and thence to more difficult reading; there are two vocabularies, a Spanish and an English. The book seems to be designed for commercial students especially; and we congratulate Hillhead High School, Glasgow, on having a teacher of Spanish. Scotland is clearly not going to be left in the lurch.

Mr. Frederick Smith, who was once appropriately enough a master in Dollar Academy, has published an excellent BRIEF INTRODUCTION TO COMMERCIAL GEOGRAPHY (Raleigh Geographies, VII., Blackie, 1s. 9d.). He attempts to describe the "present conditions and the future possibilities of the commerce of our great Empire," with which he closely associates the United States. Incidentally he sketches the growth of our commerce, and impresses some useful lessons of patriotism and responsibility. The portions of the Empire are taken in turn, and afterwards the chief products of the earth—coal, iron, tea, linen, wool, &c. The relation of the Navy to trade is made clear, and some useful political lessons are given. We note that Mr. Smith is up to date, and the Transvaal appears as a British colony. Maps and plans complete a book which should be used in the elementary schools of all our towns.

FICTION.

Mr. Anthony Hope.

Mr. Anthony Hope's QUISANTÉ (Methuen, 6s.) was probably written to please the author rather than to please the public. It is not in the least exciting, and the general tone is gloomy, though, thanks to Mr. Hope's sunny disposition, cheerfulness breaks in at fairly frequent intervals. Some readers may read it for the sake of the radiant interludes, but it really challenges attention as a study in psychology. The eponymous hero is an unscrupulous man, given to playing to the gallery, a man who, in virtue of a fascinating, though repellent, personality, forces his way to the front in politics and marries a lady whose ideas and code of honour are very different from his. Apart from the baser qualities which Mr. Anthony Hope emphasizes in his hero, there is more than one instance in recent political history which might have suggested the idea of the politician who attains influence in the councils of a party that does not like him. But, though all the characters are politicians, there is not any real politics in the book; and though there is an election chapter—uncommonly well done—we never get to know whether Quisanté is a Liberal or a Conservative. The state of his affections and the state of his wife's affections—particularly the latter—are the pivots on which the story turns. She never quite approves of him, and she is never quite in love with him; but she is dazzled and spell-bound by the magnetism of his personality to such a point that, even after his death, she cannot bring herself to marry the other man—a typical well-bred and high-minded Englishman—whom, but for the other, she would have loved. It is a hard situation for a novelist to have to handle, and we do not think that Mr. Anthony Hope has handled it with complete success. He is better at stating results clearly than at showing that they must inevitably have arrived; and the character of Quisanté is more indicated than drawn. We perceive that he was "bad form" a good deal more clearly than we perceive that he was magnetic; we do not realize him as we realized "Comingsby." But the book is redeemed by many incidental merits. Several of the minor personages are well sketched and amusing. We particularly commend Mrs. Baxter, the wife of the Dean, who illustrates the problems of high politics with parallels from petty parochial experiences, and the artist, Morewood, who has nothing to do with the story, but is at the head of the epigram department. On the whole the book is entertaining, but is not the sort of book that Mr. Anthony Hope writes best.

Mr. Seton Merriman.

In THE ISLE OF UNREST (Smith, Elder, 6s.) Mr. H. Seton Merriman demonstrates once more the power which is so marked in all his books of painting in a picturesque background; of moving before it carefully drawn, distinctive, and interesting figures; and out of their interaction distilling, as it were, some fine spiritual essence which raises his story above the level of a purely sensational romance. His background is Corsica, and its scenery and its life—the lawless, suspicious life of that island of unrest from which sprang the first Napoleon, and which is here depicted as ruled, if not controlled, by his nephew—are described with real power; equally good are the characters of the two rival families of the island, and of Colonel Gilbart, the French resident engineer officer; while Lory de Vassalot, whose fortunes take the reader on to the battlefields of 1870, embodies, in the love motive of the tale, the old spirit of chivalry:—"I could not love you, dear, so much, loved I not honour more." Despite all these advantages, the novel, like others of Mr. Merriman's, shows why he fails to rank among the greater novelists. He is never quite ready to let himself go, to live with his characters, and let them lead him irresistibly on from event to event. His manner is a little too much that of the conscious artist. He contemplates and moralizes upon the incidents of his imagination with a touch of self-complacency. His conversations sometimes lack spontaneity and his reflections are a little overweighted by the manner of profound wisdom with which they are enunciated. With a little more enthusiasm and a little more humour Mr. Merriman would write novels of real distinction. As it is, "The Isle of Unrest" is a book which no lover of a good story can fail to read with pleasure, and which, we doubt not, will meet with a well-deserved success.

Mr. Frankfort Moore.

In the CONSCIENCE OF CORALIE (Pearson, 6s.) Mr. Frankfort Moore gives us a rather unfamiliar type of American girl. Of course Coralie is the heiress of a fortune of about a thousand pounds a week—to make her anything else would be too audacious a revolt against the conventions. But she is very seriously devoted to social reform and Universal Brotherhood, and her conscience is grievously outraged by the apparent lack of seriousness in English society. Her disenchantment is described with all Mr. Moore's happy gift of humour. He fails a little at first, here as in one or two other of his books, to hold the reader at the outset—there is a little too much talk before we become interested in his characters—but when once the ball begins to roll the story is excellently told. We have a great admiration for Mr. Moore as a novelist; he is amusing and convincing, and he understands exactly how far to press romance for all who like a genuine love-story ending as all cheerfully-disposed persons hope it will end. But it is a pity that he should not sacrifice to the cause of art his personal social likes and dislikes, and that he should let himself hint at a moral—the very hackneyed and, we venture to think, unintelligent moral that all social reformers are charlatans, and that among the apparently frivolous and luxurious votaries of fashion reside all the fine qualities of the nation. He dislikes his hero, Bernard Mott, the Socialist, because he inveighs against "society," and the inevitable result is that his picture of Mott is a crude one. Otherwise the story is full of delightful and well-conceived people; while the description at the end of the book of Barry Joyce's ride across Irish bogs to win a wife is a real masterpiece.

Mr. Pett Ridge.

We suspect Mr. Pett Ridge of being something of a social reformer as well as a humourist. In his last two books he has shown what may be done for the young people of the lowest city class; in the present volume he demonstrates what cannot be done at a later stage. With these moral ideas in his mind, the characters in A BREAKER OF LAWS (Harper, 6s.), Alfred Bateson, Caroline, Mr. Finnis, Miss Ladd, and the rest are to some extent taken from life. They are, however, sufficiently untrue to their originals to make them adaptable for the purposes of romance. The outward circumstances are the result of careful observation, but the characters act as Mr. Ridge thinks will be most entertaining and not quite as they would in their own work-a-day world. Thus the reader gets, in a realistic setting, a compact and well-planned story. "Alf" or "Elf" is uncommonly like the "young Alf" of "The Hooligan Nights," but whereas Mr. Rooke's hero hurts us a little by reason of his brutishness, this Alf of romance has many tender qualities which make him sympathetic, despite his unconquerable inclination towards dishonest courses. The strong point of "A Breaker of Laws" is, indeed, this struggle of a young criminal who has married an innocent girl to keep away from the easy, remunerative, downward path. No one tries to persuade Alf to return to his old ways. The "old set" leave him alone, but, as time goes on, his brain becomes alert with the old interests, and he desires, while earning a living in the ordinary way, to increase the comforts of Caroline and his son by means he knows too well how to put into practice. Mr. Ridge's picture of the wife and her little son, and their warm friend William Finnis, is full of charm, and written with a skill by no means common in recent fiction, and superior to much of the work for which the author of "Mord Em'ly" has been praised. Alf's futile attempts to release himself from his criminal inclinations and Finnis' determination that Caroline shall not know her husband's real character give scope to Mr. Pett Ridge's powers of presenting the comic side of serious matters. The moral of the story is contained in the sigh of Miss Ladd, the sister of a house-breaker. "Ah!" she remarked dolefully, "people who run straight seem to get all the best of it."

LIBRARY NOTES.

The recent conference of American and Canadian librarians at Montreal has been followed by the publication in book form of the papers and proceedings. We have before commented on the conference, and can only add that the striking point about the papers is the intensely practical nature of their subjects and the practical manner in which they are treated. The president's address dealt with the efforts which had been made towards popularizing books and libraries in various States. Of the other contributions perhaps the most interesting were those upon children's libraries. Another feature was the round-table discussion on different technical subjects. Altogether the volume forms a useful record of a week's good work.

Many will recollect the sensation caused by the discoveries of Professor Hilprecht in Babylonia, whereby he proved that the antiquity of the human race was far greater than had hitherto been supposed. The excavations at Nippur have now brought to light the great temple, and Professor Hilprecht believes that the library contains 150,000 clay tablets. This news is a striking appendix to the speech of Sir Edward Fry to the Library Association. The continuity of learning might form the subject of another address, for that this long-buried wisdom should ever stretch out across the ages to touch hands with ours is a very striking event. Probably in no other manner than the total destruction of all its surroundings could it have been preserved to us—an instance of the survival of the fittest which modern libraries may never hope to emulate under the present condition of materials, which rather invites than retards decay.

Mr. William Martin, a resident of Acton, has sent several pictures to its public library. They are nominally lent, but are to be presented if it can be shown that the people appreciate them. The Daily News thinks it is gratifying to know that a library may so extend its sphere and develop into a local museum. Undoubtedly anything which is of literary interest or of artistic value and all that may advance knowledge of local history is worthy of place in a library. But the museum idea has its dangers. Some of our public libraries have been made convenient receptacles for odds and ends, possessing neither local nor any other interest, articles which would never be admitted into a regular museum. The generosity which would turn the public library into a similitude of the "dime museum" should be gently, but firmly, discouraged.

A bust of Chaucer is probably to be placed in the Guildhall, on the strong recommendation of the Library Committee. This will be actually the only monument of Chaucer possessed by the City.

The Report of the Librarian of the Public Library of Victoria, at Melbourne, is an interesting record of progress. The addition of important books to the reference library has resulted in an increased attendance. The set off to this is in the unsuitability of the building for its purpose. "Supervision is difficult and costly—adequate supervision is impossible." The lending library was closed for four months and the 13,000 volumes re-classified. The system now in vogue is "open access," and, so far, it has proved successful, only six volumes of small value having left for parts unknown.

A reading room was inaugurated in Kensal-rise on the 27th of last month. Mark Twain, who declared the building open, testified as an old journalist to the value of newspapers, adding that it was a capital thing to begin with a news room as the first step towards the study of higher literature in a library. It was (he thought) a splendid idea of the Legislature to make public libraries depend upon the choice of the people. The worth of a community might be measured by its willingness to tax itself for the supply of mental food.

At Teddington the Public Libraries Acts have been re-adopted by the district council. The original adoption in 1896 turns out to have been invalid, owing to informality in the resolution, as the authorities discovered when they sought to obtain sanction to a loan for a new library building.

Mr. R. Aslie King is giving a course of ten lectures on "English Novelists" at the Shoreditch Public Library, Pitfield-street, every Friday evening, and a similar course on "Novels and Novelists of the nineteenth Century," by Professor W. Hall Griffin, has been arranged for Thursday evenings at Longfield-hall, North Brixton, near the Minet Library. The admission to these lectures is free.

Correspondence.

IS SWINBURNE "A GREAT POET?"

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I reply to your correspondents who criticized my remarks on Swinburne? I will take Mr. Sillard's letter first, for, though he does not concern himself with the subject, he may as well be answered. He says that I do not write in the spirit of Matthew Arnold and that I gave "Tennyson's modesty and Stevenson's powers of memory as sufficient in themselves to establish the reputation of a great poet." This, I presume, is an instance of Mr. Sillard's power of "seeing the object as in itself it really is," for I had an idea that I merely mentioned, in passing to more important matters, a few great authors who, unlike Mr. Henley, thought that Swinburne did not write bad poetry. I used the words "bad poetry," and Mr. Henley used the words "damned to the infernal deeps."

As for my "appropriation" of the words of the great critic, Mr. Sillard has shown me that I was wrong. I thought that for the readers of a periodical devoted to literature it would be unnecessary to put the famous "best that is known and thought in the world" between inverted commas. I might, if I were captious, object to Mr. Sillard's appropriation of Mr. Gladstone's famous words about time being on his side; I might, remembering Nathan's parable, protest against Mr. Sillard's free and unacknowledged use of my own words in his opening sentences, but it has nothing to do with the subject. I may add, however, that I had no wish to come to grief in imitating the spirit of Matthew Arnold, as I see Mr. Sillard does. He "might almost be annoyed" with me, he says; but then, fortunately for my peace of mind, he spoils the effect by concluding with my "clamorous advocacy." The repose of Matthew Arnold, the repose that marks the caste of Vere de Vere, is not a healthy repose. It is really better, in Mr. Sillard's choice phrase, to "unpack one's soul," even in "dogmatic fashion." If Mr. Sillard is really annoyed, I am sorry; but, in any case, let us be clear about it; let him speak out like a man. I rather like warm abuse; the cold sort only makes me shudder, and that is uncharitable in October.

I am sorry that I could not wedge anything about Swinburne into my reply to Mr. Sillard; but I will try my best to do it in reply to "C.C.C." In the first place, I must really make a strong protest against the assertion that the greatness of a writer is not to be acknowledged till he is dead. There are difficulties in assigning him his place among the great; but there is no difficulty in honestly acknowledging that he is one of the great. "C.C.C." couples him with Shelley; I can scarcely desire more.

Secondly, I cannot conceive of any definition of poetry which would require a great poem on Shakespeare to add to our knowledge of him. For knowledge and appreciation "C.C.C." could hardly do better than turn to Swinburne's prose "Study of Shakespeare." But if "C.C.C." will turn to Swinburne's beautiful sonnet sequence on the English dramatists he will find that Shakespeare is treated differently from the rest, and among the rest he will find that there is much "pregnant thought succinctly uttered."

I cannot recognize the description of Swinburne's work as "a smooth and silvery torrent of words flowing on for page after page with tireless facility." It is the popular idea of him; but W. M. Rossetti in his admirable book on the Poems and Ballads upset that idea long ago. Swinburne's work is akin to Victor Hugo's in the passionate grip which he takes of his subject. Every word, every phrase, every sentence tightens the grip. It is true that we have pure melody like

> A sail to seaward, a sound from shoreward,
> And the spell were broken that seems
> To reign in a world of dreams
> Where vainly the dreamer's feet make forward
> And vainly the low sky gleams.

But we also have blank verse like

> Old men, grey borderers on the march of death,
> Tongue-fighters, tough of talk and sinewy speech.

And the grand ode that begins:—

> The trumpets of the four winds of the world
> From the ends of the earth blow battle.

There is not a form of poetry—praise, passion, or prayer—that cannot be found in one part or another of the works of Swinburne. His "Ode on the Eve of Revolution," "Ave atque Vale," "The Triumph of Time," "The Watch in the Night," "The Forsaken Garden" fulfil all the demands of great poetry. The test is easy; they have only to be compared with any other poetry. It proves nothing to make quotations from Swinburne which are not great poetry; the same could be done with every other poet, and more easily. As for restraint, the only criterion of literary restraint is the style; and it is generally admitted that Swinburne's style is almost perfect. What "C.C.C." mistakes for lack of restraint is merely a matter of literary evolution. Homer wrote about wine-dark seas and hollow black ships; Tennyson, even taking into account that he lived by a grander sea, gives us far more elaborate pictures—of a wave, for instance, "green-glimmering toward the summit, with all its stormy crests that smoke against the skies." Swinburne is more elaborate still, but he holds a tighter rein over his words than even Tennyson did. He never loses himself as Byron did, and as "C.C.C." does when, in a rapture of description, he says, "All Mr. Swinburne's silvery torrent of words are worth nothing"—the italics being mine.

I will conclude with another quotation in illustration of Swinburne's pregnant thought and succinct expression. I would commend it to the gentleman who wishes to imitate the homogeneity and "aloofness" of Matthew Arnold:—

Who cannot hate, can love not; if he grieve,
His tears are barren as the unfruitful rain
That rears no harvest from the green sea's plain,
And as thorns crackling this man's laugh is vain.
Nor can belief touch, kindle, smite, reprieve
His heart who has not heart to disbelieve.

Yours faithfully,

ALFRED NOYES.

HEINE AS A SONG WRITER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Heine, as a writer, has suffered on the whole from the extraordinary success of one or two particular portions of his works. We in England know him as a poet almost entirely through the "Buch der Lieder," and in prose rarely make any excursions beyond the "Reisebilder." The fame of the "Buch der Lieder" is largely due to the fact that so many of its numbers have been wedded to the music of Schumann, Schubert, and Mendelssohn. The "Reisebilder" have achieved popularity through their charming style and wit, and also because they form the setting of the Harzreise series of songs; indeed to most readers, German as well as English, the term "Reisebilder" means the Harzreise and nothing else. Parts of them are tedious through over much personality, and the long diatribes against Count Platen have now lost whatever meaning they once had. But the statement made by the writer of the article on Heine in Literature, September 29th, that Heine's fame must rest on these two works seems somewhat inconsiderate.

If he had pursued his investigations a little further, he would have found equally beautiful lyrics in the "Neue Gedichte" and in the same volume several charming ballads and the two tragedies Almanzor and Ratcliff, which most people know only by name, but which nevertheless contain some of Heine's finest poetry. It would be impossible to mention in detail the whole of the gems in this fascinating volume, but a few of the most exquisite may be named:—"Es treibt dich fort von Ort zu Ort," "Das gelbe Laub erzittert," "Tragödie," "Gesanglos war ich und beklommen," "Ein schöner Stern geht auf in meiner Nacht," and amongst the ballads "Frau Mette," "Ritter Olaf," "König Harald Harfagar." The lyrics in the "Romanzero" volume are scarcely, if at all, inferior.

One of the most characteristic of Heine's works is the adventures of the bear Atta Troll, surely the most delightful and philosophical talking animal ever idealized, and any one who has once read the marvellous description of the "Wilde Jagd" will never fail to recall it on the eve of St. John. But perhaps the most beautiful of his neglected works is "Bimini," the story of the search for the fountain of eternal youth by Don Juan Ponce de Leon. Heine never wrote anything more humanly pathetic than the old hidalgo's prayer to the Virgin for the restoration of his youth, and mingled therewith is a vein of quaint humour entirely his own. Heine is one of the most untranslatable of writers, and naturally has suffered terribly at the hands of the translators. The singularly infelicitous examples quoted by the writer of the article in question will scarcely commend Heine to readers unfamiliar with German.

Yours faithfully,

EMILY WATERS.

BARBER SURGEONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In an interesting article on "The London of Chaucer" in this week's issue of Literature the writer speaks of the "Doctor of Physic" being "a member of the Guild of Barber Surgeons."

If there is any evidence of a Doctor of Physic of that period ever having been a barber surgeon, I should much like to know where it is to be found, as primâ facie it is very improbable. The early physicians had nothing to do with surgery, and regarded the barber surgeons as illegitimate practitioners. In 1423 the Mayor and Aldermen of London granted a petition, presented by the physicians and surgeons (not barber surgeons) of that city, for the formation of an institute of medicine and surgery, to be governed by a Rector, who was to be a Doctor of Physic, and to control the practice of those professions within the City. There is ample evidence that this institute was bitterly hostile to the Guild of Barber Surgeons, so that it would appear unlikely that a Doctor of Physic would have had any connexion with that Guild.

I am yours truly,

MAJOR GREENWOOD,

THE ABUSE OF THE POSSESSIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Little has not quite understood my letter. No doubt, as he says, "the pages of Literature will be accepted as fairly representative of good English"; but I asked for quotations from standard authors—that is, from those which have stood the test of time. Mr. Little knows, of course, that the genitive inflexion is not confined to persons and personifications in Chaucer, still less in older English. I wish to find out when Mr. Little's limitation came into use, if it really exists. Like Rosa Dartle, I ask for information.

Yours faithfully,

THE SIN-EATER IN SOUTH WALES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Ernest Rhys' frank acknowledgment of the entirely modern authority on which he based the reference, in his song, to a supposed old Welsh superstition, is just what I had expected. As his inspiration came from Cardiganshire, students of Welsh folk-lore will have no difficulty in identifying the genesis of the story which so impressed the talented author of "The Whistling Maid."

The original sketch may be found in Joseph Downes' "Mountain Decameron" (1836). That powerful but unequal writer simply transfers John Aubrey's "sinne-eater" to a desolate stretch of the Welsh coast lying between Aberystwith and Machynlleth. Whenever, during the past half-century or so, the "Welsh sin-eater" has been discussed, whether in conversation or in print, Downes' sketch, more or less altered, is sure to make its appearance. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that every single soul living before 1836 within reasonable reach of the spot indicated by Downes has, at one time or another, been questioned about the existence of the alleged custom. No evidence, however, independent of what could be traced to the "Mountain Decameron," has yet been forthcoming—and I feel sure that no evidence can now be produced—to establish the belief referred to in the "Song of the Seven Candles." I am somewhat surprised that Mr. Rhys did not at once recognize the paternity of the tale when he heard it, for the "Mountain Decameron" is not only in itself a remarkable work, but "Christopher North" made it the subject of two characteristic papers in Blackwood, while it was also honoured with a review in the Quarterly.

Downes, who was a medical man, spent the latter (and greater) part of his life at Builth, in South Wales. In the forties and fifties he contributed many papers—verse and prose—to local newspapers. None of his productions, however, that I have seen (and I have come across about a score) come anywhere near the "Mountain Decameron." He contributed one paper to Blackwood (1843)—an account of a journey made in the track of the Rebecca riots. In the course of that journey the writer skirted the parish of Llandebie, the only spot in Wales, outside his own tale, where the so-called "sin-eater" has been located; but he betrays no consciousness of the fact. Downes lived in close communion with nature in her wildest aspects, and in her remotest and most inaccessible retreats among the Brecknockshire hills; but he nowhere shows any familiarity with the modes of life and the modes of thought of the Welsh peasantry. In fact, as he himself says, he was a "Solitary."

As he has no niche in the "Dictionary of National Biography," perhaps I may be allowed to translate the following description of him by a well-known Independent minister, the Rev. J. R. Kilsby Jones, which appeared in the Genius for April, 1886:—"In Builth itself there lived a short time ago a medical man named Downes, a native of Hertfordshire [? Herefordshire], Atheist, hermit, and littérateur, or at least bastard-littérateur, he wrote a great deal of true poetry, and more of innocent nonsense, for the Hereford Times; and several articles for the Cambrian Quarterly [some of these reappeared in the "Mountain Decameron"], as long as that periodical could keep breath in its nostrils; and he published a book which he called the 'Mountain Decameron.' . . . He was a passionate admirer of mountain scenery, and in the summer season he used to camp out night and day in the open air, in the recesses of the most secluded glens that he knew of. His hat was his larder, in which he carried his butter and groceries. Within the last few years he has gone the way of all flesh." Kilsby Jones was regarded by his numerous admirers as a most unconventional character. But the measure of his disdain for social conventions may be easily gauged from the above extract. In the presence of what was really unconventional he was plainly a mere Philistine. Downes was certainly no "atheist," whatever his religious beliefs may have been.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

72, Comeragh-road, W. J. P. OWEN.

THE SPELLING OF POLISH NAMES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be allowed to congratulate you on having welcomed in your columns a "Foreign Letter" that tends at last to accord to recent Polish writers their due place in European literature? The critical horizon of your correspondent "L. G." is, however, too much restricted to Warsaw and the made-in-Vienna Kingdom of Poland; to the literary activity of Cracow he is most unjust. He opens, too, with a remark about the European reputation of Mickiewicz, Krasinski, and Slowacki, whose names are, as a matter of fact, so little known in England that you very venially have misprinted them as "Miekiewicz, Kraminski, Slowackie"; the reputation of Sienkiewicz is much wider than was ever theirs, except among their own countrymen.

But it is to your correspondent's treatment of Polish names that I should like to call attention in the hope that he may modify this in the promised continuation of his letters. He appears to divide his authors into English Poles as Henry Sienkiewicz and Mr. Wislicki, French Poles as Gabrielle Zapolska, Madame Orzeszko and Louis Pierre Leliwa, and Polish Poles as Zygmunt Milkowski and Aleksander Glowacki. Of course it is not so very, very long ago that it was supposed necessary to Frenchify the name of every foreigner; "the Chevalier Bunsen" and "M. de Bismarck" figured in the leaders of The Times; but why now speak, as does your correspondent, of "King Jean Sobieski"? (It says something that it is not "King Jean de Sobieski.") To the Poles the deliverer of Vienna is "Jan Sobieski" (pronounced "Yan"); to us "John Sobieski." "Pan Michael," as the title of a translation, is an indefensible mongrel; either "Pan Michal" or "Mr. Michael." Who would ever write "Herr William" or "Monsieur Francis"? In the hope of popularizing translations from the Polish it may be sound policy to use "Henry" instead of "Henryk," but then we should use "Sigismund" and "Alexander" instead of "Zygmunt" and "Aleksander."

The initial difficulty in adapting Polish history or Polish fiction to English eyes must always be the repellent agglomerations of consonants in the proper names. The Poles treat English names phonetically according to their own ideas of sounds, writing, for instance, "Szekspir" for "Shakespeare"; it is a great question whether it would not be better for us to follow their example vice versâ, and change, at any rate, their "ch," "cz," "sz," and "w" into our "kh," "ch," "sh," and "v," if not also their "c," "rz," and "j" into our "ts," "rj," and "y" respectively. "Szujski," for example, is pronounced as if in English "Shuyski," "Bobrzynski" as "Bobrjinski," "Chmielowski" as "Khmielovski," "Waliszewski" as "Valishevski," "Glowacki" as "Glovatski." If you Anglicize the Christian name, should you not Anglicize the surname also? Either "Henryk Sienkiewicz" or "Henry Sienkievich."

Drastic contractions, like that of "Modrzejewska" (pronounced "Modrjeyevska") into "Modjeska" can only be condoned on the ground of sheer necessity.

Yours faithfully,

CADWALLADER J. BATES.

EGYPTIAN CHRONOLOGY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The recent review in Literature of my book with the above title is so fair and appreciative that I should be reluctant to suggest any alteration of an article so clearly and tersely written; but if you can spare me space sufficient to draw attention to the confirmation of your reviewer's opinions and the establishment of the principal hypothesis set forth in my essay afforded by a monument made known almost directly after my publication, you will confer an obligation on me; and I think add a valuable supplement to the review.

In September, 1899, Professor Erman, of Berlin, read at the Congress of Orientalists at Rome a paper written by Dr. Borckhardt, of Cairo, on a papyrus discovered by him, to this effect:—"In the 7th year of Usertsen III. the star Sothis was for the first time (in that year) on the horizon at daybreak on the 16th day of the 8th month (Farmuthi)." Taking 1318 B.C. as the epoch of the Sothic cycle, this would give 1875 B.C. for the 7th year of Usertsen III.

The advocates of the long chronology appear to ignore this all-important discovery of Borckhardt's, and one of the ablest of them, Flinders Petrie, in his recent book on the earliest dynasties, still adheres to 2653 B.C. for the date of 7 Usertsen III., a difference of 778 years.

On the other hand, the date in my "Egyptian Chronology" 1931 B.C. gives only a difference of 56 years, and even this difference can be diminished; for Lieblein in his treatise on Egyptian Chronology showed long since that there was a co-regnancy between Usertsen III. and Amenemhat III. of 33 years; a fact unknown to me when I wrote my book. Subtracting these 33 years, and reading 3 [1] for the conjectural 3 [...] years for Usertsen III. in the Turin papyrus, gives 1907 B.C. for 7 Usertsen III., still leaving a discrepancy of 32 years. If this petty discrepancy cannot otherwise be explained, we should have to shorten Manetho's Dynasty XV. or XVIII. by that amount; and it is quite possible that such an error should exist. But it is noticeable that 16th Farmuthi, the day of the observation in the papyrus, was not a day of Sed festival; and it is on such a day that we should expect such a memorandum to be made. The Sed festivals in Farmuthi fell on the 1st, 8th, 15th, &c. Is it not possible that the true reading of the papyrus (or of the original authority from which it was derived) should be "the 8th day" (𓏺𓏺𓏺𓏺 for 𓏺𓏺 𓏺𓏺)? If so the coincidence between my calculation and the papyrus would be exact. In any case Dynasties XIII., XIV., XVI., XVII. must be omitted from the direct chronological line; and the most important of my two main theses, viz., that only 20, not 30, successive dynasties must be counted, is now certain.

As to my other thesis, viz., that Manetho enlarged dynasties I.-VI. by interpolations of various kinds, I take this opportunity of correction by limiting his corruptions to Dyn. III.-VI. the Memphite dynasties. For the Thinite Dynasties I., II. I now prefer to take the Abydos list (with Manethonian numbers) as my authority rather than the Turin. My chief reasons for this change are:—(1) The discovery of Petrie that the ten Thinite Kings, hitherto supposed to be mythic, are really historic; (2) the nearly certain conclusion that the entrance passage of the great pyramid was used for astronomical observations. This gives an amended scheme with approximate dates.

B.C.	DYNASTY, &c.
3185	10 Thinites.
3135	Menes (instead of 2934).
2475	completion of Great Pyramid
2040	end of Dyn. VI.

From this date I adhere to my published tables.

This discovery of Borchardt's within a month of the publication of my reasons for adopting an almost identical date is one of the most singular coincidences on record. I may add that no other of the scores of schemes hitherto proposed is reconcilable with Borchardt's papyrus.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Mr. Winston Churchill's election to Parliament will have one collateral advantage for his readers. The appended "M.P." will in future enable them to distinguish between his work and that of his American namesake, and to realize that he is not the author of "Richard Carvel." A new book by the American Mr. Winston Churchill, entitled "The Crisis," is among the announcements of Messrs. Macmillan.

Mr. C. F. Clay is publishing with Messrs. Bell and Sons an English translation of "Les Secrets de l'Épée," by the irrepressible Baron de Bazancourt. An account of the original work (first published in 1862 and reprinted in 1875, but for some years past inaccessible) is given in the introduction to the Badminton volume on fencing. Mr. Clay's book reminds us that our leading publishers are a sporting race. Mr. C. J. Longman was the archery champion of England in 1883, and was in the Oxford Eleven (Association football) 1872-73; Mr. R. B. Marston also turns to archery for relaxation, but like his father, Mr. Edward Marston, he is best known as a fly-fisher and is the founder of the Fly-Fishers' Club; Mr. Sonnenschein is another enthusiastic fly-fisher; while Mr. Murray finds recreation in shooting, cricket, cycling, and golf (captain of the Royal Wimbledon Golf Club, 1881). "No exercise," however, writes Mr. Clay in connexion with his translation of Bazancourt's book, "is so absorbing as fencing." His volume is illustrated by Mr. F. H. Townsend.

Our Paris Correspondent announces the death, at an advanced age, of M. Adolphe Hatzfeld, who was for a great many years Professor of Rhetoric at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand. As professor, he formed a number of pupils who have since become eminent in political life, and in literature. After retiring from active work as a teacher, M. Hatzfeld undertook the preparation of a new dictionary of the French language in association with Messrs. Thomas and Arsène Darmesteter, a labour that occupied thirty years and was finished only a few months ago. Although Littré's dictionary is considered by most persons as a model of what a dictionary should be, M. Ratzfeld was of opinion that this work shows too much confusion in the enumeration of the various meanings of each word, and his own dictionary realizes what he esteemed to be useful reforms in the work of his predecessor.

"In the South Seas," which Messrs. Chatto and Windus are about to publish, has only appeared in book form in the edition de luxe of Stevenson's works, and is very difficult to obtain. It gives an account of experiences in the Marquesas, Paumotus, and Gilbert Islands in the course of two cruises in the yacht Casco (1888) and the schooner Equator (1889). "R.L.S." is one of those authors whose popularity, if circulation counts for anything, increases every year. Messrs. Chatto and Windus, who publish about twelve of his works, are constantly reprinting them, and inform us that there is such a constant demand for "Virginibus Puerisque" that they have difficulty in keeping it in stock. At the present moment they are preparing new and uniform editions, set in new type and bound in buckram, of "The Silverado Squatters" and "Prince Otto" (both of which are out of print), and "Travels with a Donkey" and "The Inland Voyage," which are also out of print except in the cheap edition. The same publishers are bringing out "The Cloister and the Hearth" in a thin paper edition for the pocket, with large type and fancy binding.

The Bibliographical Society will begin its return session a month earlier than usual. On Monday Mr. H. R. Plomer will read a paper entitled "Notices of English Printers in the City Records"; at the second meeting, on November 19, Mr. A. W. Pollard, the Hon. Secretary, will deal with "Some Notes on the History of Book Illustration in England." Members anticipate with interest Mr. Macfarlen's monograph on Antoine Verard, the celebrated French printer, soon to be issued.

It is a bad fire that burns to nobody's benefit. Mr. Hall's "Problems of the Mycenæan Age" should have appeared last year, but a large portion of the work was destroyed in the fire at the Ballantyne Press. Mr. Nutt states that the delay has enabled the author to embody the results achieved by Mr. Arthur Evans in his Cretan excavations, and generally to recast the volume. Mr. Nutt also announces that a large portion of Berners' Froissart (the next six volumes in the Tudor Translations) is in type, and that a first instalment may be ready for subscribers during the autumn. "Shakespeare's Greenwood: The Language, the Superstitions, the Customs, the Folklore, the Birds and Trees, the Parson, the Poets, the Novelist," by George Morley, was issued this week. A week or so later Mr. Nutt will publish a little manual on "The Boys' Club in Theory and Practice," by B. Paul Neuman, containing supplementary chapters by various experts on the subject. No. 3 of "Scottish History, from Contemporary History," which deals with the Rising of 1745, and is edited by C. Sanford Terry, M.A., will probably be ready next month. The fourth volume, "The Chevalier de St. George and the Jacobite Movement in his favour, 1701-1720," also edited by Mr. Sanford Terry, will appear during the winter. A second and enlarged edition of the second volume of "Mary Queen of Scots" has just been issued. "Heroines of the Bible in Art," by Clara Erskine Clement (a companion volume to Miss Hurll's "The Madonna in Art" in the same series), will be published next month, together with three new volumes in "Popular Studies in Mythology, Romance, and Folklore" (including "Cuchulainn, the Irish Achilles," by Mr. Alfred Nutt), and Volume III. of "The Publications of the Irish Texts Society," dealing with the poems of Eogan O'Rahilly. O'Rahilly, an ardent Jacobite, and the leading minister poet of the early eighteenth century, has hitherto been known only by a few printed specimens, but he is now edited, with an English version, introduction, and notes, by Father Dinsen, S.J. "The Wife of Bath's Tale," Vol. XIII. of "The Grimm Library," is a study by C. H. Maynadier upon the origin and evolution in literary history of the theme embodied in Chaucer's tale, and will not be ready before the winter. Another book announced by Mr. Nutt is "Indian Story and Song from North America," by Miss Alice Fletcher, the best-known authority on the manners and customs of the great Omaha tribe, of which she is an adopted member. It includes for the first time harmonized versions of thirty Indian songs.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's list is strong in biographical works. One is the life of General Sir Arthur Cotton, R.E., K.C.S.I., by his daughter, Lady Hope, with some "Famine Prevention Studies," by Mr. Wm. Digby, C.I.E. Sir Arthur Cotton was within three years of being a centenarian when he died in the summer of 1899. He took part in the expedition against Burmah, in the defence of Rangoon, and rendered great service in connexion with the vast irrigation works of India. Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler figures in the same publishers' list in two places, first with a volume of verse, as a reminder that she wrote, and published, poetry some years before her first novel appeared, and then as the recipient of a compliment without which no popular author's success would nowadays seem complete—the familiar birthday book. "The Isabel Carnaby Birthday Book," is arranged by E. D. Berrington. Other books in Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's list were included in our supplement last week. Their new "Self-Educator Series" deserves a note of explanation perhaps. The general editorship is in the hands of Mr. John Adams, Rector of the Free Church Training College, Glasgow. The aim in view is to avoid two common mistakes (1) expecting too much from the student; (2) attempting to exhaust a whole subject in one book. At present five volumes are nearly ready—French, German, Latin, Botany, and Chemistry.

The most important work in Messrs. Blackwood's new list is "The Englishman in China in the Victorian Era," by Mr. Alexander Michie, giving a résumé of modern Chinese history as illustrated in the life of Sir Rutherford Alcock. Sir Rutherford Alcock was sent to China as British Consul in 1844, and after serving in Japan first as Consul-General, and then as Minister Plenipotentiary, became our Minister in China in 1865. He retired some fifteen years ago. Mr. Michie himself has been connected with China and Japan for the last half century. The two volumes containing this work will be ready shortly. Sir Henry Craik's "Scotland since 1745" will also occupy two volumes. Its main interest lies not so much in political history—though this will be dealt with at some length—as in the record of the social and educational progress of Scotland during the eighteenth century. Mr. Hueffer's volume on "The Cinque Ports" is described as "an attempt, by means of suggestion, to interpret to the passing years the inward message of the Five Ports." A feature of the book will be the illustrations by Mr. William Hyde. Sir Theodore Martin's life of "Helena Faucit (Lady Martin) also announced by Messrs. Blackwood, is due next month. The most interesting literary item in the list is Professor Saintsbury's "History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe," which is to be completed in three volumes. The first volume deals first with the whole of Greek and Roman criticism, the last division being devoted to mediæval criticism, and continuing the history down to Gavin Douglas. The next volume in the Memorial edition of G. W. Steevens' works, "From Cape Town to Ladysmith, and Egypt in 1898" contains several new letters from Ladysmith which Mr. Steevens failed to get through the Boer lines, and which were found among his papers when the town was relieved. "Egypt in 1898" which has been included in the volume, has not been reprinted since it appeared in its original form, although it has been out of print for some time.

Messrs. P. S. King announce for next month a work on statistics, intended to be a text-book dealing in their methods and principles. It is written by Mr. A. L. Bowley, a lecturer at the London School of Economics, and the author of a work on wages, and will be called "Elements of Statistics."

Besides the Cranford mentioned elsewhere Messrs. Methuen announce many volumes in their "Little Library," including Lord Tennyson's Early Poems and his "Maud," Cary's translation of Dante's "Inferno," Kinglake's "Eothen," Thackeray's "Pendennis," Jane Austen's "Pride and Prejudice," and Mrs. Craik's "John Halifax." These are all edited with introductions and notes.

In the list of autumn publications given in our supplement last week Mr. R. Lydekker's "The Great and Small Game of India, Burma, and Tibet," was inadvertently included under Messrs. Robinson's announcements. It is published by Messrs. Rowland Ward.

M. Anatole France is now correcting the proof-sheets of a new volume in the famous series entitled "Histoire Contemporaine." This volume, which will very likely be called "M. Bergeret à Paris," will contain the articles or chapters published two years ago in the Echo de Paris, and a certain number of those in the Figaro of the last eighteen months, besides several still unpublished.

The October number of the Mercure de France contains the following note:—"The Society of the Mercure de France has just been exclusively authorized by the heirs and the executors of the will of Robert Louis Stevenson to translate and to publish such of his works as are still unpublished. Moreover, this house alone has been authorized to publish a complete edition."

Mr. Poultney Bigelow has in preparation a book on the influence of Colonies upon national life, which will be published shortly.

Apparently purchasers of The Times reprint of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" may continue to feel every confidence in the value of their investment; for a copy, in its case, was sold by auction recently at a private house on Tulse-hill for the exact sum given for it some eighteen months ago.

The Gardeners' Magazine is now published at 148-149, Aldersgate-street, instead of 4, Ave Maria-lane.

PROBLEM No. LXX
By GUSTAV A. BARTH, U.S.A.
BLACK

WHITE.

White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. LXXI
By A. ARNELL, Sweden.
BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and mate in three moves.

Referring to last week's notes, the following rendering of the theme by a Russian master appears to require a little explanation:—

PROBLEM No. 72, by N. Maximov, Russia.—White (7 pieces), K at K R 4; Q at Q Kt 6; Kts at K Kt 5, Q B 8; pawns at K Kt 3, K 4, Q Kt 4. Black (4 pieces), K at K 4; B at Q R 3; Kt at Q Kt 2; pawn at K Kt 3. Two moves.

PROBLEM No. 73, by A. Troitzky.—White (5 pieces), K at Q sq; Q at K B sq; Kt at Q 3; pawns at Q 2 and Q Kt 3. Black (8 pieces), K at K 5; Q at K R sq; Kt at Q B sq; pawns at K R 5, K Kt 5, K 3, Q 3, Q 5. White to play and win.

SOLUTIONS.—Problem No. 55, Nemo (2), Q–R 3. No. 56, Ohlsson (3), key Q–K P. Then if B–Q; 2. Kt–K 6 ch, &c., or if K–R; 2. Q–Kt 8 ch, &c. No. 57 (Troitzky Ending), White, 1. P–R 6, P–P; 2. P–K 7, &c. No. 58, Loyd, White wins by R–Q, &c. No. 59, Jespersen (2), Kt–B 7. No. 60, Znamenacek (3), 1. Q–K B 2, threatening 2. Kt–P ch and 3. P–Q 5 mate. No. 61 Ending, 1. P–Kt 4 ch, &c. (see No. 12). No. 62, Brenander (2), R–Q 6. No. 63, Traxler (3), 1. Q–Q 8, threatening 2. Q–Kt 8 ch, &c. If 1. Q–Q 8, K–R; 2. P–B 4 ch, &c.

Correct solvers are J. D. Tucker (Ilkley), Nos. 55 to 63; A. C. Waters (Bromley), Nos. 53, 55 to 63; Otto Würzburg (Grand Rapids), Nos. 47 to 58; R. H. B. (Enfield), Nos. 59, 60; E. J. M., Nos. 55, 59; M. E. Roberts, No. 62.

CITY OF LONDON CHESS CLUB.—The season opens to-day (Saturday) at 7, Grocer's-hall-court, Poultry, when Mr. Blackburne plays blindfold.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A. C. W. [illegible] No. 58 is no doubt solved by R×Q as stated by Mr. Loyd. If 1. R–Q B 8 ch, B–K R, 2. B–R 3, B–R 4, P–K 8–Q 4. B–Kt 5 ch and appears to mate next move. Thanks for many useful notes.

W. P. B. E. and others.—1. The queen at White's K B sq in No. 63 is Black. 2. In No. 61 White has only to draw.

N. S. A.—Has appeared.—A good deal may be learned at starting from Rayner's "Chess Problems and Laws." Two cheap Problems, each published at 1s.

[illegible] at Chess Stands.—Nos. 52 and 63 are very fine. In No. 52 one has to [illegible] the idea that the queen must remain on the fifth rank for the sake of a mate in 2. Q–K 5—. P–Q [illegible] Kt–K [illegible]. In No. 57 the White king keeps on the queen's [illegible] Black checks. No. 59 very fresh and clever key A. C. W.—In the very interesting game Jaenisch v. Mackenzie, 1862, [illegible] B. R 7 for White. I saw this move noticed (after [illegible] to win in the New Orleans Times-Democrat. The editor replied to B–Kt 5, to which I would reply Q–R 8 [illegible] last either Q, Rook P, though it [illegible] Where is to carry on the attack after a waiting move. The game looks rather [illegible] I think.—WILLIAM [illegible].

GAME No. XXXV.—Played in Prague:—

THE GREEK THINKERS. By Professor THEODORE GOMPERZ, of Vienna University. Demy 8vo. Translated by Laurie Magnus, M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford. [In the press.

Volume II., containing PLATO, is now nearly completed, and is already in course of translation.

This account of Greek Philosophy is inspired by the endeavour to do justice to the chief tendencies in all departments of ancient thought. Composed throughout in a clear and popular style, the work will be found to combine in a singular degree the resources of an almost encyclopædic learning with an appreciation of the results of modern science and of the dependence of the civilization of the present on that of past ages. The "Greek Thinkers" in this sense include the leaders of religion, of literature, and of the special sciences.

A GREEK GRAMMAR FOR SCHOOLS. By JOHN THOMPSON, M.A., late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge, Senior Classical Master, High School, Dublin. Crown 8vo. [In the press.

THE STUDENT'S GREECE.

A HISTORY OF GREECE FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE ROMAN CONQUEST. With Supplementary Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. A new Edition. Thoroughly Revised and in part Rewritten. By C. B. MARINDIN, M.A. With many new Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo., 7s. 6d. [Published.

"The revision could not have been entrusted to better hands . . . Altogether the work has been so improved as to render it likely to hold its place with any competitors for another term of forty years."—Glasgow Herald.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The quincentenary of Chaucer's death falls, we need hardly remind our readers, on the 25th October (next Thursday), on which day at one o'clock a window is to be unveiled by the Poet Laureate in memory of the poet at St. Saviour's, Southwark. We publish elsewhere four articles on different sides of the poet's genius.

* * * *

Another important anniversary, which is likely to be overshadowed, falls on the same day. Mr. W. P. James, whose literary notes in the St. James's Gazette rank among the best literary matter in the daily Press, reminds us that Macaulay was born on October 25, 1800, "the day of St. Crispin, the anniversary of Agincourt." He adds, "An eminent living critic has stated as the result of his experience that though the characters and events depicted by Macaulay are neither the most impressive nor the most important in our history, he has found this period almost invariably the most familiar to people of all sorts and conditions." We much doubt whether this is as true as it was. If we may judge from the list of new reprints there is not much demand now for Macaulay's history. The fact is, we are afraid, that there is no "familiarity" with any period of English history. But at the present moment, we fancy, people know and are learning more about the Reformation and the great Rebellion than any other period.

* * * *

Macaulay has his tomb in Westminster Abbey, as most people are aware, because he rests in Poets' Corner at the feet of Addison's statue, and amidst the tombs of Johnson and Garrick and Handel and Goldsmith and Gay. But, probably, not every one remembers that his is one of the rare cases where both son and father have been so honoured. Zachary Macaulay, too, was buried in Westminster Abbey, and the inscription on the pedestal of his bust is an eloquent testimony to his services in the cause of the abolition of slavery and his self-denying character. Sir George Trevelyan has said that this inscription, telling more of the man than he himself would wish to have been told, was likely to remain his only biography. But Sir George's conjecture is about to be falsified. A biography of Zachary Macaulay is among the announcements of the season. Zachary Macaulay was Governor of Sierra Leone during the most anxious period of the long French war. His biographer is Lady Knutsford, his grandniece, and niece of his son the historian. The book will be published shortly by Mr. Edward Arnold. Lady Knutsford has had Zachary Macaulay's large and varied correspondence as well as his journals to help her.

From a literary and artistic point of view the general election now drawing to a close has produced two notable things—one to the credit of either side in politics. If anything could have won the election for the Liberals, it would have been the admirable caricatures contributed by Mr. Carruthers Gould to the pages of the Westminster Gazette. Mr. Gould's draughtsmanship may not be above reproach, but he has an unfailing sense of humour and a keen eye for the weak spots in his opponents' armour. On the Unionist side, perhaps, the best things that have appeared have been the crisp and epigrammatic biographies of members in the Pall Mall Gazette. They smack a little of the style of "John Junior" in Vanity Fair.

* * * *

No man of letters with a reputation approximating to that of Dr. Johnson has addressed the electorate during the past days of Parliamentary excitement—this for the sufficient reason that we have not among us a man whose life shall form the subject of a second Boswell. When in 1774 Parliament was dissolved and Mr. Thrale had to encounter a contested election in Southwark, it will be recalled that Johnson wrote an incisive political pamphlet entitled "The Patriot," in which, among other things, he attempted to justify the American war. Boswell admits that in this as in two former pamphlets there was "a considerable proportion of sophistry, a contemptuous ridicule of his opponents, which was very provoking." The year subsequent to his third, unsuccessful, attempt to win the suffrages of the Southwark electorate, Thrale died. Johnson had aided his friend by writings, advertisements, and letters.

> A new Parliament being now called, I again solicit the honour of being elected for one of your representatives; and solicit it with the greater confidence, as I am not conscious of having neglected my duty, or of having acted otherwise than as becomes the independent representative of independent constituents; superior to fear, hope, and expectation, who has no private purposes to promote, and whose prosperity is involved in the prosperity of his country. As my recovery from a very severe distemper is not yet perfect, I have declined to attend the Hall, and hope an omission so necessary will not be harshly censured. I can only send my respectful wishes, that all your deliberations may tend to the happiness of the kingdom and the peace of the borough.

Johnson's efforts were of no avail, however, for the borough discarded the services of its "best representative in the Commons." Six years earlier, as we learn by a letter from Johnson to his biographer, "Mr. Thrale (had) happily surmounted a very violent and acrimonious opposition; but all joys have their abatement. . . . Mrs. Thrale has fallen from her horse and hurt herself very much." Some candidates perhaps would think success cheaply purchased at such a cost.

* * * *

Apropos of the Thrales, it is not generally recognized that the second name in the title of the great brewing firm, Messrs. Barclay, Perkins, and Co., is that of the man who hung a mezzotint portrait of Johnson in the counting-house of the Southwark Brewery, and upon being asked by Mrs. Thrale why he did so, answered "Because, Madam, I wish to have one wise man there." The Doctor, greatly flattered, said "It is a very handsome compliment, and I believe you speak sincerely." No wonder many gracious things were said to him.

* * * *

It is not given to many men to be immortalized in such words as Ruskin uses, in his autobiography, of his friendship with the late Sir Henry Acland—a friendship which, as he wrote, "has never changed but by deepening to this day." Senior to Ruskin as an undergraduate only by about a year and a-half, Acland's judgment was even then "unerring, his aims determined, his powers developed," and the whole force of his character was required in the coming struggle for the future of scientific education at Oxford. Himself a High Churchman, and an intimate friend of Dr. Pusey, Acland found almost all the religious world of Oxford up in arms against the spread of physical science. The votes for the new scientific museum in Convocation were carried only by very narrow majorities; the final vote would probably have been lost but for the intervention of Dr. Pusey. Acland's aim was to make his University not only a centre of classical and theological learning, but a place where men might study profoundly the whole range of physical science. No man ever did more to widen the outlook of those in authority. It is safe to say that he will be remembered rather as a son of Oxford than as one of our most eminent physicians.

Illustrated journalism lost one of its best known leaders by the death of Mr. William L. Thomas, the founder of the Graphic and Daily Graphic. A successful artist himself, he could detect talent in others, and his counsel and encouragement laid the foundation of many artistic successes. It used to be said that the Royal Academy had to study the Graphic before filling its vacancies, and certainly a great number of Graphic artists have been gathered into its select portals. On its literary side, the Graphic has always preserved a high tradition. Victor Hugo, Anthony Trollope, Charles Reade, Wilkie Collins, Thomas Hardy, Sir Walter Besant, and many another well-known author helped to make the paper what it is. The mainstay throughout, however, has been Mr. W. L. Thomas. He broke away from the Illustrated London News when that journal was twenty-seven years old and audaciously founded a rival. The tide of success came to the Graphic with the Franco-German war. Before the Graphic came of age in 1889 nearly two millions of money had, we believe, been spent on its production. Out of the Graphic came the Daily Graphic, the accomplishment of an ideal formed by Mr. Thomas, it is said, more than twenty years before. It was a daring experiment; the mechanical difficulties were enormous, and, at times, disheartening; but, one by one, they were overcome, and the Daily Graphic is now as firmly established as the parent paper.

* * * *

The late Mr. Locker-Lampson, in 1886, printed what he intended should be a complete list of his unique collections at Rowfant. He thought that this little piece of extravagance would be atoned for by his firm resolution never to buy another book. Alas for human resolves! He soon began to buy again, and there has just appeared, fourteen years after the publication of the first catalogue, an "Appendix to the Rowfant Library," giving all the printed books, manuscripts, autograph letters, &c., collected in the interval. For Mr. Locker-Lampson's son is as keen a collector as his father, and the present volume is almost as large and contains nearly as many entries of interest as the first.

* * * *

Edited by Mr. Godfrey Locker-Lampson and excellently printed at the Chiswick Press, this new production is something more than a bare catalogue of rare editions. Mr. Lang, who contributed some prefatory verses to the first catalogue, writes again here on "the special act of grace" by which

> The well-loved honours keep their place,
> And new-won glories half efface
> The splendours of the old.

Mr. Wilfrid Blunt adds a reminiscent sonnet; Mr. Dobson sings characteristically of

> The courtly Owner, glass in eye
> With half sad smile, forérunning
> Some triumph of an apt reply,—
> Some master-stroke of punning.

Lord Crewe contributes a longer poem, beginning in verse as smooth and polished as Frederick Locker's own:—

> The yellow autumn sunset falls
> On copse, and lawn, and shaven green,
> And gilds the russet Rowfant walls
> Their trees between.

and closing thus:—

> What hope but this his heart could ask,
> As thick the shadows gathered round,
> That hands he loved should take the task
> He left uncrowned?
> And thus as years are rolled apace,
> New comrades gather, these to those,
> Alike the bluest-blooded race
> That Bookland knows.
> 'Tis well! we bid thee no good night
> Dear Master of the lyric strain;
> The life that made our days so bright
> Lives here again.

Those booklovers who can bear to read about others' treasures will find here a rich store of entertainment. Some entries will arouse a pang of envy in the best of us. Here we have, among many others, the "Religio Medici" (first and unauthorized edition), the first issue of the first edition of "Gulliver's Travels," and Edward FitzGerald's own copy of the first edition of the "Rubáiyát."

* * * *

The death is just recorded of Mr. John Baird, of Chatham, whose likeness to Dickens, both in features and physique, was so remarkable that he was known in the neighbourhood as Charles Dickens' "double." Strangely enough, Dickens seems to have known nothing of the resemblance. Mr. F. G. Kitton writes:—

> Some twelve years ago I accompanied my friend, the late Mr. W. R. Hughes, F.L.S., Treasurer of Birmingham, on a visit to Mr. Baird, whom we found the very counterpart of Dickens, and he was "exceedingly proud to be mistaken for so great a man, although it was inconvenient at times." His appearance then much resembled the last photographic portrait of the novelist, taken in America in 1867. At the last public reading given by Dickens at Chatham the policeman at the door, observing Mr. Baird as he left the hall, mistook him for the reader himself and shouted to the attendant outside for "Mr. Dickens' carriage!" Mr. Baird, who was in his ninety-first year and had been chairman of the Chatham Waterworks Company for nearly fifty years, was personally known to Dickens. Yet I am assured on excellent authority that neither Dickens nor the members of his family residing at Gad's Hill Place had ever heard of Mr. Baird, so that the many mistakes said to have arisen from the alleged resemblance must have been very one-sided, the Novelist and his nearest relatives being quite unconscious of them.

* * * *

A more real link with Dickens is broken by the death of George Dolby, Dickens' private secretary. He was a brother of the famous singer Madame Sainton Dolby. In the great days of the famous reading tours, both in England and America, Dolby's name was almost as widely known as his master's. For he succeeded Arthur Smith (brother of the more famous Albert) in the onerous post of manager. Upon him fell the arrangement of every detail—the engagement of the hall, the advertising, the providing of much-needed refreshment between the acts in the dressing-room, the selling of tickets, and finally the counting of the gains. Then came the long railway journeys, on which it was Dolby who exerted himself to amuse his wearied employer, and provided him with the best procurable of food and drink.

* * * *

The two lived for many years on terms of the greatest intimacy, and during the American tour Dolby watched over Dickens' failing health with the most anxious solicitude, in spite of the strain and worry caused by the wild rush for tickets. Writing from Boston, Dickens said :—"Dolby is nearly worked off his legs ; nothing can exceed his energy and good humour." Again, from New York, he wrote :—"Dolby continues to be the most unpopular man in America (mainly because he can't get four thousand people into a room that holds two thousand), and is reviled in print daily. Yesterday morning a newspaper proclaims of him, 'Surely it is time that the pudding-headed Dolby retired into the native gloom from which he has emerged.' He takes it very coolly and does his best." After this Dickens always used to call him "P. H." Dolby, in allusion to those "graceful specimens of literature describing him as the 'pudding-headed.'" Later on he wrote from Boston :—"Dolby is as tender as a woman and as watchful as a doctor. He never leaves me during the reading now, but sits at the side of the platform and keeps his eye on me all the time."

* * * *

One of the many "ridiculous things" which were performed by Mr. Dolby and Mr. Osgood (the well-known Boston publisher) to keep Dickens in spirits was a walking match between those two gentlemen, into which the Novelist entered with so much enthusiasm that he drew up the Articles of Agreement, in which he referred to the competitors, in true sporting style, as "the Man of Ross" and "the Boston Bantam." A description of the event, duly chronicled by Dickens, was printed on a broad-sheet with gold borders, each impression of which was signed and stamped, the stamp being cancelled with a monogram from a die specially prepared and immediately afterwards destroyed. One of these broad-sheets (believed to have been Mr. Dolby's own copy and probably unique) was recently disposed of at Sotheby's (the Wright Collection) for £20. Mr. Dolby's volume of reminiscences, entitled "Charles Dickens as I Knew Him" (1885), is one of the most entertaining and informing books relating to the novelist ever published. In 1887 Mr. Dolby brought an action against the proprietor of a well-known publication for libel, which appeared in an article describing him, erroneously and disparagingly, as "Dickens' Deputy Diner-out." The plaintiff won the day and obtained damages amounting to £100. His end was pathetic, he died "penniless, at the Fulham Infirmary," and the inquest held upon him produced a verdict of "Bronchitis, accelerated by self-neglect."

* * * *

The quincentenary of Chaucer's death gives a new interest to the old haunts and habits of the poet's life in London. Recently we devoted a paper to the subject, and the Home Counties Magazine offers a pleasant article on "Chaucer at Aldgate," by Professor Hales. The Professor shows how we may trace the probable route taken by Chaucer every morning from his house above the Gate of Aldgate to the Custom House.

We may picture him going forth to his labour till the evening by several routes—down the Minories and then by the Tower, and the Church of All Hallows, Barking, and so to Customers' Key ; or down Aldgate and Fenchurch-street as far as Mark-lane and so to his destination ; or more commonly perhaps proceeding down Jewry-street and Cretched Friars and Hart-street (to use the now current names) and so into Mark-street and on to his official desk.

The writer speaks of Chaucer as a lover of London in the same category as Lamb, Dickens, or Johnson. The poet certainly expressed his affection for the city, but he did singularly little to immortalize the town itself. There is nothing in all his works which brings the streets of old London before our eyes so vividly as Lydgate's "London Lyckpenny."

* * * *

Mrs. Henry Birchenough is of opinion that this country is sadly in need of a Tyrtæus. "Wanted—A New War Poet !" is the title of her article in the current number of the Nineteenth Century, and she scornfully compares the "storm of patriotic jingles" aroused by the struggle in South Africa with the poetry published at the time of the Crimean war. The little volume "Wagers of Battle," recently republished—its original title, by the way, was "Points of War"—serves to furnish her with several illustrations of the nobler strains that nerved the hearts of an earlier generation. Times have sadly changed, she thinks, and we have now but Messrs. Rudyard Kipling and Harold Begbie to catch the mantle fallen from the shoulders of Sir Franklin and Mr. Henry Lushington.

* * * *

Upon Mr. Kipling the lady is especially severe. She speaks of his "deplorable, meaningless, and vulgar jingle," and, not content with attacking the author, brands with no less infamy the composer of the music for his well-known "jingle." Sir Arthur Sullivan must stand in the dock beside his associate in crime. "Alas !" she cries, "nobody can forget how some of the rhymes found tune-makers of the same quality, and hence new and everlasting torments from the indefatigable barrel organs." It is the privilege of ladies to state their convictions forcibly, and it is conceivable that certain minds might class the words as "deplorable and vulgar." They, however, certainly achieved the purpose for which they were written, and we imagine that a moderate degree of intelligence only is requisite to discover their meaning.

* * * *

The Onlooker, a new threepenny weekly, is of the "bright, gossippy" class, and tells you all about well-known people or people who wish to be well-known, and take the necessary steps to that end. It is well got up, and has a portrait by Mr. Mortimer Menpes of Mr. Winston Churchill, M.P. The Dramatic Calendar, giving a brief description of the chief plays now running, is a good new feature. There is an attempt at "a better method" of telling the world what books to read. This better method is to get six of the "well-known people" aforesaid to inform the world what books "they have lately most enjoyed reading." Possibly some people may prefer their own judgment : but tastes differ. At any rate, they can here see the autographs of these celebrated personages. "John Oliver Hobbes" contributes a curious item :—

Ouida's Critical Essays ; —
The Symbolists . . . . . Arthur Zymons.

Lady Pembroke is made to include in her list "Fanny Berney and her Friends." She is the only contributor, by the way, who mentions "David Harum."

* * * *

In America, where they are nothing if not thorough, a book has been recently published called "The Real David Harum." It appears that the gentleman described in Mr. Noyes Westcott's popular novel answered, in real life, to the name of David Hannum, that the village of Homer, Cortland County, New York, is the Homeville of the book, and that several other names have been so slightly changed as to be readily recognizable by their neighbours. According to Mr. Vance's little handbook it seems that the Homer people are jealous of the fame that has come to their fellow-townsman. They are prone, says a writer in the New York Daily Tribune, to speak thus :—

> I do not see why this here Westcott picked out David Hannum to put in a book. The town has a heap sight bigger men than Dave Hannum ever was. Why, we sent men to Congress, and there was a lot of fellows who went West and made their fortunes, and was much more distinguished than Dave Hannum ever thought of being. . . Dave Hannum was an ordinary sort of amusing cuss, and though he had lots of money one time he died poorer than a church mouse.

Probably "the ordinary sort of amusing cuss" makes a more interesting figure as hero of a novel than the most successful member of Congress. We rather wonder that the good folk of Homer have not a sufficiently keen eye to business to send a bill in to Mr. Westcott similar to that which was drawn out against Shakespeare by the originals of Snout, Starveling, and the rest in Mr. Black's novel "Judith Shakespeare."

* * * *

It is strange that the City authorities do not encourage rather than hinder the genuine student, anxious to search for first-hand information of a special kind in those valuable Letter-books, Journals, and the like, kept at the Guildhall. Mr. Riley's "Memorials of London and London Life," in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, extracted almost without exception from the Letter-books, suffices to indicate the richness of the harvest that remains ungarnered. On Monday evening Mr. H. R. Plomer gave to the members of the Bibliographical Society some interesting details as to his "finds" in the City archives. He discovered, for instance, that Richard Pynson was official printer to the City from 1517 onward to the time of his death, the first mention of his name being on the 23rd of March, 1517, when a bill for 54s. for the printing of books was presented. On December 10, 1528, another bill of 37s. 3d. is mentioned, the comment thereon being that he "must be contented with less." Another entry relates to an unknown book by Palsgrave, author of "Les Clairissement de la Langue Francoyse," on the teaching of Latin and French, upon which a pound or two was advanced in November, 1550; members of the Court were asked to peruse it, presumably with a view to publication. Systematic search by competent persons through these old volumes would doubtless add considerably to our store of knowledge.

* * * *

Hans Andersen is popular with the publishers just now, though the new editions of his "Fairy Tales" can hardly be, as the Daily News suggests, in commemoration of the centenary of his birth, for that is nearly five years off. We recently announced a new commemorative edition to be published in this country by Mr. Heinemann, which is to have an introduction by Mr. Edmund Gosse. In the New York Critic for October there is an article entitled "Side Lights on Hans Andersen," by Mr. Gosse, of which the following is an extract :—

> It was a favourite exercise with Andersen to read aloud his fairy tales, soon after they were written, to some fortunate friend. The number of those who can say that they have enjoyed this privilege must now be growing small. In England it must be extremely small, for Andersen's latest visit to this country was paid in 1857. The present writer, therefore, is tempted to believe that there is some little rarity, at least, in the experience which he is able to relate, and the more so from a particular which will be presently mentioned. Only on a single occasion did Hans Christian Andersen read to me one of his unpublished fairy tales, and, indeed, I had not the honour of knowing him until he had given to the world the main bulk of his productions. But in the summer of 1872 I had the happiness of listening to "The Cripple." At that time Andersen had a suite of rooms in Copenhagen, but he was much more frequently to be found at the mansion of some friends just outside the fortifications, called Rolighed or "Quietude." This house had been the residence of several interesting people, among others of no less a person than Oersted. It was now owned by a wealthy and liberal merchant, Mr. Moritz Melchior, who had rebuilt it, and who had turned it into a miniature of Rosenborg Castle, with a tower, and with high balconies overlooking the Sound.
> In this house Andersen was so constantly welcome that a portion of it—three or four charming rooms—was set apart entirely for his service, and he came and went in them without restraint. "Rolighed" is the subject of Andersen's latest poem, in which he says :—
> My home of homes, where behind the slope of elder-bushes,
> My life regained its sunshine and my harp its tone,
> To thee I bring with gratitude this blithe song of mine!
> It was here, in his bright room open to the east, with the long caravan of ships going by in the Sound below, "like a flock of wild swans," as he said, with the white towns of Malmö and Landskrona sparkling on the Swedish coast, and the sunlight falling on Tycho Brahé's island, that Andersen proposed to recite to me a new fairy tale. He read in a low voice, which presently sank to almost a hoarse whisper; he read slowly, out of mercy to my imperfect apprehension, and as he read he sat beside me, with his amazingly long and bony hand—a great brown hand, almost like that of a man of the woods—grasping my shoulder. As he read, the colour of everything—the twinkling sails, the sea, the opposite Swedish coast, the burnished sky above—kindled with sunset. It seemed as if Nature herself were flushing with ecstasy at the sound of Andersen's voice.

The suggestion of the Daily News that copies of the tales should be sent as Christmas gifts to elementary schools, children's hospitals, &c., deserves support.

Perpetual Youth.

Some ten years ago (or it may be more) a certain critic, whose sympathies were rather with French than English forms of literature, remarked upon the prevalence in this country of a class of book seldom seen elsewhere—the book of adventure pure and simple. The critic was perfectly correct, and the last few years have witnessed the publication of a larger number of volumes in this kind than ever. It is curious to notice, too, that the more adventurous they become—the more crowded with peril and escape, with battle and murder and heroic rescue—the more bald and ungrammatical becomes their style of writing. And yet it was R. L. Stevenson, that most eminent stylist, who did more than any one else to popularize what may be called the adult boy's book. In his hands it was at least literature. Stevenson's novels were not in our opinion his best work—he was primarily an essayist—but the prose in which they were written was admirable, spirited, easy, and with a distinctive touch of its own. His followers achieve success in spite of all the faults incident to hasty and careless writing. Their chief concern is to keep the story moving, and, to do them justice, they commonly contrive that events should follow one another with a breathless rapidity. And their fertility is amazing. Let us not deny them the possession of talent—the talent of the Italian improvisatore "who recites but will not pause to write." Four stout volumes in the year is a light estimate of the contribution that the successful practitioner in this line makes to the world's literature; as many as seven have been recorded as one year's output from the workshop of a persevering lady. The odd thing is that these books are not intended for the young; boys may buy them, but they are not what are commonly known as boys' books. Most nationalities, presumably, have their writers who cater for the adventurous youth; but England alone (so far as we know) is happy in the possession of authors and readers alike endowed with the spirit of perpetual juvenility. It is well to keep young, and we would not willingly lose the adventurous mind. "An author's mind," says Hazlitt in one of his essays, "is seen in his writings, as his face is in the glass." It may well be that we have some gallant fellows, pining for adventure, in our midst; perhaps we meet them daily in the literary clubs without a suspicion of their fiery nature; but certainly if their writings are in any sort an index to their minds it might be well to give some of them a wide berth. As to the many thousands of adult citizens of the Empire who buy their books, they have at least the pleasure of knowing that they have preserved their boyish tastes. But when they praise one of these tales of breathless incident as a work of genius, as has been lately done, it is difficult for the judicious hearer to repress a smile.

TO CHAUCER,

Who Died in the Autumn of 1400, on October 25th.

" When that Aprille with his shoures sote
The drought of March had perced to the rote "
And the first notes of Spring had power to call
You from your book, her glances to enthral
Your eyes long-fastened on the hearts of men ;
When at your window where the fowles sang
The winding horn their melodies outrang ;
Or at the inn, in your rare company
The pilgrims laughed and little thought to be —Poor dust—the immortal pictures of your pen ;

In that fair season would the unfettered lays
Of rhymeless songsters prick your heart with praise ;
By gilded mead, down deep embowered glade,
In haunts by natural beauty secret made,
Wandered alone our poet of the throng ;
We wander with you, Chaucer, down the years ;
Love's Rose reopens, and the pomp of spears
Sparkles anew ; once more the daisies blow
Beneath your feet, and o'er us as we go
Sounds sweet and full the nightingale's song.

On cloistered lawns, empurpled by the rose,
Where memory softly into music flows,
Linger the burdens of your far refrain ;
Swiftly, to love or laughter tuned, the strain
From sparkling humour into passion glows ;
With prayer of martyr, cry of battle shrill
Mingles the distant murmur of the mill ;
On high sentence and knightly speech sublime
Breaks the rude laughter of the olden time,
On true love's sigh the sound of lawless blows.

E'en so your eyes that shone with ecstasy
Grew dim with mirth, twinkled from sage to sly,
Now scoffed at Love, now bowed before Her shrine,
Till She at last in clemency divine
For saintlier song forgave Her poet's scorn.
Softly you closed the book of chivalry,
True knight, repenting all your " ribaudye " !
The rose had laid her loveliness aside,
The fields were widowed of their golden pride,
What time their poet to the grave was borne.

What though at this sad season silence fell
On lips that loved of vernal days to tell,
Shrewd Time that robs the rhymester of his song
Reveres the bard ; e'en now through ages long Visions of elder days your verses bring.
A mortal dies, soon must his image fade
In the most loyal memory to a shade ;
The poet lives, within the heart secure ;
Five hundred years ! and still your words endure,
Poet of Spring-time, of our verse the Spring !

LEGALIZED ARTISTIC ROBBERY.

Go, little book, from this, my solitude,
I cast thee on the waters,—wend thy way—,
And if, as I believe, thy plot be good,
The stage will grab thee before many days.

When it first entered the minds of our appointed legislators that literary produce, like more vulgar and material produce, had a claim (far more shadowy, of course) to be considered as property, it occurred to them that it would be advisable to supplement the rough equity of the Common Law with a Statute Law designed to protect it from common robbers who were something more than plagiarists. The dramatic pickpockets who stole literary handkerchiefs, picking the initials of the owner out of the corners and substituting their own, were overlooked with contempt, as the property they stole was considered to have no literary value; and the stage, supplied and satisfied with this refuse, was never thought likely to burgle the strongholds of literature—properly so called. The chartered felony of Shakespeare in one age and one language, and the equally chartered and more impudent felony of Molière in another age and another language, did not disturb this complacent theory, and the statutory definition of copyright never contemplated such a thing as stage-right, or the power of selecting, plot, story, characters, names, titles, dialogue, &c., at will from any work of fiction, re-arranging them in any form that might please the selecter, and using them for fame and profit, not only without the consent, but often in defiance of the active opposition of the original creator and owner. This was not justice, but it was law—a legalized form of robbery, and those who objected to it had the stone wall of costs to knock their heads against.

The first and greatest victim of recent times was Mrs. Henry Wood, the novelist, whose popular story of " East Lynne " was pounced upon by some nameless hack who used the licence given him by a highly-paid legislature and dramatized the work without the slightest communication with the author. The result of this robbery by Act of Parliament has been that Mrs. Henry Wood, with her heirs, executors and assigns, have been despoiled during the allotted span of copyright of a sum that at the lowest computation may be taken at a quarter of a million sterling supposing her equitable stage-right had been enforced with the business ability which directs the operations of a Pinero or a Barrie.

This unblushing encouragement of a " Thieves' Kitchen " by the legislature—an encouragement that has been stigmatized by public writers for more than a quarter of a century—naturally stimulated authors with a legal training to take steps for their own protection. One of the earliest and most successful of these authors who could take care of themselves was the late Mr. Charles Reade—a writer who possessed the unusual double gift of novelist and dramatist. I say unusual, because neither Thackeray nor Dickens possessed it. To be a dramatist was one of Thackeray's unsatisfied ambitions, and Dickens positively smelt of the footlights. Charles Reade produced a drama at Drury Lane Theatre, which I should almost be justified in describing as a theatrical " man-trap and spring-gun." It was called Gold, and it contained in solution the seeds of another drama, and a powerful novel. Gold ran its allotted time, and in due course the novel of " It's Never Too Late to Mend " appeared, to be followed by a carefully-prepared drama bearing the same title.

Some time before Charles Reade's version of his novel found its way to the stage, the hot and eager "adapters," as they were politely called, tumbled over each other in their haste to utilize the novelist's invention. He was waiting for them. He selected one "adaptation" (they used stronger terms in "Old Fagin's" days) as a test-case, and easily proved that in Gold he had anticipated the pirates and had secured his stage-right in It's Never Too Late to Mend by priority of production.

This signal victory obtained over legalized fraud by an author who combined in his single person novelist, dramatist, and sharp attorney roused novelists to a sense of the value of stage-right, but few of them had the energy, or were in the position, to take action. Their stories, such as they were, were printed and published (some of them, perhaps, with a weak and valueless notification that the "right of dramatization" had been reserved), and as such, according to the late Chief Justice Cockburn, were "dedicated to the public," giving any would-be adapter the right to use names, titles, incidents, plot, and anything he could find within the four corners of the binding for the purpose of stage-representation, but not for printed publication. Naturally writers of fiction fretted under this deprivation of a valuable right. As far back as 1873, the late "George Eliot" wrote to me: —

I thoroughly concur in the opinion that the Law of Copyright in relation to the dramatization of novels ought to be changed, and I shall willingly give my adhesion to any energetic effort towards attaining that end.

The late Lord Lytton: —

I heartily sympathize with your efforts, and shall be very willing to co-operate to obtain such an amendment of the Copyright Law as may prevent the unauthorized dramatization of novels.

The late Wilkie Collins: —

My "Poor Miss Finch" has been dramatized, without asking my permission, by some idiot in the country. I have been asked to dramatize it, and I have refused, because my experience tells me that the book is eminently unfit for stage purposes. What I refuse to do with my own work another man (unknown in literature) is perfectly free to do against my will and (if he can get his rubbish played) to the prejudice of my novel and my reputation.

Miss M. E. Braddon: —

I have written twenty-four novels, many of these have been dramatized, and a few of the dramatic versions still hold the stage. I have never received the smallest pecuniary advantage from any of these adaptations, nor does the law of copyright in any way assist me to protect what appears to be a valuable portion of my copyright—namely, the exclusive right to dramatize my own creation.

The late Watts Phillips, a dramatist by profession, as well as a novelist, the late Charles Mackay, Tom Taylor, Westland Marston, William Gilbert, Sir Charles Young, Florence Marryat, and Palgrave Simpson all write in the same strain, with W. S. Gilbert, F. W. Robinson, and other writers still living. An Authors' Protection Society was the outcome of this agitation (for it assumed the form of an agitation), and a Royal Commission was appointed, consisting of Lord John Manners, the Earl of Devon, Sir Charles Young, Sir Henry Holland, Sir John Rose, Sir Louis Mallet, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Sir Julius Isaacs, Mr. Daldy, Mr. Froude, Mr. Herschell, Dr. W. Smith, Mr. Fitz James Stephen, Mr. Edward Jenkins, M.P., and Mr. Anthony Trollope. Our committee comprised Mr. Tom Taylor, Mr. Charles Dickens, jun., Mr. B. L. Farjeon, Mr. Charles Gibbon, Mr. J. Glaisher, F.R.S., Mr. Joseph Hatton, Mr. Edward Jenkins, M.P., Mr. Blanchard Jerrold, Mr. Charles Reade, and Mr. Moy Thomas, who consented to act as honorary secretary. The Commission sat and took long, exhaustive, and varied evidence and its report was published in 1878. It advocated the protection of the novelist. Twenty-two years have passed, and the Blue-book still paves the vaults of Westminster.

To make a workable play out of a novel, not written with an eye to the stage, requires much labour and ingenuity, and a special talent not always possessed by the ordinary writer of fiction. In the novel the descriptive writer is perfectly unfettered. He describes his scenery and surroundings, and in many cases his characters impress themselves upon the reader with the smallest possible amount of dramatic dialogue and the largest possible amount of descriptive writing. In the drama this process is reversed. The scenery is handed over to the scene-painter, and the dress and appearance of the characters are the work of the costume and wig maker, plus the interpretation of the actor and actress. The words of the dialogue have to be subordinated to the action, and if they throw no light on the inner character of the puppets they are worse than useless, and become what the stage-manager irreverently calls "cackle." This shows that the man who possesses the true optique du théâtre may be a valuable collaborateur as a reformed thief in the hands of a writer of no dramatic talent who is willing to condone a felony. The copyright law entirely overlooks the possibilities of such beneficial partnerships, where one man supplies just as much literature, or "cackle," as may be wanted, and the other the stage-carpentry—and this law gives the same legal protection, neither more nor less, to the thief who finds his play practically ready-made as it does to the thief who merely steals rough materials, and has to shape them together. A case of this kind is in the Law Reports—"Toole v. Young"—in the seventies. A short story was written in Good Words in such a form (nearly all dialogue) that it could be transferred to the stage without the addition of a dozen words. It was so transferred by an unauthorized so-called adapter, and produced in defiance of the writer (myself) and the owner by purchase, Mr. J. L. Toole. The action before the late Chief Justice Cockburn brought out the "dedication to the public" theory and the judgment that the "original source" (the book or the magazine) was open for the whole world to go to and pick out what it fancied. This judgment was upheld on appeal, in spite of the able opposition of the late Sir John Karslake.

Within the last few years a new and almost comic interpretation of a bad Statute Law has been acted upon by Mrs. Hodgson Burnett in protecting her "stage-rights" in "Little Lord Fauntleroy." The Copyright Act, the Printing and Publishing Act—was dragged in to fire a broadside at the pirates, and it was contended that the "Copying of parts" for use at rehearsals, and the actors to study, was a "multiplication of copies" within the meaning of the Copyright Act. Mr. Justice Stirling, a sound Judge on these questions, before whom the case was tried, upheld this view, and, for the present, this decision holds the field. It is difficult to speak about such a decision, on such pettifogging grounds, with becoming respect, and it would be foolish to prophesy the result, if the case is ever carried to the Court of Appeal. The weighty and valuable property of "Stage-right" ought not to be left trembling on such a foundation.

JOHN HOLLINGSHEAD.

CHAUCER.

CHAUCER'S WORLD.

The essential interest of Chaucer's work lies not in its representation of mediæval life, but in its revelation, sometimes almost prophetic, of the elements which we know, from record or by actual contact, as part of a more modern England. The Age of Faith lay behind, if, indeed, that fascinating Age does not fly further and further from our search, till it loses itself in the mists of Iona or the obscurity of the Catacombs. At any rate, the Age of St. Dominic and St. Louis was past, and an impassable gulf seemed to sever it from the contemporaries of Wickliffe and Parson Ball. In Italy and France there had been an awakening of the human spirit, which was a kind of false alarm of the great awakening of the Renaissance. Something of this early stir communicated itself even to the remote scholars of England, and Chaucer became, in a manner, the untimely herald, not only of the melodious bursts of song, but also of the liberal thought and discursive culture that distinguish the spacious times of Elizabeth. The baronial feuds, which were so effectual in hastening political liberation, rudely checked the liberation of the spirit. Not many nobles had, like Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, the heart for long and curious studies, when it was so difficult a task to keep their heads on the battlefield or from the block.

Behind Chaucer lay the mediæval world, the world of saintly miracles and fantastic deeds of chivalry, a world mysterious with dreams from the Forest of Broceliande, elfin echoes from Caerleon or Tintagel, when all the land was "fulfild of fayerye," and one had but to take horse and ride out at the frowning gate of some castle-crowned burgh to strike at once into an unknown land of forest or waste heath, beckoning to adventures endless such as those half-told that befell Sir Thopas. It was a society, in that ancient world, of rude barons secluded in their impregnable fastnesses, where they could give rein to all the lust of avarice, pride and cruelty, and lowered over a sparse community of beast-like serfs. It was a society almost devoid of intellectual resource, a society of knights who could barely spell and clerks who could hardly write. Its sustenance and its recreation were, on the one hand, a barren and rigid theology; on the other, narratives embellished of dry blows and furious manners, the moral treatise, or the chanson de geste.

All this lay behind Chaucer. Around him there was growing up a very different world. The sturdy Saxon courage had been crushed for a time; it had not been tamed. The noble could no longer bid defiance to the world from the security of his Gothic keep. There had come back into the country from the Crusades engineers who could make short work of portcullis and barbican. Even those clumsy, ineffective cannon were, at least, a menace. Besides, against the extortions of a Lackland, the faithlessness of a Henry of Winchester, the Norman noble had been fain to invoke the aid of the Saxon churl. In the green shaw many a man, who had taken for motto "He moste needës walke in woods that may not walke in toun," had made head against all the King's power. The fame of these outlaws was dear to every yeoman who drew a good bow, whose "not-heed" no quarter-staff could break, and whose homely English visage had been embrowned by the suns of France. Nor were the burghers, whose shops had clustered at the foot of the castle rock, any longer the cringing dependents of a feudal lord. The Londoners made a little army of themselves, and had turned the fortune of more than one field. William de la Pole, of Hull, became the founder of a noble, almost a royal house. Canynges of Bristol, Whittingtons of London, rose to a state almost as princely as that of the Florentines or Venetians, whose names were inscribed in their "Libri d'oro." Chaucer, himself a Londoner and the son of, perhaps, such a jovial host as the keeper of the Tabard, was bred at Court, where his father was often in attendance, became the friend of Princes, and the accredited agent of the Crown in matters of high diplomacy. There seems to have been a larger and more opulent middle-class at this time than we find again till the present day. The craft-gilds entered into competition with the great trade-gilds. A weaver, a dyer, and a carpenter are introduced in the Tales, each with property and rent enough to become an alderman. Their wives intend that their husbands shall soon attain that dignity, when they themselves will be "stylèd" "ma dame," take precedence in church, and have their trains carried by pages in queen-like state. The Wife of Bath, who carried on a cloth-making trade on her own account, was able for her own pleasure to make travels almost as extensive as those of the knight-adventurer in his own career. Even in the country the middle classes were treading on the kibes of the nobility. The Reeve lived in a pleasant house standing by itself on the common, and sheltered by trees.

> His wonyng was ful fair up-on an heeth,
> With greene trees shadwed was his place—something like a manor-house in a park, it would seem. Though he liked to get the present of a coat and hood from his master, the reeve was a greater capitalist than the lord of the manor.

The glamour and mystery had fled from forest and heath with the rapid growth of the towns, and the invasion of waste land by farm and thorp and stead. The country was invaded in different fashion, too, by the mendicant orders, "limitour and othere holy freres," who swarmed everywhere—

> As thikke as motes in the sonne-beem,
> Blessinge halles, chambres, kitchenes, boures,
> Citees, burghes, castels, hye toures,
> Thropes, bernes, shipnes (i.e., stables), dayeryes, they were the cause "That there been no fayeryes"—an odd contrast this to good Bishop Corbet's belief, in the days of King James, that the disappearance of the elves was due to the suppression of the abbeys! Into every village and township these wandering friars carried the news of the day. "The itinerant friar was of necessity a newsman." In the village tavern the friar did then what the thumbed news-sheet does now. He was the one link with a wider world, and he furnished the material for the sluggish talk that circled round the ale-benches. And every friar, bearing the scandals of Avignon and Rome, intrigue and counter-intrigue, and slanderous depreciation of rival orders—as in the conversation of the Holdernesse limitour who complained of the parish priests—

> Thise curats been ful negligent and slowe
> To grope tendrely a conscience—and described so contumeliously the regular monks—

> Fat as a whale, and walking as a swan,
> Al vinolent as botel in the spence,
> When they for soules seye the Psalm of Davit, > Lo, "buf," they seye, cor eorum eructavit— or in the mutual recriminations of "Peres the Ploughmans Crede"—was unconsciously disseminating revolt and incredulity. Feminine sensibilities were touched by their dexterous acting and ready tears. The masculine intellect was disgusted by their absurd pretensions. Wives and daughters ran after relics, and welcomed the holy men with open arms. Husbands and fathers suspected their undue familiarity, and resented, like Thomas of Holdernesse, their unmannerly intrusion into the domestic circle.

The rapid extension of knowledge militated against ecclesiastical claims. For scholastic hair-splitting had been substituted Greek subtlety. Porphyry and Aristotle were read in preference to Aquinas. Boëthius was the clerk's study now; not the Legends of Saints. Miracles were the staple of conversation only to churchmen and nuns. The marvellous was relegated from the region of ubiquitous reality to the distant unknown. The borders of the world had been enlarged. Marco Polo had penetrated to the heart of a civilization older by centuries than the Roman or the Greek. In the Squire's Tale we hear of Cambinskan (Ginghis Khan), of Camballo, a personification, or misreading, of Cambalue (Pekin), of Sarrai, the ancient Mongol capital. Sir John Maundeville had discovered that even Mahometans were in possession of a revelation—faint, compared to that which Christians enjoyed and abused, but genuine, of the Truth of God. Arabian science prevailed over mediæval obscurantism. Avicenna and Averroës, their clear-cut logic filtering through the medium of Latin paraphrases, had tinctured even Scholastic philosophy. Criticism had begun to make havoc of other impostures than the asses' bones and dilapidated shirts which the pardoners paraded. Master Harry Baily's treatment of relics is too outspoken to bear quotation. Chaucer laughs slyly at the pretensions of the Alchemists. The host non-plusses the Canon's Yeoman, when he boasts that his master by his skill can pave all the ground from Boghton-under-Blee to Canterbury with silver and gold, by the pertinent inquiry why a man of such mastership goes in such sluttish and tatter-de-mallion array.

Chaucer, who is not, perhaps, "a master of them that knew," lord of all the intellectual wealth of his generation, like Dante, is, perhaps, at least as great a scholar as the "moral Gower"; only he carries his knowledge with the lightness of a man of the world, and not like a pedant. But under all his knowledge and all his culture, his Italian eloquence and rhetoric, his brilliance of French chivalry, he is at heart the plain English bourgeois of birth and temperament. It was a hard-headed, light-hearted race of which he came, with all the qualities of a full-fed animal, leading an open-air life. The sturdy, Anglo-Saxon life was still in full vigour. Robin Hood and Little John were dead and gone, but the outlaws had not quite deserted the forests. They still, even in Chaucer's time, lay in wait for the merchants passing to and from the great fair at Winchester. The Teutonic race was full of music and noise. The miller brought the pilgrims out of town to the sound of bag pipes. The squire was singing all day long. The Friar "wel couthe singe and pleyen on a rote." The Pardoner "loude song 'Come hider, love, to me.'" They loved sport like the King to whom the deer were as his brother, and knights never rode to the war without the resource of a cast of hawks. It was necessary that they should live most of their lives in the open air, for their homes were without any of the conveniences or even the decencies that we require. Their pageants were magnificent, their dress superb, at their tables they were "Epicurus' own sons," but their houses were little better than hovels; the furniture of a manor-house consisted of little more than a few benches, a few pots and pans, a few platters, an iron candle-stick, and a salt box. In the miller's house, and the miller was a man of substance, it was necessary for the guests to sleep in the same room as the women of the family. It was inevitable that these men should be coarse in manners and thought. Their objection to the impositions of friars and monks was founded on no religious feeling. They were as ready to cry out on Lollardry if they were rebuked for swearing; their ears ached at the "drasty speeche" when they heard that Sir Thopas was a water-drinker. Professor Minto has found the motive of Chaucer's genius in the spirit of chivalry. If he had only left those poems which are inspired by chivalrous ideals we should have found him a beautiful but ineffectual poet. He wrote the "Boke of the Duchesse" and the "House of Fame" to please his patrons; the "Canterbury Tales" to please himself. He was delicate and fanciful when he wrote for the nobles; great when he appealed to his own middle class. We keep his memory to-day not as the fashioner of delicate porcelain figures of knighthood, but as the creator of those strong English beings of flesh and blood, brain and muscle.

THE DREAMER AND THE HUMOURIST.

Tu es d'amours mondains dieux on Albe
Et de la Rose en la terre Angélique.

With these lines, adapting the old pun of Pope Gregory, "not angles but angels," a French poet of the fourteenth century, Deschamps, pays Chaucer the greatest compliment that one poet can pay another by sending him a copy of his works. The compliment is enhanced by the authority in matters of love which Deschamps, writing from the land of the Troubadours, allows to his confrère across the Channel. The pursuit of the tender passion had become a sort of religious cult in France. Taine tells us of a company of love penitents "who, in order to prove the violence of their passion, dressed in summer in furs and heavy garments, and in winter in light gauze, and walked thus about the country, so that several of them fell ill and died." Aggrieved lovers referred to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Love, and those who were proved to have infringed the statutes of the goddess are supposed to have suffered the penalties imposed by the Court. It is no wonder if we discover an excess of sentiment in the literature of the time. Love is the all-engrossing theme, and the poet's treatment of it hovers between the licence of realism and the mystic fervour of symbolism and allegory. The two extremes are also to be found in the Italian literature known to Chaucer. Even the gay author of the "Decameron" could bring tears from the eyes of Petrarch with his story of the patient Griselda. And so Chaucer is half a man of the world and half a dreamer and sentimentalist; adapting his work at one moment from the "Decameron" and the "Fabliaux," and at another from the Teseide and the Roman de la Rose.

As a sentimentalist he goes almost as far as his French models, and makes a religion of love. The ideas of Christianity are engrafted upon heathen mythology. Betrayed lovers are regarded as the martyrs of Cupid; the Goddess of Love is described as "Saint Venus." To heighten the sentiment in the story of Dido and Aeneas the classical idea of fate calling the hero from the arms of love is completely transformed. Aeneas is represented as a faithless lover, only too glad of an excuse to escape from Dido. In Virgil we feel almost as sorry for the hero as for the Queen. In Chaucer all our sympathy is reserved for the martyred Dido. The story of Lucrece, told by Chaucer with a dramatic power which rivals that of Shakespeare's version, is nevertheless marred by an excess of sentiment.

The poet of sentiment includes the allegorist and the dreamer. Chaucer translated the "Roman de la Rose" in his youth, and was also constantly indebted to it in his later work for his landscape pictures and for his favourite framework of the dream. Even in the "Canterbury Tales," where he has learnt to draw his characters from life, his early love for allegory has not entirely left him. Griselda, Constance, and Cecilia are not real characters, but the abstract impersonations of the highest ideals of the Middle Ages in its more reverential mood. It is only Chaucer's command of pathos that redeems the story of their misfortunes from dulness. We could not wish for a more touching picture than he draws of the exiled Constance, putting forth to sea alone in a small boat with her child.

Her litel child lay weping in hir arm
And knoling pitously to him she seyde:
"Pees, litle sone, I wol do thee noon harm."
With that hir kerchef of hir heed she breyde,
And over his litel yen she it leyde,
And in hir arm sche lulleth it ful faste,
And unto to heven hir yen up she caste.

And Chaucer does not only sympathize with the misfortunes of saintly women. No less pathetic are the lines in which the poet shows his charity for the wayward Cressida:—

No me ne list this sely womman chyde
Ferther than the story wol devyse;
Hir name, allas! is publisshed so wyde
That for hir gilt it oughte ynow suffyse.
And if I mighte excuse hir any wyse,
For she so sory was for her untrouthe,
Ywis I wolde excuse hire yet for routhe.

Here it is no longer the mediæval visionary but the man of the world who speaks. Chaucer, with his penetration into character, could not bring himself to regard Cressida as altogether bad. It is the same insight that makes his comedies so delightful. We have his word for it that his eyes were for ever cast upon the ground; yet not a detail escapes them. He is a master of the final touch that immortalizes a character. The "sergeant of the lawe" is a busy man, "no wher so busy a man as he ther n'as," "and yet," Chaucer adds, "he semed busier than he was." The prioress spoke French "ful fayre and fetisly," but here again comes the qualifying phrase, "after the scole of Stratford atte Bowe." Her learning was in fact more showy than profound. The forester is appropriately assigned a head like a nut, and lest we should forget the shipman we are told

With many a tempest hadde his herd been shake

The pardoner mounts the pulpit; observe his antics!

Than peyne I me to streeche forth the nekke
And est and west upon the peple I bekke
As doth a dowve sitting on a berne.

The dove stretching his neck to right and left on the roof of a barn! No simile could be more exact and humorous. Even Cowper's preacher is hardly as good;

The things that mount the rostrum with a skip,
And then skip down again; pronounce a text;
Cry—hem! and reading what they never wrote
Just fifteen minutes, huddle up their work,
And with a well bred whisper close the scene.

Chaucer is equally amused with the vanity of the parish clerk, with all his charms calculated to fascinate the sex—his hair straight and broad like a fan, reminding us of Struwwel Peter, his shoes embroidered in patterns like the tracery on church windows, his red stockings and blue tunic, his manner of dancing—

After the scole of Oxenforde tho
And with his legges casten to and fro—his playing upon the guitar and small rubible! But what says the object of the "joly" Absolon's affections to all this?

Go forth thy wey or I wol cast a ston.

And no wonder! Absolon is the fop of the lower classes, the fourteenth-century "toff." He is but one of a countless number of equally amusing and typical figures scattered up and down the tales. It is in the stories that contain these comic sketches that Chaucer is most original. As in the serious tales, the groundwork of the tale is borrowed, but the scenery is English, the characters have English names, and display the dress as well as the humours familiar to the eye of the poet. Chaucer had in fact grasped the great truth that the effects of comedy are more local and particular than those of tragedy. Moreover his comic characters are drawn from every rank of life, a fact which gives his comedy more variety than either the humour of the Restoration or the satire of the eighteenth century. In width of range it may be compared to Shakespeare's, while in satiric power it is as effective as Swift's without losing its geniality. But it is more often humourous than witty in the highest sense. Leigh Hunt's remark that the "jests of the fool in Lear are the sighs of knowledge" would bear little application to the sayings of any character in Chaucer. It is as a master of the picturesque in humour that he excels. And his characters are not only designed for the eye; they speak and act throughout consistently with the poet's first description of them. Chaucer's treatment of the character of Pandarus in "Troilus and Cressida" is a triumph in this way, and affords an excellent example of his genius as an adapter of other men's work. In Boccaccio Pandarus is a young nobleman. The English poet completely alters his character, turns him into an old man, as crafty as Archimago himself and as witty as Polonius. By dint of the experience of years he persuades Cressida to listen to the avowals of the too bashful Troilus.

It would be vain to attempt an exhaustive analysis of Chaucer's humour. When we get to Pandarus we are carried sufficiently far away from the medieval visionary whom we have seen receiving a letter of congratulation from the poet, Des Champs, to realize the two opposite sides of the poet's genius. There can be little doubt which has made the greater impression. His comedy sheds much more light on the contemporary life of his time than his sentiment does, and for this reason alone it would be more interesting. Moreover as a tragic poet he was surpassed in the Middle Ages by Dante. His comedy was unrivalled.

A POET OF TRANSITION.

No one nowadays disputes or is likely to dispute the genius of Chaucer. He stands side by side with the greatest of modern poets. No poet of this century has had so wide a range, and no English author of the first rank has had less to guide him along the highway of song. Nevertheless, it is idle to assert that our enjoyment of a poet who wrote in the fourteenth century can ever be the same intense pleasure that we derive from the poetry of lesser luminaries of more recent date. Besides much that still makes an intimate appeal to the modern reader there is much that can only be regarded as curious and interesting to the antiquarian. The genius of the man enabled him often to outrun his contemporaries and overstep the border line which separates the Renaissance from the Middle Ages. But his poetry also bears strongly the marks of his own time. The literature of medieval France, with all its conventionality, made a lasting impression upon his mind. The poet who in his rarest treatment of character foreshadowed Shakespeare himself was content, in his treatment of nature, to produce the same landscape over and over again. Is not "the month of May motif" in Chaucer, pretty enough at first hearing, reiterated a little too often? Even the celebrated address to the daisy in the Legend of Good Women which opens so beautifully need not surely have extended to more than eighty lines. After all, it is almost certainly a veiled eulogium of a lady, a fact which a little mars the touching picture of the great poet kneeling down to immortalize the humble flower.

The medieval side of Chaucer's work is by no means confined to his outlook upon nature. It often extends to themes that bear more intimately upon the destiny of man. His picture of death in the Knightes Tale, in the passage where he describes the last moments of Arcite, is repelling to the modern reader. Like the Danse Macabre of the later Middle Ages, it enforces the mere physical horror of death and corruption. The air of romance with which Chaucer invested the story—that of the rivalry of Palamon and Arcite for the hand of the fair Emelye—only increases by contrast the shock caused by his repulsive realism:—

Swelleth the brest of Arcite, and the sore
Encreeseth at his herte more and more.
The clothered blood, for any leche-craft,
Corrupteth, and is in his bouk y-laft,
That neither veyne-blood, ne ventusinge
Ne drinke of herbes may ben his helpinge
The vertu expulsif, or animal,
Fro thilke vertu cleped natural
Ne may the venim voyden ne expelle.
The pypes of his longes gonne to swelle,
And every lacerte in his brest adoun
Is shent with venim and corrupcioun.
Him gayneth neither, for to gete his lyf,
Vomyt upward, ne downward laxatif.

This can hardly be termed poetry. It is the picture of a dying man as it might appear to the practical and hardened eyes of a medical student. Such a crude and grotesque catalogue of horrors would have been inexcusable in the mouth of the "Doctour of Phisyk" himself, and it is still more inappropriate from the lips of the "very perfect gentle knight" who tells the tale. Chaucer does not indeed always dwell upon the material side of death. In the celebrated Ballade of Good Counsel, supposed by some to have been written on his death-bed, he strikes a very different note.

Her is no home, her is but wyldernesse
Forth pilgrime! forth best out of thy stalle?
Look up on hye, and thonke God of alle.

Moreover, we have but to turn the page from the description of Arcite's death to the requiem speech of Duke Theseus, and we light upon lines which are fully worthy of the coming renaissance.

Infynyt be the sorwes and the teeres
Of olde folk and folk of tender yeeres, or again—

The world is but a thurghfare of woo
And we ben pilgryms, passying to and froo.

It is not only the poet's point of view that is often at variance with our own, but also his ideals of poetic workmanship. What would now be regarded as an error in poetic tact was not so regarded in his time. The art of selection and arrangement, the craftsmanship which saves a poet's work from incongruity and bathos, was only partially understood by Chaucer. This does not mitigate our admiration of the poet's genius. With no great models of literature in his own language to aid him, with no great contemporaries to stimulate or to check him, as a poet in fact before criticism, he achieved wonders. But it does hinder our full enjoyment of his work. It is often in those passages which approach most nearly to the sublime that the want of technique in the artisan mars the pictures conjured up by the brain of the artist. Witness his description of the scene painted on the walls of the Temple of Mars :—

Ther sangh I first the derke imagining
Of felonye, and al the compassing ;
The cruel ire, reed as any glede ;
The pykepurs, and eek the pale drede ;
The smyler with the knyf under the cloke ;
The treson of the mordring in the bedde ;
The open werre, with woundes al bi-bledde ;
Contek, with blody knyf and sharp manace ;
Al ful of chirking was that sory place.
The sleere o himselfe yet sangh I ther,
His herte-blood hath bathed al his heer ;
The nayle y-driven in the shode a-night ;
The colde deeth, with mouth gaping upright.
Amiddes of the temple sat meschaunce,
With discomfort and sory contenaunce.
Yet sangh I woodnesse laughing in his rage ;
Armed compleint, outhees and fiers outrage.
The careyne in the bush, with throte ycorve
A thousand slayn, and nat of qualm ystorve.
The tiraunt, with the prey by force y-raft ;
The toun destroyed, ther was nothing laft
Yet sangh I bent the shippes hoppesteres ;
The hunte strangled with the wilde beeres ;
The sough freten the child right in the cradel
The cook y-scalded, for al his longe ladel.
. . . . . .
Ther were also, of Martes divisioun
The barbour and the bocher and the smith
That forgeth sharpe swerdes on his stith.

Was there ever a better example of bathos than this passage, so wonderful in parts, and so incongruous as a whole ? We are carried with the rapidity of a shuttlecock from the sublime to the ridiculous and back again to the sublime. We have not a moment to shudder over such dramatic pictures as that of " the smyler with the knyf under the cloke," " the colde deeth, with mouth gaping upright," or " the hunte strangled with the wilde beores " before we are confronted with the vision of a sow poking his nose into a child's cradle, or of " a cook scalded for all his longe ladel." And what poet but Chaucer would have dared to discover a barber on the walls of the Temple of Mars ? Dryden, for one, had not sufficient courage, and in his adaptation of Chaucer's poem omits the barber. The Knight's Tale in which the passage occurs is modelled upon the Teseide of Boccaccio, and belongs to Chaucer's maturer period. He had become thoroughly conversant with the best Italian literature ; he had even visited Italy, where he is supposed to have made the acquaintance of Petrarch and Boccaccio. In his more youthful poems, written under the influence of French literature, the hand of the apprentice is much more obvious. It is not easy to read " The Boke of the Duchesse " with any real pleasure in these days, and it is difficult to believe that the praise which is lavished upon it by some critics can be quite sincere. In his delightful " Literary History of the English People," M. Jusserand says of this poem, which was composed on the occasion of the death of Blanche of Lancaster, wife of John of Gaunt, that " the occasion is sad, but the setting is exquisite." As a Frenchman, M. Jusserand is perhaps naturally inclined to regard this work of Chaucer's French period through favourable eyes. But we can hardly understand how John of Gaunt, Chaucer's patron, could have been best pleased with the poet's description of his deceased lady. In the first place the distressed knight, who in the allegory represents John of Gaunt, thinks it necessary to inform the poet that his lady, i.e., Blanche of Lancaster, was not afflicted either with a squint or with the opposite misfortune of looking both ways at once—surely superfluous information in describing a Duchess.

Therto hir look was not a-syde,
Ne overthwert . . . . . .

In the extremity of his grief the bereaved lover goes on to describe the most intimate charms of the lady that he has lost. These are the cherished memories that crowd the knightly mind in the depths of its despair :—

. . . . . and body long
She hadde, and armes, every lith
Fattish, fleshly, not greet therwith ;
Right whyte handes, and nayles rede, &c.

A requiem of which a Duchess might be proud, but, we think, few poets !

But even " The Boke of the Duchesse," written in the poet's youth, and so crude in parts, gives us a glimpse of Chaucer's greatness in the few lines describing the opening of the dream which forms the framework of the poem. The birds settle on the roof of his bed chamber, "upon the tyles, al aboute," and treat the poet to a feast of harmony—

The moste solempne servyse
By note, that ever man, I trowe,
Had herd ; for som of hem song lowe,
Som hye, and al of oon acorde
. . . . . .
For ther was noon of hem that feyned
To singe, for ech of hem him peyned
To finde out meny crafty notes ;
They ne spared not hir throtes.

Meanwhile, through the melody of the birds comes the sound of the horn calling the poet to the hunt, and the light of the dawn flows through his stained glass windows on to his bed.

. . . . . my chamber was
Ful wel depeynted, and with glas
Were al the windowes wel y-glased,
Ful clere, and not an hole y-crased,
That to beholde it was gret joye.
For hoolly al the storie of Troye
Was in the glasing y-wrought thus.
. . . . . .
My windowes weren schet echon
And through the glas the sunne schon
Upon my bed with brighte beames
With many glade gilden stremes.

Possibly Keats was indebted to these lines for the similar idea expressed with such warmth of colouring in the Eve of St. Agnes.

Full on this casement shone the wintry moon,
And threw warm gules on Madeline's fair breast,
As down she knelt for heaven's grace and boon ;
Rose-bloom fell on her hands together prest,
And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
And on her hair a glory like a saint.

Both these passages have an enchantment about them which carries us back over hundreds of years, and it is probably the very small portion of "The Boke of the Duchesse" that begins with the arrival of the birds and ends with the lines we have quoted that has blinded some critics to its faults. Certainly no work of Chaucer's more appropriately illustrates by its unevenness the transitional nature of his genius. It is just this unevenness in his poetry that has led students, such as Mr. Cowden Clarke, to select "the Riches" of Chaucer, or poets like Wordsworth, to rewrite some of his poems in modern English. Such attempts are doomed to failure. Chaucer, with all his fallings, was inimitable. To rewrite him and to bowdlerize him in such a way as to break up his well-knit narratives are alike unprofitable tasks. It is better to study his work for ourselves and distinguish for ourselves between the medieval rhymer and the immortal poet.

CHAUCER'S LANGUAGE.

Chaucer is one of those writers who are more often talked about than read. We all know he is the father of English poetry, a well of English undefiled, and so forth; some of us may have read the "Prologue" in our schooldays, or a tale or two for some examination; but to all appearances few except professed scholars ever read him of their own accord. Dryden, for all his generous appreciation of Shakespeare, and of others not always fairly esteemed of in his day, seems to have been puzzled by Chaucer. The intellectual power of the man indeed, and his inward poetic quality, were perceived by him; but they shone forth as a gleam through clouds, obscured by a diction and rhythm which were strangely unlike what might have been looked for from such a man. The common distaste for him, or reluctance to read him now, is partly due to the same cause which acted on Dryden—that is, to ignorance of a few simple principles. These once mastered, as a matter of fact Chaucer is easier to understand than Swinburne or Robert Browning. There are not so many obsolete words in Chaucer after all, and his syntax is simplicity itself; while the themes of his verse are drawn straight from life and the hearts of mankind.

It is necessary, of course, to get a good text, such as Professor Skeat's "Student's Chaucer," or the Globe edition, or those of the Clarendon Press. As the verse is printed in these, it will be seen that the spelling is practically phonetic—that is to say, every syllable is sounded, the same letters represent the same sounds, and where popular contractions are used, the contraction is really spelt as it was spoken. Thus we have nam, nis, nath for ne am (am not), ne is, ne hath; theffect for the effect; wandring for wandering, and so on. Not that all elided or slurred vowels are left out; but this is done in the commonest phrases, and with a little practice the reader will find no difficulty in reading the others. No one with a fair ear will fail to see that there must be a slur in such lines as:—

> Bût by hēre cóote-armûres, and bý hēre gérē:—
> I lóvēde hirē first, and tóldē thé my woo.

There is often a liquid or nasal in these words, and they are specially words of Romance origin. But, for the rest, all written syllables must be sounded: the final e in such words as swétĕ (adj.), sónĕ (adv.), dédĕ (short in dative), súffrĕ (inf.), and other syllables which in modern English are not separate, as the plural -es (wórdĕs), the -ed of the past tense and participle (péreĕd). The ending -ie or -ye is, according to the same principle, two syllables, and adds much to the music of the verse. Thus in the line—the voice dwells with delight on the last word, which is almost an echo of the birds' cheeping. We are not concerned here with the reasons for the inflexional endings: there they are for us, and all we have to do is to read them. It is a general rule, however, that the final vowel of a word is slurred (not exactly elided) before another vowel; but no one who can read Milton will find any real difficulty here.

If Dryden had had Professor Skeat's excellent text, and had known what is said in the last paragraph, he could have enjoyed Chaucer to the full; but for us unfortunately more is needed. The pronunciation of English has changed since Dryden's day far more than it had changed between him and Chaucer; and our vowel sounds are nearly all spoilt. Chaucer must be read with the pure vowels—the broad a of father; e, i, and u (ou) much as in Italian; o (or oo, as it is also written) as in no; but without the affected diphthong one often hears. Of the consonants, we need only mention that gutturals (ch, gh) are sounded as in loch, but perhaps a trifle lighter (Ger. nicht), and r must be properly rolled. With these few rules we shall get close enough to Chaucer's pronunciation for all practical purposes; and the gain in musical quality is quite astonishing. Chaucer's English has all the merits of German, without one of its defects.

No one can tell a story more vividly or with keener point, and he excels in drawing a clear picture with a few words. Not least of his merits is the healthy heart which he shews. There is coarseness in Chaucer, but chiefly where he speaks through the coarse lips of a Reeve or a Miller; there it is part of the character drawing, and at its worst it does no harm. We laugh at the humour, but the coarseness disgusts. It is quite otherwise with the modern problem novel or play, which are for ever suggesting vile things which they fear to speak out; which, whatever their aim may be, more often attract to vice by alluring hints than show it in its own naked ugliness. Chaucer is fresh as a May morning, and his influence kills all hurtful things as the sunlight purifies garbage.

And he is well worth the trouble of reading. His breezy geniality and rich humour make him as fascinating to young boys, or to uneducated men and women, as to the critic or dilettante. No English book is more popular in the schoolroom, if properly read, than the "Prologue," though it is easy to make desperate dull work of it by the dry-as-dust method; and a party of intelligent working men fairly revel in it, and will have more. Mr. Stead made a mistake when he printed his "Penny Chaucer" in the modern spelling, altering the verse where he must to make it scan. It is the real thing men want; and a reprint of the whole "Prologue," with a page of explanations prefixed how to read and pronounce, would have been just as easy to understand, and would have taught the reader much more. Moreover, extracts and abstracts obscure one of Chaucer's chiefest virtues.

THE DRAMA.

"MRS. DANE'S DEFENCE."

Is social ostracism quite so dreadful, or, rather, is the dread of it quite so potent a force as the playwrights, and more particularly Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, would have us believe? I fancy not. I fancy that many men and women have lived it down, or simply ignored it and been, like the jackdaw of Rheims under the Archbishop's curse, not a penny the worse. It is, surely, only the weaklings who are perpetually asking themselves, What will the world say? But this, I know, does not suit the dramatists' book. They cannot spare any of the great irresistible forces which serve as dynamos, so to speak, to the dramatic current. Hence the tendency of the stage always to overestimate social pressure and to exaggerate the fear of public opinion. A woman's "reputation," important as it is in life, no doubt, becomes in the theatre something as sacred as the Ark of the Covenant. There, too, her "past" has tenfold the influence which it has in the real world of inertia, practical compromises, and short memories. And in the playhouse "society" is always treated as a monster, or chained tyrant, hidden somewhere behind the scenes, to be let loose whenever there is a risk of the characters thinking out their own lives independently of the conventions. Playwrights have always had need of some symbol of irresistible power, something final, about which there is to be no argument. In Shakespeare it is the Prince or the Rightful Duke. In Tartuffe it is "L'Exempt." In Théodora it is the eunuch with the bowstring. In modern melodrama it is the policeman with the handcuffs. And in modern comedy it is that mysteriously awful abstraction "the world." It is the playwrights' axiom that you cannot defy "the world." And, whatever scrapes hero or heroine may get into, they must always before the curtain falls be set right with "the world." Mr. H. A. Jones has (at any rate for stage purposes) a profound belief in "the world." Did not Mr. Charles Wyndham, in the last act of The Liars, arrest two eloping lovers by expatiating on the misery of their condition when banned, as they assuredly would be, by "the world"? And now, again, in Mr. Jones' latest play Mrs. Dane's Defence, we find Mr. Wyndham vindicating the majesty of "the world" and emphatically declaring that the displeasure of "the world" is not to be braved by any sane person for a single moment. Well, without any desire to pose as a social rebel, I am inclined to think that "the world," in this sense, "is too much with us" on the stage. The first dramatist who has the courage to make his hero say "fudge!" and his heroine turn up her pretty nose, when threatened with "the world," shall have my hearty applause. For then I shall know that another ancient bogey has been found out to be only a candle stuck in a turnip.

Meanwhile we have to accept the convention at Mr. Jones' valuation, and, accepting it, we cannot but find much that is of absorbing interest in his new play. Let it be granted that if once Mrs. Dane (Miss Lena Ashwell) is found guilty of a "past" it is all up with her, that no honest man must dream of marrying her, that she must be kept out of villadom as though she were the plague. Let it be granted that it is the proper and most urgent business of villadom and of one of her Majesty's Judges (Mr. Wyndham) and of his friend the charming widow (Miss Mary Moore) and of the Rector (Mr. Alfred Bishop)—in fact of all the respectable dramatis personæ—to devote their whole time and energy to an inquisition into Mrs. Dane's history. It is not, perhaps, altogether pleasant to see one forlorn woman so heckled and harried. And even when she is exposed for the impostor that she is, we still think her too good a match for the Judge's sentimental young noodle of a son. To be fair, Mr. Jones himself has wanted us to think that all along, and, even had he not, Miss Ashwell would compel us to think it. If I were asked to define womanliness, I should say, Don't ask me, for I don't know, but go and see Miss Ashwell. The French would say that she is très femme, and I defy you to put it more succinctly. Though I cannot define womanliness, I know that there are several sorts of it, and Miss Ashwell's is the tender-fierce, pleading-passionate, meek-sarcastic, in some deliciously paradoxical sort. It is in the third act that we see this woman going through all her changes, the act in which the judge mercilessly cross-examines her and forces her to a confession of the truth. It is a capital bit of stage-writing, this act which is nothing but a prolonged conversation. It begins quietly, with the two interlocutors in complete accord; then a critical word slips out, all is changed in a trice to discord, and there is a rapid crescendo to a catastrophe at the end. As I sat watching this scene I felt that, while the details were fresh, the formula was vaguely familiar. I now recognize that the old scene I had at the back of my mind was the scene between Clarkson and the Duke in Dumas the younger's L'Étrangère. There you have two people sitting down for a quiet talk as friends till a chance word suddenly charges the atmosphere with storm so that finally one man first loads the other with his scorn, and then slays him, in his own words, comme un petit lapin. It was a most effective thing, and Mr. Jones' scene (which of course owes nothing to Dumas) is a most effective thing. I merely compare them, because they show how two very different tunes may be set to the same rhythm.

The third act is the play, the first two merely "positing" the question Who is Mrs. Dane? and the last decently dismissing her in deference to "the world." By the way that question, Who is Mrs. Dane? is only a question for the persons of the drama; the audience are allowed to know the answer from the first. I have seen it stated that this is not so, and Mr. Jones has been accused of the dramaturgic blunder of keeping a secret from his audience. Some playgoers seem to want announcements made by the Town-crier. Did they not see the look which the man who had withdrawn his charge against Mrs. Dane furtively threw at her? Did they not hear him promise, with emphatic significance, to "be her friend whenever she needed one?" Did they not see her throw up her hands in despair at the first "curtain"? No, Mr. Jones knows his business as a playwright; and Mrs. Dane's Defence is a very characteristic specimen of his most skilled work.

HAMPSHIRE.

THE VICTORIA HISTORY OF THE COUNTIES OF ENGLAND: A HISTORY OF HAMPSHIRE AND THE ISLE OF WIGHT. Vol. I. Edited by H. ARTHUR DOUBLEDAY, F.R.G.S. (Constable.)

This is the great beginning of a great undertaking. It is the first time that a serious attempt has been made to put forth a national survey of the counties of England after a fashion which shall at once show their condition at the present day and trace back their history to the earliest times. When the work was first announced it was felt that no one man, nor any special group of men, however able, could possibly achieve success. The difficulties in the way of any general scheme of co-operation were so great and complex that Mr. Doubleday is much to be congratulated on having secured so able a body of experts to begin the history of Hampshire. If the three other volumes are conceived and executed on similar lines—and we see no reason to doubt that this will be the case—Hampshire will have good cause to congratulate itself on the success of this great experiment.

This volume opens with natural history under the general editorship of Mr. Trevor-Battye. It would be difficult for the most experienced naturalist to group together any college of men of the time more capable of doing justice respectively to English geology, palæontology, botany, marine zoology, insects, fishes, birds, or mammals than Messrs. Clement Reid, Lydekker, Townsend, Garstang, Herbert Goss, Boulenger, Meade-Waldo, and Gerald Lascelles. Moreover, in addition to their contributions, the sections on botany and insects have been subdivided amongst a number of special experts on different branches, every one of whom are at once recognized by the naturalist as having particular gifts for dealing with the assigned subject from a Hampshire standpoint.

In Hampshire the natural history contributors had before them an exceptionally fine field. The geologist had an area so varied as the chalks of the secondary system in the north and the Bagshot sands of the tertiary deposits in the south, as well as smaller areas of London clay or of gault and greensand. This much-diversified geological area naturally creates a corresponding difference in the vegetable and, to some extent, in the animal life of these districts. The extent, too, of wood and forest in the county, which is very considerable, adds materially to the wealth and variety of insect, bird, and other animal life, as well as to diversity of vegetation. Hampshire contains not only 37,000 acres of wood, properly so called, but also upwards of 100,000 acres of true forestland. Of this latter total the New Forest alone absorbs 90,000 acres—a vast amount for a small country like England, which has been thickly populated for so many centuries. Mr. Trevor-Battye puts its extent vividly before us:—

> Ninety thousand acres is a large amount, and perhaps we shall best convey a sense of its size by saying that a deer standing at Vinney Ridge, in the middle of the New Forest, could, if it chose to do so, travel ten miles to the north-west or south-east, and five miles to the north-east or south-west, without crossing the forest borders.

The conditions within the forest are extremely varied, and if the north of the county is compared with the south the contrasts are yet more startling—greater, probably, than in any other part of England. "In the north of the county a hare could scarcely run from covert to covert without being seen; in the wild country of the New Forest a wild boar by choosing its ground might easily pass from one end to the other without being observed."

The butterflies of Hampshire are a well-known attraction to the entomologist. That rarity the lovely White Admiral occurs in many woods of the county as well as at Parkhurst, in the Isle of Wight; but in some parts of the New Forest it literally abounds. Mr. Goss writes of having counted thirty on a single bramble bush, and of seeing thousands floating gracefully up and down the rides. Mr. Trevor-Battye, with enviable enthusiasm, says that "the sight of a bramble bush in full flower and literally covered with these magnificent insects is worth going a hundred miles to see." He also waxes eloquent over the silver-washed fritillary, which he describes as being found in myriads in the forest, "and dazzlingly beautiful they are, sailing up a glade or feasting on the flowers of a thistle." Although scientific experts will, we believe, be abundantly satisfied with the technical list of all Hampshire visitants, the writers, in their introductions and general comments, are by no means superior to appealing to a larger class of readers, or to showing that abstruse knowledge does not extinguish a generous admiration. It is of interest to some to know the exact nomenclature of the six kinds of earwigs found in Hampshire; whilst it will probably interest more to learn that the unpleasantly obtrusive insect termed the common earwig, or forficula auricularia, is popularly known as the "eari-wiggle," or in the north of the county as "twitch-bell" or "furkin-robin."

There is probably no other county in England more favourably situated for a great variety of bird life than Hampshire. The woods and forests, the great chalk plain of the centre, the numerous rivers and lakelets, and the long stretch of seaboard combine to supply a delightful list of 280 species. It is pleasant to find that neither the common buzzard nor the honey buzzard are yet extinct; that the peregrine falcon is not at all rare; that the hoopoe is an annual spring visitor; that the stone curlew nests in many localities and is on the increase; and that that beautiful bird the great crested grebe now breeds annually on almost every suitable piece of water throughout the county. With regard to the golden oriole, Mr. Meade-Waldo describes it as "an occasional summer visitor," and states that it would doubtless breed if undisturbed; it will probably interest him and others to know that it was seen on the Lyndhurst side of the forest only last April. It is reported of the starling that in Hampshire, as elsewhere, it has greatly increased in numbers; it is described as the greatest enemy of the green and greater spotted woodpecker, as it appropriates their nesting holes. Curiously enough, we are told that that charming bird the nuthatch is an increasing species, and that "it has practically no enemy." If this is the case in Hampshire, the starlings there are more considerate than in several parts of the Midlands, where of late years they have been cruelly busy in ejecting nuthatches from their holes.

Botany is treated of in the comprehensive and exhaustive fashion that the county deserves, for Hampshire actually lays claim to 1,118 species out of the 1,958 flora inhabiting Britain, a number not approached by any other county save possibly in the case of Kent. Mr. Townsend's plan of mapping out the county for his important subject into twelve districts corresponding with a like number of principal river basins will certainly commend itself to his fellow-botanists. The subject is worthily and exhaustively dealt with from a technical point of view by Mr. Townsend and his colleagues, but the love of flowers is happily so universal that we wish it could have been treated in a slightly more popular form in the large type introductions to the lists. The special local names for flowers are always interesting, and sometimes valuable in their associations; the popular nomenclature of Hampshire flora is unusually frequent and varied, and yet in these pages it seems to be ignored, save in a single instance. It is melancholy to read, of the south of the Isle of Wight, that "the fern-hunter might detect the rare sea spleenwort (asplenium marinum)." We well remember the time, early in the "sixties," when we found the sea spleenwort as readily, and as in much profusion, between Freshwater and the Needles as it can now be found between Tintagel and Port Gavern, on the Cornish coast.

It is not to be expected that the superlative position which Hampshire holds amongst the counties with regard to botany and zoology could be maintained in other branches of its history. There are not a few county, as well as parochial, writers whose exuberant and localized patriotism leads them into enthusiastic exaggerations with regard to the districts of which they treat. Errors of this kind are rendered almost impossible by the scheme adopted in this general survey. Professor Boyd Dawkins, who writes in this volume on prehistoric Hampshire, will have charge, as we understand, of the prehistoric sections throughout all the counties; a similar task is assigned to Mr. Haverfield and Mr. Reginald Smith, who discourse respectively on Roman and Anglo-Saxon times. Professor Boyd Dawkins gives us a highly interesting sketch of Palæolithic or River-drift man as he might have been found in Hampshire in the pleistocene age, when he occupied the country in common with the woolly rhinoceros and the mammoth, the bison and the urus, finding formidable rivals in the chase of the deer in the lion and spotted hyæna. This is followed by a vivid general description of the county in the neolithic age, and of its conquest in the bronze age by the Goidels, who formed the van of the great Aryan migration. But the professor has to admit that the earlier antiquities of Hampshire have not yet been sufficiently explored to go into detail; that the numerous camps cannot at present be safely dated; and that the pit dwellings have not been examined with sufficient care to allow of them being assigned to their proper place in the archæological record. Professor Boyd Dawkins is so deservedly noted for his caution in all assertion that we confess to being somewhat surprised to read—when he is mentioning the new weapons, the new customs, and the higher civilization which the Goidels brought into Hampshire—that "they worshipped the unknown God in temples, the largest of which are represented by the great stone circles of Avebury and Stonehenge." There is certainly no historic record which connects the worship of this race with stone temples or stone circles. We were also under the strong impression that archæological research had not brought to light anything that could warrant more than a qualified surmise in the direction of this temple use of great stone circles. It must then, we think, be the case that Professor Boyd Dawkins has in his possession certain facts with regard to Avebury and Stonehenge not generally known to scientists. We shall look forward, therefore, with the greatest interest to his account of these temples when the history of Wiltshire comes to be written in this series.

Mr. Haverfield's investigations into the traces of the Roman occupation of Hampshire are painstaking and thorough, and the results as tabulated on a clearly marked special map can be easily grasped. But by far the most interesting matter relative to the Romano-British period is the excellently illustrated account given by Messrs. W. St. John Hope and G. E. Fox of the long-buried city of Silchester. These gentlemen, as is well known, have been in charge of the systematic exploration of this site which has been conducted during the summer months by the Society of Antiquaries for the last ten years, and which will extend over several more years in the future. Elaborate reports have been issued of the results of this work, year by year, in the Archæologia; but the fellows of the Society who have followed these most closely will be the first to enjoy and appreciate the interesting and able summary here given of what has been accomplished and the scholarly conclusions that they venture to advance as the results of their ten years' study. These twenty-two pages, supplemented by Mr. Haverfield's remarks on inscribed objects found at Silchester, give a more readable and convincing idea of the true settlement of the Romans in Britain, from a municipal as opposed to a military standpoint, than all the other treatises and essays that we have read on the subject. Not the slightest trace of a garrison force to keep down a conquered people has come to light at Silchester.

The particular enthusiasm of the Hampshire man may again be fairly kindled by the latter part of this volume. The last 150 pages are given to an introduction to the Domesday Survey, to an English version of the portion relating to Hampshire, and to an account of the Winchester Survey. It is satisfactory that Mr. J. Horace Round, who is facile princeps among Domesday students, is to have the charge of this section in each county. As Mr. Round remarks, there is no county in England so closely connected as Hampshire with this great national record. "It was at Winchester that Domesday Book was kept; at Winchester that it must have been compiled; and at Winchester that the lost original returns were preserved, far into the next century, in the treasury of the Norman kings." Mr. Round's arguments, deduced from the survey, ought to set at rest for ever the gross exaggeration of early chroniclers as to the rooting up of sixty churches from as many fair townships by the Conqueror to make the New Forest. The survey, when critically examined, certainly seems to put the Conqueror's conduct in a more favourable light than is usually represented. The losses supposed to be sustained by the old English religious houses turn out, under careful scrutiny, to be entirely imaginary, so far as Hampshire is concerned, save for the loss by the nuns of Winchester of a single manor that was secularized. A most helpful feature, which must have involved considerable labour, is Mr. Round's Domesday map, whereon the names of the manors in which the King had an interest, those of the principal church tenants, and those of the greatest lay tenant (Hugh de Port) are underlined in different colours. This is a better plan than attempting to colour the whole extent of the different manors (which was once done for Somersetshire with unsatisfactory results), as there is so much uncertainty about their boundaries.

The value of a great undertaking of this kind depends much upon the nature and number of the illustrations. Considering that the subjects treated of in this volume do not readily lend themselves to illustration, this instalment gives fair promise both of their excellency and of a liberal supply. The woodland frontispiece, "On the Edge of the New Forest," a drawing by Mr. W. Hyde, is altogether charming. The full-page plates, both plain and coloured, illustrating Silchester and other Hampshire mosaic pavements, together with numerous blocks in the text, are quite satisfactory, whilst various plans and maps not specified in this notice tend materially to expound the letterpress. The front and end covers of the Winton Domesday MS. (in possession of the Society of Antiquaries) were well worth giving in facsimile, for the binding of this MS. is considered by experts to be contemporary, and the stamps prove it to have been the work of Winchester craftsmen.

We trust that this undertaking, so meritoriously begun, may be well supported. The volumes will be issued only to subscribers. The Hampshire volumes are four in number and the price six guineas net. The subscription list of each county history does not close until the last volume for that county goes to the press. When that time comes the publishers are under a pledge to destroy all unsubscribed-for copies that may remain in hand. When this stupendous work is completed, according to the lines laid down, this national survey will comprise 100 volumes. As we contemplate in imagination such a mass of profound literature we can only sum up our feelings in a single word, and exclaim with Dominie Sampson, as he stood aghast before the heaps of Colonel Mannering's library, "Prodigious!"

THOMAS DAVIDSON ON EDUCATION.

A History of Education. By Thomas Davidson. (Constable. 5s. n.)

It is characteristic of modern life to be unable to conceive of great abilities finding or seeking no public recognition. It was the medieval idea to search out and thrust into prominence the genius which was supposed to desire naturally to conceal itself. The modern idea is that powers which do not force themselves into prominence are mediocre. When a man's friends assert of him that he deserved a place in the world's memory which he did not obtain, any explanation is sought rather than indifference. The commonest explanation of genius manqué—of the Joubert, the Amiel, the Mallarmé—is that the healthy balance of an active mind was deranged by the preponderance of the fastidious and selective principle. No such reason can be assigned for the comparative failure of Thomas Davidson, whose career came to an unexpected close the other day in a hospital at Montreal. Of the selective principle, of fastidiousness, there is not a trace in his work. It was in his nature, rather, to fling down his thoughts, his facts, even his undigested erudition, with a sublime carelessness, only too happy if his readers were startled or scandalized. In the sphere which he had chosen this quality alone was likely to go far in prejudice to his success. It was not possible that specialists who had passed laborious years at the elucidation of subjects which he hastily and light-heartedly handled would bow to his arbitrary dictum. Nor was it possible that the public would prefer his unreasoned ipse dixit, supported by they knew not what measure of investigation, to the careful and laborious conclusions of acknowledged masters. "I am well aware that this is not the ordinary view," he would write on so hazardous a question as the Semitic element in Greek mythology, "but I feel sure that it is correct." The work he chose to do, consisting for the most part of large generalizations, requiring the support of scrupulously verified details of ethnology and social and literary history, made this eccentric self-confidence peculiarly dangerous.

Undoubtedly the author of this "History of Education" possessed a remarkable personality. Something of this might be divined even from these pages, but only his intimate friends knew his secret. A contemporary of Robertson Smith and Minto at Aberdeen, Thomas Davidson first went over to Canada and then wandered away to St. Louis, where he found a society of philosophic Germans which made a permanent impression on, at any rate, his intellectual character. Longfellow got him an appointment in the Examination Department of Harvard University. He then seized an opportunity to go to Athens and study Greek archæology. For years he followed a roving career—if it could be called a career that led nowhither—but showing a decided predilection for Italy. The credit is claimed for him of having "stimulated the Pope in the preparation of his famous Encyclical "—Aeterni Patris—"on Aquinas." If the claim is just, there is a fine irony in the result. In his work on Rosmini's Philosophical System he laughs at the conflicting interpretations which have vexed the Church since the reinstatement of the Thomist system, and in the book before us he throws the discredit of the Encyclical on the Jesuits. Better known than his "Rosmini" are the two volumes in the "Great Educators" Series on Aristotle and Rousseau, given forth to the world from "a mountain farm" near Keene, Essex County, in the State of New York. As we have to speak more than seems grateful of the defects of the writer, we perhaps may be allowed to quote from a contemporary some appreciation of the man:—

> It was the charm of this wandering scholar that he was ever human and ever young. Like Abou Adhem, he loved his fellow-men, and was as friendly with his old Italian housekeeper, who believed in ghosts and saintly protection, as with the learned men whose friend and correspondent he was. The present writer can see him now embracing a genial captain of the Alpine regiment stationed in the Italian mountain town where for a time he made his home. He was not quite a saint, but he loved much, and he shall be forgiven much. He could have kept Socrates company over the amphora while the rest were under the table, and could have gone forth to teach with as clear a head. A unique character, built on a solid Scotch foundation, polished by travel and by thought, and with the bright and eager tone of the American, he was the best example in our time of the medieval wandering scholar.

The conception of this "History of Education" is great, and the book would have been great if Mr. Davidson had given himself scope for its proper development—a proceeding which would have required at least two or three quarto volumes. It is an attempt to develop historically Froebel's thesis that Education is "conscious evolution." Mr. Davidson has traced the growth of Education from the most primitive stage from the stage of Savagery, through the intermediate stages of Barbarian Education, among the Turanians of Chaldæa, Egypt, and China, the Semites of Babylonia and Assyria, and the Aryans of India and Iran, of Civic Education in Judæa, Greece, and Rome, to the Human Education of modern times. The conception, we have said, is magnificent, but to take such an enormous sweep in limits of space so circumscribed presents a task of the greatest difficulty, which has not been altogether overcome. There has been a failure, at all events, in the formal part. Only the most vital and predominant characteristics of each period are the proper object of such a study. But sometimes details of almost a trivial kind are introduced. The author has never been able to make up his mind whether it is the spirit of Education—"conscious evolution" as displayed by the whole community—or whether it is the material part of it—pure Pædagogics—with which he is concerned. In a larger work the material side, the Pædagogics, might have been treated sufficiently and yet kept in due subordination. It is difficult to apprehend the rationale of his classifications. It is not clear why the Patristic Education, which condemned poetry as cibus dæmonum, should not range with the Barbarian systems, or why Greek Education is denied the title of Human. The causes which ruined Greek culture may also disintegrate our own.

Exception may well be taken to Mr. Davidson's determination to set out from a metaphysical starting-point. Even to those who are prepared to accept the metaphysics doubts may intrude themselves how the theory of subject and object as "desiderant feelings" affects either the origin of civic organization in Greece or the value of Polytechnic Institutes in America. For ourselves we do not attach so great an importance to the psychology and ontology which Mr. Davidson has derived from Rosmini. A Philistine obtuseness prompts us to ask—If man is a "substantial feeling," how does he find room for a great variety of feelings, and how can "certain subordinate combinations . . . sunder themselves naturally from the whole, and . . . set up a new human body for themselves"? If man is a "fundamental feeling" and ideas are "relations between feelings," what is it that apprehends those relations? Again, Mr. Davidson believes that, until clearness is reached with regard to the eternal nature of the human spirit and its activities, true education is impossible. Yet he seems to explain the failure of the Egyptians to ascend to "any lofty ideals or philosophical conceptions" by their belief in immortality. There is probably no real contradiction, but here is another place where elaboration was all-important.

We feel compunction at having dwelt so long on imperfections. We repeat that the combination in this book of scope and extent made imperfection inevitable. It is an original book, bold in conception, vast in design, limited only in size, in execution paradoxical, irritating, tantalizing, but always suggestive. It is, as the last should be, the best of the author's books—better even than the Rosmini, far better than the Aristotle or Rousseau. We understand why Davidson made little impression on the world. He carried into literature the method and manner of the St. Louis brasseries. And the work which he chose was one in which personality can have but slight play. His metaphysics were a feature of his personality, but even his personality could scarcely suffuse metaphysics. It was as if George Borrow had left only some treatises of philology. Still, even from this impersonal book we can, as we said, faintly divine how he was so vivid an inspiration to those who were admitted to his intimacy.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Lord Rosebery.

Mr. Thomas F. G. Coates cannot be congratulated very warmly on his LORD ROSEBERY: HIS LIFE AND SPEECHES (Hutchinson, 21s. n.). The book seems to have been thrown together anyhow, and the narrative part is written in the conventional language of adulation. Much of it is scissored from the daily and weekly papers and the monthly magazines, even the Era and the Ladies' Realm being laid under contribution; and most of the anecdotes have the cloying charm of familiarity. Such interest as the book has depends upon the speeches; and Lord Rosebery's speeches, like Lord Beaconsfield's, are good to read as well as good to listen to. He seems to have more than the omniscience which Anglo-Indians find so irritating in Lord Curzon of Kedleston; but he also seems to be more used to it—perhaps because he has been omniscient longer. Even here, however, Mr. Coates does not do the history justice. The speeches are not complete; we do not even find the celebrated reference to "the predominant partner." We might, of course, take the book as a text for a discourse on his political career and prospects; but the book is a made book, and hardly worth that compliment—especially at a season when there are so many other books to write about. Being quite uncritical it challenges no controversy.

Most of the anecdotes contained in the book reappear in THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, K.G., by Jane T. Stoddart (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s. n.). It is on the whole a better written book, and the numerous photographs with which it is illustrated are magnificently printed. But it is only a pot pourri, after all, and hardly a book that claims any serious discussion.

South Africa.

Mr. Archibald R. Colquhoun is turning out books rather faster than is good for his reputation. Much of THE RENASCENCE OF SOUTH AFRICA (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)—the pages on the scenery, the flora and fauna, the history, the climate, &c.—could have been knocked up in any newspaper office from the usual works of reference. Not until the closing chapters on the economic future and the settlement does the voice of the book-maker give way to that of the ex-Administrator of Mashonaland. Here experience and knowledge enable Mr. Colquhoun to make short work of the popular proposal to fill up the country with soldier settlers. The experiment, he points out, has been tried over and over again, in Albany, in Rhodesia, and in Bechuanaland, and has always failed disastrously. The soldiers accepted the farms readily enough, but sold them, shortly afterwards, to land speculators and drifted to the mines. Where they stuck to them they failed, as at Albany, where "successive years of blight, flood, and other misfortunes discouraged the colonists, and finally an elaborate system of relief had to be organized for them." This seems conclusive. The book has a fairly good map.

IAN HAMILTON'S MARCH, by Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill (Longmans, 6s.), is good journalism of the sort that one expects from the author; but there is nothing more that needs to be said about it. The last hundred pages or so are filled with extracts from the journal of Lieutenant Frankland, lately prisoner at Pretoria. This is not in the least important, though the subject gives it a certain interest.

THE RESURRECTION OF PETER, by Princess Catherine Radziwill (Hurst and Blackett, 1s.), is "a reply to Olive Schreiner," and introduces upon the scene another Divine Person who tells Peter Halkett that his former visitor was a false prophet, and draws a picture of South Africa unified and civilized by the energy of one man whom we are to identify presumably with Mr. Cecil Rhodes, and who, on one occasion, is spoken of as "He" with a capital H. The two little books together make an interesting contribution to the pamphlet literature of South African politics.

Reprints.

The first volume is now issued of "The Authentic Edition of Dickens." This, of course, can only come from one firm, Messrs. Chapman and Hall. As Dickens himself relates in the preface to PICKWICK, which forms the first volume of the present edition, Messrs. Chapman and Hall, attracted by some pieces which Dickens, a young man of three and twenty, was writing in the Morning Chronicle, or had just written in the old Monthly Magazine, waited upon him "to propose a something that should be published in shilling numbers." That something was, of course, "Pickwick," and Messrs. Chapman and Hall remained Dickens' publishers until his death. The present edition is marred neither by notes or introduction. It contains Dickens' original preface and Hablot Browne's original frontispiece. It is a well-printed, admirably-bound volume, and it has the great advantage, not possessed by one or two other editions of "Pickwick," of containing the whole edition between two covers. The distinguishing feature, however, of the edition is, of course, the illustrations, still wonderfully strong, clear, and vivid. Those who possess the absolutely first edition will, of course, miss the drawing of the cricket match at Dingley Dell. This drawing by Buss, with another from the same hand, both of which, with other unused designs, appeared in the Victoria Edition of 1887, were quickly superseded by designs from the hand of Hablot Browne, and the new edition contains all the illustrations by Seymour and "Phiz." The text is from the edition which the author corrected in 1867 and 1868. Inside the cover, at the beginning and the end, are portraits of Dickens—Maclise's picture of the novelist at the age of 27 at the beginning, and the equally well-known portrait of him at the age of 58 at the end—both of them bearing Dickens' autograph. In each volume—there are to be twenty-one in all (5s. each)—one of the illustrations has been selected to form a coloured frontispiece. In the present case the frontispiece is "The First Appearance of Sam Weller."

The new edition of Pierce Egan's LIFE IN LONDON (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.), like some of Jim Pinkerton's speculations, has "proved a disappointment." It is a new impression only, so far as we can see, of John Camden Hotten's reprint of 1869, with the plates omitted. As the letter-press was written for these plates, and contains numerous references to them, it hardly seems worth while to have given us the text by itself. Even the list of the plates, with their pagination, has been preserved, though only one of them is given as a frontispiece. The curious compiler of a slang dictionary may attach some value to Egan's contorted prose, but otherwise an edition like this is only of use to confirm Thackeray's opinion that any permanent popularity which the book might have would be due not to Egan but to Cruikshank.

Another re-issue of Nathan Bailey's translation of the COLLOQUIES OF ERASMUS comes from Messrs. Gibbings (7s. 6d.). Bailey was the lexicographer whose English Dictionary, published in 1721, was said to have been twice read through by Lord Chatham, and which formed the groundwork of many subsequent works. As might be expected, he had a large command of colloquial English, and he was fond of modernizing Erasmus, as when he makes him speak of a schoolmaster as "a greater Whipmaster than Busby himself." The present edition appears in three pleasantly got-up small octavo volumes, and the notes, by the Rev. E. Johnson, are brief and judicious. They are necessary not only for Bailey's modernizations but for his positive inaccuracies.

It is a pleasure to have brought to our notice again Mr. Whymper's SCRAMBLES AMONGST THE ALPS (15s. n.), which Mr. Murray re-issues with all its wonderful illustrations and a new preface by the author, with some interesting notes as to routes up the Matterhorn and changes which have taken place since the "Scrambles" in the conformation of the mountain. Mr. Morley Roberts has lately told us in these columns what an ascent of the Matterhorn to-day is like. It was a more difficult matter in the sixties.

FICTION.

The Roman-à-clef.

Mr. Morley Roberts' LORD LISLATHGOW (Arnold, 6s.) is well imagined and well written, as is all Mr. Morley Roberts' work. Two biographies of Lord Rosebery which we notice elsewhere have just appeared. Perhaps Mr. Morley Roberts is representing the spirit of the time more aptly by making him a hero of fiction. His book is a roman-à-clef in which Lord Rosebery supports the title role. It is more audacious than "The Colossus," and, under a very thin veil of fiction, it makes certain charges, not only against a party, but also against individuals. The general scheme of the story is to exhibit Lord Rosebery no longer sulking like Achilles in his tent, but coming down at the psychological moment on to the stricken field, dishing the old Radicals, and emerging as the triumphant leader of the new party of Liberal Imperialists. So far, of course, there is nothing that any novelist who watched politics might not have thought of and written out well or badly, according to his talents. What is striking, and challenges controversy if not verification, is the account of the manner in which the old Radicals are dished. This process is achieved by the publication in a Liberal Imperialist organ of certain compromising letters which their custodian—the editor of another paper—is blackmailed into surrendering. This part of the story, we hasten to add, is evidently meant to be read as fiction, and neither the blackmailer nor his victim can be identified with any public personage. The contents of the letters are more sensational, and there is hardly a pretence at concealing the identity of the correspondents. Those correspondents, in fact, are Eustace Loder, whom we already know from "The Colossus" to be meant for Mr. Cecil Rhodes, and John Midhurst, the latter part of whose name is intended to suggest the late Liberal organizer. The allegations conveyed in the letters are that Mr. Cecil Rhodes presented £5,000 to the Liberal party funds on the condition that the party should abandon "Little Englandism" or should return the money if it did not see its way to doing so; and that the leaders of the party violated the conditions and refused to return the money. It is no business of ours to plunge into political controversy. We need only say that it requires considerable hardihood to formulate charges of that nature in a roman-à-clef. A novelist is hardly justified in making them if they are really to be regarded as a mere play of fancy. It is of the essence of the roman-à-clef that its literary interest, and even its human interest, must suffer. But, even in these respects, Mr. Morley Roberts has been more successful than might have been expected—and emphatically more successful than in "The Colossus." With a good young man who turned blackmailer for his hero, it was practically impossible for him to end his story satisfactorily; but he steers through his difficulties with a dexterity which it is impossible not to admire. His women, too, are well and sympathetically drawn; and epigrams illuminate his pages.

A Welcome Humourist.

It can have been no easy matter for the author of "The Skipper's Wooing" and "Many Cargoes" to follow those deservedly popular collections with a long novel on the same lines, but in A MASTER OF CRAFT (Methuen, 6s.) Mr. W. W. Jacobs does it with a grace and ease that if not surprising is certainly delightful. It is many days since such a humoursome feast has been spread on our library table. The adventures of the agreeable Captain Flower in his desire to avoid marriage with at least two of the three charming ladies to whom he has engaged himself, the quaint development of the character of his uncle who attempts so much on his behalf and only arrives at landing himself in matrimony, and the wise courses of his faithful "mate," Fraser, are told with a delicacy and a certainty which will prevent the reader putting aside the book until he knows the issues of the fortunes of his friends. For each of the principal characters, from the captain to the boy, from the leading actors to the merest supernumeraries, become of vital interest to the reader. The publichouse people of Chelsea and the seagoing people of Wapping or of Seabridge are delineated with as much perspicuity as wit. But like all true literary humourists, Mr. Jacobs has a pretty taste in the pathetic. The account of the best of the captain's loves, Poppy Tyrell, in her affairs with the Wheeler family, and of the growth of her affection for the excellent mate, Mr. Fraser, shows that, although the métier of the author is to make us laugh, he can play upon other and deeper emotions with equal ease and skill if it chance to be his desire. It is hardly too much to say that in the dialogue there is no false note from the first line to the last.

Correspondence.

IS SWINBURNE A "GREAT POET"?

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The discussion as to whether Swinburne is, or is not, a great poet leads us to consider lest in the present day we are in danger of calling certain authors gods "which by nature are no gods." Many years ago Professor Dowden declared that the deification of Shelley was complete. I do not think he would say so now. The poets at present deified are those whose verse sings of the camp and of bloodshed, and smacks of the barracks and the forcible language of "Tommy." Latter-day verse is nothing if not martial; at its best it is but a waving of the one flag above all other flags, a variation of that time-honoured vaunt that "Britons never shall be slaves." Now, although it may be much to stir the spirits and excite the somewhat cheap fervour of men by the writing of verses that can be recited with great effect at music-halls, we should not forget that poetry is not an essence that can be bottled and stoppered in such fashion. It is well at times to return to the deification of Shelley as a poet. Mr. Augustine Birrell asserts that we like our poetry to be serious, that as Englishmen we "are fond of sermons"; but it is Mr. Birrell's own comparison of Matthew Arnold's poetry with Shelley's that forces us more clearly than ever to recognize that a poet, born not made, has flights above and beyond all sermons, formulas, principles, and patriotism, and it is this power of flight that makes the true poet. In this airy, unearthly soaring Shelley excels. Who has ever matched the perfect music of "The Ode to the West Wind," or, "The Cloud," or more especially the second verse,

Swiftly walk over the western wave, Spirit of Night!

Wrap thy form in a mantle grey,
Star-in-wrought,
Blind with thy hair the eyes of Day;
Kiss her till she be wearied out, &c.

—these lines are a picture, a symphony, and a pealing of sweet bells all in one exquisite whole. The rare beauty, too, of "The Skylark," which we defame by giving to children as a task to learn and to disfigure by a sing-song repetition; and all the wonderful parts of "Prometheus Unbound." Beauty such as these pieces possess flash out here and there across the years, amid the accumulated work of poets, like diamonds in a circlet of precious stones. Colonel Lovelace in his marvellous "When love with unconfinèd wings" reflects it, and it is a quality impossible to compass or to describe. Read "To Althea from Prison" to any one not poetical and he will instantly demand from you an explanation of the sense of "grates" or even of "gates." These persons are deaf to the simple, haunting loveliness of "Arethusa arose"; they require a lesson in their poetry, powder in their honey, and find it possible to rejoice in

Tell me not in mournful numbers,
Life is but an empty dream,
For the soul is dead that slumbers,
And things are not what they seem.

—lines which are a terror, and a horror, and a blasphemy of the sacred name of poetry. Matthew Arnold indeed complained that there was in Shelley's poetry "an incurable want," "the want of sound subject matter." He himself had not the ear to catch the perfect song, he never attained that uncareful, melodious note, nor, for all his really fine writing, did he have the actual touch of Apollo's lyre. Coleridge could finger that string, and it quivers all through the "Ancient Mariner" and "Kubla Khan." Tennyson less often sounded it, and Byron, I venture to think, never; the roll and volume and power of his verse never took their rise in the snow-capped mountain beneath the solitary morning star. "Shelley," says Swinburne, "outsang all poets on record but some two or three throughout all time; his depths and heights of inner and outer music are as divine as nature's and not sooner exhaustible." And among our modern poets who except Swinburne himself possesses this "inner and outer music"? Is it not well sometimes to go apart from cursing "Tommies" and hospital details and even "pregnant thought succinctly uttered" and be uplifted on the wings of the true spirit of poetry? To breathe what Masson calls "The intellectual ether" of Shelley's poetry, and after such refining we might be less prone to make unto ourselves gods of the last new scribblers, and less slow to recognise the truly great.

Lowlands, Bungay, Oct. ARTHUR HOOD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Lord Beaconsfield on a famous occasion congratulated himself that a solid piece of furniture stood between him and Mr. Gladstone, and similarly may not I congratulate myself that a strip of water separates me from Mr Alfred Noyes, who seems to have been like Bob Acres when he sat down to write his letter—"Odds flints and triggers! I must be in a passion!"? Mr. Noyes appears to have studied Mr. Henley's writings sufficiently closely to copy some of what may be termed their "roughness" to the exclusion of those qualities that give a certain charm to what he (Mr. Henley) writes. Much as Mr. Noyes seems to dislike Matthew Arnold, he might learn from him to avoid exaggeration and never to praise with blind enthusiasm.

Swinburne is so essentially a musical poet that it is to be regretted that anything like discord should be imported into a discussion concerning him, but nothing that Mr. Noyes has said or quoted proves him to be a great poet. "Pregnant thought and succinct expression" have never been the qualities for which Swinburne has been long and deservedly admired, and Mr. Noyes is not fortunate in his quotation in support of this claim. "Who cannot hate, can love not" is untrue, and truth is an essential element in great poetry; so is restraint—a quality in which Mr. Noyes' prose is so lacking that one can only attribute it to the constant reading of Swinburne.

To say that Swinburne "holds a tighter rein over his words than even Tennyson did" is a bêtise that no one with a critical mind would commit.

Believe me, Sir, very truly yours,

P. A. SILLARD.

THE SIN-EATER IN SOUTH WALES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. J. P. Owen seems to doubt the existence of Sin-eating in Wales in his letters to you on the subject (Literature, pages 221 and 281). Some years ago I wrote a full account of the custom as practised in Wales in the Cymro. I cannot lay my hands on the number just now, but may I draw the attention of Mr. Owen and also of Mr. Ernest Rhys to a very important authority on the question, viz., "Dryeh yr Amserocdd," by Robert Jones, of Rhoslan. His account of the custom (pages 42 and 43) is too long for reproduction here; but it may be summarized. The custom was called in Wales "Diodlas" or "Diodles." It was done in the following manner. When any one died the family selected some poor fellow to perform the ceremony. A bowl was sent to the maker of the coffin to be coloured the same as the coffin. On the day of the funeral the head of the house, when the corpse was taken out and laid on the bier, delivered across the coffin to the poor man a loaf of good bread, a large piece of cheese with a piece of silver planted in it, and a bowl full of beer, or milk, if there be no beer. The poor man (viz., the Sin-eater) then blessed and prayed for the soul of the dead, eating and drinking. Mr. Ernest Rhys' allusion to Sin-eating in the "Whistling Maid" is therefore based on a real and historical Welsh custom.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

THOS. SHANKLAND.

THE ABUSE OF THE POSSESSIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Rouse has raised an interesting point in asking when the tendency to limit the case inflection of nouns to those which were invested with a more or less personal sense began, and what is the history of its development. He is probably in a better position than I am to conduct the inquiry, as I have but few authors and no grammar at hand. But I have consulted the Preface, Dedication, and Postscript of Dryden's Virgil, the First and Third Parts of the Pilgrim's Progress, Ben Jonson's Discoveries, and Cavendish's Life of Wolsey, for the purpose of ascertaining the average practice in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; and the authorized version of the Bible, and the Prayer-book are always with us. If we may come to a fairly safe conclusion by accepting these as authorities it would appear that the association of the possessive inflection with person was undoubtedly the rule 300 years ago. For, although idiomatic survivals of the more general senses of the old genitive are easily found in Cavendish and Bunyan, they are not very numerous even with them, while they are almost undiscoverable in Jonson and Dryden. The example of the latter is the more remarkable in that he goes out of his way to disparage the substitution of prepositions, or signs of cases, as he calls them, for inflected cases, calling it one of the "barbarities on which our speech is built by the fault of our forefathers." We may hence conclude that, if he had felt justified in so doing, he would have gladly "rejected all those signs, and cut off as many articles as he could spare, comprehending in one word what we are constrained to express in two."

My impression, although I am at present unable to verify it, is that as soon as the analytical expression of relation had gained a firm footing in the language, the genitive began to lose most of its powers. A very curious instance of the tendency may be noted in the same chapter (I quote from memory) of "The Revelation," where "all manner spices" and "all manner of spices" both occur. "All manner" is, of course, an old genitive of quality, but its force was evidently moribund at the time that this chapter was translated or revised, and the connexion between the two names was emphasized by the insertion of the preposition between them.

I should be the last to deny or to regret the existence of old genitives in the language, but I fail to see why the cordial welcome which we extend to such old friends as "The Winter's Tale" and "A Stone's Throw" is due to such doubtful company as "The Criterion's New Play" or "The Lock's Rape."

Yours faithfully, E. D. LITTLE.

LOCAL MUSEUMS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With reference to your remarks in to-day's Literature on the subject of local museums in connexion with Public Libraries, it may interest some of your readers to know that in our small library at Brentford special efforts have been made, for more than ten years, to collect pictures that may advance our knowledge of local history, and the result has been, so far, very successful.

A special feature of the collection referred to is the series of prints illustrating the famous Wilkes elections here; these include some curious pictures with such titles as "Brentford Sweepstakes," "A Taylor riding to Brentford," and portrait groups of Horne Tooke, Serjeant Glyn, and John Wilkes, &c. Other pictures of interest are the first "Kew-bridge," the Three Pigeons Inn, frequented by Shakespeare and Jonson, &c.

To this interesting and valuable collection we are anxious to add any other prints illustrating local history, and recently a series of photographs of buildings that are being demolished have been secured, by gift and purchase. There must be a large number of prints relating to Brentford which we do not possess, and if this should meet the eye of some one who can assist us in making the collection more complete we shall be glad.

I am yours truly, FRED. TURNER.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

A good catalogue of the works of art contained in the Louvre has long been a desideratum, and especially since the recent rearrangement of the principal galleries, grouping together the works of each school, and the opening of the new Rubens Gallery. Meanwhile, in the absence of an adequate catalogue for the general public, amateurs are soon to be provided with a work that renders justice to the great masterpieces in the Louvre. The house of Goupil and Co.—now under the management of Messrs. Manzi, Joyant, and Co.—is on the point of completing "Les Maîtres de la Peinture au Musée du Louvre." This work, which will form two large folio volumes and which has been appearing, in French and in English, at irregular intervals during the past two years, is among the most sumptuous of art publications. Each school of painting is, with a few exceptions, the subject of one of the twenty-four parts into which the work is divided. Elaborate articles have been written by the most competent French critics—M. Eugene Muntz, M. George Lafenestre, M. André Michel, M. Pierre de Nolhac, M. Frederic Masson, M. Maurice Hamel, and others. M. Henri Bouchot, the erudite curator of the print department of the National Library, gives a sympathetic description of the pictures by the English masters. Unfortunately the English school is very poorly represented in the French national gallery. The skilful employment of photogravure, aquatint, and typogravure has led to the accurate reproduction of 288 of the most important pictures. It is a pity that the necessarily high price of these volumes and the limited number of copies printed puts them beyond the reach of many lovers of art. But every one will be able to see them in the great public libraries, the directors of which have been among the first to become subscribers.

Reports from the book trade for the past month show that the autumn season, so far, has only been remarkable for its novels. The weightier and more expensive volumes, for the most part, have been kept back on account of the elections. There has been a good demand, however, for art volumes, which become more popular every year as gift books. It is too early, perhaps, to speak of the season's successes in fiction. Sir Walter Besant's "The Fourth Generation," one of the first to appear this season, will soon be in its third edition, and Mark Twain's new book, "The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg" (both published by Chatto and Windus), has gone to a second edition. Another early success was Mr. Oliver Onions' "Compleat Bachelor"—the first volume in Mr. Murray's dainty series of half-crown novels—which is now in its third edition. Messrs. Methuen, besides their Marie Corelli record, announce new editions of the late Mr. Stephen Crane's "Wounds in the Rain," Mr. Anthony Hope's "Quisanté," Mr. W. W. Jacobs' "Master of Craft," Mr. Robert Hichens' "Tongues of Conscience," Dorothea Gerard's "The Conquest of London," Lucas Malet's "The Gateless Barrier," (a third edition), and Ada Cambridge's "Path and Goal." Mr. Eden Phillpotts' "Sons of the Morning," Mr. Max Pemberton's "The Footsteps of a Throne," and Mr. Gilbert Parker's "The Lane that had no Turning" are also successful. Messrs. Macmillan, too, have had to reprint Florence Montgomery's "Prejudged" and Rosa Carey's "Rue with a Difference," while Messrs. Smith, Elder are preparing a second edition of Mr. Merriman's new novel "The Isle of Unrest."

The proposal which Professor Dowden made in our columns to celebrate the new century by producing an "adequate" history of English literature is endorsed by Sir Walter Besant in the Author. The cost and the risk are, of course, the difficulties; and Sir Walter Besant's suggestion that these should be faced by a company formed for the purpose seems as feasible as any other. That plan was adopted, we believe, in the case of the new "County Histories," of which the first volume has just appeared; and at any rate it seems a plan eminently suitable to such large literary undertakings. The project may not be of the sort that one would care to lay before the average promoter, eager for great profits and quick returns, but it would surely recommend itself to a good many rich men who perceive the need for such a work. The millionaires who endow Universities and pepper the country with free libraries are men to whom it seems not unreasonable to suggest so excellent a means of extending their literary efforts. They could not conceivably lose all the money they put into such a venture, and it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that they might see it all back again with interest.

There are also some instructive notes in the Author upon the economic aspects of the sixpenny book. The calculation is made that 27,200 copies must be sold before the publisher can clear out-of-pocket expenses, and that an author would, on the royalties usually offered, earn only £156 on an edition of 50,000. Seeing that there are many novels of which that number of copies would not be read even if they were given away with pounds of tea, it looks like a dangerous policy to produce new books at that price; and we believe that both authors and publishers are quite alive to the fact. Sir Walter Besant inclines to think that even the sixpenny reprint does harm by competing with the new novels at six shillings; but about that we have our doubts. It is probably the sixpenny magazines and the papers of the "bits" order that suffer most from the competition. The six-shilling novel goes on fairly healthily; and the sixpenny reprint probably increases its potential public by advertising the authors among classes not previously familiar with their names. The sixpenny reprint of "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," for instance, will probably cause a good many fresh readers to look out for Mr. Thomas Hardy's next novel, whether it appears at sixpence or at any other price.

Mr. James, to whose notes in the St. James's Gazette we refer elsewhere, reproaches us for having said that "an author has no longer any right to complain of the use to which his book is put when once he has parted with the copyright," and that "the purchaser of a fine poem would be within his rights if he used it as an advertisement for pills." Our object in saying these things, or something like them, was to warn authors, and not to encourage their enemies, so that it may be worth while to go into the matter a little further. Let it be granted that the purchaser of a copyright from an author does not acquire the right to make any or every use of it to the author's detriment any more than the purchaser of a walking-stick acquires the right to hit the vendor over the head with it. His position would be both legally and morally untenable, for instance, if, by mutilation, addition, or abridgment, he made the author appear responsible for libellous, blasphemous, or even grossly inaccurate statements. The author would have his remedy under the Common Law, though not under the Law of Copyright. But would the use of a poem to advertise a pill be regarded as damaging, in this sense, to the poet? Seeing that pills are habitually advertised by poems, we hardly imagine that a jury would take that view. The question arose, in fact, not many years ago, in connexion with a poem of Sir Edwin Arnold's; and Sir Edwin, acting, no doubt, upon good legal advice, did not take the matter into Court, but contented himself with writing to the papers to explain that the poem was not written up to the pill, but that the pill (or, perhaps, it was a hair restorer) was compounded to fit the poem. Mr. James also asks:—"Could it be contended that an author would have no right to complain if a publisher, having bought the copyright of a work of genius, refused to produce it?" It certainly could be so argued; for it is easy to imagine a case in which a publisher would buy a copyright for the express purpose of suppressing a book which, if published, would compete with another book which he was pushing, and the author would be assumed to have taken that risk with his eyes open. But no author is obliged to face that risk if he does not wish to. In order to avoid it he has only to have his agreement so drawn that the undertaking to publish on or before a stated day is a part of the consideration for which the copyright is assigned. It is a simple way out of the difficulty, and we believe it is a way frequently taken.

The number of books on the war is steadily increasing. Two come from Messrs. Arnold, one being "The Story of My Captivity in the Pretoria Prison," by the Rev. Adrian Hofmeyr, who was recently the hero of a stormy meeting in Shoreditch in support of the candidature of Mr. Claude Hay. He is a cousin of the famous Boer leader, Jan Hofmeyr, and is now Assistant-Commissioner of Mafeking and a delegate to England from the Imperial South African Association. The other book to come from Mr. Arnold is by Mrs. Bagot, who, under the title of "Shadows of the War," gives an account of her experiences while in charge of the Portland Hospital at the front. Now that the war is nearing its end Messrs. Skeffington are bringing out a little volume of "Three Plain Sermons for the Day of Thanksgiving"; a collection of "Hymns of Thanksgiving," including a hymn by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould for the return of the troops, entitled "Coming Home," another hymn entitled "In Remembrance of the Fallen," and the National Anthem, with the addition of a new verse of thanksgiving. The tunes are specially composed by Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir George Martin, Mr. A. H. Brewer, and Mr. Martin S. Skeffington.

Messrs. Cotta, of Stuttgart, will publish about Christmas a complete collection of Prince Bismarck's letters to his wife; the volume will contain some five hundred letters written between 1847 and 1892.

We hear so much—so much more, perhaps, than is necessary—of FitzGerald's "Omar" that it is pleasant for a change to look forward to new editions of his prose. His Letters have already taken their place securely among the classics, and among the most engaging classics, of English epistolary literature; and are continually being quoted by the critics of the day for comparison, when other published letters come up for judgment. "More Letters of Edward FitzGerald," edited by Mr. W. A. Wright, is among the forthcoming additions to Messrs. Macmillan's admirable Eversley Series. Meanwhile the same firm is adding to the "Golden Treasury" Series a volume of "Miscellanies by Edward FitzGerald," to include the "Euphranor," "Polonius," and other pieces. Modest as FitzGerald was he was a little proud of "Euphranor," and was proud of Tennyson's praise of it. And has not some one said that the description of the boat race with which it ends is one of the most beautiful pieces of English prose? It was certainly time that these pieces were made more accessible than in Mr. Wright's three volumes of the complete works.

We have received the following from Mrs. Paget Toynbee:—

Mrs. Paget Toynbee, having undertaken to prepare for the Clarendon Press a new edition of the "Letters of Horace Walpole," would be greatly obliged if owners of original letters, whether already printed or not, would kindly communicate with her, in order that the new edition may be made as complete and correct as possible. Many of the letters as hitherto printed are either fragmentary or disfigured by misreadings, and it is desirable that they should be corrected by collation with the originals. Mrs. Toynbee has already succeeded in collecting from various sources nearly two hundred letters which are not included in current editions, and it is probable that there are many others in private hands which she has not yet been able to trace. Any letters entrusted to her would be treated with scrupulous care and returned to their owners as promptly as possible. To those who are unable to lend the originals Mrs. Toynbee would be grateful for careful copies. All obligations of this nature would of course be duly acknowledged by the editor. It is expected that the new edition, which will be provided with a full index, will be completed in ten or eleven octavo volumes. Communications should be addressed to Mrs. Paget Toynbee, Dorney Wood, Burnham, Bucks.

The announcement is welcome, for, Mr. John Morley's opinion notwithstanding, Walpole's Letters are among the most entertaining classics of their class; and there has been no attempt to present a complete edition of them since Cunningham's well-known collection in nine volumes, published in 1857-59.

Mrs. Paget Toynbee's contributions to "Notes and Queries" have become a recognized source of authoritative information about Horace Walpole.

"The Romance of the Earth," shortly to be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein, is by Professor Bickerton, Professor of Chemistry and Physics at Canterbury College, New Zealand, whose address before the last meeting of the British Association was widely commented upon. The book is a popular illustrated one tracing the development of life from the protoplasm, and containing speculations which carry the author back millions of years before the earth existed. In another book, to appear shortly afterwards under the title of "The Story of the Stars," Professor Bickerton will state his views in a more severely scientific form, with no illustrations beyond a few diagrams.

The first volume of a collected edition of Nietzsche's letters is promised for November. After the threats of legal proceedings which Nietzsche's sister, Frau Förster-Nietzsche, circulated in the Press a few months ago against the unauthorized publication of any of her brother's letters, it is doubtful if the authorized collection will be very complete. It is conceivable, at least, that many possessors of letters from the philosopher will not be so ready to oblige the directors of the Nietzsche archive as they might have been.

His Honour Judge Parry began his literary career by doing literature the excellent service of editing the Letters of Dorothy Osborne. Since then he has become better known as the author of books for children. He has now retold "The Story of Don Quixote" for children, and his version, with illustrations by Mr. Walter Crane, is among this season's announcements of Messrs. Blackie and Sons. Judge Parry must wish that the madmen of Manchester would tilt at windmills rather than at County Court Judges. He is now, we are glad to say, recovered in health from the serious injuries not very long ago inflicted on him by an assailant in Court.

According to the Berlin papers, Gerhart Hauptmann has all but finished two new dramas; one is a modern play of artist life, Michael Kramer, the other a dramatization of the Middle High German Idyll, Der arme Heinrich, on which he has long been engaged. The story of the Arme Heinrich is familiar to English readers as the basis of Longfellow's Golden Legend.

The Hon. W. Warren Vernon is about to complete his "Readings on the Divina Commedia" by the publication, through Messrs. Macmillan, of two volumes on the "Paradiso," uniform with his volumes on the "Inferno" and "Purgatorio," which appeared some years ago. The "Readings" are largely based on the lectures of Benvenuto da Imola, delivered in Latin at Bologna in 1375, only about fifty years after Dante's death, and never printed in their complete original form before 1887, when they were published at Florence at the expense of Mr. Vernon. In the "Readings" the text is given a few terzine at a time. Then comes a literal prose translation with a running commentary, and numerous explanatory notes.

"An American Anthology, 1787-1899," by Mr. Edmund Clarence Stedman, was published in America last Wednesday. The selection makes a fitting companion volume to Mr. Stedman's "Victorian Anthology," which was published as far back as 1895. There is an introduction and biographies.

The Agnostic Annual publishes a "Twentieth century double number," with a good many important articles of which the chief are a paper on "The Triumph of Rationalism in Religion," by Mr. Leslie Stephen, and a review of "The Science of Evolution," by Professor E. Haeckel, Mr. T. Whittaker, and Miss C. E. Plumptre.

Messrs. Kegan Paul and Co. will publish the following volumes in their series of Westminster Biographies:—Next week, "John Wesley," by Frank Banfield; to be followed at once by "Adam Duncan," by H. W. Wilson, and a month later by "Daniel Defoe," by Wilfred Whitten.

The re-issue of the "English Historical Memoirs" in thirty volumes, announced by Mr. Nimmo, is the first uniform illustrated edition of the works of John Heneage Jesse, which were originally published during the forties and fifties. They will be uniform in size, type, and paper with the edition of Lady Jackson's French Memoirs, recently issued by the same publishers in fourteen volumes. Of the thirty volumes of the English Memoirs—all illustrated with etchings and engravings—fourteen will be ready this autumn, and the remaining sixteen in the spring. Mr. W. B. Boulton's work, in two volumes, on "The Amusements of Old London," a survey of the pastimes of Londoners from the seventeenth to the beginning of the nineteenth century, will be published by Mr. Nimmo towards the end of the month. The illustrations, from contemporary sources, are all coloured by hand, a feature which also marks the "History of Steeple-Chasing," by Mr. Wm. C. A. Blew (uniform with his "Quorn Hunt and its Masters") now coming from the same publisher. In November Mr. Nimmo will issue a new edition of Mr. Harting's "Handbook of British Birds." The author has edited the Zoologist for twenty years, as well as the natural history columns of the Field for a still longer period.

Mr. Heinemann will shortly publish the "Studies in Style" which Mr. W. H. Helm recently contributed to the Morning Post. They are not parodies, in the ordinary sense, but "gently exaggerated essays" in the methods of individual writers, or of schools of modern fiction.

A new edition of the third volume of Mr. C. P. Lucas' "Historical Geography of the British Colonies"—that dealing with West Africa—will be published immediately from the Clarendon Press. The recent Ashanti troubles should lend additional interest to this reissue. As is well known, Mr. Lucas is connected with the Colonial Office.

Mr. Arnold has a book on old colonial days, "The Journal of Mrs. Fenton," 1826-1830. Mrs. Fenton was an officer's widow in India seventy-four years ago, and, marrying again, wandered first to Mauritius, and then to Tasmania. Her journal gives a glimpse into ordinary life under many skies in the days of our great grand parents. A life of Admiral Sir Thomas Pasley, edited by his daughter, Miss Louisa Pasley, is another work announced by Mr. Arnold. Sir Thomas served in the naval expedition to the Crimea during the Russian war.

A new book by Mr. Samuel Gordon, the author of "Lesser Destinies" and "In Years of Transition," is entitled "Sons of the Covenant," and is a study of the Jew in European society. Another book about the Jews is coming from Mr. Fisher Unwin within the next ten days, under the title of "The Jew in London: A Study of Racial Character and Present-Day Conditions." The book contains an introduction by Canon Barnett and a preface by Mr. James Bryce. Mr. Zangwill's new novel, by the way—"The Mantle of Elijah"—will be published by Mr. Heinemann next week.

"The Inner Shrine," the novel by Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick that has been running serially in the The Times Weekly Edition, will be published by Messrs. Harper at the end of the month.

A new experiment in the lowering of prices is to issue a new edition of a recent six-shilling novel at the original price together with a shilling paper-covered edition. Mr. Burleigh is adopting this course in the case of Miss Nora Vynne's book, "The Priest's Marriage."

Mr. Harold E. Gorst has resigned the editorship of the Review of the Week.

THEOLOGY.—Mr. Murray has in preparation a short treatise on the Holy Communion, by Canon Gore, entitled "The Breaking of the Bread," and a book on the Atonement, by Canon Moberly, entitled "Atonement and Personality."

It is not often that Russian theological works find their way into English print, although Russian translations of Canon Farrar's writings, and of books by other foreign theologians, have been warmly welcomed in the Tsar's dominions. Next month, however, we are to receive through Messrs. Rivington an English translation of the monograph on "The Soothsayer Balaam," written by Bishop Seraphim of Ostrojsk. The book deals with the transformation of the Mesopotamian Soothsayer Balaam into a Prophet (Numbers xxii.-xxv.), and contains much archæological, philological, and psychological materials. Another translation announced by Messrs. Rivington is "La Bonne Souffrance" of Francis Coppée, a book to which Canon Newbolt called attention in one of his sermons in St. Paul's Cathedral some time ago. The work has been translated by Catherine M. Welby, and contains a preface by the Rev. W. H. Hutton. It will be ready at the end of this month. "The Idylls of Theocritus," translated into English verse by James Henry Hallard, M.A., is announced for November. In the following month the same publishers will issue "The Minor Festivals of the Anglican Church," by the Rev. M. J. Sparrow Simpson, and "The Pilgrim's Path: A Book of Prayer for Busy People," compiled by Frederick E. Mortimer, rector of St. Mark's Church, Jersey City. "The Pilgrim's Path" has passed through thirteen editions in the United States.

Messrs. Elliot Stock will publish a volume by the Dean of Ely entitled "Pro Patriâ," containing sermons preached on national occasions in England and America. The same publishers have nearly ready for issue a volume of selections from the writings of Dean Farrar entitled "The Life of Christian Service."

ART.—Vigo-street is striving assiduously, and, apparently, not without success, to preserve the art teaching of the Beardsley school. "Contrary to general anticipation," writes Mr. Lane, in a note announcing "The Later work of Aubrey Beardsley," consisting of upwards of 170 designs, many hitherto unpublished, "the Beardsley 'cult' has not proved of so ephemeral a nature as was prophesied." The volume will be uniform with Aubrey Beardsley's "Early Work." About the same time—early November—Mr. Lane will publish another album of cartoons by Mr. C. Dana Gibson—"The Americans." Across the way in Vigo-street Mr. Elkin Mathews has an album of cartoons in hand by Mr. Arthur Hopkins, R.N.S., "Sketches and Skits."

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. LXXIV.
By VALENTIN MARIN, Madrid.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White mates in two moves.

PROBLEM No. LXXV.
By L. PRADIGNAT, France
BLACK.

WHITE.
White mates in three moves.

Above and No. 76 add some further illustrations of the fact that several problemists may, unconsciously or otherwise, hit upon precisely identical ideas. On the face of it the similarity of position will be apparent, and the solutions will add point to it. We were both interested and amused to see, in a London daily recently, the following, where the theme once more appears as a speaking likeness:—

PROBLEM No. 76, by R. Oswald.—White (7 pieces), K at Q Kt 6; Q at K sq; rooks at K B 4 and Q 4; pawns at K R 2, K 3, Q B 2. Black (5 pieces), K at K 4; B at K Kt 2; pawns at Q 2, Q 3, Q 4. Two moves.

In No. 68, by Dr. Gold, the White queen is at K Kt sq. With Q at Q Kt sq there is a solution, but the point of the illustration is lost.

PROBLEM No. 77, by A. Troitzky.—White (7 pieces), K at K Kt 2; R at Q 6; B at K sq; Kt at Q 8; pawns at K Kt 4, Q 2, Q R 2. Black (5 pieces), K at K 4; Q at Q B 5; B at K Kt 4; pawns at K Kt 2 and K 3. White to play and win.

We should be glad to realize that genuine interest is taken in these End-game studies. Above looks critical, but we have not seen the solution.

WHY BLINDFOLD CHESS IS POSSIBLE.—A French writer notes that the very fact that in chess the pieces have distinctive powers is an aid to his memory. Blindfold exhibitions of Polish draughts are unknown, not because of the uniform appearance of the men, but because of their almost uniform powers. In draughts there is little to which the memory can cling except position. In chess the blindfold player has to deal with several entities as distinct in their nature as so many different persons. The incidents of the game are not chaos, but an intelligent development of intimately related events which have something of the interest of a novel. Games, indeed, may differ from each other as widely as novels, and a blindfold player, having usually the first move, can often impress each of his games with a different character from the outset, and thus facilitate his task. For him there is safety in variety.

GAME No. XXXVII.—Played in Yorkshire tournament. White, Mr. J. T. Stockwell (Leeds); Black, Mr. O. L. Anders (Halifax):—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1. P–K 4	P–K 4	12. P–K B 4	B–Q 5 ch
2. Kt–K B 3	Kt–Q B 3	13. K–R sq	P×P

11. Kt–Kt	B×Kt	22. Kt–B 7 mate (a).

(a) A lively little contest ending with a "Philidor's Legacy" (which, by the way, is much older than the celebrated Frankenstein). The first player thought 17. P–B 5 better than Q–Kt 3 ch. Black failed at move 10.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish with this number, for its interest both as a work of art and an historical memorial, an enlarged reproduction of one of the two medals just designed by Mr. Emil Fuchs in commemoration of the war in South Africa. Our next issue will contain a careful study of the significance of the new School of French poets, by Mr. W. Morton Fullerton.

* * * *

Literary fame did not come early to Charles Dudley Warner, who died the other day at his home in Hartford, Connecticut; but it is some thirty years ago since he made his reputation with "My Summer in a Garden." Once he was a lawyer in Chicago; subsequently a journalist and editor of a Hartford newspaper; but after his first success he wrote volume after volume of essays, novels, and sketches of travel and autobiography. He devoted two books to the "Life and Work of Washington Irving." He acted for some fourteen years as one of the editors of Harper's Magazine, and was, we believe, the only man who ever had the honour of collaborating with "Mark Twain," the result of their joint endeavours being a novel called "The Gilded Age." The "American Men of Letters" Series also owned him as editor, and he himself was worthy of no undistinguished place in that goodly company.

* * * *

Warner's connexion with Harper's Magazine was not only an editorial one. He succeeded Mr. W. D. Howells in the spring of 1892 as writer of the causerie in that magazine under the heading of "The Editor's Study." The succession was interesting as putting a period to Mr. Howells' monthly girdings at romance, and particularly at the taste for romance in this country, which he took for a symptom of our insular backwardness. Mr. Howells, in his valedictory causerie, expressed a fear that the true realistic faith would not be safe in the hands of his successor. He saw in imagination Mr. Warner making the round of the little side altars in the "Editor's Study" and marvelling at the graven images of canonized realists he would find there. He feared they would be cast out of window for a rabble of unnaturalized foreigners from France, Italy, Norway, and the furthermost parts of Spain; and, worst of all, that down might come "that great first of all realists, the supreme artist, the incomparable master of fiction, he with the look of the baffled peasant, the troubled deity, whose plain, sad face was perplexed with the vain endeavour to live some Christlike solution of the painful earth, the august and pathetic image of Tolstoy"—and in its place go up a bust of Thackeray or Scott. Mr. Warner, on taking his place, contented himself with remarking that he ventured to hope that the cause of honesty in literature belonged to no one sect, and he assured Mr. Howells he was not going to throw his deities out of window, even if there were some wooden idols among them.

One of Charles Dudley Warner's claims to be remembered is his attempt to establish, in the United States, a body somewhat resembling our own Society of Authors, but of wider scope. His idea was that one and the same organization might protect literary property, raise the tone of literary men, and educate the public taste in literature. We commented on the enterprise at the time, finding it more interesting than practical, and we have not since heard that anything has come of it. Charles Dudley Warner, however, took a strong line on the subject of international copyright, and if the United States should ever adhere to the Berne Convention, he will be one of those to whom enriched authors will have reason to be grateful.

A correspondent writes as to the late Mr. W. L. Thomas:—"As you say, the turning point in the fortunes of the Graphic came when the Franco-Prussian War broke out, and Mr. Sidney P. Hall, fresh from Oxford, where he had acquired fame by drawing caricatures for Mr. Shrimpton, went out as artist-correspondent. It was, I believe, a picture of the late Dr. Lightfoot of Exeter, as Jupiter kicking Vulcan out of Olympus—an allegorical presentation of the unsuccessful attempt of the Great Western Railway Company to establish 'works' at Oxford—which convinced Mr. Thomas of the young artist's ability. Since then the paper has prospered steadily; and many important novels have appeared serially in its pages—some of them, like 'Tess of the Durbervilles,' in a somewhat expurgated form. Mr. Thomas never edited either of his papers, though he occasionally contributed an article on some subject in which he was interested. When he did so, he used, with characteristic modesty, to request that it might be handed to some member of the staff to 'put right.' His great talent, however, was for management—a talent that was much in evidence in the early days of the Daily Graphic. At one of the birthday dinners of the Daily Graphic, an after-dinner speaker drew a picture of those days. It was a picture of a gloomy staff fearing imminent failure, and Mr. W. L. Thomas sitting on a high stool, with his hat a little on the back of his head, the one man in the company who already saw his way through failure to success, who never lost his temper, and was always ready with suggestions. It was, no doubt, an exaggerated picture, but there was a great deal of truth in it. In many ways Mr. Thomas was a pioneer. He started the fashion of giving away with his paper Christmas pictures by the best artists of the day; and he was always one of the first to perceive the possibilities of the new mechanical processes of reproduction. In connexion with the Daily Graphic he deserves less credit for the idea, which was obvious enough, than for recognizing the psychological moment at which the idea could be turned to profitable account. He had many other spheres of usefulness, being a member of the Council of the Society of Arts and of the Royal Academy of Music, and the originator of the Press Band, which plays during the summer at mid-day in the Embankment-gardens."

* * * *

The Shakespearian performances given by Mr. Benson at the Lyceum last summer drew a happy mean between the spectacular display and the antiquarian experiments of the Elizabethan Stage Society. In more than one quarter the wish was expressed that a company acting up to Mr. Benson's ideals might become more or less permanent. We are glad to hear that he is, at all events, about to return to London in the winter, when he will take up his abode at the Comedy from December 19 to April 9. Only two of the plays in his prospectus are among those which were given in the summer—Richard II. and Hamlet—and the latter will not apparently be given in its entirety as before. The remaining plays promised are The Merry Wives of Windsor, The Taming of the Shrew, The Merchant of Venice, Henry IV., Part II., Coriolanus, and As You Like It. There is no mention of any works by other dramatists than Shakespeare. Is it too much to hope that some day a company, such as Mr. Benson's, may impart more than an antiquarian interest to one or two plays of the other Elizabethans?

* * * *

The late Professor Shuttleworth, among his many activities, religious, philanthropic, and musical, did not forget literature. His premature death entails a serious loss to the Ladies Department of King's College, where he was Lecturer in English Literature. He was not only a man of high culture, but, if we may say so without disrespect either to him or his audience, he was just the man to lecture to ladies. He had an engaging manner which at once attracted them, and gave promise of finding interest and even entertainment in the gravest of literary subjects.

* * * *

As to the reprint of "The Last of the Mohicans," which we noticed recently, a correspondent expresses his regret that the true chronological order of the romances has been neglected in this edition, as it is in most others. It begins with "The Last of the Mohicans" and is to end with "The Pioneers," as though one were to sandwich "The Three Musketeers" between "Twenty Years After" and "The Vicomte de Bragelonne." It is true that Cooper did not write his Leatherstocking tales in their chronological order; "The Deerslayer" was produced fifteen years after its sequel. But the illusion should be preserved as far as possible, and a chronological edition must begin with "The Deerslayer," in which we are introduced to Natty Bumppo, and end with "The Prairie," in which he dies in a fashion that recalls the last moments of Colonel Newcome. The "Mohicans" should follow the "Deerslayer," to which it is a kind of sequel; and "The Pioneers," in which Natty and Chingachgook appear as old men, should immediately precede "The Prairie." "The Pathfinder," a detached study of Natty's manhood, falls naturally into the middle place.

Cooper was the author chosen by Carlyle to illustrate his remark that the true principle of literary finance was to pay authors for the amount they did not write—a variation of the well-known doctrine that speech is silvern, silence golden, which he urged in so many volumes. Publishers have not yet seen their way to adopt that counsel of perfection. If the trades union of authors which Sir Walter Besant seems to desire is ever brought into being, it may be possible to introduce the principle which Carlyle desired. In China it is said that men pay their doctors by the year and deduct a fixed percentage for each day of sickness. So the author by profession might be paid an annual salary and have so much a line deducted for his publications, with the proviso that if he did not publish anything he would be expelled from the union. This is too Utopian a vision; but it is true that the judgment of posterity often achieves the reform that Carlyle wished authors to undertake by themselves. The man who produced a hundred volumes is often given a lower place than he who gave his life to polishing a single work. "One thinks," Carlyle wrote of Cooper in 1838, "had but the hogshead of thin wash, which sours in a week ready for the kennels, been distilled, been concentrated! Our dear Fenimore Cooper might in that way have given us one Natty Leatherstocking, one melodious synopsis of Man and Nature in the West (for it lay in him to do it), almost as a Saint-Pierre did for the islands of the East; and the hundred incoherences, cobbled together hastily by order of Colburn and Company had slumbered in chaos, as all incoherences ought, if possible, to do." The "hundred incoherences" have actually returned to chaos; who can now describe the rig of the Waterwitch or the garb of Hardheart and Tom Coffin? But Natty Bumppo has triumphantly survived; though we do not call him a "melodious synopsis," our opinion of his merits and of his chance of attaining immortality rises year by year. Thackeray, indeed, went so far as to say that he was better than any one in "Scott's lot." We should hesitate to agree with that verdict, but we have no hesitation in agreeing with Thackeray that "La Longue Carabine is one of the great prize-men of fiction. He ranks with your Uncle Toby, Sir Roger de Coverley, Falstaff—heroic figures all—American or British, and the artist has deserved well of his country who devised them."

In Belgium, under the title "Ligue pour le Livre Belge," a society is being founded which, by means of subscriptions, will assure a regular reading public in their own country to Belgian authors. The idea was formulated by M. Jacques de Cressonières, a well-known barrister and professor at the Université Nouvelle, and M. Max Hallet, a prominent Socialist. They have secured the patronage and co-operation of M. Eugene Demolder, author of the "Reine d'Emeraude"; M. Ivan Gilkin, poet and critic; M. Ballat, M. George Eekhard, and nearly all the foremost men of literature and art. "Belgian authors," says M. George Eekhard, "are known only by name and reputation to their countrymen. They are accepted on faith owing to the notoriety or celebrity they have won beyond the Belgian frontier." The new league, which will supplement the lending library and enable the public to buy new works more frequently, numbers among its members names belonging to all parties and tendencies; these will serve as a guarantee of terms of selection, philosophic and aesthetic, without which the society would be a failure.

* * * *

In a recent article in L'Art Moderne M. Demolder proposes to inaugurate the new league with an exhibition of works of modern Belgian writers published within the last quarter of a century. The project has been most favourably received and enlarged upon by the Press. The foremost reviews and magazines are also to be exhibited, together with the original drawings and engravings forming their illustrations. Frontispieces and bindings, editions de luxe, portraits and even caricatures of authors, manuscripts of their works, photographs of their homes and houses are also to be included. Demolder suggests, in addition, a selection of paintings and musical scores originally inspired from the literary works. The newspapers swell the list with further suggestions. Concerts and lectures follow in due course. "The catalogue of the exhibition," justly remarked one journal, "would be a valuable document for the biographical and bibliographical notes and other information it would contain."

Literary Monuments in Churches.

"So long as Westminster Abbey," said the late Dean Stanley, "maintains its hold on the affections or respect of the English Church and nation, so long will it remain a standing proof that there is in the truest feeling of human nature, and in the highest aspirations of religion, something deeper and wider than the partial judgments of the day and the technical distinctions of sects." In Westminster Abbey stands the ancient monument of Chaucer, and hard by it are those other memorials of England's worthies in the contemplation of which Addison, as he has told us in a beautiful passage in the Spectator, passed many a solitary hour. They arouse to-day the same feelings of awe and aspiration, and exercise the same refining influence upon thousands of Englishmen and Americans as they did two hundred years ago upon the meditative essayist. It has been observed that visitors remain longest about the Poets' Corner. Their hearts are touched with a warmer sympathy as they gaze at the memorials, often plain and unadorned, of those among the "famous men" there commemorated who were "wise and eloquent in their instructions" and who "recited verses in writing." An objection has been raised, as we mention elsewhere, on ecclesiastical grounds to the inclusion of purely literary memorials in churches. It applies especially to the proposed systematic erection of memorial windows, such as that just unveiled to the memory of Chaucer in the Cathedral of St. Saviour's, Southwark. Yet, if what Dean Stanley said is true, nothing surely so strengthens the hold which Westminster Abbey retains upon the respect of the nation as its "Poets' Corner." This great and ancient church is the one building which above all others preserves and sanctifies the memory of English writers. It is a similar ideal which inspires the memorials in St. Saviour's, and it is one which can hardly be thought adverse to the interests of true religion. It is difficult to realize what would be lost, not only to the English Church, but to the higher life of the nation generally, if the practice of choosing religious houses as fit places for the commemoration of great men were to fall into desuetude. To those who have seen in the church the proper home for such memorials, whether it be to private persons—like Inigo Jones, whose monument to George Chapman still stands in St. Giles'-in-the-Fields—or to public bodies, we owe the vast collection of monuments which represent the highest and best national spirit. Above those "technical distinctions of sects," which Dean Stanley speaks of, is the reverence for those who, however indirectly, have raised the spiritual life of the nation, whether they be soldiers, statesmen, or writers. They deserve it as much as those who have directly furthered the cause of religion. Estimate the claim to commemoration in a cathedral on the highest possible ground, and Chaucer, it may be argued, has as good a right to it as Laud. If the subject of the Chaucer window be called in question, it may be urged that a portrait of Chaucer in stained glass is at least not more shocking to the religious sense than a statue of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Such a portrait, with a representation of the pilgrims, presents the most obvious method of commemorating the poet. And at any rate we need not forget that the goodly company of the tales were on a religious pilgrimage. The designer of the window has taken far the best and most instructive means of keeping alive the memory of Chaucer—of the first great Englishman who became, in the words of the Poet Laureate, an "uncontroversial evangelist of right feeling and right thinking." After all, the argument of Mr. Alfred Austin in favour of erecting literary memorials, carefully selected of course and properly conceived, in a sacred building is the right one, and it could not have been better stated than it was in the address which he delivered on Thursday. If the Church is not prepared to welcome as true confederates those who, though it be not in ecclesiastical phrase, "inculcate fidelity, hopefulness, charity, deference towards authority, manliness towards men, chivalry towards women, tenderness towards children, loftiness of thought, the lifting up of the heart, the purifying of the soul, reverence, piety, and patriotism," then it will undoubtedly direct its vast influence to weak and narrow uses.

BALLADE OF THE CANTERBURY ROAD.

Through woods in shimmering mist of green,
By streams where rushes rustling sway,
O'er swelling down and dale between
Through festival and holiday,
And all the mirth of wakening May,
With hedges wrapped in hawthorn snow,
Rings out the chime of chaunting gay;
Sweet pilgrims' songs of long ago.

Ah, joyous group! right little teen,
I warrant, had ye by the way;
Small cause for heart-ache, wrath, or spleen,
Mid ballad, round, and sweet virelai
That echoed through the lanes all day
And rang through sunset's fading glow,
Or woke the lark when dawn was grey;
Sweet pilgrims' songs of long ago.

And though long since ye all have been Thrust in the loveless dust away,
Though earth five hundred springs hath seen
And all their pageanted array,
Since rhymed your merriment and play
To chiming bits of palfreys slow,
Your songs still hold grim Time at bay,
Sweet pilgrims' songs of long ago.

ENVOI.

Prince, and all ye who rhyme essay,
Fashions in verse must ebb and flow,
But these stand fast, nor dread decay,
Sweet pilgrims' songs of long ago.

Personal Views.

THE GERMAN SCHOOLBOY.

The difference between the German schoolboy and the English is that the former goes to school to learn and the latter to play. The German father is careful concerning his son's physical welfare, arguing that a healthy body is necessary as the residence of a sound mind. The English father is anxious that his son should not be entirely uneducated, arguing that an active mind is necessary to the support of a sound body. Till six years of age the German lad is left entirely alone, so far as education is concerned. Until he enters school the probability is that he does not even know his letters.

In his extenuation, however, one must remember the German buchstab is not the sort of character to which one would willingly expose the innocence of childhood. It is a cunning, wicked hieroglyphic, its chief ambition to be mistaken for that which it is not. The German man's shrewdness in business, his invulnerability to the wiles of deceit and trickery, I attribute to his early training in the mazes of his own alphabet. The child that at a glance has learnt to tell a German A from a U, and a B from a V, whose eye has been trained to detect the twiddle by which you know that a capital E is in reality a G, who is not to be humbugged by an N pretending it is an R; who knows an "f" from a long "s"; who can pick his way among written "c" and "u" and "m" and "n" and "i"—is not to be taken in, later in life, by the comparatively feeble efforts of the mere human swindler. Teach a boy the German alphabet, and you have fairly prepared him to hold his own through this world of shams and make-believes and affectations. Small wonder that the German parent shuns, so long as may be, introducing his babe to the amazing hypocrisies of the German A, B, C. With knowledge of the German alphabet must necessarily disappear all the simplicity and trustfulness of childhood. So through the happy days of infancy this sad thing is kept away from him. Till six, he exercises merely his limbs and his lungs. Then his evil hour arrives, and for eight years he works; and work in a German school does not leave much leisure for frivolity.

That he is not overworked is proved by the fact that he keeps his health, and that the race does not deteriorate in stature or in stamina. Indeed, German manhood would contrast with Anglo-Saxon rather to our own disadvantage. Little men-figures such as one can meet by the thousand in the streets of any large English town are rare in the Fatherland. Not to speak of the Austrians, who even so far back as the heyday of the Roman Empire were regarded as a giant race, the Prussians and Bavarians must be in height and breadth beyond the average standard of modern manhood—in breadth too often, one fears, sadly beyond. In Germany men of seven feet are as common now as they were when Friedrich the First of Prussia and his son, Friedrich Wilhelm, scoured the Empire for recruits to their famous Potsdam Guards. That so many of them appear men run to seed, if one, without offence, may apply so impolite a simile—flabby and pudgy, is the accidental result of the pernicious national habit of excessive beer-drinking. As young men they show no signs of having sacrificed physical to mental well-being.

But the exact amount of study that the human boy, or shall we say the German boy?—for the Jüngling, quiet, thoughtful, well-behaved, appears by contrast with the youth of other countries a production somewhat unearthly—can be made to accomplish without entailing this sacrifice must have been judged to a nicety. And the State sees to it that that amount and no less its sons shall accomplish. At fourteen or fifteen the German boy leaves the Gymnasium or the Oberrealschule better educated than many of our own young leave their University. He possesses a thorough mastery of his own language, including its complicated grammar—for grammar, in Germany, is not considered as with us an unnecessary acquirement, tending towards priggishness; a knowledge of history, not confined to that of his own country but embracing an acquaintanceship with Weltgeschichte from the Stone Age to the present Rule of Gold; a thorough grounding in mathematics; a grip of elementary science and Naturbeschreibung; an introduction to physic and chemistry; and a familiarity with Christianity, as taught in schools and churches. He knows something of music, and has an understanding of Art. He can play and he can sing. His learning of English and French has not been confined to the irregular verbs, a few rules of grammar, and a certain number of idioms to be repeated parrotwise; it is with him a practical possession. He can speak in those languages, and he can understand them when they are spoken to him. A German schoolboy, if you ask him the way in German, will probably reply to you in English. This is uncomplimentary to your accent, but about that he is indifferent; his desire is for his own advancement. A German schoolboy who picked me up one morning a few months ago on the sands of Blankenberghe was delighted on discovering me to be an Englishman, which happened promptly on my remarking that the new harbour works, considered æsthetically, were hässlich, the pronunciation of which word I never yet have mastered. He waived the question of the War in South Africa, and took me metaphorically to his arms, and for half an hour talked English to me. It was bad English; I think I could have understood his German as well. But that was not his concern. Here, in holiday time, far away from school, an opportunity had occurred to him to improve his English. It was a gift of Providence, and he seized it. Can any one imagine an Eton lad seizing on a similar opportunity to practise his French or German? The German boy is conscientious with a conscientiousness that is uncanny.

Latin is not the fetish in German education that it is with us. In English schools, as some of us know to our cost, two-thirds of a boy's time are practically wasted on a study that is no earthly use to him in after life, that affords him no pleasure, that at the best enables him to enjoy the doubtful privilege of posing occasionally as a superior person. Most of us, thank Heaven, soon get rid of this useless burden of dead knowledge, thereby making room for more living studies. I should like to know how many men of thirty retain any knowledge of Latin, with the exception perhaps of being able to decline "Musa," or conjugate the verb "Amo." In practical Germany, the classics, except through the medium of translation, are deemed useless, except to intending Professors, or to men of exceptional leisure; and the German schoolboy is not troubled with Greek at all, though a purely elementary knowledge of Latin is provided for him, upon which, if he desire, he can later found a further acquaintanceship. All that is aimed at is that he leave school prepared in every way for social and business life. If he belong to the well-to-do classes, he then enters a University, where he remains for four years. The German student is not an industrious young man. He probably feels, and with some justice, that, having been condemned during his boyhood to exceedingly hard labour, he is now entitled in his youth to play somewhat. So with rare exceptions he proceeds to "bummel" through life. Only the exceptionally studious or ambitious think of devoting more than four or five of their eight Semesters to work. Maybe he will travel—for the German University system allows, and indeed encourages, his doing so—perfecting himself in modern languages. Or maybe he has a yearning towards Culture or Science. But generally speaking he is practical in his educational ideals, only studying with energy such subjects as are necessary to his career. Socially, he feels he is already sufficiently equipped, and his real duties would appear to lie rather in the direction of the Mensur and the Kneipe.

But this is apart from my subject, which is that of the German schoolboy, and not of the German student. He is an industrious little chap, studying as he stands on the stehplatz of the electric tram that takes him to and fro to the mid-day meal; poring over his books even in the short quarter of an hour's interval. His heart is in his work. In Germany there is a deadly earnestness about this question of Education, and the German boy himself has caught the prevailing enthusiasm. Carlyle described school as a walled-in space in which you imprison boys and then throw books at them. The German school-man, to do him justice, has made endeavour to deserve this reproach no longer. Not merely that a man knows, but that he shall be able to impart—two very different things—is required of him. It is deemed essential that he shall be able to make study interesting. In Churches and in Picture Galleries one meets whole classes, headed by the master. The principles of architecture are better taught by every boy putting on his hat and trotting round to the Cathedral, where, the actual thing in front of his eyes, it is explained to him. Picture Galleries are held to help not only Art but the acquirement of history. The German Schoolmaster would shock your confirmed artist by his appreciation of "subject." From his point of view a badly-painted "Entry of Charles V. into Ghent" is much to be preferred to the most perfectly-silhouetted ginger-beer bottle ever "projected" upon canvas. Not chiaroscuro, not solidity of shadow, not perfection of symbol is what the German Schoolmaster demands of art, but historically correct costume, and true representation of armoury and domestic utensil of the period. On misty days in autumn, to take an example, the schoolboy of the Black Forest is marched to the peak of some high hill. From there geography is taught him. It is pointed out to him that he stands upon an Island completely surrounded by the mist, which for the purposes of this comedy has had handed to it the part of water, which it plays with much success. The twin rivers of mist on either side of him, filling both valleys, are, for him, estuaries; the spur of mountain opposite is a peninsula. He descends, it is certain, with geographical ideas in his head that could never have been put there by mere maps hanging upon a wall.

The German boy is taught to regard Education not as a thing limited by hours, but as the business of his day—to dismiss play altogether from his mind. Neither boy nor man, it is maintained, can serve two masters. As bearing upon this part of the argument, I may mention that I have a little friend, a German, whose parents are enthusiastic admirers of all things English. A little while ago they removed him from the school in Germany, where he was promising to make himself ill by over application to study, and placed him in an English public school. He is still as enthusiastic, as eager as ever. But it is for play, not for work. His desire, as it was in Germany, is to be top of his division. But now it is to be top in cricket and in football, in racing and in rowing. This one case proves the German argument, if any argument were needed. Only the exceptional boy can possess the super-abundant vitality necessary for distinction in two paths leading to utterly opposite goals. Admirable Crichtons are not to be had for the asking. The Germans say, Work first, play afterwards; boyhood for study, youth for sport. The consequence is that the German schoolboy, by comparison, appears out of school hours dull and uninteresting. His small mind is troubled with the misbehaviour of the Huns, anxious concerning the problem of the Asses' Bridge. His play in holiday time, and holiday time only—for while school is sitting bed appeals more to his leisure than exercise, and small wonder—may seem to Anglo-Saxon eyes childish. He has learnt no sport, and has therefore little else beyond his own childish instinct for make-believe with which to amuse himself. So soon as this departs from him he becomes a miniature man, a quaint figure in the Café, his tiny face almost hidden behind his huge glass of beer. He is grave, courteous, and generally a little tired. His chief wish would appear to be to do those things that he ought to do, and to carefully shun those things that he ought not to do. He keeps to the path, reads and obeys religiously all police notices and warnings, avoids the seats in the park reserved for grown-up people, plays only with the sand provided by the Government for his amusement. Nowadays, it is true, he is beginning to indulge a little more in sport. In holiday time he may be seen conscientiously practising the "outside edge," riding his bicycle round flower-beds; for whatever his small hand finds to do it is desirous to do it thoroughly. On the whole he is a lovable little chap. One feels sorry for him that he has to work so hard. But he is quite willing. He has convinced himself that it is good for him, and that for him is all-sufficient.

CHAUCER AND ST. SAVIOUR'S, SOUTHWARK.

The Chaucer Celebrations.

London recognized Chaucer's claim, on the 500th anniversary of his death, to special remembrance in the City, "that is to mee so deare and sweete," and The Chaucer made an effort, against somewhat adverse circumstances, to do full honour to his memory.

Many have visited the British Museum to view the unrivalled Chaucer collection, arranged in the King's library some months before—though few people were aware of the fact until recently—but the bronze bust of the poet which the Corporation lately ordered for the Guildhall will probably not be ready until next year, and the Chaucer dinner of the Whitefriars' Club, which was to have taken place this week, has been postponed until next month. Mr. Clement Shorter is to take the chair, and Dr. Furnivall, who is to be the guest of the evening, will deal with the "Modern Spirit in the Canterbury Tales." The ceremonious commemoration of this week's anniversary, therefore, was confined to the opening of the Chaucer window in St. Saviour's Collegiate Church, Southwark, by the Poet Laureate. The window is a very handsome memorial, with a portrait of Chaucer in the upper part of the light, and below it a representation of the Canterbury Pilgrims starting on their famous journey from the Tabard Inn, in the Borough.

Mr. Alfred Austin, who unveiled the window, dwelt on Chaucer as "the first great personality in our history who stands before us as representing what is now felt by us all to be the English type of character and intellect"—English in his burly love of the fresh open air, and English in his jovial humour.

> Not hitherto indicated so far as I know, but I think equally true, is the practical temperament and capacity of the first great English poet! You know something about that here, for was not Chaucer Controller of the Customs in the port of London, as, moreover, he was the Parliamentary representative for Kent, Clerk of the King's Works at Windsor, the confidant of rulers, warriors, and statesmen, a soldier in France, a diplomatist in Italy? In my humble opinion no man can be, or ever became, a really great poet who could not have been a successful man of affairs, a methodical administrator, a sagacious statesman, aye a victorious general, or a circumspect and impressive Archbishop. Whether it is their limited possession of the practical temperament that has hindered the Celtic race, which has produced so many beautiful poets, from producing, to speak with accuracy, a really great poet, a poet of the first class, I will not presume to say. But I believe it is because of the fundamentally practical, weighty, massive element in the English character and intellect that England has given birth to the greatest poets, and the greatest number of them. Another reflection that has occurred to me is one of profound satisfaction that a poet like Chaucer—a poet not pre-eminently distinguished for dogmatic fervour, as was Milton for instance, or for all-pervading piety as, say, was Wordsworth, but a poet ostensibly and for the most part mundane, a man like the rest of us with the not unusual characteristics of a man, sometimes serious, sometimes playful, at times even jocose and perhaps almost profane, but, as I should be prepared to maintain, fundamentally religious in the true signification of the word, and deeply convinced and profoundly conscious of spiritual dignity and moral duty—should be accorded an unqualified welcome in this sacred edifice. That, if I may presume to say so, in such a place, and before such an audience, is as it should be. A now much loved and revered statesman of our time, whose confidence and friendship are abiding reminiscences for any who enjoyed them, was once assailed with no little ridicule because he declared that he was "on the side of the angels." I venture to affirm that all really great poets are on the side of the angels; for the distinguishing mark of the really great poets is wisdom, and no one is wise who has not a deep-seated and loving belief in the efficacy and necessity of virtue. The merely lyrical note which every poet must possess, for without it he may be anything else you like, but he cannot be a poet, is, nevertheless, though an essential, withal a rudimentary element in his art. But, as the thoughtful old scholastics would have said, "rudiments" is the designation of the lowest class in the scale of education and accomplishment. To the highest but one they gave the name of poetry, to the highest of all the proud title of philosophy. The great poet, in his progressive advance in training and achievement, perforce becomes a philosopher or a lover of wisdom, in other words, one who sees and understands, and who weds the spell of the only universal knowledge of which man is capable to the insinuating magic of sonorous and mellifluous harmony. The Church would itself indeed lack wisdom if it failed to appreciate such confederates as these, and would gratuitously divest itself of much of its power did it hesitate to extend to them the sanction of its tenderness and its charity. For poets are the uncontroversial evangelists of right feeling and right thinking—a truth Plato must surely have had more or less conspicuously before him when he said that poetry should consist, for the most part, of hymns to the gods and praises of virtue. Equally with, and sometimes perhaps yet more persuasively than, avowed and formal moralists, great poets inculcate fidelity, hopefulness, charity, deference towards authority, manliness towards men, chivalry towards women, tenderness for children, loftiness of thought, the lifting up of the heart, the purifying of the soul, reverence, piety, and patriotism. Chaucer, intelligently read and sympathetically understood, even in his most humorous and seemingly worldly moments inculcates all of these, though he is rarely an express moralist, and never a dogmatist. He is too clear and penetrating in his vision, too lucid and definite in his expression, to dogmatize. To some that may sound like a paradox. But let them think of it frankly and fearlessly and it will cease to seem such. There is, there necessarily can be, nothing more indefinite than dogma, more especially concerning the greatest and most important of all subjects; for these can by no possibility and by no effort of mind or language be clearly and accurately defined. At best, they can be apprehended but as in a glass darkly. That is why the great poets, themselves so undogmatic, are the allies of, nay, are themselves, ministers of God. That is why the wise, indulgent, comprehensive, truly Catholic Anglican Church says to poets in turn, Come to me, who offer you an all-embracing welcome. Come to me as others come, when you desire to proclaim and ratify the central and enduring love of your life. When, finally, you put off this muddy vesture of decay, and say, as Chaucer said,

> Forth, pilgrim, forth; forth, beast, out of thy stall,
> Look up on high and thank the God of all!

Come and let what was mortal of you repose within my precincts, and your immortal past be commemorated on my walls, and shine, as Chaucer shines, in the dim religious light of the exquisite window it is my privilege to unveil to-day. Shall I be thought to be travelling beyond the duty you have imposed on me if I add that it behoves us all, more especially in these days, to help to silence every note of discord within a Church that can remain National only by maintaining its traditional charter of comprehensiveness, and by continuing to proclaim that its mission is not to exclude but to include, not to ban but to bless, and, among its other notes of catholicity, to associate with the piety of the Saints the wisdom of the Poets?

Literary Memories of St. Saviour's.

The Poet Laureate's eloquent appeal should be read in connexion with an objection which has been raised to the series of memorials to which the Chaucer window belongs, on the ground that literary subjects are out of place in ecclesiastical art. Without discussing the religious side of the question it seems inappropriate to bring such an argument forward in the case of St. Saviour's Church, whose history is full of literary associations and whose books abound in references to the poets and players who lived and died in the Liberty of the Clink, when Bankside, hard by, was the home of the Show Folk. To neglect the poets now would be a poor return for the generosity of Gower, who helped so materially towards the restoration of the Priory Church of St. Mary Overies, as it was then called, 500 years ago. The essentially Moral Gower, who deserves more, perhaps, than any other Southwark worthy the window which in due course is to be there placed to his memory, was laid to rest in the tomb which he had prepared for the purpose in St. Mary Overies, where, we are told, "he lieth right sumptuously buried, with a garland in his hand in token that he, in his life-daies, flourished freshly in literature and science." The prayers which he wrote for his soul can still be read on his monument:—

> En toy qui es Filz de Dieu le Père
> Sauvé soit qui gist sous cest pierre.

The tomb was afterwards removed to the south transept, but restored to its original position when the building was reconstructed by the late Sir Arthur Blomfield a few years ago, to be converted into the cathedral church of the Diocese of Southwark.

The Elizabethan Drama.

Shakespeare, Edmund Spenser, and Beaumont and Fletcher already have their memorial windows in the church; Goldsmith and Johnson, besides Gower and others, are to follow. In Shakespeare's time the connexion between St. Saviour's and the drama was of the closest kind. Edmund Shakespeare, the poet's youngest brother, a player, was buried here in 1607, in his twenty-eighth year, "with a forenoone knell of the great bell." Shakespeare himself—for the church was in close proximity to the Globe Theatre—lived for some years close by. Beaumont and Fletcher were his near neighbours, living a common life until they parted in 1613, Beaumont to get married—and to die but two or three years afterwards—Fletcher to enter into his literary partnership with Philip Massinger. When Fletcher died of the Plague of 1625, just nine years after the death of Beaumont, he was buried somewhere in St. Saviour's Church, or churchyard, to be followed in 1639, by the unfortunate Massinger, "a stranger"—meaning that he belonged to some other parish. Massinger was buried at the expense of the parish—in the same grave as Fletcher, according to Sir Aston Cokaine in his "Epitaph on Mr. John Fletcher and Mr. Philip Massinger."

Goldsmith and Johnson.

It was on Bankside, 100 years or so later, that Goldsmith made a shift to live by a "very little practice as a physician and a very little reputation as a poet." This was after his early wanderings on the Continent and his experience as assistant to a chemist on Fish-street-hill, and just before he became a schoolmaster at Peckham. Dr. Johnson's claim to a memorial window in Southwark is based, of course, on his connexion with Mr. and Mrs. Thrale, whose town house, when they owned the brewery which is now the property of Messrs. Barclay, Perkins, and Co., stood within a short distance of the site of the old Globe Theatre on Bankside. Here they entertained Dr. Johnson and their other friends, as well as at their country house at Streatham. Reference was made in last week's Literature to the help which Dr. Johnson gave to Mr. Thrale during his Parliamentary campaign in Southwark, and another good story of the Doctor's association with the brewery is worth repeating. Johnson, as one of the executors, was present at the sale of the brewery, which took place by auction upon the death of Mr. Thrale in 1781. The story as told by Lord Lucan, if not precisely exact (writes Boswell), is, at least, characteristic. While the sale was going on Johnson appeared bustling about with an ink-horn and a pen in his button-hole like an exciseman, and on being asked what he considered to be the value of the property to be disposed of answered, "Sir, we are not here to sell a parcel of boilers and vats, but the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice."

Cruden, Bunyan, and Sacheverell.

One of the windows still to come is in memory of Cruden, of the "Concordance," who was buried in the burial ground of a Dissenting congregation in Deadman's-place, now, like the site of the Globe Theatre and other glories of the past, swallowed up by the brewery. On November 1st will be the 130th anniversary of Cruden's death, and the suggestion has been made that the window might be very suitably dedicated on that date. We believe, however, that there is no likelihood of the window being ready this year. If scholarship and genius should be accompanied by piety to entitle a man to a memorial window in St. Saviour's, then Cruden, at least, has earned his place. True, his eccentricities made it necessary occasionally to place him under restraint, but his religion was so real, and his motives, even as "Alexander the Corrector," so simple and sincere, that his memory, on that score alone, deserves to be treated with respect. John Bunyan has already been included in the series of memorials at St. Saviour's; the Bishop of Rochester dedicated a window to his memory only a week or so ago. At one time Bunyan preached at a chapel at Zoar-street, close by, and the cost of the window—£85—was subscribed by the children of the diocese. It may seem a trifle incongruous when the series is complete, to discover the Puritan tinker of Bedford in company with the arrogant Dr. Sacheverell, but it is not surprising to find that the close connexion which existed in the early part of last century between the High Church champion and St. Saviour's is to be commemorated by one of the four windows which remain to be completed. Sacheverell became chaplain of St. Saviour's in 1705, four years before he preached the violent Assize sermon at Derby and the St. Paul's sermon on "The Perils of False Brethren both in Church and State," which led to his impeachment before the House of Lords and to the overthrow of the Ministry which brought him to trial. It was in St. Saviour's, on Palm Sunday, 1713, after his term of imprisonment had expired, that Sacheverell delivered his sermon on "The Christian Triumph and the duty of praying for enemies."

Chaucer's Tabard.

The old Tabard Inn of Chaucer's time—to return to the quin-centenary celebrations—was in existence as late as the beginning of the 17th century, but nothing remained of the original building when the inn was demolished in 1871. Sir Walter Besant, in his book on "South London," from which, by permission of Messrs. Chatto and Windus, we take our illustration of the inn, shows what pilgrims and pilgrimages meant in the 14th century. "Part of the business of the Tabard, and of other inns of Southwark, was to organize and conduct such a party to Canterbury and back. As the ships licensed to carry pilgrims charged so much for the voyage there and back, including the visit to the shrine, so the Host of the Tabard charged so much for conducting and entertaining the party there and back again." The Tabard (Sir Walter subsequently explains) was named after the ornamented coat or jacket worn by Kings at coronations, and by heralds or even by ordinary persons.

SUDERMANN'S NEW PLAY.

A spark of heathendom smoulders in us all. It comes down from the times of the old Teutons and has outlasted the centuries. Once in the year it bursts into flame, and then we call it "Johannisfeuer." One night in the year is free—yes, free. Then, with jeering laughter, the witches ride up to the Blocksberg on broomsticks, the same broomsticks with which their witchcraft is at other times thrashed out of them; then the wild hunt sweeps through the forest; then awaken in our hearts the wild wishes which life has not fulfilled and, be it clearly understood, dared not fulfil.

In these words from the toast which the hero of Herr Sudermann's new drama, Johannisfeuer (Schauspiel in vier Akten; Stuttgart, Cotta 1900, 2m.), proposes on Midsummer Night lie the significance and kernel of the work. The bonfires with which the old heathen festival is still commemorated in East Prussia throw their lurid glare across the piece. They are "the ghosts of our stifled wishes, the red plumage of the birds of paradise which we might perhaps have cherished all our lives long, but which have flown away from us."

The play opens on the eve of a wedding. George von Hartwig, a Königsberg builder, is about to marry his cousin, Trude Vogelreuter. He is a man of sturdy and independent character and, in spite of the fact that his father had ended as a bankrupt and a suicide, has worked his way up to a good position in life. He suffers, however, under the sense of obligation to his uncle, to whom he owes his bringing up and education. With all his kindness, Vogelreuter has not much consideration for his nephew's sensitiveness on this point, and on the eve of the wedding uncle and nephew almost come to an open quarrel on the question of Trude's dowry, which George is unwilling to accept. In the Vogelreuter household there is another person who stands in a similar position—Marikke. One winter night in 1867—a year still remembered in East Prussia for its severity—a Lithuanian beggar had thrown herself and her baby before Vogelreuter's sleigh; the child was adopted by the kind-hearted squire, while the mother, a thief and a drunkard, drags from prison to prison, a constant menace to the Vogelreuter family. Marikke meanwhile has become the good fairy, the "cricket" (Heimchen), of the household: with unwearied hands she controls and manages everything. She even takes upon herself to make journey after journey to Königsberg to prepare the new home for the young couple. In earlier days she and Hartwig had loved each other, but in a dumb, unconscious way; now, on Midsummer Night (Johannisnacht), this passion flames up like the bonfires on the hillsides; the heathendom in both their natures asserts itself. With that instinct for theft which has come to her from her mother Marikke steals the love that belongs to her foster-sister. But the "Johannisfeuer" burns only one night in the year; with daylight the intoxication disappears. The lovers recognize that life cannot be lived by the unholy glare of heathen fires. Marikke renounces the claims to Hartwig which the Midsummer Night had given her, and he marries his Trude.

Such is briefly the story of Johannisfeuer. That such a play should meet with unanimous favour in the theatre was hardly to be expected, and the reports of the first performances in Berlin, in Dresden, and Amsterdam show that Herr Sudermann has not this time won an unchallenged success. George von Hartwig, we feel, might have been made plausible in the more leisurely style of a novel, but he is too problematic to be a convincing stage hero; Marikke, too, a figure with some of the heathen grandeur of Regina in Der Katzensteg, is difficult to reconcile with the Christian self-effacement she shows in the last act. One expected to find heathendom and Christianity brought into a more serious conflict with each other; one felt that the playing with "Midsummer Night Fire" ought to have had more tragic consequences than a little heartsore and passive resignation. It is almost as if Herr Sudermann had shrunk, as he has not shrunk since his first play, Die Ehre, from the ruthless consequences that follow—not perhaps always in life, but always in art—on the heels of a conflict with established law and order.

But although the compromising dénouement of Johannisfeuer jeopardized the theatrical success of the play, in details and workmanship it will hold its own with Sudermann's best work. Johannisfeuer is the most satisfying work Herr Sudermann has given us since Das Glück im Winkel. Partly in Morituri, wholly in Johannes and Die drei Reiherfedern, he was feeling his way to a higher, more spiritual and poetic kind of drama than that with which he won his great successes; but none of these poetic plays was altogether successful. Now he has returned to the ground where he is most at home, to the firm ground of the East Prussia of to-day, the scene of his novels; but he has not returned empty-handed from these excursions into the higher poetic drama. There is a finer spirituality, a more poetic symbolism in the ideas on which Johannisfeuer is built up than there is in any other of his plays of contemporary life. Certainly in none of them is the East Prussian flavour so fresh and convincing as here. With the exception of the hero and his bride, the characters have all more of the soil than we are accustomed to find in Herr Sudermann's dramatic work; his Hilfsprediger Haffke in particular is one of the very best figures he has ever created. One need only compare Haffke with the moralizing Heffterdingk in Heimat to see how Sudermann has advanced in these years. Only once in Johannisfeuer, as far as we remember, does Herr Sudermann fall back into the old theatrically-effective style that he learned ten years ago from Dumas fils, and that is, where he makes Haffke moralize to Marikke in the last act on "the melody that runs through all our lives."

If Johannisfeuer, compared with the cosmopolitan success of Heimat ("Magda"), must be regarded as a failure, it is at least an honourable failure; it is altogether a finer, more genuinely poetic piece of work. And it is in dramas of this type rather than in tragedies in verse like The Three Heron Feathers that Hermann Sudermann seems to us most likely to enrich the German stage with enduring works.

THE DRAMA.

"THE NOBLE LORD."

Corsica has been recently described by Mr. Seton Merriman as the island in which "they do nothing restlessly." That description would fit Captain Marshall's Criterion farce, The Noble Lord. People flit on and off the stage, but nothing is done. That is to say, while the figures move the farce does not. A lady is wooed by three gentlemen at once and promises her hand to each in turn. She shilly-shallies for three acts while each of the gentlemen has his own way of hinting to his rivals that "two's company," &c. When the time comes for the audience to catch the last suburban trains the lady makes up her mind to marry the man whom she was bound to marry all along. Granted that farce, being the lowest, is the most lawless of all dramatic kinds; but there is one law which even farce must obey—the law of development, of progression by cumulative interest; and through its failure to observe this law Captain Marshall's farce is a little dull. Then, in compounding it, he has missed the right admixture of the real and the unreal. For his heroine's three suitors he chooses, if you please, the Prime Minister of England, the leader of the Opposition, and the leader of the Irish party. Now you cannot play with these titles as though they were counters. There are not half-a-dozen men who are possible Premiers or Opposition or Irish leaders, and they are all known. It follows that Captain Marshall's people, who would be proper game for the satirist, are not suited to the purposes of the farce-writer. For the farce-writer wants the generalized type, and here we cannot get that, for we cannot dismiss certain actual individuals from our minds. There is not room for the imagination to play in. We see Mr. Arthur Bourchier, for instance, labelled Prime Minister of England, but as he is not in the least like any one on the list which we know to exhaust the number of possible Prime Ministers, we do not get even the minimum of illusion which is requisite for farce. Captain Marshall has, I fancy, foreseen this difficulty, and endeavours to meet it by making his Premier remark to the leader of the Opposition that they are, of course, just ordinary men after all. But this won't do. If we were in presence of two statesmen of this rank and found (as possibly we should find) that they were just ordinary men after all, the discovery would be interesting. But it is not interesting to find an ordinary man, labelled Prime Minister, driven to account for his failure to justify the label by admitting that he is only an ordinary man. Or put it in dialogue.

> Mr. Bourchier.—Please imagine me to be the Prime Minister.
> Audience.—We cannot; you are obviously an ordinary man.
> Mr. B.—Well, a Prime Minister is an ordinary man.
> A.—Yes, but an ordinary man cannot persuade us, by the mere fact that he is ordinary, that he is Prime Minister.

There is, of course, the same difficulty in The Price of Peace, Mr. Raleigh's melodrama, at Drury Lane. In that play the Prime Minister of England is shown as a political assassin, and, as illusion is in the circumstances impossible, we are not thrilled. As illusion is impossible in Captain Marshall's farce we find it difficult to be amused.

The amusement of the farce must be sought elsewhere, in the fibs and jokes of the naughty little intriguer played by Miss Annie Hughes, and in the plain-spoken Marchioness, who is, I take it, nearly related to the Duchess in Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie. There is a scene wherein the Marchioness interrupts a meeting of New Women, which strongly recalls the second act of M. Pailleron's play wherein the Duchess interrupts a meeting of précieuses. In The Noble Lord all the political people rendezvous at a Scotch country house as they did in Mr. Pinero's Cabinet Minister, and there a Scotch marriage ceremony is performed as it is in Mr. Barrie's Wedding Guest. Obviously there has been no plagiarism, but the inevitable reminiscences of the audience are bound to impair its pleasure. Captain Marshall has done some really fresh and ingenious work in farce. His Excellency was a capital fantasy, and A Royal Family was nearly as good. If, then, we are disappointed with The Noble Lord, we may fall back on the reasonable expectation that the author will do better next time.

Reviews.

CROMWELL.

OLIVER CROMWELL. By the Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P., Hon. D.C.L. and LL.D. (Macmillan. 10s.)

All who read Mr. Morley's latest book will rejoice that he was not deterred from continuing it on learning that such "heroes of research" as Dr. Gardiner and Mr. Firth were first in the field. Such a career as Cromwell's is capable, as he says, "of endless presentment and interpretation." And there is, indeed, ample room for a work which combines a philosophic grasp of events with the graces of style for which its author has long been famous. It is more than a life of Cromwell; it is rather a monograph on the whole period of the Revolution, which will be read with pleasure and profit by men of all shades of opinion, whether or no they accept its conclusions. They will find in it a refreshing frankness and directness of view, a freedom from prepossession—one may almost say from prejudice—which has been conspicuously absent from some recent books on the subject. Mr. Morley brushes aside at starting as hardly germane to his theme the lawyers' question "whether the real Conservative on the old lines of the Constitution was not King Charles himself." But he is fair-minded enough to add:—"Just as the historic school has come to an end that despatched Oliver Cromwell as a hypocrite, so we are escaping from the other school that dismissed Charles as a tyrant, Laud as a driveller and bigot, and Wentworth as an apostate." He gives us a striking and mainly just picture of the King's evil genius, the Queen. Yet his estimate of Charles will appear to many as unduly harsh. Who that has read of his efforts to save Strafford and his grief at signing his death-warrant could write, "In Charles himself, whether for foe or friend, an Eliot or a Strafford, pity was a grace unknown"?

Mr. Morley spends much rhetoric on the attempted arrest of the five members, which he calls "a daring outrage on law, faith, and honour," while he describes the King's attendants on that occasion as "ruffiers" and "baffled cut-throats." But he does not often let himself go in this fashion. Though in less vehement language (and with no opprobrious terms for the Roundhead musketeers), he condemns almost as severely the over-awing, the purging, and the forcible expulsion of the Long Parliament; and the same conscientious impartiality is displayed throughout the book. Part of his character of Laud deserves to be quoted; its truth will hardly be denied by the most fervent admirer of the pragmatical Archbishop:

> Churchmen in all ages are divided into those on the one hand who think most of institutions, and those on the other who think most of the truths on which the institutions rest and of the spirit that gives them life. Laud was markedly of the first of these two types, and even of that doctrinal zeal that passed for spiritual unction in those hot times he had little. . . . "He had few vulgar or private vices," says a contemporary, "and, in a word, was not so much to be called bad as unfit for the State of England." He was unfit for the State of England because, instead of meeting a deep spiritual movement with a missionary inspiration of his own, he sought no saintlier weapons than oppressive statutes and persecuting law Courts. . . . Persecution has often won in human history; often has a violent hand dashed out the lamp of truth. But the Puritan exodus to New England was a signal—and no statesman ought to have misread it—that new forces were arising, and would require far sharper persecution to crush them than the temper of the nation was likely to endure.

It is to Mr. Morley's honour that he strongly censures the execution of Laud; and in condemning the treatment of Naylor, the Quaker, under the Protectorate, he remarks how "little there was to choose between the spirit of Laud and the hard hearts of the people who cut off Laud's head."

Of the character and aims of Strafford Mr. Morley gives, in our opinion, a far juster estimate than has lately been in fashion. But it is amusing to find that, in his view, the Deputy's chief merit consisted in the way in which he made all parties feel the weight of his hand. After describing with relish a scene with the Irish clergy, which vividly recalls the hectoring of his Parliament by Henry VIII., Mr. Morley adds:—"This marks precisely the type of man required to deal with ecclesiastics and rapacious nobles alike. The English colonist and his ecclesiastical confederate and ally were the enemy, and nobody has ever seen this so effectually as Strafford saw it." Whether the Englishman in England should be treated on different principles from the Englishman in Ireland Mr. Morley does not explain; but in dealing with the hero of his sketch it is not the iron hand or the "mailed fist" which especially attracts him. He evidently distrusts "those impatient and importunate deifications of Force, Strength, Violence, Will, which only show how easily hero-worship may glide into effrontery." He deplores as "one of the harshest ironies of history" the fact that Cromwell's name has "become the favourite symbol of the shallow faith that force is the only remedy." Yet he unwillingly admits elsewhere that there is some foundation for this view. After praising Cromwell's high ideals, his pure ambition, his sense that government must depend upon moral as well as political forces, he adds:—"Yet it can hardly be accident that has turned him into one of the idols of the school who hold, shyly as yet in England but nakedly in Germany, that might is a token of right, and that the strength and power of the State is an end that tests and justifies the means."

We must find room for an extract from Mr. Morley's eloquent summary of the Protector's career:—

> He made what some of the best of his contemporaries thought dire mistakes; he forsook many principles in his choice of means, which he intended to preserve in working out the end; and many of his difficulties were of his own creation. Yet watchfulness, self-effacement, versatility, and resource for the time and on the surface repaired all, and as "constable of the parish" his persistency was unfaltering and unmatched.
> In the harder task of laying the foundations of a deeper order that might be expected to stand after his own imperious control should be withdrawn he was beaten. He hardly counted on more. . . He reared no dam nor bulwark strong enough to coerce either the floods of revolutionary faction or the reactionary tides that came after.

Mr. Morley gives us a very brief but most valuable sketch of the leading events of the war. But it is when he reaches the tortuous negotiations which followed it, the tragedy at Whitehall, the campaign in Ireland, and the various political shifts of the Protectorate that his narrative seems to thrill with a new, almost a personal, interest. It is a surprise to find him warmly praising Cromwell's attempt in 1647 to form an alliance between the King and the Army. No one has shown more clearly than himself that the real aims of the two were wide as the Poles apart. Instead of canting about the King's duplicity in treating with both parties, he says, with his usual fairness:—"Each side sought to use him, and from his own point of view he had a right to strike the best bargain he could with either."

Mr. Morley expressly acknowledges that the cause of the King's ruin lay as much in his position as in his character. In truth, that position was between the two mill-stones of the Army and the Parliament; and it was from the former, the upper mill-stone, that at last the ruin came. In discussing his trial and execution, Mr. Morley says nothing particularly new. He agrees that there was no answer to Charles' contention that "that was no Court and that he was there by no law"; why then should his insistence on this point be styled "unmeaning iteration"? Mr. Morley, seems, however, to adopt the defence that the proceeding was an act of war, and, as such, as defensible as the war itself. Yet it is scarcely an open question, we think, whether, if Lord Roberts had captured Krüger and shot him after three years of treating followed by a summary Court-martial, Mr. Morley would have accepted this defence. And he does not see that the suggestion that it was a case of "my head or thy head" places the leaders of the Army in a very unheroic light. It means that they committed a deed which set reconciliation and good government further off than ever merely in order to save their own necks. It means that they were really afraid of their own captive; and though the excuse may contain more truth than we know, it hardly deserves to be ranked as an apology.

Mr. Morley's judgment on the massacres in Ireland was not likely to be a lenient one. He speaks elsewhere of Cromwell's "freedom from revengeful temper"; but how he reconciles this description with the General's plea that he took "a righteous vengeance" for the outrages of 1641 we are at a loss to see. Mr. Morley shows that the garrisons at Drogheda and Wexford were partly English and Protestant; and he makes short work with the contention that the butchery prevented further effusion of blood. Few will dissent from the strictures with which he closes his review of Cromwell's Irish policy:—"A Puritan, armed with a musket and the Old Testament, attempting to reconstruct the foundations of a community mainly Catholic, was sure to end in clumsy failure, and to this clumsy failure no appreciation of Oliver's greatness should blind rational men."

Nor does Mr. Morley blind himself, as so many historians have done, to the pure absolutism of the successive experiments in government under the Protectorate. The first, he says, "was a near approach to a Monarchical system very like that which Strafford would have set up for Charles, or which Bismarck two hundred years later set up for the King of Prussia"—the difference being that Cromwell tried to conceal from himself the military foundations of his power. If so, he failed altogether to conceal it from the nation; and Mr. Morley is right in thinking that this experience of the supremacy of an Army, even with a General of the best intentions for dictator, was burned into the memory of England for a century to come. The stock defence is that the Protector saved her from worse evils by bridging over a period of anarchy, and, though this is true, the subsequent unpopularity of Puritanism as a ruling idea is scarcely a sign of her gratitude.

One of the most interesting chapters of the book is that called "Puritanism and the Double Issue," in which, among other high topics, Mr. Morley examines the Calvinistic doctrine of fatalism. He is at no pains to conceal his want of sympathy with Puritanism as an active force in politics, though he respects its high ideals of conduct, and also that very unworldliness which gave to it its supreme strength. There is a touch of cynicism in some of his expressions which is not unlikely to give offence, as, for instance, where he speaks of the "lyric excitement" of Cromwell's accumulation of texts before the Little Parliament, or where he characterizes the phrase "according as Providence should direct us" as "the formula of mystic days for modern opportunism." In speaking of the crisis which preceded the expulsion of the Rump, he says, "When it was known that the Army was again waiting on God and confessing its sinfulness things were felt to look grave"; and in describing Cromwell's share in the work his comment is, "He waited for the in-dwelling voice, and more than once in the rough tempests of his life that daimonic voice was a blast of coarse and uncontrolled fury." From first to last Mr. Morley will not admit the least imputation upon his hero's sincerity; but, if we mistake not, he holds the view that Cromwell was often the victim of self-deception, even when he most firmly believed himself to be following Divine guidance.

The reader will find numerous happy instances in the book of Mr. Morley's turn for epigram. He tells us that Cromwell was never much of a democrat, but "the same may be said of many, if not most, of those whom democracy has used to do its business." He speaks of the concoction of a Second Chamber as "the pons asinorum of democracy"; and in alluding to the ejection of Puritan Ministers on August 24, 1662, he calls St. Bartholomew "the patron saint of Christian enormities." He compares the indignation meeting of the Army at Saffron Walden in 1647 to "the processings of a modern trades union in the reasonable stages of a strike." And, finally, the picture which is brought to his mind by Oliver at the head of his Council Board, plotting to seize the West Indies, is that of "so many hearty Corsairs, with pistols, cutlasses, and boarding-cups, revolving their plans in the cabin of the Red Rover or Paul Jones' Ranger." These lighter features of the book will assuredly add to its popularity, and we confidently predict for it an unqualified and richly-merited success.

DIANE DE POITIERS.

MADAME DAME DIANNE DE POYTIERS, DUCHESSE DE VALENTINOIS. A Monograph. By MARIE HAY. Illustrated. (J. and E. Bumpus.)

A more fascinating subject than that chosen by Miss Marie Hay could hardly be imagined. In binding, printing, and illustration the book is almost all that the most fastidious critic could demand. The reader really can be said to lack nothing except the matured judgment of character and the wealth of curious detail which he will expect and will not find in the book before us. The writer's style needs a little pruning here and there, but it is with more essential matters that we prefer to deal; for a lady who has the taste to discover, and the ingenuity to present, so much that is novel and interesting to the English public cannot be allowed to imagine that if she writes another "monograph" it will be accepted with the indulgence that this fine exterior will claim, in many cases, for "Dianne."

Her estimate of Diane's character is far from being in accordance with known facts. If we suggest that many little essential points have been omitted, it is only with the object of convincing Miss Hay that everything is worth saying (out of the little that remains) about a lady whose personal influence was hardly less powerful than her political and social power was far-reaching. Mademoiselle Diane de Poitiers, born of Saint Vallier, wedded to Louis de Brézé, the Grand Seneschal, created by Royal favour Duchess of Valentinois and Chatelaine of Chenonceaux, was a widow in 1531, sixteen years before the death of Francis the First. She ruled the Dauphin from her first appearance at the Court. From 1547 to 1559 she ruled the King. The key to her strange nature is that she was born upon the banks of Rhone, and married into the litigiously parsimonious atmosphere of Normandy. The title she derived from her husband, "La Senechale," clung to her all her life. Her origin was remembered only on such occasions as the discovery of Bourbon's conspiracy, when the evil fate that hung above both sides of her house decreed that her husband should reveal the treason of her father. "Madame," writes the wretched Saint Vallier to Diane, from the sunless depths of his prison beneath the walls of Loches, "je vous requiers ayez tant de pityé de vostre paouvre père que de le vouloir venir veoir." It was not for two years that he was able to secure his release, and then it was not by his daughter's help, but by an agreement between Bourbon and the King of Spain. A slight acquaintance with either Belleforest or Du Bellay would have saved our author from any necessity for defending Diana's virtue at a date when its loss would have hardly conferred upon her any direct or substantial benefit. Miss Hay says little enough about Chenonceaux, that lovely castle in Touraine with which the memories of Diana are more deeply associated than with any existing building; else she might have been faced with the extremely unpleasant and sordid details of the lawsuit by which Diana made good her title to that fair estate. This is no place to supply the omission by dilating on the unhappy fate of its previous owner. Neither Miss Hay nor any one else can make out a good case for Diana by emphasizing "her love of beauty and her true appreciation of genius." Such an attempt is almost as futile as the mistake, so often made by other writers who forget the value of original authorities, of exaggerating the artistic patronage of the King who left Leonardo da Vinci to die, neglected and alone, close to Amboise.

But before following Diane's fortunes further—the gift of Chenonceaux occurred even before her Royal lover had come into his kingdom—it may be well to consider those associations of tradition and blood of which Miss Marie Hay has only mentioned one, when she records that the grandmother of Diane's husband was a daughter of Agnes Sorel by Charles the Seventh. But this is not all. De Brézé's mother had been murdered for proved adultery. There was a similar connexion on the woman's side also; for Diane's father was descended from that daughter of Marguerite de Sassenaye and Louis XI. who had married Aymar de Poitiers. It is still more curious to observe that Diane also had in her veins, through the de la Tour connexion, some of the blood, not only of Mary Stuart, but—more remarkable still—of her lifelong rival, Catherine de Medici, whose mother, Madeleine de la Tour, was connected with the Poitiers family on the woman's side. Lastly, it is impossible to omit the reflection that the Valentinois title revived for Diane's benefit had been last held by Cæsar Borgia. But little did Diane care for such sinister associations. Valentinois is scarce twenty-five miles down the Rhone from St. Vallier, and its revenues had once before proved of considerable benefit to the family of Poitiers. That pale, untroubled face—untroubled because the heart's blood behind it had been frozen by the interminable law suits of the Norman Seneschal—with smoothly-waving bands of coal-black hair above a brow of snowy white, was armed with keener weapons than any Court lady of the time possessed. By no other drugs save cold water and indifference she vanquished every beauty in her path. She came to Court with the reputation of an impregnable widow and with two girls to marry. She secured the highest prize in the market for herself. She allied her daughters with the powerful families of Lamarck and Guise. By the very repression of her passions, in every other case save where they brought her in a rich return, she kept firmer hold upon that stern and sensible régime which gave imperishable health and beauty to her person. But in one way she was unrestrained. A demon of avarice and intrigue insatiable possessed her. She took Chenonceaux, she took Anet, she took Chaumont, she took the Duchy of Valentinois, she laid hands on the very treasury of Henri II. and kept the key. The waves of envious scandal broke harmlessly upon the stony rock of her chilly and indifferent reserve. The plots of all her enemies foundered in the quicksands of her businesslike correspondence with every man and woman who held any power at all. Until Henri II. was dead the Court of France, and France itself, was dominated by the pale, cold moonlight of Diane de Poitiers. Miss Marie Hay does well to reproduce one of her letters, if only to show the indomitable handwriting of the woman. Another is before us as we write. As was probable, it is a receipt, and you can almost see the long, thin fingers that traced those firm strokes locking up the money in her safe a moment afterwards. Yet she knew when to spend and to spend freely, either from her own inexhaustible widow's cruse of health and common sense or from her hoarded gold. "Si vous saviez," writes Henry to her in a touching letter which is better worth reproducing than his stilted verses, "Si vous saviez le peu de passtams que j'ay, vous auriez pityé de moy." She knew it well. Never was a King so bored. Never did any favourite so well know how to hearten him for royalty. Miss Fleming was brought over with Mary Stuart to try and tempt the Monarch's wandering fancy. But there was a strain of Spanish melancholy in Henry very different to the volatile buffoonery of Francis. He stuck to the black and white of his Diana. Nicole de Versigny was then added to the famous "escadron volant" by which Catherine de Medici was wont to work her will upon the male intelligence. She was equally powerless. It was Diana who still sat by the King's side, after the edict of Ecouen, and watched the tortured Protestants hauled up and down above the flaming scaffold.

We may be asking too much, but in a monograph, if anywhere, we might have legitimately expected to find a personal detail so intimate as a warming-pan. Diana's is in existence still, in the collection of M. Nestor Roqueplan. But Miss Marie Hay has at least reproduced some excellent portraits. In this pretty volume we can see revealed all that magnificent health and strength, that hard resolve and energy of character, which appealed to the King as much as the firm line of Diana's features or the proud curve of her lip. But we can see, too, now that the glamour of her life is gone, the narrow forehead which marks decision of nature rather than loftiness of ideas, the calm, tight features which repressed all sensuality and tenderness and allowed nothing to be visible save inflexible will and that serenity—scarcely human, after all—which Jean Goujon expressed in the exquisite lines of his "Diane Chasseresse" at Anet. It is true that, as Miss Hay says, she inspired many masterpieces of her time; but they were frigid and artificial. One of the best of any that remain has scarcely been noticed in this monograph at all. On the great tomb of her husband, Louis de Brézé, the Grand Seneschal, there is a kneeling figure in widow's weeds, exhibiting for the benefit of every devout Norman the sorrows of Diane. She took care to confine them to that cold and costly magnificence of alabaster and black marble in the Chapelle de la Vierge of Rouen Cathedral. Elsewhere her influence chilled the impetuous spirit of the French Renaissance. It is more reflected in the squares and spaces of her Italian garden at Chenonceaux than in the wild flourishes of more natural beauty that lit up the towers and balconies under which she slept so soundly.

The Recreations of a Judge.

In his cultured and serious habit of mind Sir Edward Fry has to seek a parallel within the limits of his own profession something in common with the late Lord Selborne. A reader of his STUDIES BY THE WAY (Nisbet, 10s. 6d. n.) will find, we think, a style more direct and pointed than that of the somewhat ponderous and occasionally verbose Chancellor. But they both provide distinguished examples of a breadth of scholarship not too often displayed on the judicial Bench. Sir Edward has now retired from the Bench, but these nine papers are, as he tells us, the outcome of a habit continuously indulged in of committing something to paper upon subjects that interest him. They are varied in range. Two of them are legal—an extremely acute disquisition on the true theory of punishment which he thinks is not a utilitarian one, but is to be found in the "effort of man to find a more exact relation between sin and suffering than the world affords us," and a delightful paper on the history of the art of conveyancing. The former appeared in the Nineteenth Century, and is the only "study" apparently which does not now appear in print for the first time. "The Banquet of Dante," "Strabo in Egypt," "The Old Testament" (a paper read at a meeting of "the Christian Conference"), and "Sermons" have titles which show the variety of Sir Edward Fry's interests. Perhaps the most attractive and original of the studies is the picture of Hesiod—of his life and his surroundings—which we have in "An Old Greek Farmer." The two remaining papers consist of travel notes in Greece and Sicily. To a generation overwhelmed with unnecessary records of tours in every quarter of the globe these notes, in their mixture of learning and observation, afford a fine example in little of what a book of travel really worth publishing should be.

Mr. Chamberlain.

JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN THE MAN AND THE STATESMAN, by N. Murrell Marris (Hutchinson, 10s. n.), is a fairly interesting, though a rather bulky, compilation. It is not, and does not claim to be, critical, and it reminds one in a way of the biography of which Macaulay said that it seemed to be the result of a compact by which the family supplied information and the author supplied praise. We are far from denying, of course, that praise is due to Mr. Chamberlain, but his discriminate admirers will not care about seeing a man of such marked individuality "written up" as if he were the conventional industrious apprentice. After all, Mr. Chamberlain's failures are as interesting as his successes, and little is gained by slurring over his unconscious contributions to the gaiety of nations. The student who only knew the Colonial Secretary from this book would never recognise in him the statesman who is said to be the inventor of the "New Diplomacy," who has interested the world in the matter of publication of despatches, and who acquainted two hemispheres with his anxiety about the health of Mrs. Kruger. Yet these matters are not less important than the facts that Mr. Chamberlain learnt English History from "Little Arthur" instead of Mr. Markham, and earned the approval and patronage of artistic Gaul by packing his screws in blue paper. Nor do we find any mention of the letter written in such interesting French to M. Yves Guyot, though it would have been a valuable commentary on the fact that Mr. Chamberlain took a prize for French at University College School. Nevertheless the book will have its public. It boils down the newspapers fairly well, and contains several portraits of Mr. Chamberlain at various ages and in various attitudes.

Chaucer Portraits.

The publication in book form of Mr. M. H. Spielmann's exhaustive papers in the Magazine of Art on the different PORTRAITS OF CHAUCER adds another appropriate memorial to the poet whose quincentenary has just been celebrated. Mr. Spielmann deals carefully with no less than eleven portraits. Of these, the well-known illumination by Occleve, in the margin of one of that writer's own poems, is the most valuable, as it is the only portrait which was undoubtedly taken by a man who had seen the poet. The next best evidence as to what Chaucer was like, or perhaps the best evidence of all, is in the prologue to Sir Thopas. But Mr. Spielmann, owing apparently to a misreading of the passage, expresses a doubt whether it really refers to Chaucer :—

> Is the description of the poet really a portrait of himself at all? And what reason is there to suppose that the master of the ceremonies has the author in view when he banters the rhymester?

But if we quote the whole of the passage of which Mr. Spielmann only quotes half, we think that there can be no doubt in any reader's mind that the poet's words refer to Chaucer:—

> Til that our hoste japen tho bigan,
> And than at erst he loked upon me,
> And seyde thus, "what man artow?" quod he;
> 'Thou lokest as thou woldest finde an hare,
> For ever upon the ground I see thee stare.
> Approche neer, and loke up merily.
> Now war yow, sirs, and lat this man have place,
> He in the waast is shape as wel as I,
> This were a popet in an arm t'embrace
> For any womman, smal and fair of face,
> He semeth elvish by his contenaunce,
> For unto no wight dooth he daliaunce.

A World "out of Joint."

COMMERCE AND CHRISTIANITY (Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. n.) is another book from the pen of the author of "The Social Horizon," and one or two other suggestive books on social problems. It is a plea for the direct application of religious principles to commercial affairs. Not, however, on the lines more generally accepted by Churchmen, and by many who support for instance, the Christian Social Union. The author looks upon the commercial world as inexorably ruled by principles adverse to Christianity. He sees, as did the late Edward Bellamy, that the future lies in the hands of great monopolies. By the natural laws of commerce these will tend to dominate entirely the world of trade, and at the same time to be necessarily inconsistent with the common interest. Hence will eventually arise an imperative demand to bring them under public control. It is an interesting forecast for which it is not difficult to find some support in recent economic history. The writer is not concerned to meet the usual objections to a Collectivist policy—such as the discouragement of enterprise and the growth of bureaucracy—because he is endeavouring primarily to show not that such a policy ought to be adopted, but that it will be adopted; that in fact what he believes to be the only social system consistent with Christianity will establish itself as the natural result of economic laws. It is curious to note that those who try to apply religious principles to the present system of competitive trade are only delaying this result. The book is well written and evidently sincere; but the economist will feel that it leaves many difficulties untouched. The writer, for instance, does not seem to recognize any difference between the municipalization or nationalization of the postal system or of means of conveyance such as tramways and the same treatment of articles of commerce (such as bread), with their varying quotations dependent on the fluctuations of home and foreign trade. Nor does he notice that his forecast, even if it be well founded in the case of necessaries, such as the bread supply, would not work out on the same lines in other cases.

Mr. Havelock Ellis' criticism of our "so-called nineteenth century" is much less practical. The NINETEENTH CENTURY (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.) is a dialogue "in Utopia" between a student who had made a special study of that particular century in the dim and remote past and a younger man who keeps the elderly student "on tap" by ingenuous questions such as "How could such a state of things endure for a single day?" His picture of the misery and barbarity of that unhappy age, when "nations were merely artificial units formed (by unscrupulous politicians) for the purpose of terrorizing one another" is a little too highly coloured, and (as will be seen from our quotation) uncritical, to be very convincing, but it will be read with amusement if not with interest. Here is a flattering picture of the Britishers of to-day :—

> A race of illmade but energetic barbarians, with big skeletons, projecting cheek bones, massive jaws; and to this framework the flesh laid on roughly as it were with a trowel, greedy carnivorous mouths, and long upper lips—lips sometimes thick, irregular, and sensual, sometimes drawn back as by a bit, a painful sense of tension, seeming to show that these men were conscious of a desire to restrain a wild beast within them.

Mr. Havelock Ellis ranges over almost every feature of social life, and finds it all out of joint. It is impossible for so able a thinker, however extravagant, not to be often stimulating. He exposes in an original way many ailments of modern life to which habit and familiarity has made us dull. One of the curious developments of the nineteenth century is, according to him, moral force—those "abnormal persons" with "a strain of sympathy unduly narrowed" who insisted on preaching to other people and telling them what they ought to do. To such a person "it seemed perfectly natural that whether they had his tastes, or whether they had not, they should act as if they had." Doubtless this preposterous habit will, in some future age, be recorded by the historian of this benighted century. And among the well-meaning but misguided persons who practised it, he will no doubt include the name of a distinguished writer, one Havelock Ellis.

T. E. Brown.

When a friend condoled with the late T. E. Brown on the absence of his name from a certain list of the minor poets of the day, he answered, with a smile, that perhaps his place was rather among the major poets. Such appears to be the serious conviction of his publishers, who have added his COLLECTED POEMS (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.) to the handy and well-printed series that already contains the works of Tennyson, Wordsworth, Shelley, Coleridge, Matthew Arnold, and Lowell. The present edition has been prepared on behalf of the author's three daughters by his old friends, Mr. H. F. Brown, Mr. H. G. Dakyns, and Mr. W. E. Henley. It contains all of Brown's verse that has hitherto been printed, along with some new pieces, including a hitherto unpublished prologue and envoy to his chief production, "Fo'c's'le Yarns," and some minor lyrics. It is perhaps too soon as yet to attempt to anticipate the verdict of posterity on Brown's hitherto little-known work. We may say with safety that he has done for the Isle of Man all and more than all that William Barnes did in the way of interpreting the Dorsetshire character. Beyond that he has contributed to our literature some remarkably successful tales in verse, of a kind that has scarcely been attempted since Crabbe. "Major" or not, he was a true poet, whose work deserved all the popularity that it is likely to achieve in this convenient form.

Mrs. Marshall.

Miss Beatrice Marshall's life of her mother EMMA MARSHALL (Seeley, 6s.) is a work of pious obligation carried out with skill and taste. There were circumstances in the career and character of the author of so many popular historical novels which justified a biography quite apart from her discovery of an interesting and successful vein of fiction. She was one of those writers who retrieved misfortune by untiring literary industry, a band containing names high on the roll of fame, as Miss Marshall reminds us in the following picture :—

> Often she worked late into the night. I see her now, with the lamp close to her manuscript, her small hand scurrying over sheet after sheet without a pause, the veins on her forehead starting from the fatigue she was too engrossed to notice. As I recall the picture, I think of the young man in Castle-street, Edinburgh, who watched a hand writing on the other side of the road, and marvelled at its untiring industry—a greater, but surely a not more pathetically indefatigable hand than my mother's.

Reproduction of the new Peace Medal designed by Mr. Emil Fuchs, commemorative of the war in South Africa, of which an account appeared in "The Times" of October 10. The medal has been accepted by Her Majesty.

She was also a woman of singularly beautiful character, who passed her life almost entirely amid the picturesque surroundings of old Cathedral cities—Wells, Exeter, and Gloucester. Her portraiture, as drawn by her daughter, is a very attractive one, and we can congratulate Miss Marshall on a book showing much literary capacity. There are many pleasant, if rather curiously effusive, letters from Longfellow.

Fishing.

Pike and Perch (Longmans, 5s.) is the latest addition to the Fur, Feather, and Fin Series, and the book hardly needs any other recommendation to the fisherman than the fact that it is mostly written by Mr. William Senior ("Red Spinner") and John Bickerdyke. Among coarse fish the pike is pre-eminent; he is the one savage of our English waters, and the only fish that can be taken without any sense of pity. As Mr. Senior shows, he is even (when small) not to be despised when captured on fine tackle. And nowadays the fisherman has discarded (under pressure) the cruel method of trolling. It is a question whether live-baiting should not follow this practice into ancient history. It seems not unlikely that it will soon be thought as unsportsmanlike to catch pike with anything else but artificial bait as it would be to use the worm for trout in a dry-fly river. And where pike are vermin, as in such rivers, they should be destroyed by netting. John Bickerdyke treats of the perch, and Mr. Shand of the cookery. It will interest many who have followed "Red Spinner" as disciples to learn that the frontispiece of this little book is really a very good portrait of their master in the art.

Literature owes much to the angler; to "The Amateur Angler" she is beholden for An Old Man's Holidays (Sampson Low, 2s. n.), a slender book of angling reminiscences in Hampshire, Cornwall, Wales, and other places, adorned by many touches of humour, quiet literary grace, and keen observation. These qualities do not come naturally to all fly-fishers, but the art tends to induce that sober outlook upon the world which is the keynote of much good writing. This little book is quite worthy of the author of "By Meadow and Stream," "Days in Clover," and several other volumes of agreeable reflections. It is a delightful compound of angling recollections and pleasant divagations into other themes.

Religious Controversy.

One advantage of a crisis, in the Church or elsewhere, is that it drives men to confess the secrets of their hearts. The excitement of the moment makes them throw aside conventions, and they appear to the world as they are, tolerant or bitter, thoughtful or arrogant, liberal or narrow. The Rev. N. Dimock, for instance, writes a frankly controversial book, Light from History on Christian Ritual (Murray, 2s.); he publishes it under the auspices of the National Protestant Church Union; but he allows no sentence to escape him that is unworthy of a religious man; he contents himself with the inherent strength of his argument and the facts (liberally supported by authorities) upon which it is based. As a result he has produced a book, small and unpretentious though it is, which could hardly be read by an opponent without forcing some admissions, and which will carry conviction to the unprejudiced reader that Mr. Dimock is right in his main contention—namely, that the over-elaboration of services is due to a decadence from the true Christian ideal of worship. We say "of services" advisedly, for Mr. Dimock is the first controversialist we have read who has had the good sense to point out that there has been a falling away from the purity and simplicity of worship in music as well as in ceremonial.

The Rev. the Hon. W. E. Bowen begins The Crisis in the English Church (Nisbet, 6s.) with twelve pages of impartial praise of the Oxford Movement, followed by a careful investigation, verified by quotations, of the excesses of doctrine and practice which were directly connected with that movement. This is ably done; but its interest seems to be a purely historical one. Mr. Bowen's object is to show the connexion of the excesses of sixty years ago with the excesses of to-day, and so to strengthen his cry of alarm. As a matter of fact, we are less near Rome to-day than we were then. In the next chapter he gives us the worst passages he can extract from twenty books of devotion, and accounts of various foolish and pernicious doings which have been observed in thirty-four churches. We do not know why he gives three long quotations from forms of self-examination on the Seventh Commandment. They are not edifying when used for his purpose; but if self-examination is to be practised at all, they seem to us just what is wanted. We very much doubt whether it is worth while to adopt this method of laboriously collecting the faults and follies, ignoring all that is good, in the books and services of the extremists, though it might be so if it could claim the virtue of originality. Sir William Harcourt and Mr. Bowen himself have already devoted themselves to the study of extreme books of devotion; Mr. Kensit's example led the Record to publish the accounts of ritualistic services which have provided Mr. Bowen with forty-eight pages of matter; his "Clergy Discipline Bill" is "framed in accordance with" Mr. Austin Taylor's League. His careful review of the Lambeth Hearings is scarcely necessary, for they have been already discussed from every point of view. Dr. Llewelyn Davies writes an able introduction to the volume. He admits in the first sentence that he has not read the book which he commends to the public. This is scarcely fair either to Mr. Bowen or his readers. He joins with Mr. Bowen in the appeal to "loyal Englishmen" to use against those with whom they disagree "the constitution sanctioned to us by centuries of Divine blessing." Would Mr. Bowen welcome the use of the constitution against the rectors and vicars who ignore the rubric which requires of them two services every day—a provision quite as important as any prohibition of ritual observance? The book is hardly one to which one would expect a Broad Churchman to give his imprimatur. Broad Churchmen would long ago have preceded the Ritualists into exile, to the immense loss of the English Church, had not the sense of fair-play among Englishmen prevented it.

Mr. Walsh, in his little work The Ritualists (Nisbet, 1s. 6d. n.), which is similar in tone to his former well-known books—unearthing many facts which it is well should be known and refusing to recognize any good thing in his opponents—makes a curious confession, viz., that the real object of his attack is the people of England—the voters who have put into office Prime Ministers, of both parties, who "have vied with each other in injuring the Protestant cause." Mr. Walsh might have specially charged patrons of livings with responsibility. Anyhow, we commend his admission to Mr. Bowen. If strong measures are to be taken at all, many hard-working laymen are likely to think that the Bishops could find plenty to do in dealing with inefficiency among the country clergy. We do not quite understand one criticism of Mr. Walsh—viz., that he "once saw behind a Ritualistic so-called 'altar' on an Easter Sunday morning, while the consecrated elements rested on it," this text of Scripture: "He is not here: He is risen." This is hardly "Romanizing" doctrine.

Mr. Howard Hensman's History of Rhodesia (Blackwood, 6s.) is what it claims to be. It contains a good map and a good index, together with appendices showing the output of gold, the class of labour most in demand, and the average rate of remuneration in the leading towns. There are the inevitable supplementary chapters on the war. We could have dispensed with the narrative of the siege of Kimberley, but the account of Colonel Plumer's operations fills a gap. Mr. Hensman does not write very well, but he covers the ground with care.

We can conscientiously praise the very agreeable and delightfully printed book on pastimes of all kinds by Mr. and Mrs. E. V. Lucas, which bears the engaging title What Shall We Do Now? (Grant Richards, 6s.). If we were inclined to criticize it we could hardly yield to the inclination; for the very original proposal is made to all young readers of the book that they should, on blank pages provided at the end, put down any suggestions which they have for its improvement. Two prizes are offered for the best of such suggestions, and the competition closes on March 31. To spoil the game by our own criticisms would be churlish. We can only say that the authors reveal an extraordinarily wide experience in the art of amusing boys and girls and have produced a book of a very original type which ought to be in great demand during the Christmas holidays.

Elocution and Stage Training, by Maxwell Ryder (Burleigh, 5s. n.), is the best written and most sensible book we have seen for a long time on a subject that has often lent itself to mere book-making. The mechanical part of elocution is thoroughly dealt with, and there is a very interesting discussion of the question how far an actor should actually feel the emotions he expresses. We do not know where else to look for so careful an exposition of the art of "make up" as Mr. Ryder gives us. To the young and aspiring "mime" this book should be of great service.

The Book of Sundials (Bell, 31s. 6d.) in its enlarged form deserves the claim which its title makes to be the one standard authority in English on the subject. Mrs. Alfred Gatty began the study of dials in 1835. For nearly forty years she collected particulars about dials in England and abroad, and dial mottoes, "a compendium," as one of her correspondents described them, "of all the lazy, hazy, sunshiny thoughts of men past, present, and in posse." Her book appeared shortly before her death in 1872. It was re-edited in 1889 and 1890 by Mrs. Eden, Mrs. Gatty's daughter, and Miss Eleanor Lloyds, with considerable additions, and they have since continued their researches which have resulted in the present magnificent and exhaustive volume. Among other important new additions is a chapter on Portable Dials by the well-known collector Mr. Lewis Evans. The list of Sun Dial mottoes occupies 280 pages of the book, and with its notes and illustrations is a wonderful collection of poetic antiquarian lore.

Messrs. Blackwood send us a copy of the second impression of the fifth edition of Sir Edward Bruce Hamley's The Operations of War (21s.). The rapid sale of this important work is presumably due to the fact that it was recently prescribed as a text-book for certain military examinations—a fact which is also, of course, evidence of its merits. We imagine, however, that a new edition will be needed now to embody the Teaching of the Boer War and show how it modifies both tactics and strategy. It will hardly be written again, for instance, that "few precautions are necessary," when conducting a reconnaissance in the rear of a beaten enemy, for from the neglect of such precautions "regrettable incidents" have resulted.

"If stationary men (and women) would pay some attention to the districts in which they reside, and would publish their thoughts respecting the objects that surround them, from such materials might be drawn the most complete county histories." These words of Gilbert White are quoted by Mr. George Morley in Shakespeare's Greenwood (Nutt, 5s.), and are the justification for his book. It is a copious but confusing guide to Shakespeare's country and its manners. It deals naively and in detail with "mumming," "mothering," harvest-homes, "Thomasing," haunted houses, ghost stories, Gospel Oaks, the poet Shenstone, Dr. Samuel Parr, and George Eliot, in their relation to Warwickshire. But the volume is little more than raw material. A certain rusticity seems to have entered into the author's style, which is somewhat sprawling, and, though always enthusiastic, full of such things as "unslayable" and "manless landscape." Nevertheless, the first chapter, "The Language," which shows what Shakespeare's vocabulary owed to the speech of his native county (a subject treated in much detail by a writer in these columns some little time ago), makes the volume an interesting mass of "origins."

ART.

Dutch Painters of the Nineteenth Century. With Biographical Notices. Edited by Max Rooses; translated by F. Knowles. Vol. III. (Sampson Low. £2 2s.)

This handsome and richly illustrated volume is the third and concluding part of an important work on the Dutch painters of the nineteenth century, edited by the well-known curator of the Plantin Museum at Antwerp, and translated by Mr. F. Knowles. The biographical notices of the different masters are supplied by Dutch writers of repute, and, in one case, the well-known painter, Heer Ter Meulen, has himself contributed a chapter which consists less of autobiographical recollections than of his views and theories upon art. The whole work gives an excellent history of Dutch art in the present age, and the beauty of the photogravures and other reproductions deserves high praise. A careful study of these volumes will of itself enable the reader to form a very fair idea of this interesting school of modern art, which has been so cordially appreciated both in England and America. Exhibitions of Dutch pictures have been frequently held in London during the last fifteen years, and Dutch artists have found their most generous patrons in English and American connoisseurs.

True to the old traditions of their nation, modern Dutchmen are chiefly occupied with landscape and genre. They paint interiors and street scenes with great cleverness, and they delight in reproducing the wide horizons and broad plains, the hazy atmosphere, and sombre tints of their own country. But they have also a keen eye for fleeting effects of light and colour, and the lovely changes of sun and cloud, of wood and field, of sea and shore, charm these northern masters as they charmed the landscape painters of Barbizon before them. In them we see the true heirs of the French romanticists, of Millet and Corot, of Rousseau and Daubigny. As Mr. W. E. Henley said at the time of the Edinburgh Exhibition in 1886, "They have read their Constable in a French translation." And as one of their own countrymen has written:—"Their works are good and true, because the men who painted them devoted their lives to an endeavour to depict Nature as they saw her through their own eyes, not as some one before them had seen her, not after changing and reconstructing her to conform to specific academic rules, but fresh and ever variable, as they found her." The greatest masters of the school, the veteran painter Josef Israels, who has left his stamp on the national art of the age, the brothers Maris and Hendrik Mesdag, have been already fully dealt with in the preceding volume of Heer Rooses' work.

The most interesting figure in the present book is that of Anton Mauve, the painter whose comparatively early death twelve years ago was lamented as much in England as in his own country. The absence of Mauve's pictures has been much regretted by French and English visitors to the Paris Exhibition, where the rigid limitation of Dutch works of art to the last decade of the century has led to the exclusion of many of the finest paintings of the school, and has rendered the collection less representative than might have been the case. Anton Mauve's father was a Baptist minister of Haarlem, and during many years the young artist's career was hampered by poverty and ill-health; but it is pleasant to learn that his talents were first recognized in England, and that his best patrons were Englishmen, such as Mr. J. S. Forbes, Mr. Justice Day, and Mr. Alexander Young. When he was about thirty a fortunate chance took him to Oosterbeek—the Barbizon of Holland—where he met Bilders and William Maris and painted the flocks of sheep and haymakers of this pastoral village, and the gnarled oaks sacred to Wodan in the neighbouring forest at Wolfhezen. After his marriage he lived chiefly at the Hague, where he became intimate with Israels and other prominent artists, until, in 1886, he settled at Laren, a picturesque village near the Zuyder Zee, which had long been one of his favourite hunting grounds. There he found those heathery commons and copses of fir and birch, those orchards and cottage gardens, which he was never tired of painting. Peasant life, in all its varied forms, had an especial attraction for Mauve. His wood cutters and farm labourers, his white horses drawing the plough, his sheep penned in the fold, driven along the road to market, or feeding in the green meadows, his cows following each other to the farm at milking time, are familiar to those of us who find pleasure in his refined and sympathetic art. He loved the Dutch country lanes with their long lines of trees and heavily-laden carts, piled up with logs of wood, and took especial delight in drawing the delicate branches and silvery foliage of the birches under the soft pearly haze and grey skies of our northern climes. During the last years of his life he studied the works of Jean François Millet with increasing admiration, and under the influence of the "Grand Rustique" his works attained more of classical beauty and simplicity than at any former time. Like poor Millet, he had always suffered from terrible headaches and fits of depression, but at Laren he found the quiet home and rustic surroundings which he needed, and was happy in the company of his wife and children and a few artist friends. His pictures were beginning to command high prices in London and Paris, and a prosperous and active career seemed before him, when he died very suddenly while on a visit to his brother at Arnhem in February, 1888, at the age of forty-nine.

Among the other painters whose works are illustrated in the present volume, the most worthy of notice are Adolphe Artz, who attained a deserved reputation in Paris, and represented his country at more than one International Exhibition, Ter Meulen, the distinguished sheep-painter, Hendrik Valkenburg, whose peasants rival those of Josef Israels' in vigour and reality, Philip Sadée, who paints the fisher-folk and sandy shores of Scheveningen, Jan Vrolijk, the Troyon, and Josseling de Jong, the Bastien-Lepage of the Dutch school. The portrait of Queen Emma of the Netherlands, by this last-named artist, which is here reproduced (p. 242) and the admirable picture of his own mother (p. 244) are worthy of the best traditions of Dutch painting, while his fine landscape (p. 249), with ploughman and horses resting at noontide, on the wide plain bounded by the distant sea, shows that this clever young master's efforts and aspirations are not limited to one branch of art.

Pietro Vannucci, called Perugino. By G. C. Williamson. (Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.) (Bell. 5s. n.)

This little book gives a full account of the life and works of Pietro Perugino, the great Umbrian master, who set the seal of technical perfection on the devotional art of earlier ages. It is in such pictures as the triptych of the National Gallery and the Crucifixion of S. Maria Maddalena dei Pazzi in Florence, that the mystic sentiment which had from the first been the leading note of Umbrian painting, and the poetic feeling for landscape, which was the natural inheritance of the artists born in this lovely mountain region, find their highest development.

Fortunately for young Pietro Vannucci he was early brought under Florentine influences. After spending some time at Arezzo with Piero del Francheschi and Luca Signorelli, both of whom owed much of their training to Tuscan masters, he came to Florence when he was about twenty-five, and worked in Verrocchio's bottega, with Leonardo as his companion and friend. Ten years later, "il Perugino," as he now became generally known, was summoned to Rome with the best Florentine masters, and painted his noble fresco of Christ delivering the keys to St. Peter, in the Sistine Chapel. All the artist's finest works—the altarpiece of Villa Albani, the Deposition of the Pitti, the Ascension at Lyons, the Vision of St. Bernard at Munich, the Certosa triptych, the fresco of the Crucifixion, and the Vallombrosa Assumption—belong to the last decade of the sixteenth century. At that time Pietro stood high in popular favour, and was regarded not only in Perugia, but in Florence as one of the foremost masters of the day. When the Duke of Milan sent to Florence for a painter to execute an altarpiece for the Certosa, Perugino was recommended to him as "a rare and singular artist, whose faces have an air of the most angelic sweetness, and who is most excellent in wall painting." And Isabella d'Este, the celebrated Marchioness—not Duchess, as Dr. Williamson styles her—of Mantua, did not rest until she had obtained a picture from Perugino, to hang among the masterpieces of contemporary art which adorned her studio.

These heavenly visions of gentle Virgins and radiant Archangels, with dreamy faces and upturned eyes, set in wide and beautiful landscapes under clear sunset skies, naturally appealed with a peculiar force to the men and women of that troubled age, weary with perpetual wars and conflicts. Perhaps this may also explain Napoleon's passionate admiration for Perugino's works, and the repeated orders which his ministers received to collect this master's pictures in Perugia and the neighbourhood, and send them to Paris. Dr. Williamson gives a melancholy account of the ruthless way in which churches and convents were plundered by the conqueror's orders, and paintings that had been for centuries the glory of the city were carried off to France to be divided among provincial galleries. To-day the student of Perugino's art must travel to Lyons, Marseilles, Nancy, Rouen, Caen, Bordeaux, and Nantes to find the separate panels of the great altar-pieces which the Umbrian master painted for the churches of S. Pietro and S. Agostino of Perugia. And by a cruel fate, the Madonna, surrounded by the patron Saints of Perugia, that "Palladium of the city" which Perugino painted in his best days for the Priors' chapel in the municipal hall, was sent back to Italy, through the intervention of the English Government, but kept in the Vatican by Pope Pius VII., and never restored to its original home.

Dr. Williamson has carefully examined most of these works, and his critical remarks are chiefly based upon the studies of Morelli and Mr. Berenson. But while he follows the last-named critic in rejecting the famous Sposalizio at Caen, which Vasari and every subsequent writer for the next three hundred years declared to be Perugino's work, he is sceptical as to the authorship of the Apollo and Marsyas, generally known as the Morris-Moore Raphael, in the Salon Carré of the Louvre. This charming little picture, which still bears the name of the master of Urbino in the catalogues, but which appears to us to be executed in Perugino's most delicate and characteristic manner, is ascribed by the present writer to Pinturicchio, or some other Umbrian artist of the day. But although we confess that we are unable to agree with Dr. Williamson here, he is probably right in saying that Perugino painted mainly in tempera, and never adopted oils as his medium. Nothing is more difficult than to decide such questions in the case of these fifteenth-century artists, who used oil varnishes and glazes in their tempera paintings. Mr. Ruskin once admitted that he had discovered a picture which he had long admired as a masterpiece of oil painting to be in reality tempera, and a hot controversy has sprung up among art critics regarding the actual medium which Perugino employed. While Crowe and Cavalcaselle speak of his change from tempera to oils, and of the complete mastery over oil painting which he finally acquired, Mr. Herbert Horne tells us with equal assurance that "all Perugino's pictures were painted in tempera on a gesso background." But whatever his medium may have been, Perugino knew how to handle colour with admirable skill, and the brilliant lines and lovely effects which he produced in the works of his middle period remain unsurpassed by any of his contemporaries. In his latter years his types became formal and mannered, and his style underwent a visible deterioration. The constant repetition of subjects and the manufacture of religious pictures to order could not fail to produce a bad result, and when Michel Angelo unkindly pronounced Perugino's paintings to be antiquated, and called him goffo nell' arte, the charge was not altogether untrue. The words point to a change in the public taste, which Perugino might naturally resent, but which he was compelled to recognize. He saw his popularity wane before that of his own scholar Raphael, and the other great masters of the new age, and he wisely left Florence and returned to his old home. There he spent the last twenty years of his life, painting altarpieces in Perugia and the hill cities of Umbria; and in one instance at least, the fragment of a Deposition in a church in his native town of Città della Pieve, he attained to something of his old fervour and devotion. His last fresco, an Adoration of the Magi, on which he was engaged at Fontignano, is now in the National Gallery. Before it was finished he died of the plague, at the age of seventy-seven.

Mr. Walter Crane is not only a man of exceptional experience in the art of design, but a cultured and lucid writer. In the former he has well-known limitations, which some will recognize in his new book on Line and Form (Bell, 12s. n.); but it would be difficult to get a more masterly exposition of the practice of design on its formal, conventional, and technical side than he here gives us. He goes closely into detail on the subject of instruments and materials; but the value of his work is that he always writes on a plane far above that of the technical handbook. He gives no cut and dried rules, and is always in touch with principles. A close observer of nature himself, he illustrates with endless resource the continual adaptation of nature in the best decorative art. His copious original illustrations provide "a liberal education in themselves" in the art of design. One chapter at the end is devoted to colour—a subject which might receive fuller treatment. It might well form a third volume in the series which he began with "The Bases of Design."

Mr. William Nicholson in his portfolio of sixteen pictures illustrating CHARACTERS OF ROMANCE (Heinemann, £2 2s. n.) has varied his method. Instead of the strenuous application of simple light and shade to the delineation of form, he now works with an abundance, sometimes a superfluity, of line. We have the same broad and powerful vision; some of the pictures, especially Munchausen, Don Quixote, and Mr. Vanslyperken, are masterly in their conception. But we have a sense of some waste of power in the new method; the abundance of devious and wayward lines are distracting and sometimes want meaning. The horses are extraordinarily strong in drawing, but not always accurately proportioned—a feature which, nevertheless, is of value in the "Gargantua," which breathes a fine spirit of Rabelaisian extravagance. The feeling expressed in the pose and free treatment of the subject in the "Miss Havisham" and the "Sophia Western" is full of dignity and beauty. "Tony Weller" we do not care for. It reminds us rather of the bullying coachman as described by Borrow than of the genial and simple parent of Sam Weller. In the backgrounds the artist has aimed at suggesting an appropriate atmosphere; they are sometimes a little bizarre and over emphasized.

After a somewhat extended vacation the Royal College of Art has reassembled. The vacation has been prolonged owing to the state of confusion into which the S. Kensington Museum has been thrown by the progress of building operations, and no relief can be expected for some time, inasmuch as fifteen months, at least, have been provided for in the contract for digging the foundations for the new buildings. These are well advanced and appear to have been well done. It seems to be the general opinion at S. Kensington that the Museum will not be itself again for some years to come—eight years is the most sanguine estimate.

Preparations for the exhibition of Black and White, which is to be held in the galleries of the Indian Section of the S. Kensington Museum next month, are well advanced. The range of work is comprehensive, and artists and publishers, both at home and abroad, are co-operating with the Museum authorities so cordially that the collection promises to be unusually attractive. It is a matter for some comment that the public generally appear to take very little interest in black and white work. Every publisher of importance has a more or less extensive collection of drawings in pen and ink and in wash which he would, in most instances, be only too glad to dispose of for a reasonable consideration. Buyers, however, are very few, for the public—having no intuitive taste for art—appears to be more willing to enroll itself amongst two or three hundred other subscribers for "a print," and thus to seek safety in numbers, than to exercise its own discretion and possess itself of original drawings which have no fellows. If original black and white work were more readily sought by the public than it is at present, the buyers would more often than not possess themselves of works of art, and the publishers be more able to obtain the best work of the best illustrators. The fact that drawings have been more or less faithfully reproduced can have no real effect upon the value of the originals. Were it otherwise the most popular and most copied original pictures in the great galleries of the world would be the least valuable.

Two exhibitions of sketches and studies have opened almost simultaneously. That of the London Sketch Club at the Modern Gallery appears to represent the ideas of the younger men, and, on the whole is an attractive little show. There is work by Montague Smyth, and Cecil Aldin, by Walter Churcher, Lee Hankey, Lance Thackeray, Tom Browne, and, of course, by the president, Geo. C. Haité, which is decidedly above the average. The collection is small, and for this, among other reasons, rises superior to the collection of studies and sketches of members which occupies the Galleries of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colour. Too many members of the R.I. appear to misunderstand the meaning of a sketch, and if work such as that shown by Lucien Davis, E. M. Wimperis, Thos. Pyne, and Edmund G. Warren can be classed as studies or sketches, we should like to see their finished work and compare it. What a sketch really should be is well shown by H. Swanwick, by the broad and sunny work of Arthur Harrington, by the admirably free contributions by David Green, the bold firm drawings by J. Finnemore, and the figure studies by Douglas Almond.

Mr. E. A. Abbey, R.A., is making progress with his fresco, "The Award of Sir Robert Billerdon (Lord Mayor, 1483) in the dispute as to the precedence of the Merchant Taylors' and Skinners' Companies," which, when completed, is to be added to the frescoes in the Royal Exchange. Mr. Frank Brangwyn's "Modern Commerce," Miss Henrietta Rae's "Sir Richard Whittington's Charities," and Mr. Ernest Norman's "King John Signing Magna Charta" are to be placed in the ambulatory of the Royal Exchange next month. None of these subjects appear to be either specially important or original.

Messrs. Graves are exhibiting the last of their topical war pictures. It is called "Just like Bobs" and has been painted to keep in remembrance—by means of reproductions at a popular price—an incident which caught on with the sentimental Tommy, and through him with the still more sentimental stop-at-home. "Bobs" is stopping to give his water-bottle to a wounded private—most of us know the story. It is a cutchpenny incident, and will doubtless "sell." Mr. Caton Woodville has painted the picture. In the absence of any artist who has risen sufficiently to the occasion to paint a fine picture directly associated with the war, Mr. Woodville's military experience and knowledge and his astounding—almost dangerous—facility have provided the public with a series of pictorial commentaries upon the war which are above the average of contemporary commissioned canvases. The war has, possibly, not been brought sufficiently home to the nation to have produced a Delacroix, a De Neuville, or a Detaille.

There is to be a special Arts and Crafts section in connexion with the Education Exhibition which is to be held at Liverpool from Oct. 31st to Nov. 9th next.

FICTION.

Prefaces.

"A preface," says Miss Coleridge in her recent collection of essays and sketches, "is not even a beginning proper, inasmuch as it does not bind a writer to go on. It is pure indulgence in the delight, without any of the responsibilities, of authorship." We doubt whether Miss Coleridge is right, and Mr. Morrison's prefatory letter to "My dear Wimbush" in the forefront of CUNNING MURRELL (Methuen, 6s.) is an interesting example of the nature of "artistic liabilities" incurred by the preface. It is the author's intention, while complimenting his friend, to point out to the dull-witted among his critics that, if they consider the occult doings of his principal character, Cunning Murrell, overdrawn, they are stupid fellows who do not recognize flesh and blood when they see it, for this very man was known, it seems, to both Mr. Wimbush and Mr. Morrison; the latter, indeed, has described him more directly from the life in the Strand Magazine. In a work of art the originals of the characters employed matter nothing to the reader. If the author is unable in the course of his story to make them appear real, he will not better matters by telling us that they once lived in Essex. If he cannot persuade us that we know this and that man, nothing that he can tell us about the knowledge of Mr. Wimbush and himself will help us. But, fortunately, "Cunning Murrell" is one of those engrossing books that require no prefatory assistance. This story of smuggling and witchcraft and of Essex life generally in the middle of the century is full of human interest. If Murrell belonged at first sight to the middle ages rather than to 1850, this merely helps the artistic "values" and throws such personages as the pathetic Dorrily Thorn, the generous and simple Steve Lingood, and Robosholery Dove into a more becoming position in the picture. Hadleigh and its neighbourhood had at the time of the story overlooked the passage of time and still held to the ideas of an earlier period. Thus Cunning Murrell could exercise those queer arts of his which awed the simple country folk. He himself believed in his occult powers—a vain artist and a casuist withal, cunning enough to convince the gullible people of Leigh and Hadleigh. It is owing to this fact that he puts upon Dorrily Thorn's aunt, Mrs. Martin, the stigma of witchcraft. In discovering how this tragedy works out the reader will have perused a very successful and interesting example of the modern novel. Mr. Morrison's style is always admirable; his pictures of the country are, like his descriptions of persons and his narration of incidents, well considered, clear, and often beautiful. Here is such a passage at hazard:—"Presently, on the right, the hill fell away wholly, and left the road, descending still, to top its last ridge, throwing wide a great picture where Essex lay broad and fecund below, dotted with a score of hamlets, richly embushed with trees, motley with fields of many colours, and seamed with hedges." This book, a development of the manner of "To London Town," will certainly add to Mr. Morrison's reputation.

In his admirable book, THIRTEEN STORIES (Heinemann, 6s.), Mr. Cunninghame Graham takes the matter of the preface very seriously and gives us nearly five pages of it, in which he makes many questionable statements, such as, "Let there be no mistake: the writer and the reader are sworn foes." This is, no doubt, sometimes true, but we feel sure there will be no hostility between those who read, say, "Cruz Alta" in the present volume and Mr. Graham. He takes us to all countries and shows us life "in the phantasmagoria we call the world," from River Plate to the Carse o' Stirling. "Cruz Alta," the most important sketch in the book, is a wonderful account of a wild-cat expedition to bring horses from Uruguay to the Brazilian capital. It is filled with vivid adventures and wise deductions. The horse business is a failure, of course, and the more interesting on that account. As Mr. Cunninghame Graham says—

> . . . Those who fail after a glorious fashion, Raleigh, Cervantes, Chatterton, Camoens, Blake, Claverhouse, Lovelace, Alcibiades, Parnell, and the last unknown deck-hand who, diving overboard after a comrade, sinks without saving him: these interest us—at least they interest those who, cursed with imagination, are thereby doomed themselves to the same failure as their heroes were.

This quotation gives our author's form at a glance. Its faults are on the side of a crowding of ideas and vehemence of expression. With less insistence Mr. Graham's style would be a great enjoyment, for he has, apart from his vivid descriptive powers, a cynic touch which will please the literary student. "Rothenberger's Wedding" is an amusing satiric sketch, "La Clemenza de Tito" a well-observed study, but among the lesser stories of the thirteen we like best the account of how Amarabat, the runner, failed to take "The Gold Fish" from Rabat to the Sultan at Tafilet. This has the true fatalistic note of the East and is told with exquisite skill.

In Devonshire.

Mr. Eden Phillpotts' previous work has been of more than one kind, and always successful. But no one can doubt that he is more at home with Devonshire and Devonshire folk than anywhere else. "Children of the Mist" showed it clearly, and won for him from some admirers the name of "the second Blackmore." His SONS OF THE MORNING (Methuen, 6s.) is in the same style. It is a long, thoughtful, character-sketch of three or four men and one woman. All are striking figures, human and intelligible. Perhaps the most sympathetic is the ease-loving, volatile Christopher, who divides the heroine's love with the widely different Myles Stapledon. Few writers have dared to draw a good and wholesome-minded maiden who is yet capable of loving two men equally and at once. In this case the men are so contrasted in almost every particular that a woman whose character, as it were, embraced the qualities of both might well hesitate. It is a passionate appreciation rather than actual passion that inspires her. In marrying Myles she would have to turn from the gracefulness of life; in marrying her playmate Christo, from its earnestness. The reader must find out the upshot for himself. There is much besides the psychological problem to interest him. The background of torrent and Tor, of Devonshire scenes described with intense sympathy, and rustics full of humour, conscious and unconscious, all make the book one which must not be hurried through.

Tales of Pontiac.

Mr. Gilbert Parker's political ambitions do not seem likely to interfere with his skill as a story-teller, if we may judge from his last book, THE LANE THAT HAD NO TURNING (Heinemann, 6s.). The short story is very seldom wrought to perfection in England, but Mr. Parker establishes once more, as it seems to us, his claim to be one of the very few writers who make that particular literary form a thing of art. Even so, one charm of his tales is non-English—the picturesque atmosphere which (to quote from the author's dedicatory letter to Sir Wilfrid Laurier) envelopes that "proud province which a century and a half of English governance has not Anglicized." Mr. Parker gives us once more the old Quebec type with its moods so swiftly ranging from gaiety to pathos, its wit at once naive and acute, and its devoted, even fanatical, love of tradition—a type which perhaps appeals more than any other in the Empire to the English imagination. Another charm of these stories of "the people of Pontiac" is that they are "associated tales." The focus ranges over one neighbourhood, shifting here and there as it isolates now one now another picture in the life of the habitants; and the links which unite the stories add greatly to their interest. The longest story, which gives the title to the book, turns on the ever-recurring problem of racial antagonism; the others tell mostly of the private joys and sorrows of the people. They are full of poetry, pathos, and dramatic force, and show a peculiar power of realizing the limitations and possibilities of the short story.

From China.

We remember the name of Mr. Julian Croskey as that of the author of a magazine article complaining of the difficulty of making a living by literary work. He had, he wrote, abandoned the endeavour in despair and become a day labourer in a sawmill. The appearance of "THE S.G." (Lamley) shows that Mr. Croskey has been trying again, and we shall be very much surprised if he does not this time succeed. The novel is a story of Legation Street during the Boxer rebellion. That sort of thing is not, of course, the highest kind of art—is, in fact, journalism rather than literature. But as journalism it is admirable, and it rises to the level of literature in places. Its chief merit, however, is as a character study of Sir Robert Hart, to whom it is dedicated, and whom it introduces to us, under a thin disguise, as Mr. Pericord. Mr. Croskey was, we understand, at one time employed in the service over which Sir Robert Hart presides. At all events, he knows his China uncommonly well, and his presentation of the Inspector-General, of whose personality so little is known in England, is hardly, if at all, inferior to the presentation of Mr. Rhodes in "The Colossus." We wish the book the success which we can hardly believe] that it will fail to win.

"Frightfully thrilling."

The lady who writes as "G. Colmore" is to be congratulated on her latest novel THE MARBLE FACE (Smith, Elder, 6s.). Although "The Strange Story of Hester Wynne" was the first novel that made her widely popular we had noticed many fine qualities in her previous books, and are therefore by no means surprised to find that "The Marble Face" is a sustained work of much vividness and power. The story is made up of extracts from the diaries of Sir Darnley Cotterel and of Laura Lequesnay, and the first few chapters are overloaded with the secret misery of his life. The secret is so well kept that the reader may weary and believe that Sir Darnley is that uncomfortable fellow an homme incompris, but he will soon get into the swing of the story and understand its tragic issues. Darnley writes early in the book:—"It seems to me that if anybody were to touch these leaves, the mere feel of the paper would tell of the suffering of the writer, so imbued must they be with the spirit which produced them—the spirit of pain." Fortunately Laura comes as his saviour to lift from him the weight of a crime which has haunted him for years. The lady of the Marble Face, the mother of Darnley, is admirably drawn; her actions, although fortunately unusual, are comprehensible and bring about a situation of high tragedy. "The Marble Face" is far above the average of novels. It is by no means a true work of art, but it raises hopes that "G. Colmore's" next book may approach nearly to that description.

"A Furnace of Earth."

The story of Miss Hallie Erminie Rives' book, A FURNACE OF EARTH (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), is told in the quotation of "The Revelation of St. Love the Divine":—

> Their first estate of joy they leave,
> So pure, impassioned, and elate,
> And learn from Piety to grieve
> Because their hearts are passionate.

Margaret and Daunt are those whose hearts are passionate, and this is what happens when they meet and he says, "I love you."

> Her eyes flowed into his. From a flushed blur under cloud-pale eyelids, they had turned to violet balls, shot through with a trembling light. The look she gave him melted over him in a rage of love. Desire bordered it, a smile dipped in it, promise made it golden, and he saw his own longing painted in it, as a pilgrim sees his reflection in a slumbering pool.

With such phrases as—"His sunburned face was pale, and his gray eyes were hazed with a daring softness" the tale of their loves is told. Yet despite the lack of reserve in Miss Rives' style there are flesh and blood in "A Furnace of Earth," and there are passages of beauty—rather flamboyant it is true—which compensate one for occasional lapses.

THE CONQUEST OF LONDON, by Dorothea Gerard (Methuen, 6s.), is not one of its author's best, but it is bright and fresh—the very book to give to a girl. It begins with four pretty girls dyeing their old frocks in default of new ones. A legacy arrives, and all is changed. The four provide themselves with a rabbit-like and meek chaperon, and troop up to London to take the town by assault à la Gunning. The results are the natural ones, with a little help from the friendly novelist, who cannot reconcile herself to leaving her pretty characters in disappointment and humiliation. Titled and talented suitors loom in the background before London has long been enriched by the presence of Philippa, Evelyn, Cissy, and Adela.

THE GRIP OF THE WOLF, by Morice Gerard (Horace Marshall, 3s. 6d.), is a stirring tale of blows and chivalry, with a proper love interest. The Countess Helen, who supplies the same, goes through perilous adventures ending in the stake. The torch is applied, the faggots smoke, when lo! Brunoborg to the rescue and Black Bertrand to discomfiture. Another novel by the same author, but published (at the same price) by Messrs. Ward, Lock, is called THE MAN OF THE MOMENT. It is not so good. The diplomatic intrigue is melodramatic, and the love intrigue conventional and, again, melodramatic. There is a lady's-maid who says "Ah, Mistress! I will be even with you yet! You do not know Marie, but you will." "So moves the wheel of life," remarks the author, with somewhat irrelevant philosophy.

THE DEVIL'S HALF ACRE (Unwin, 6s.), by "Alien," is an agreeable enough story on a grim subject. John Jermyn, of the Otago goldfields, has murdered a man and attempts to expiate his crime. Under the name of "The Prophet" he preaches to the wild inhabitants of the once famous Gabriell's Gully. Rose Jermyn is the gay note in his life, and her trials and love form the motif of the book. "Alien" is a rather laboured writer, but she has sincerity and occasional vivid flashes.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ALLEN LOUNE, MINISTER OF RELIGION (Unwin, 6s.) is the rather portentous title of a Scottish novel by Mr. Alexander MacDougall which may find pleased readers among students of Calvinism. This chronicle of the small loser of a man's soul, seen from the outside, is written with fluency and directness. The main character, although highly religious, is petty and ignorant to an unusual degree. But, although Allen writes of art and literature as a Philistine, on the subject of religious scruples he gives the impression of being an accomplished disputant. "Allen Lorne" is published as a novel, but it reads too much like the conscientiously written autobiography of a not very clearly seeing and quite uninteresting person.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The new borough councillors who are to be elected next Thursday will not fail in their duties for want of advice. They have already been reminded of their duty in many other particulars, and it may not be superfluous to remind them of the powers offered them under the Public Libraries Act. Great progress has been made of recent years in the inauguration of libraries in London, but there are still many districts without these aids to culture. In more than one instance the old vestries showed themselves continuously unwilling to adopt the powers. We hope that their successors, the councillors, will encourage the movement as heartily as a due consideration for the ratepayer's pocket will permit.

The late Sir Henry Acland was one of the oldest and most distinguished of librarians. The collection of scientific books in the University Museum had been under his careful charge since 1858. The Radcliffe Library is sometimes confused, by those unacquainted with Oxford, with the Radcliffe building, or "Camera," the beautiful circular reading-room of the Bodleian.

The "British Library Year-book" for 1900-1901, published by Messrs. Scott, Greenwood, and edited by Mr. Thomas Greenwood, contains an exhaustive account of the various British municipal libraries, with a number of tables as to hours of work, income, &c., besides several special articles. The first of the articles deals with the library rate, and advocates the removal of the present restrictions and the substitution of a permissive increase in accordance with local conditions. The question of "Children and Public Libraries" is treated by the librarian of Cardiff, where special attention is given to this branch of library work. The Libraries Acts are now in force in 400 towns and districts, as compared with 330 in 1897. In spite of this steady progress, there are still many boroughs well able to maintain a public library that are as yet without one.

The new museum given to West Ham by Mr. Passmore Edwards was opened by the Countess of Warwick on October 17. The Essex Field Club have placed a good collection of objects in the museum. On the same day was re-opened the West Ham Technical Institute and Central Library, which has been rebuilt after the fire of a year ago. Last week, also, saw the inauguration of two other East-end libraries. Both Bow and Limehouse have for some time endeavoured to find the necessary funds, and both in the end owe a good deal to the philanthropy of Mr. Passmore Edwards, who, on the 18th inst., laid the foundation-stones of the two buildings. Similar progress is reported from Hawick, where Mr. Carnegie has given £10,000 conditionally on the council providing a site for the new library.

In Denmark there are already several public libraries, and efforts are being made to obtain an extension of their work. Mr. A. S. Steenberg, of Horsens, has just published a little book on the history of the library movement, more especially in England and the United States. The author has visited many of the English libraries and gives much practical information upon cataloguing, card charging, and the various technical appliances which are found in our larger libraries. The Danish Government are taking the very practical step of having this book distributed free of charge to the people's libraries throughout Denmark.

Mr. Charles Welch, librarian of the Guildhall, is giving a course of University Extension Lectures on the History of London at the South-Western Polytechnic Institute on Friday evenings.

The October number of the American publication Public Libraries contains several useful descriptions of travelling libraries, and an article on "Technical Books in English Public Libraries," by Mr. Andrew Keogh, of Yale, formerly of the Newcastle-on-Tyne public library.

Correspondence.

THE CANTERBURY TALES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Professor Skeat will pardon me, I am sure, if I venture to point out a slight mistake in his most valuable edition of Chaucer's works; and I must confess to a feeling of something like satisfaction at finding a small error in a great work where all, or nearly all, is so perfect.

In Vol. III., at page 376, where Dr. Skeat is considering the question of the length of time the Canterbury pilgrims took to tell their tales, and the number of days the tales took up, he says, "in group F. l. 73 the squire remarks that 'it is pryme,' it is 9 o'clock." This is not a slip of Professor Skeat's, for in another place, at page 378, in the same volume, again referring to the squire, he says "the narrator remarks that he will not delay the hearers 'for it is prime'—i.e., 9 a.m."

Now I need hardly point out to the learned reader that "pryme" does not mean 9 o'clock, but 6 o'clock a.m. The word is taken from the name of the canonical office which was originally said at sunrise, and later on was fixed to be said at 6 o'clock in the morning. It was the first of the day offices, whence its name of prime. The hymn at the beginning of the office "Jam lucis orto sidere" would be out of place at a 9 o'clock office, when the good monks had been up and at work for three hours at least, and the sun, too, was risen well into the heavens.

This office was not originally what is known as a Basilican office, that is one that was said in the quire, but rather a private prayer used by the monks immediately they rose in the morning. "Ista prima ibi cantatur ubi dormiunt," says one of the oldest authorities on the subject, quoted by Dr. Batifol in his "Histoire du Bréviaire romain." But long before the fourteenth century it had become the first of the recognized canonical day hours said regularly in monastic churches and cathedrals, and the word "prime" had become synonymous with 6 o'clock a.m., the average time of sunrise throughout the year. At 9 o'clock—i.e., the third hour after sunrise or prime, the office not of prime but of tierce was said, a word which like "prime" bears its own meaning—the office of the third hour.

It is curious, though, that Dr. Skeat thus starting from a wrong basis, and reasoning wrongly upon it, comes to a right conclusion as to the time meant by the expression "half way pryme." The expression does mean, as Dr. Skeat says, half-past 7. But if he was right in thinking prime meant 9 o'clock, "half way pryme," to bring it to half-past 7, would require "half way" to mean half way between prime and the canonical hour next before prime. It is scarcely necessary to say that this is not the meaning of "half way" in this connexion, or that it does mean half way between the hour named and the succeeding canonical hour, not the preceding. Thus "half way pryme" means half way between prime and tierce—i.e., half way between 6 o'clock and 9 o'clock. So though "prime" does not mean 9, nor "half way pryme" half way between 9 and the preceding canonical hour, it does mean half-past 7.

While on this point I may be allowed to notice the unnecessary length of time—four days—supposed to be taken up by the telling of the Canterbury Tales, both by Dr. Furnivall, in his preface to the six-text edition of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales," and by Dr. Skeat. The pilgrims were made to start on the 17th or 18th of April. The later I suggest as the day Chaucer intended. That is, in our present calendar, April 26th, when the sun rises at a quarter before 5 o'clock, and it would be daylight long before that. In line 822 of the prologue, speaking of the morning on which his pilgrims started on their journey from the Tabard, Chaucer says:—"Amorwe whan that day gan for to sprynge, Up roos oure hoost and was oure aller cok." That is, the pilgrims were aroused at daybreak. They naturally started at once, they would be well on their way, and the Knight's tale begun by 5 o'clock at the latest. Then came the Miller's tale, and then the Reeve, at line 3,906, says, "Lo Depford I and it is half way pryme"—i.e., it is half-past 7. The Reeve then tells his story, not a very long one, and the Cook perhaps follows with another, or, as Dr. Skeat suggests, the Yeoman's tale is substituted for the Cook's. Then the host makes a speech to the company, in which he tells them it is "ten of the clokke," just about the time we should expect it to be. He tells them, too, "The fourthe party of this day is gon" (Line 17). What day? Obviously the first. No other day has been mentioned, nor could have been mentioned, because not nearly sufficient tales have yet been told to take up the whole of the first day.

The host then calls upon the Man of Lawe—"tel us a tale anon," having made some wise reflections on loss of time, and advising them to lose none. The "Man of Lawe" at once proceeds with his tale. In this plain and simple account of the progress of the tales so far on the first day we thus have the Knight's tale and the Miller's tale, taking up the time till 7 30, then the Reeve, and perhaps the Yeoman, go on till 10, and the Man of Lawe goes straight on from that time. Then come the tales of the Shipman, and the Prioress, and Chaucer's tale of Melibeus; these, with the Monk's tale and that of the Nun's Priest, if this is their right order, might well take up the rest of the first day. But modern editors make a break at the sudden end of the Cook's tale—why nobody knows—and begin a second day (or group B as they call it) and leave the pilgrims, much against the host's advice, without any tale for the rest of their first day. Thus they would cease to carry out their proposed way of employing their time from 10 o'clock in the morning till they arrive at the end of their first day's journey. Professor Skeat feels this difficulty, but does not get over it. He says, speaking of his supposed second day or group B, which he begins with the Man of Lawe, "something is wanted to bring the time up to 10 o'clock." A good deal is wanted according to his and other editor's division. Not only the first day from 10 in the morning till the evening is a blank, but the next day from daybreak, when they would start afresh, up to 10 a.m. is wanting. If we adopt the obvious course of tales which I venture to suggest, neither of these wants are felt.

It should be remembered, too, that when Chaucer began his work he intended each pilgrim to tell two tales on the way to Canterbury. Now there were, including the Canon's Yeoman, twenty-nine persons, so that the poet had, at any rate at the beginning of his work, to be economical of his space, and to get as much as possible, perhaps more than was possible, into the time he had at his disposal on the road between London and Canterbury, a distance which to pilgrims on horseback did not usually take more than three days. But some learned editor starts the theory that after the Cook's tale there must be an interval of twenty-four hours, and other editors follow him without giving any adequate reason for their adoption of the theory, and against the plain words of their author.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HAMILTON BROMBY.

THE VICTORIA COUNTY HISTORIES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the exhaustive review of the Victoria County History of Hampshire in Literature of to-day, my name alone appears in connexion with the class Insecta.

I have nothing to complain of, but, in justice to my colleagues, I desire to say that I could not have undertaken the section of the work entrusted to me without the able co-operation of Miss Ethel Chawner, the Rev. Canon Fowler, Messrs. Frederick Adams, Malcolm Burr, Eustace Bankes, P. M. Bright, James Edwards, W. H. B. Fletcher, R. McLachlan, J. J. King, Kenneth Morton, Edward Saunders, J. J. Walker, and Captain Savile Reid. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

HERBERT GOSS.

The Avenue, Surbiton-hill, Oct. 20, 1900.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I read in your columns that the publishers of the new County History of England "are under a pledge to destroy all unsubscribed-for copies that may remain on hand." I hope it is not too late to protest against this destruction, and to appeal from Constable—well, from Constable the tradesman to Constable the man of letters. Why not place such volumes in libraries not rich enough to buy them? Give them to London Board schools, prisons, workhouses, lunatic asylums, anything; but to destroy them! Sir, I cannot believe it. I have heard much against publishers from Sir Walter Besant and others. Doubtless they drive hard bargains; but to destroy good books deliberately! It would be unpardonable and a corner should be added to the "Inferno," in which such publishers should be forced to publish for ever, and distribute free of cost to all souls in that region, no books but choice literary works, for which they must pay a hundred per cent. royalty to the author for ever and ever. Yours faithfully,

Rugby, Oct. 21. W. H. D. ROUSE.

SWINBURNE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—While I agree with almost every word of Mr. Hood's appreciation of Swinburne, I should like to answer Mr. P. A. Sillard, if possible, once and for all. He says that my reasons for calling Swinburne a great poet were inadequate, and he might well be right when those reasons had to be packed into the limited space of a letter; but, nevertheless, if you will allow me, I will give him—as I have already given—more reasons than he will know how to answer. First, however, I must absolutely and emphatically decline to discuss the question that Mr. Sillard brings forward so pertinaciously. It is really most embarrassing to read letters that discuss one's inferiority to Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Henley, Matthew Arnold, Swinburne, and Mr. P. A. Sillard; for it seems to me that, in the adoption of such a standard, Mr. P. A. Sillard somewhat overestimates my importance as well as his own.

He speaks, once more, of my lack of "restraint." I only know that the one mistake I certainly made in my first letter, for which I have been sorry ever since, was due to what Mr. P. A. Sillard calls "restraint," and what I call "childish humbug." I said that I admired some of Mr. Henley's verses, and it was a mean thing to say; for, in reality, I thought that, though they were not quite great poetry, they were some of the noblest poems ever written.

My reasons for calling Swinburne a great poet were these. In the first place I mentioned a few great authorities who thought, at least, that Swinburne wrote very excellent poetry. In the next place, I said that he had influenced English literature more than any other poet that ever lived. My reasons for that assertion were these. He began to write when England was under the domination of Tennyson. After twenty years there were some three hundred writers of verse. Every single one of these had forsaken Tennyson, and was under the direct influence of Swinburne. It would be useless to quote examples from writers like Mr. Lang, Mr. Dobson, Mr. Gosse, A. O'Shaughnessy, and others; but, even now, his influence is found in the remotest and most unexpected places. Mr. Watson, for instance, is a professed follower of Wordsworth. But hear him in unguarded moments:—

> The triumph of him that begot,
> And the travail of her that bore,
> Behold, they are evermore
> As warp and weft in our lot.

Then, Mr. Henley, who says that Swinburne is "damned to the infernal deeps," could not have written—

> By the dismal fords, the thankless hills, the desolate half-dead flats,
> He has shepherded them like silly sheep and cornered them like rats;

unless Mr. Kipling had written—

> Down in the dark, the utter dark, where the blind white sea-snakes are;

and unless Swinburne had previously written:—

> Sudden and steady the music as eight hoofs trample and thunder
> Rings in the ear of the low blind wind of the night as we pass.

The difference in the method of handling words will be obvious if these typical pieces of modern poetry are compared with a typical piece of Tennyson:—

> Robed in universal harvest up to either pole she smiles,
> Universal ocean softly washing all her warless isles.

The Swinburnian lines are clearer, keener, more closely knit, and in other hands than Swinburne's generally less mellifluous than the Tennysonian lines; and this is what I meant by saying that Swinburne keeps a tighter rein over his words than even Tennyson did. Mr. P. A. Sillard calls my statement a critical bêtise. He absolutely ignores the distinction I drew between the elaboration which is the natural and proper result of literary evolution and the lack of "restraint" or control of words. If Mr. P. A. Sillard thinks that the mere "trill" of a sentence can ever, by the biggest booby, be mistaken for expression, form of thought, style of intelligible speech, he will hardly find a more satisfying and silvery trill than > Lillibullero-bullen-a-la.

But if that gives him no satisfaction, what is the cause of its failure? Well, inasmuch as Mr. Sillard hints at the unutterable bêtise that I ought not to discuss "pregnant thought and succinct expression" because, if you please, "they have never been the qualities for which Swinburne has so long and deservedly been admired," I will quote some words of John Addington Symonds, on F. W. H. Myers, which seem to answer the question. "Every word here tells not merely for the metrical effect, but because it has true meaning in it and the rhythm is vitalized with passion, with sympathy for moods assimilated, with grasp upon the actuality of the imagined situation. Mr. Myers has notable affinities with Mr. Swinburne." I may sum up that quotation in a single sentence. There are many people who can appreciate a negro melody, but are absolutely incapable of appreciating a symphony from Beethoven. Now, Mr. Sillard says that Swinburne's words, "who cannot hate can love not," are untrue. They are absolutely true and can be proved scientifically to be true. So long as foulness is in opposition to purity, sorrow to joy, and life to death; so long as the homogeneity of the corpse is lower than the heterogeneity of a great human nature, so long as a single heart revolts at a tale of cruelty or injustice, those words are absolutely true. Perhaps the words uttered by a certain personification of Love eighteen, nearly nineteen, hundred years ago, were also uttered by the personification of Hate. I refer to certain words about a "generation of vipers." And, in conclusion, I will challenge Mr. Sillard to produce any lines of equal length and number from any poet, ancient or modern, in English or French literature, that contain more pregnant thought, succinct expression, and striking illustration than these:—

> Who cannot hate can love not, if he grieve
> His tears are barren as the unfruitful rain
> That rears no harvest from the green sea's plain;
> And as thorns crackling this man's laugh is vain;
> Nor can belief touch, kindle, smite, reprieve,
> His heart who has not heart to disbelieve.

Yours faithfully,

ALFRED NOYES.

THE SIN-EATER IN SOUTH WALES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The Rev. T. Shankland's letter will not help Mr. Ernest Rhys much, I am afraid. Jones of Rhoslan has been already summoned into Court in this controversy. In October, 1895, I sent a letter to Professor Rhys, who sent it on to Mr. Hartland, who, in turn, wrote to me asking my permission to make use of the information contained in it. That letter quoted Jones of Rhoslan's account of the custom, and also an earlier description from the British Magazine, Vol. VII. (1835), professing to be taken from a MS. once in the possession of a Bishop of St. Asaph. There is no doubt that the Bishop alluded to was Fleetwood, who, in 1710 (in the words of Archdeacon Thomas—"History of St. Asaph," p. 132), "printed and sent round his charge to the clergy some time before his visitation. . . .

With the charge he also sent a request to the clergy that they would supply him at his visitation with a short account of their parish and church, its dedication, wakes, monuments, superstitions, usages, townships, tithes, and titheholders. . . . Many pages of the transcript of 'Llyfr Coch Asaph,' in the Episcopal Library, are in his handwriting."

All the later descriptions of the North-Walian funeral customs that I have seen—Pennant's "Journey to Snowdon" (1781), J. Evans' "Tour in North Wales" (1800), Bingley's (1800), Jones of Rhoslan's "Drych yr Amseroedd" (1820), "Cymru Fu" (1862)—are founded on the St. Asaph MS. account. The most interesting variation is that the original account says nothing about coffins, for the very good reason that coffins were not in common use in Wales in the early part of the eighteenth century; whereas the later copyists, ignorant or forgetful of that fact, all mention the coffin, which also duly appears in the coloured plate in the Rev. Peter Roberts' "Popular Cambrian Antiquities," and is reproduced (uncoloured) in Wirt Sikes' valuable "British Goblins." All these North-Walian customs may be easily traced back to the suppressed Roman Catholic rites of the sixteenth century by means of an account of the "State, Civil and Ecclesiastical, of the County of Lancaster, about the year 1580," printed by Earwaker, from a MS. in the Bodleian, in the Chetham Society's "Miscellanies," Vol. V. The expressions of "horror" and so forth, so liberally indulged in by Moggridge at Ludlow in 1852, when describing the alleged "sin-eating" custom at Llandebie, would be quite out of place in regard to the above.

Mr. Shankland does not seem to be quite "up to date" as to the present position of the controversy. Mr. Hartland's treatment of the quotation from Jones of Rhoslan gives the line of cleavage, so to speak, exactly. When I twitted him with omitting the last two sentences of Jones' account ("The whole family used to kneel on the graves on the Sunday after the funeral, each to say his Paternoster. And they would never mention any deceased member of the family or kin without saying most devoutly, 'Heaven be his portion!'"), Mr. Hartland replied that the omitted sentences had "nothing to do with the 'diodles,'" for they referred to a different place and a different day. Thus, he dogmatically assumed what he was required to prove, namely, that the funeral dole was a survival of an old "Celtic" tribal feast, the central feature of which was eating the corpse. I, on the other hand, maintained that the so-called funeral feast was nothing but the dilapidated remains of the old pre-Reformation "dirge," with its usual sequelæ of trental and anniversary. I hope that I may not be considered immodest if I avow my belief that I have proved my point. I have given a full, but of course not exhaustive, account of the whole controversy in the Llan (Church Press, Lampeter) during the past seven months, to which I would refer such of your readers as can read Welsh.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. P. OWEN.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Bookselling in South Africa, after many months of stagnation, is beginning to show signs of revival. It is satisfactory that the sale of school books has remained unaffected throughout the war; in general literature the South African trade—which as a rule has to be taken seriously into account—has been virtually non-existent since the Boers crossed the border into British territory. One of the leading booksellers of Johannesburg, however, has just visited London for fresh supplies, and is now on his way back to start business again. It was interesting to learn from him that on returning to Johannesburg recently he found that his shops and their contents—books to the value of £5,000—remained exactly as he left them, while another bookselling house in the town had been looted by the Boers most shamefully. The same authority holds sanguine views concerning the prospects of the South African trade, but he believes it will be at least two years before any decided improvement sets in. Machinery and other things are more urgently needed for the moment, as well as a really peaceful settlement. Books will follow.

Sir Lewis Morris' new book of verse will appear early in November. Besides a number of shorter lyrics, several of which have appeared in Literature, the volume comprises two long unpublished poems, one in elegiac verse, "The March of Man"; the other, in blank verse, a Georgian romance, founded on a dramatic story of crime reported from the Russian tribunals of last spring, and reproduced accurately. The volume will also comprise the odes on the death of Mr. Gladstone and on the Diamond Jubilee, which appeared in a morning paper. It is to appear simultaneously here and in America, and will probably be the writer's last work.

Mr. Murray, in his compromise between cut and uncut edges, by which, though the pages are cut, the edges are left rough at the side and the bottom, would seem to have accidentally invented what has been invented before. Messrs. Methuen state that for nearly three years they have been using this method. After all, we are not so sure that this via media adopted by Mr. Murray and Messrs. Methuen will conciliate all tastes. As all men are born Platonists or Aristotelian, so are they born with an innate leaning to smooth or rough edges. It is a fundamental difference of taste. Those who only care about having their pages ready cut may be satisfied; and so may those who only care to have the edges rough. But how about those who actually prefer the smoothness of the machine-cut edge? Or how about the leisurely and respectable readers who love to handle the paper-knife?

Mr. Leonard Huxley's life of his father, Thomas Henry Huxley, which Messrs. Macmillan now publish, aims at putting the man before the reader rather than at discussing his scientific and philosophical achievements. That, of course, is the first duty of the biographer. The science and the philosophy is already before the world, and has already challenged the judgment of experts, whereas, to all but those who had the privilege of knowing him personally, the man has yet to be revealed. And it is a matter of acknowledged fact that Huxley gave to those who did not know him personally a misleading impression of his character by the militancy of his controversial methods. For, though "ever a fighter" (in Browning's phrase) in matters of thought and opinion he was, on the unanimous testimony of his friends, very lovable as a man. Mr. Wilfred Ward has put on record his own surprise and pleasure on first meeting Huxley to find, instead of the man of combative and even aggressive manner he had expected, a personality of singular charm; and the story has been told more than once of the disinclination of the older members of the Metaphysical Society to admit among them such a firebrand, and of his popularity after he had joined. Mr. Leonard Huxley's biography is not the only account of Huxley we are to have. Messrs. Putnams announce a book on "Thomas Henry Huxley," by Mr. P. Chalmers Mitchell, planned some years ago for this firm's series of "Leaders of Science." And we are to get a volume on Huxley by Mr. Edward Clodd, in Messrs. Blackwood's series of Modern English Writers.

Messrs. Gowans and Gray announce a new series devoted to standard authors, both English and foreign, to be called The Complete Library. The works of each writer are to be given unabridged, and their letters will also be included. All the different readings from authoritative editions will be given, and, where necessary, notes and glossaries. Each author is to have a separate editor. One volume will appear every month, and on December 1 the first of five monthly volumes, containing the works and letters of Keats, edited by Mr. H. Buxton Forman, will be published. Some fresh manuscripts of some of Keats' poems have come to light, and at least one previously unpublished letter will be added. The price of each volume in the series will be 1s. net.

Apropos of the reproduction of Mr. Fuch's medal which we publish this week we note that a copy of Carter's "Medals of the British Army, and How They were Won"—clearly a book for the present moment—is included in the last catalogue issued by Mr. Spencer of New Oxford-street. The author sets out the main features of the campaigns, or actions, for which the medals were given. He stops short, however, in the sixties, hence a large part of the subject has yet to be written. Medals are granted now with a frequency that to the lay mind is almost startling in comparison with the few that were issued in the earlier half of the century. Nearly twenty different medals have been issued during the past ten years, to say nothing of the numerous clasps which have been added to medals for exceptional engagements.

Under the heading "The Abuse of the Possessive" Mr. E. D. Little writes to us as to a reference he had made to the use of the genitive in a passage in the Revelations which, in his letter to us, he had quoted from memory:—

> The reference in my last letter to the authorized version of the Bible should run as follows:—
> A comparison of Rev. xviii.,12, and Rev. xxi.,19, affords a very curious illustration of the tendency. In the former we find "all manner vessels of ivory, and all manner vessels of most precious wood," and in the latter "all manner of precious stones."
> In the next sentence for "this chapter" read "these chapters," and for "names" read "nouns."

"The Bibliographical Society of Lancashire." This is the name of an association now in course of formation, whose President is Prof. W. A. Raleigh, and Hon. Sec. Mr. E. Gordon Duff, of the John Rylands Library, Manchester. The Committee numbers fourteen, among them Messrs. H. Guppy, R. A. S. Macfie, and D. Lloyd Roberts. It is proposed to limit the membership to 150 with an annual subscription of £1, an entrance fee of a similar sum to be charged after the election of the first hundred members. Working bibliographers will be specially welcomed, and there is every likelihood that the roll of the society will soon be filled. Interesting extra publications—publications, that is, other than the papers read at the meetings—will be issued from time to time.

With reference to the suggestion in our article on "The Subject Catalogue of the British Museum," "that a list of novels and plays would be found extremely useful," we understand that a complete list of printed plays has been made by Mr. Herbert Gatfield, of the British Museum, and stands in the Reading Room at the centre desk, where it is accessible to readers, and that it is ready for the press.

Messrs. Newnes have an original idea, a series now in preparation of handbooks called "Our Neighbours," edited by William Harbutt Dawson. They will not be statistical, political, or controversial, but will describe in a friendly spirit the intellectual and social life of the various peoples. The following will soon be ready: "French Life in Town and Country," by Miss Hannah Lynch; "German Life in Town and Country," by W. H. Dawson; "Russian Life in Town and Country," by Francis H. E. Palmer, sometime secretary to H.H. Prince Dronthop-Loubetsky; "Dutch Life in Town and Country," by a Resident at The Hague.

Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode write:—

> Last winter you kindly noticed our effort to provide entertaining and instructive lantern lectures for institutions and societies throughout the country. May we be allowed to point out that we have improved upon our idea of last year by obtaining the services of several popular writers to prepare lantern lectures, copies of which are sent (with slides) for a small fee to societies, institutions, schools, &c., who are unable to afford the expense of paying large sums to lecturers for their personal services. For the coming season we have arranged with Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., M.P., to write on "A Century of Empire"; the Earl of Rosslyn on "With Roberts to Pretoria"; Mr. Clement K. Shorter on "Illustrated Journalism—Yesterday and To-day"; and Mr. Arthur Cratchit on "An Evening with 'Punch.'"
> Particulars of the above scheme will be sent to any of your readers on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope.

Lord Frederic Hamilton is succeeded in the editorship of the Pall Mall Magazine by Mr. George R. Halkett, who has been art editor for the last three years.

In our list of Publishers' Announcements contained in our supplement of October 6th, we announced Vol. IV. instead of Vol. III. of the "Biographical History of Gonville and Caius College," edited by Dr. Venn and published by the Cambridge University Press.

The Magazine of Art has acquired the right to publish a long series of pictures in the Wallace Collection. These will begin in the November part.

Mr. Macqueen has in preparation a book on The Transvaal Secret Service by "One Who Was In It," which gives some curious facts about Transvaal officials.

Mr. John Long has an illustrated volume entitled "Australia at the Front," which gives a colonial view of the war by Mr. Frank Wilkinson, the special correspondent of the Sydney Daily Telegraph, who accompanied the troops from Australia through the campaign.

Messrs. Nisbet and Co. announce "The Church Directory and Almanack," for December, a new publication with new features, and costing not more than 2s. net. Mr. Walter Walsh's "History of the Romeward Movement in the Church of England, 1833-1864," will be published by Messrs. Nisbet next week. They also announce a memoir and appreciation of the late Lieutenant Tait, by Mr. J. L. Low, who was one of that officer's most intimate friends, and a well-known amateur golf player.

Gabriele D'Annunzio, whose reputation outside of Italy is growing, is reported to have finished a new play on the often dramatized theme of Francesca da Rimini. It will be produced simultaneously in Italian and German. D'Annunzio's Il Fuoco and Sogno d'un mattino di primavera have just appeared in German translation and are apparently finding a large sale.

Mr. Croal Thomson, the editor of the Art Journal, contributes an article, with twenty illustrations, to Part VII. of "the Paris Exhibition" (Special Series of the Art Journal), dealing with the collection of works by Old Masters of the English School to be seen in the British Pavilion in the Rue des Nations.

Readers interested in exotic literatures are not likely to have forgotten the very interesting book on Yiddish literature produced last year by Mr. Leo Wiener of Harvard, and his account of the gift of the living Yiddish poet, Morris Rosenfeld. An edition of Mr. Rosenfeld's poems is now announced by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons with the title "Songs from the Ghetto," accompanied by a prose translation and glossary. An introduction has been written by Mr. Wiener. Dante and Chaucer had a simple task compared with that of the poet who is to make of Yiddish a classical tongue.

Messrs. Macmillan are publishing "A Life of Francis Parkman," by Mr. C. H. Farnham. The historian of Canada was, it seems, a cripple hampered further by other physical defects. He depended on crutches for walking, and on the eyes of others for the study of the manuscript authorities for his histories. His biographer, weighing his achievements against his disabilities, calls him one of the heroic figures in the history of letters. The biography comes as a fitting complement of the fine library edition of Parkman's historical works recently issued by the same firm.

The list of volumes in the "Sermon Seed" Series, or "Homiletics for Every One," also announced by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, may be useful:—Vol. I. Sketches of Sermons of the late Bishop Phillips Brooks; Vol. II. A Collection of Illustrations from the same; Vol. III. An Analysis of the Seven Volumes of Sermons of Pastor Bersier, of the French Protestant Pulpit; Vol. IV. Sketches of 150 Sermons on texts from the Psalms by English, American, and other Preachers—Ward Beecher, Liddon, Farrar, Maclaren, &c.; Vol. V. Sketches of 150 Sermons on texts from Isaiah—from similar sources.

Monsieur Félix Alcan's announcements for the autumn contain a new volume in the "Histoire de la Troisième République," by M. Zevort, entirely devoted to the administration of President Carnot; a volume on Prussia, by Professor Waddington of Lyons, in the series of "Instructions to the French Ambassadors from 1648 to 1789," an invaluable collection published under the auspices of the French Foreign Office; and Prof. Guerand's "La Main d'Œuvre Ouvrière dans l'Ancienne Grèce." From Professor Luchaire we are to have a collection of essays entitled "Mélanges d'Histoires du Moyen-Age." Among M. Alcan's philosophical works are "Le Problème de la Vie," by M. Bourdeau, and Paulhan's "Psychologie de l'Invention." The leading French idealist, Professor Renouvier, is to bring out a long-awaited book on "Les Dilemmes de la Métaphysique Pure," and a volume by

M. de Roberty on "La Constitution de l'Ethique." M. Alcan has also the good fortune to have got hold of the little book in which M. Couturat is to bring out some unpublished fragments of Leibnitz on logic.

Books to look out for at once.

CHESS LIBRARIES.—A few enthusiasts have made it one of their chief aims to gather together everything in the shape of chess literature that could be obtained in a lifetime. The literature of chess it far more extensive than most people pretty well acquainted with other branches of literature would imagine, and very curious are some of the old books and MSS. Mr. J. D. Séguin (Times Democrat, New Orleans) writes as follows apropos of the collection of Mr. Chas. A. Gilberg, of Brooklyn;—"It was nearly forty years ago, almost in the beginning of his chess career, and with a casual purchase of Agnel's 'Chess for Winter Evenings,' that Mr. Gilberg began the accumulation of his present great chess library and collection of chess pictures and curios, which, as he informed us not very long since, had reached far over 2,000 volumes, and thus ranked as the third, if not, indeed, now the second, of the world. The wonderful collection of Mr. John G. White, of Cleveland, O., which must now approximate 4,000 volumes, stands, of course, unapproached, and that of Baron von Heydebrand, of Wiesbaden, Germany, perhaps exceeds Mr. Gilberg's slightly in numbers, but almost assuredly by no great margin, if at all. It is questionable, indeed, if any chess collection surpassed his in the rarity and uniqueness of its contents. Running from a Cessoli's of 1480, a Ruy Lopez of the incomparably rare first edition of 1561, a group of forty editions of Vida, beginning with that of 1527, down to the latest work of the present day, the chess bibliophile found himself almost bewildered by the array of chess bibliographic treasures spread before him in the library of the deceased chess amateur." Since this was written Baron von Heydebrand und der Lasa has likewise departed, and we have no idea what will become of these chess treasures. It is only a couple of years since we received some pleasant communications from der Lasa, with a copy of his catalogue, to which we may be able to refer more fully at some future time. Mr. Séguin has a large modern collection, but a fire in New Orleans destroyed many choice works some years ago.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

A real honour has been conferred, albeit indirectly, upon sound scholarship by the promotion of Mr. George Laurence Gomme to be clerk of the London County Council. He is a devoted public servant, a distinguished statistician, and an authority on Local Government (on which he has written excellent books). By way of recreation he founded the "Folklore Society," became its vice-president, and has produced some valuable antiquarian literature, particularly "The Village Community." In still lighter moments he devised "The Kings," "The Queens," and "The Princes Story Books." We heartily congratulate him on another event of interest to be recorded in a new edition of his "History of London in the Victorian Era."

The connexion between diplomacy and letters is not now so strong in this country as in the palmy days of Addison and Mat Prior, when an embassy to Paris or The Hague was considered well within the reach of a tolerable poet. Literature probably did not do much to secure their positions in the service to the late Owen Meredith, or to Sir Rennell Rodd. But America has carried on the tradition with such names as Motley and Lowell, to say nothing of lesser lights. In Italy the pursuit of letters, even of fiction, is often associated with public life. The late Italian Ambassador Baron de Renzis, besides being a soldier, a politician, and a diplomatist, was a novelist, a dramatist, and a poet.

For students of literature the most interesting item in the November Monthly Review is Mr. Hall Griffin's translation of an Italian MS., discovered last January, which narrates the events on which Browning founded "The Ring and the Book." The actual source of the poem was "the square old yellow book" in which Browning found the evidence adduced in the trial of Guido Franceschini in 1698. This is now at Balliol College, Oxford, and a translation of it is in progress.

Mr. George Smith, of Smith, Elder, and Co., contributes to the Cornhill an all too brief instalment of reminiscences under the title of "In the Early Forties." What a happy time the reviewer would have if our voluminous autobiographers would confine themselves to such gems of reminiscence as the following about Leigh Hunt!:—

> I had to pay him a sum of money, £100 or £200, and I wrote him a cheque for the amount. "Well," he said, "what am I to do with this little bit of paper?" I told him that if he presented it at the bank they would pay him cash for it, but, I added, "I will save you that trouble." I sent to the bank and cashed the cheque for him. He took the notes away carefully enclosed in an envelope. Two days afterwards Leigh Hunt came in a state of great agitation to tell me that his wife had burned them. He had thrown the envelope with the bank notes inside carelessly down and his wife had flung it into the fire. Leigh Hunt's agitation while on his way to bring this news had not prevented him from purchasing on the road a little statuette of Psyche which he carried, without any paper round it, in his hand. I told him I thought something might be done in the matter: I sent to the bankers and got the numbers of the notes, and then in company with Leigh Hunt went off to the Bank of England. I explained our business and we were shown into a room where three old gentlemen were sitting at tables. They kept us waiting some time, and Leigh Hunt, who had meantime been staring all round the room, at last got up, walked up to one of the staid officials, and addressing him said in wondering tones, "And this is the Bank of England! And do you sit here all day, and never see the green woods and the trees and flowers and the charming country?" Then in tones of remonstrance he demanded, "Are you contented with such a life?" All this time he was holding the little naked Psyche in one hand, and with his long hair and flashing eyes made a surprising figure. I fancy I can still see the astonished faces of the three officials; they would have made a most delightful picture. I said, "Come away, Mr. Hunt, these gentlemen are very busy." I succeeded in carrying Leigh Hunt off, and after entering into certain formalities we were told that the value of the notes would be paid in twelve months. I gave Leigh Hunt the money at once, and he went away rejoicing.

Five hundred years ago a licence was granted by Bishop Braybrooke to remove the old church at Tyburn and to build a new one of stones or flint dedicated to St. Mary, near the brook or bourne. Thereafter the Parish of Tyburn became known as St. Mary-le-Bourne, the Marylebone, or Marybone of our own time. The quincentenary of the dedication has this week been celebrated in the old Parish Church of Marylebone, in High Street, now a chapel-of-ease to the large edifice in the main road, wherein Robert Browning was married to Elizabeth Barrett. The original mother church was taken down in 1741, and the present building—the smallest church in London, it is said—built in its stead. On May 10, 1606, "Sir Francis Bacon was married—to his young wench in Maribone Chapel. He was clad from top to toe in purple, and hath made himself and his wife such store of fine raiment of cloth of silver and gold that it draws deep into her portion." So said Sir Dudley Carleton. Hogarth depicts the interior of the old church in "The Marriage," No. 5 of the "Rake's Progress" Series, and James Figg, the prize-fighter, whose portrait is given in the second plate, was buried here in 1734. To the existing little church Lord Byron was brought from Holles Street to be baptised on March 1, 1788, and fifteen years later Horatio Nelson Thompson, daughter of Nelson and Lady Hamilton, was christened. For long Dickens lived and worked at No. 1, Devonshire-terrace, close by, where his favourite raven died in 1841. The baptism in "Dombey and Son" took place in the church; moreover the clerk whom Dickens is said to have had in mind when writing it died only a brief time ago.

In another column we publish an article by Mr. W. M. Fullerton on the "Young French Poets," and the strong lyrical bias of recent French verse in defiance of the old conventions. Mr. Fullerton mentions Albert Samain, a poet of delicate and sensitive genius, whose recent death called forth a fitting tribute from Monsieur Louis Denise in the Mercure de France. The number also included some sonnets by Albert Samain himself. These alone afford good evidence of the sympathy with the humbler details of life which among other things marks the modern French school.

L'horloger, pâle et fin, travaille avec douceur.
Vagues, le seuil béant, somnolent les boutiques,
Et d'un trottoir à l'autre ainsi qu'aux temps antiques
Les saluts du matin échangent leur candeur.

Panonceaux du notaire et plaque du docteur. . .
A la fontaine un gars fait boire ses bourriques ;
Et vers le catéchisme en files symétriques
Des petits enfants vont, conduits par une sœur.

* * * *

The current number of the Edinburgh Review deals with Byron, and the writer, in a review of Mr. Murray's latest edition of that poet's works, points out that the majority of the present world knows more of Byron's private history than of his poems. It is not surprising that this should be the case, for the story of his life makes more attractive reading than most romances; but it looks as though, even now, we were far from attacking the great problem of his place as a poet in an unbiassed spirit. As long ago as 1830 Macaulay wrote that the time would come when his "rank and private history will not be regarded in estimating his poetry." It may come yet, but the industry of editors is doing what it can to delay the consummation.

Byron is perhaps the most remarkable instance of the passion for personalia. His private life exercised the greatest influence on his reputation as a poet. Those who objected to his treatment of his wife found it difficult to praise his verses, while those who were attracted by his reckless disregard of convention and cynical contempt of the world found an added pleasure in his poetry. Few reputations have see-sawed more violently—have been more lavishly praised and more fiercely attacked. Had his poetry alone been in question, the verdict would have been settled long ago. But an alien element was introduced, and has confused the issue for the best part of a century. It was Charles Lamb who wrote to the editor of the Reflector a lengthy and cogent epistle "On the Danger of Confounding Moral with Personal Deformity"; but the peril of confounding moral with artistic deformity is at times equally worthy of notice. It is at least pleasanter (to put it only upon that ground) to form our conception of a favourite author from the internal evidence afforded by his works than from scraps of dubious gossip about his domestic affairs. Milton, in private life, may have been a dull or ill-conditioned pedant; we are content to know that he showed us a better self in his printed books. But it is unfortunately almost out of the question at present to reconstruct for ourselves the real Lord Byron from his poetry alone.

The art of index-compilation is one of more utility than ornament, and those who practise it do not commonly get much reward for their labours, which is perhaps the reason why so few indexes combine accuracy with good arrangement. But the General Index for the Parliamentary Debates (Session 1900), issued by the indefatigable Miss Bailey, whose Annual Index to The Times we recently noticed, compels admiration. This portly volume of more than seven hundred pages claims to be the largest Session Index yet produced; and it has been brought out in perhaps the shortest time on record. It needs only a glance at such headings as India, China, the Army, or the South African War to show the amount of thought and labour involved in a compilation of this size and completeness.

The use of historical novels in teaching a boy history is very thoroughly investigated by Mr. C. S. Fearenside in the School World. His plan is that the master should have at hand a list of novels bearing upon the period which he is teaching, and with its help advise his boys what to read out of school hours. This little plot for disturbing the peace of a boy's playtime is neatly laid. But we doubt its efficacy except so far as the precocious youth is concerned, and it is the average youth with whom masters have to deal. To him the etiquette which exists between masters and boys is more engrossing even than Scott's novels; and in his opinion the interference of a master out of school should not extend further than a little tactful guidance from behind a cricket net. He will find some means of evading any novels which are provided for his improvement; or should he read them their connexion with his history lesson will probably hinder his pleasure in them. Was not Byron led to depreciate Horace in this way? We are quite at one with Mr. Fearenside as to the educational value of historical novels, especially if teachers are themselves well up in them. But we are afraid the system he proposes must be attended with drawbacks.

In reference to the statement we made the other day that Zachary Macaulay, like his son, was buried in Westminster Abbey, it has been pointed out to us that, though a monument was erected to Zachary in the Abbey, his body actually rests in Mecklenburg Square.

It is interesting to compare Alphonse Daudet's posthumous confession "Premier Voyage—Premier Mensonge" with Mr. Barrie's "Sentimental Tommy." The capacity of the young Daudet for playing a part was not inferior to that of Mr. Barrie's unsatisfactory hero. This fatal gift of imaginative make-believe was recently put forward in a story of Mr. Neil Munro's as specially a Celtic characteristic. Yet Tommy was a lowlander and Alphonse Daudet a "méridional." We probably owe this posthumous book of Daudet to a suggestion of Edmond de Goncourt. Daudet one day expressed his regret that he had written "Le Petit Chose" before he had learnt "to see"; and M. de Goncourt advised him to write the story of his childhood afresh, just as if he had not already made a novel of it; the comparison between old and new, he thought, would be highly interesting. Daudet, it is said, acting on this hint told some of the stories of his childhood to Mr. Sherard for the latter to make into a book. As is only too customary in French books, no editorial light is vouchsafed us to the manner of the composition of this posthumous volume; but certainly "Premier Voyage—Premier Mensonge" was the title that gossip then assigned to the forthcoming product of this novel method of collaboration between Daudet and Mr. Sherard.

The Murders of Delicia.

A popular writer of fiction has familiarized us with a character, introduced under different names into many different novels—the woman of literary genius whose epoch-making works, admired by Royalty, leave her husband cold; who pines beneath the blighting indifference or jealousy of this critic on the hearth, and who makes him a criminal by dying before her time. In the Medical Press a daring attempt is made to put the boot upon the other leg, and to prove by cold-blooded, actuarial calculations that the genitive in the phrase "the murder of Delicia" should be read not as an objective but as a subjective genitive—that, in short, if there is any murder in the case at all Delicia is not the murdered but the murderess. Such, at least, is our interpretation of the grave statement that "it is found that, not alone in the number of survivors, but also in the length of survivorship, the husbands of literary women compare unfavourably with their fellows in ordinary wedlock." This pointed use of the word "ordinary"—as though marrying a woman of letters were something abnormal and unnatural, like marrying a nun or a cannibal princess—is probably the result of loose writing rather than of malice afore-thought. We may let it pass, therefore, and, assuming for the sake of argument that our contemporary's facts are right, cast about us for an explanation of the phenomenon. It would, of course, be easier to find the explanation if we knew of what complaints the husbands usually died. The Medical Press omits to tell us—an omission which almost moves us to accuse its editor of toying with a solemn subject in a very unscientific spirit. If, on the other hand, we seek our information from the works of the novelists themselves, we find discrepancies in the evidence. In a novel which we lately read a literary lady gave her husband boiled duck for dinner. If it could be shown that that were the general practice of literary ladies, there would be no need of any further witness. But it was in a man's novel that this boiled duck figured. In many women's novels we find a very different picture to contrast with it: the picture of the wife who, devoid of ambition and ignorant of her own abilities, discovers that she has literary genius at the opportune moment when her husband is dying of consumption, writes novels to pay for the cod liver oil, and finds herself growing famous while his life is flickering out. These stories would suggest that an invalid husband stimulates a woman's talents much as poverty is supposed to stimulate a man's, and, if we knew that they were true, they too, like the other story which we quoted, would explain the facts by which the editor of the Medical Press is puzzled. But the two explanations are mutually destructive. In the former case, that of the boiled duck, the "literariness" of the wife causes the husband's suffering; in the latter the situation is exactly reversed. It may well be that neither explanation is the true one. Our contemporary suggests that "it is not improbable that the average of men marrying literary women do so at an advanced period of life"; but this is hardly in accordance with the known facts of literary history. Middle-aged literary women have been on the contrary rather famous for their success in fascinating the affections of very young men. They like, as George Sand did, to feel simultaneously the emotions of the mistress and the mother—there are many parallel instances in England as well as France. Our contemporary's riddle, therefore, still remains without an answer; but we are offered a sop of consolation in the statement that "where both members of the couple are literary" the husband's expectations of life are higher—that as dog does not eat dog, so Delicia does not murder her husbands when she and they sit at the opposite ends of the table writing novels. It follows that, in the interests of the higher morality, all our unmarried men of letters should lose no time in proposing matrimony to our unmarried women of letters in order to save others from a fate against which they alone are relatively immune. The prospect is one which we contemplate with sympathetic interest.

Personal Views.

THE HISTORIAN.

History is essentially the telling of a true Story. That Story must have some major interest and should properly boast a certain grandeur; it must be concerned with the political relations of men, or, if it be but an episode, it must attach to a personality or a place worthy of mention if it is to deserve the great title of History. But while it is true that the matter demands proportion and degree, yet the governing condition which marks out History from every other department of letters is that in writing History you are telling a great Story, and that the Story is true.

If a man should go about saying that it is a science, a work whose interest lies in the mere getting at a fact or the barren formulation of a law, he would be very wrong. For in the first place no human relation was yet discovered, not even that established in criminal trials, where Fact was more than an imperfect foundation whereon human emotions, memories, and moral analogies could build up their unsubstantial reality; and in the second place no accumulation of Fact whatsoever will give to the accidents of living the rigidity of a scientific law. It may be that determinism is a false scent; it may be that the synthesis is too complex for the mind to deal with; whatever it is, not even our moderns can force History into the mould of physics. For there runs all through it the picture of Ourselves, men loving, astonished, blundering, finding their best in vague visions and their worst in fantastic terrors. In a word the spirit of comedy dominates this kind of literature above all others, and so true is this that if I had preferred epigram to exactitude I might have called history an admirable great comedy that happened to be true.

Now in the attempt to tell this true story, or, if you will, to present this comedy, there are three things a man has to do. He has to entertain his reader—that is his first function; it is quite impossible for a thing to remain in the mind that has not struck roots and grown there, therefore the mind must be stirred. Secondly he must take care to chronicle, that is he must be thinking all the while not only of his audience but of the jealous dead, and he must be passionately concerned that the deeds of great men shall not perish; nor can I imagine a better motive for beginning a History than the desire to do justice to unknown valour. Finally he must have continually present in his mind a corrective sense of detail and an industrious readiness to bolt out the truth, even in little things, for without this it is certain that the divine poetry that is in all of us will run away with him and that he will tell a fine story, but one in which, alas! a plot will soon introduce itself, till that which was meant for History ends as solid fiction should, in a just balance of reward and punishment.

I have put these three things in a certain order, and called one of them "the first" because it seemed prior to the others in point of time; I mean, a man must first desire to tell his story and catch his audience before he can consider those other qualities. Yet no one of the three is strictly chief, but all are equally indispensable to the whole. Each also may, according to the spirit of the time or the private bent of the writer, be especially insisted upon; and it is from such special insistence where all should be evenly adjusted that the major faults of Historians proceed. For at one time the picturesque, at another the exact, is in fashion and men are afraid of whatever criticism happens for the moment to be violent; but of all the errors which the Historian can commit, that of which we have all been lately guilty, and from which we are but just escaping, is surely the worst; I mean the accumulation of precise details, the passion for minute research, and the consequent neglect of unity and method.

If you contrast the kind of faults that have been committed from the exaggeration of the other elements in past Historical work with the result of this last kind of disproportion, it will be evident at once how much more regrettable is micrography than any other species of writing. For consider the Chroniclers. It was their business—or they thought it so—to note down merely what they thought to be of major importance among the things they saw or heard of. Yet, though they did this only, and neglected to weave the whole into a fabric, and even slipped into a hundred involuntary errors of statement, making half their story fabulous, yet what you get is a tale of a kind, and it is often startling in its physical poignancy—a kind of resurrection.

I noticed that even after dark one heard the whistling of the arrows.

I took the King's dress in my hand and compared it with the stuff of which his was made, and said, "See, you are a proud villain, you dress far above your station and wear the same cloth as the King himself."

A man on a tower built out to sea saw a ship, and said, "That is King Richard's ship for it is crimson all over and has crimson sails."

If a man writes these things he is welcome to tell me tales of salamanders and green afrits till the end of his book. I am none the less certain that I have a History of a kind before me. Simplicity and Humility have made him credulous, but they have also given him a powerful hold upon my heart and he brings up the dead men to life, men like him and me, by saying so many things as one would naturally say them, and noticing at once what all the world naturally notices.

Then again a more modern man, conscious of his pen and of the vast audience to which he can appeal, will sacrifice too much to the telling of a brilliant story. This our Romantics have certainly done. Michelet, for example, who, determined to launch an epic, brings in too many deified principles, establishes a Republican Olympus, and here and there keeps this man off the stage or thrusts that one on it for the sake of his climax. But such error and exaggeration remain pardonable. You can take a chapter of Michelet, cut out fifty abstract propositions, and correct with a pencil half-a-dozen inaccuracies (if as many) and still discover the Historian. He has certainly told you a fine great Story, and in the main a true one.

But that third modern error, micrography, is unpardonable, for it kills the very essence of History, cutting its root. In getting at the exact facts in a hundred details you are not telling a story at all, and, so far from telling the truth, you are quite certainly saying something false, and you are creating innumerable opportunities for telling some favourite lie. For, when I come to think of it, if I desired to create a thoroughly false impression, I should conceive no better way of doing it than by accumulating a number of absolutely certain facts (especially if they were rare) and arranging them in my own order; as, for instance, to say of Julius Cæsar, "This epileptic was of aristocratic birth and the principal matter of his works is to describe his own actions in the third person." Or, again, "The reign of George III. in Corsica was remarkable from the fact that it saw less murders, brigandage, and rebellions than that of any other Monarch the island had obeyed." The facts implied or stated in either of those sentences are absolutely true, the impression created is wholly false, and the larger the number of facts the more irrefragable would appear the vicious conclusion attached to them. Such "scavenging" of history has also this evil attached to it, that in no conceivable way can the accumulation of facts, even if they are well selected, present an historical truth. The actions of men, their interplay, and their relative values, have evidently something in them of the organic and no amount of mechanical industry will get life into dead materials. Leave out the breath of a time, its standards and ideals, its humour; or, again, leave out of account the common truths about men—that they are confused bunglers rather than plotters, that they act otherwise in crowds or in panic than they do singly and at ease; neglect to impress such verities upon your reader side by side with your relation of facts, and the total result, however true its component details may be, is false, and the next good poem or fairy tale you may come across is far more nearly related to the spirit of History than the rubbish heap you have accumulated with so much labour.

I know that in conclusion this will be asked;—How can the great mass of modern research be used, then, and by what right will you produce a book on this or that if you neglect it; and if you do not neglect it, how can you fail to be swamped if you try to write as the storytellers wrote fifty years ago? Well, the answer to such a question would be in itself a book, and a mere statement of it would exceed the conclusion of this article. But I should begin to answer that question by another. How do we understand and present true impressions of our everyday life? We see a million things, we do not do more than half note them, we do not remember them separately at all, and yet we get a truth out of the whole. I know what Piccadilly is and I know a Sussex landscape when I see it. How? The mind has done something with these innumerable details, for which the mathematicians furnish us a metaphor when they talk of integration. It is in a similar way that I would have a man receive the accumulation of detail which a strange swarm of servants has quarried for him. It need not absorb so much of his time as he fears—why, all the known facts on Waterloo would fit into a copy of The Times!—what he needs time for is the thinking out of the unity, the getting at the picture. And, when he has that, then let him present it as artists do, passed through the process of his mind and impressed with the harmony that the soul gives to everything it creates or transforms. And let him not begin to write until he finds that moment of vision of which the great French Historian speaks when he tells at the outset of his book, J'ai vu La France.

HILAIRE BELLOC.

THE YOUNG FRENCH POETS.

[By W. MORTON FULLERTON.]

There has just died, lost to his mother-province of Bresse—the Bresse of that Église de Brou which Matthew Arnold celebrated in some of his most Wordsworthian lines—a delightful poet long forgotten by Parisians. There was a moment, however, when he was the talk of the town. It was the moment when Anatole France was firing his most winged arrows at the fantastic little company of young poets then chirping in unwonted accents on the slopes of the hills of Sainte Geneviève and Montmartre. A countryman from the rich plain of the Bresse, M. Gabriel Vicaire—finaud (which is the French word for "canny") and ironically malicious—suddenly brought out one of the most amusing literary skits which has ever enlivened the literature of parody. In his "Deliquescences d'Adoré Floupette" he turned the attention of the boulevards to these chattering songsters of the new "Symbolist" School. He imitated their strange, fresh voices with all the mastery of the legendary mocking-bird. The extraordinary Inversions and circumlocutions of Moréas, the mysterious, opaque, and purple shadows of Mallarmé, the most unintelligent affectations of Count Robert de Montesquieu, all the strange and at times insolent exoticism of these youths piping in revolt against the restrictions of the Alexandrin and wooing the muse, to the scandal of academic France, into fresh Bohemian pastures new—everything, in fact, which constituted for French ears, accustomed to the verse of the classical drama, an impudent innovation, was reflected in this little book so deliciously as almost to deceive the initiated. The parodist himself passed for a time as a mystifier of the new school. The joke, however, was soon enough discovered, and Vicaire, hunted indignantly from the young literary circles, retired to the country, where he began to interpret, as he says in one of his verses :—

. . . L'esprit des aïeux et les mœurs d'antrefois.

The "spirit of the ancestors and the manners of yore" represented an ideal of contemplation very different from that which had inspired these strange youths and opened their eyes to the insufficiency of French poetic expression. The years have gone by—not many of them, but at least a decade—and Anatole France no longer jeers. The raillery of the journalists has ceased. The Academy honours some of the most characteristic of the innovators ; one of the most distinguished of them, who has married a daughter of the author of "Les Trophées," is invited by a great University to deliver a series of lectures on "The Poets of To-day and the Poetry of To-morrow." Verlaine himself is invited to Oxford, and the "young reviews," the Mercure de France and the Revue Blanche, which first sheltered these singers, have become recognized organs of independent French thought, which have driven the Revue des Deux Mondes into the background, where it remains the home of lost causes and of impossible loyalties.* The "Decadents" have triumphed. The best in them is acknowledged to have shown an admirable poetic energy and a real literary vitality. Just as the Manets and the Monets, the Sisleys and the Cazans, and the Berthe-Morissots now hang on the walls of the Luxembourg, so on the shelves of those who care for delicate and sincere literary utterance, such poets as Paul Verlaine, Henri de Régnier, Tristan Corbière, Albert Samain, Georges Rodenbach, Émile Verhaeren, Viélé-Griffin, Stuart Merrill, Rimbaud, and a score of others, stand shoulder to shoulder with the Parnassians, with the Sully-Prudhommes and the Leconte de Lisles, an object of interest and often of affection for those who love the poets.

It is a remarkable fact of literary history, this vitality of poetry in France. But at no period in the past has there been anything like this revolution in poetic expression. The new French school, which it is now time to cease to call new, has marked as great a change from the schools that immediately preceded it as the Lake poets in England marked at the beginning of the century. The Edinburgh displayed as determined a bias in presence of "The Lakers" as the organ of the French Jeffrey naively revealed before the verses of Verlaine. And the comparison might be developed instructively. The new school of French poets has certainly not as yet produced anything so great as a Keats or a Shelley ; but in the originality and rarity of the fresh note which its serene efforts have introduced into French literature, it is difficult to exaggerate its utility. MM. Van Bever and Paul Léautaud have recently published an anthology of the work of the French poets during the last twenty years.* The little book is of a touching completeness in the information which it offers to a legitimate curiosity. The choice of the poems, moreover, in spite of the inexplicable omission of some important names, is as largely tolerant as even the most fanatic of the new school could desire. In this volume, to be sure, there is no "Adonais" nor any "Ode on a Grecian Urn." Taken in bulk, however, if so coarse a phrase may be used of a product so quintessential as poetic expression, the note, the general atmosphere of these pages is so remarkable and new, relatively to the past of French versifying, that it justifies triumphantly the faith of these admirable youths. They have opened the windows of the temple of French poetry, and let in the sunlight whence it had been excluded ever since Ronsard. "Born late and without beliefs," as one of them writes, they yet have always had a faith in the capacity of French words and idioms to express the subtler sensations and emotions of the human soul. Here was a whole world which, for the most part, French poetry had refused to invade. And this brings us to the sense of what "symbolism" has really done for French poetry.

The "Symbolists" and the "Decadents" have too long been victims of a name. As M. Rémy de Gourmont says in his Livre des Masques, "the word 'symbolism,' if taken in the narrow and etymological sense of the word, means almost nothing. If you go somewhat farther the word may mean individualism in literature, artistic freedom, abandonment of the old formulas." And he goes on to explain how it happened that symbolism, taken in this sense, was a novelty. He says :—"We had had of late years a very serious attempt at a literature based on a scorn of all ideas and a disdain of the symbol. Idealism was a reaction against this pretension, and thus it came about that people fancied they were affirming fresh and even surprising truths in professing their intention of re-installing the idea in literature."

M. Rémy de Gourmont is one of the most daring and instructive critics of our time, but his explanation of the word "symbolism" as applied to the product of all these young poets is not altogether luminous. It would be impossible, in fact, to find a happier occasion for the use of that newly revived—for it was the method of Madame de Staël and even of Lamartine—instrument of literary criticism which M. Joseph Texte, as the readers of Literature know, extolled as the most certain method of getting at the real significance of a literary epoch—viz., the comparative method—the comparison of a national literature with other literatures throughout the world. "Symbolism," it should be instantly admitted, represented to the modern Frenchman an attitude as new and untraditional as at the end of the eighteenth century Richardson or Butler represented to the French Anglomaniacs who had just discovered England. If the Huguenots or a Saint Evremond or a Voltaire had not been exiled, how long would Frenchmen have had to wait to discover that there were qualities counterbalancing the faults in the literature of the North? The old spontaneity, the artistic freedom of the French literature of the Renascence had been thrown, as it were, into a strait-jacket by the very same forces which created the firm, centralized authority of the age of Louis XIV. Instead of Montaigne and Brantome and Rabelais we had Boileau and Corneille, Racine and Bossuet. The old spontaneous play of the Gallic temper, the freedom of the unacademic provincial utterance, was suddenly dammed as by an artificial dyke of

* The legitimacy of the application of this phrase of Matthew Arnold to M. Brunetière's review will be recognized by all who have watched its evolution during the last three or four years. From a liberal organ it has become, in philosophy, a medium of reactionary thought. In literary criticism, however, M. Brunetière, who is enamoured of the historical method, is more liberal and, I am tempted to say, more canny. MM. Reyssié and Joseph Texte, and his own study of Rousseau and Lamartine, showed him that he must throw anchors to windward if he did not wish to lie stranded on the borders of the vast current of French literature. Careful readers of his Sorbonne lectures on the "Evolution of Lyric Poetry in France in the XIXth Century" could have foretold his eventual recognition of "symbolism" and the young poets. And indeed in the second July number of the Revue des Deux Mondes we beheld his mouthpiece, M. René Doumic, offering them at last the freedom of the city and the fraternal accolade as fellow-citizens of the same republic of letters. In this article, which may really be held to be a literary event, the "symbolists" were covered with flowers. They were linked on to the Lamartinian tradition. The process seems to me just and happy. But the interesting thing is that the young poets have at last forced the donjons of the Revue des Deux Mondes.

Latin and Italian classicism. It was not until Rousseau and Chateaubriand opened the floodgates of the long pent-up French soul that French prose became once more free.

The resurrection of French poetry was a phenomenon almost identical. Until within the last twenty years, in spite of the first volume of the "Meditations," owing to the predominance of classicism, only the great, simple, general ideas were thought fitting for translation in verse. French poetry was expected to be as reasonable as Pope or Addison. On the stage the audacious genius of the Romanticists, Victor Hugo at their head, insisted on a freedom which, after all, was not to the taste of the majority. But, for poetry as a whole, the same ideal was proclaimed as for French prose—namely, the expression in the most intelligible language of the most general ideas. French prose and poetry were to give voice to universal, not to individual (or lyric) human nature. When, therefore, a Paul Verlaine and an Arthur Rimbaud, when the Belgians and the Americans naturalised as Frenchmen, when the provincials, who had developed far from the centre of classical French utterance, haunted, as they all were, by memories of rhythms in other tongues, or the tinkling of the bells of Ys, found stirring within them the impulse to express themselves, to reflect their own individual view of the world, to chronicle freshly and naturally their own special experience of the tears or the joys of things, their product was bound to displease. It seemed for the moment un-French because new, unworthy because not clear, according to the canons of French taste. The simple fact that at last the Muse had enticed them into by-paths where hitherto for long years she had never been followed by Frenchmen, but whither Englishmen had accompanied her ever since Shakespeare, was enough to discredit her French followers as outsiders, as decadent Bohemians wanting in respect for the language as symbolists, in a word, experimenting with affectation. The havoc they played with the Alexandrin was a crime, or at any rate a fault, like unto the heedless glee of a naughty child. Yet if, at this moment, Englishmen had taken the trouble to examine the efforts of these innovators to shake off the conventions of French poetic expression, they would have been astonished at the discovery that after all, symbolism was only an effort of emancipation. It expressed the desire to give French poetry the same liberties as English poetry had always had, to bring the Muse back to nature, to sweep into the ken of the poet the whole world of phenomena and sensation, to allow him the privilege of the vagueness that suggests, to enlarge the scope of poetry from the mere plastic description of surfaces, from a narrow subordination to Reason, until it included the whole range of human feelings and reactions. To have achieved this victory, whatever may have been the boisterous absurdity and infelicitous achievements of some of the experimenters, is to have endowed French poetry with a new power. And this it is which symbolism has done for French literature.

After three centuries it has become possible for Frenchmen to pen lines such as those of our English poets :—

> Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow
> For old, unhappy, far-off things,
> And battles long ago :

or "Perhaps, the very wind is like a bell," or even "fleet the times carelessly as they did in the golden world." This very considerable achievement could not have occurred save at a democratic moment such as the present. I have already indicated how this gratuitous company of singers has been recruited from men who had undergone the influence of foreign literatures or grown up amid the sights and sounds of unsophisticated provinces. And at a democratic moment, with the loss of respect for all many traditions and conventions, these writers have found a constantly growing audience to appreciate their efforts without waiting for the permission of a recognized authority. With the shattering of the central power and its Court standards of taste, with the rise of a new generation, which has for the first time learnt to look at things as they are and to use its own judgment, the audience of the last twenty years is freer in France than ever before from the prejudice of the old canons. These Symbolists, who are, after all, only genuine poets, as Englishmen use the word, have given a voice to the democratic diversity of feeling and observation.

Nothing would be simpler, nothing more agreeable than to follow page by page through the anthology of M. Van Bever and M. Paul Léautaud, quoting passages illustrative of this thesis. Stanzas like those of Mallarmé evoked by the vision of his daughter fanning—

> O rêveuse, pour que je plonge
> Au pur délice sans chemin,
> Sache, par un subtil mensonge,
> Garder mon aile dans ta main.
> Une fraîcheur de crépuscule
> Te vient à chaque battement
> Dont le coup prisonnier recule
> L'horizon délicatement—

are sweet and rare, and until recently extraordinarily unusual in French verse. But they are not subtler, not more haunting than a hundred lines in Bliss Carman, our Canadian Keats, notably in his "Low Tide on Grand Pré." Yet how inevitable and simple it all is ! Mallarmé and his fellows are not always simple. This book, even, contains many things which are as the thorns in the garden of the anthology. But Verlaine, for instance, is incomparably simple, natural, and warm. At his best he is the French Wordsworth. And two young men, like those who begin this book, Henri Barbusse and Henry Battaille, neither of them more than twenty-eight, with the sweetest confidence, unawed by the formality and frigidity of the French tradition, do not hesitate to give their own form to their own individual feelings. There is in this, perhaps, a slightly morbid tendency, but there is, at all events, a singular sharpening of the senses to feel and to note such shadings as the old French poetry had neglected. Yet I repeat, they are maintaining the tradition ; for Parnassianism, the Greek and Roman ideal of plasticity, is not necessarily France. French expression was developing for centuries before the royalty of the Ile de France, aided by the servility of the provinces, stereotyped artistic taste.

A Breton, Tristan Corbière, in his "Pardon de Sainte-Anne," like the Dutch Verhaeren, is as powerful an artist as the greatest of the etchers. And here there is nothing of the hollow tintinnabulation of a Poe, but an astonishing, essential melodiousness which is the natural voice of the quaint and moving religious festivals of Brittany. Such verses as these respond in the deepest sense to Matthew Arnold's definition of poetry as being a criticism of life. Not all of these young men dive so deep into things. André Fontainas, to whom Frenchmen owe a translation of "Samson Agonistes" and of "Comus," is as ingenious and full of conceits as Voiture, but one feels that this facility and ingenuity are those of an accomplished artisan who has learned to love poetry in books. Paul Fort is a most cultivated poet, rich in human emotions, a more civilized Whitman. M. Fernand Gregh, the son of the music publisher, has been "crowned" more than once by the Academy, perhaps as being both the least distinguished of the school and the most obvious and facile. As Corbière said of himself, unjustly, M. Gregh has abundantly de l'idée et pas une idée. M. René-Ghil is the inventor of the once famous phrase, "verbal instrumentation," which well describes his work, for it is nothing else. But these last mentioned are among the experimenters whose work has not been in vain any more than are the sweetly-melancholy lines in the little volume "De l'Aube au Soir," by M. Georges Benoist, just published by the classical house of the poets, Alphonse Lemerre. And when one wanders listlessly through the pages of this anthology, one liberates at almost every turn of the path an exquisite line or a gentle thought winging its way shyly out of this garden of the poets. It is an immense satisfaction in these parterres to come upon not a single psittacist ; the birds are all of a feather ; there are no canaries nor mocking-birds among them. This is due to the fact that each man reports his individual vision. Their vision, moreover, is Janus-faced; they hesitate no more to look within their own souls—and at this moment comes to me the memory of an incomparable little volume by Henri Ghéon, "La Solitude de l'Été," where he speaks of the country villages in summer as intimately as Demeter herself might have crooned her memories to her child Persephone than to reflect humbly the aspect of the world without. M. Henri de Régnier, speaking of himself and his fellows, expresses delicately this double gaze:—

C'est donc vers la Vie qu'ils ramèneront la Muse, non plus pour qu'elle la rêve, mais pour qu'elle la vive. Au lieu de présenter à ses oreilles les conques sonores où l'on entend le murmure d'une mer idéale, ils l'associeront au bord des flots mêmes pour qu'elle en écoute la rumeur et qu'elle y mêle sa voix.

Elle les suivra demain comme elle est venue hier s'abriter au palais de songes que d'autres lui avaient construit. La Poésie d'ailleurs n'a ni hier, ni demain, ni aujourd'hui. Elle est partout la même. Ce qu'elle veut c'est se voir belle, et peu lui importe, pourvu qu'elle y mire sa beauté, la source naturelle des bois ou le miroir par lequel un artifice subtil lui montre son visage divin dans la limpidité cristalline d'une eau fictive et imaginaire.

The Edinburgh Review for November, 1822, contained a remarkable article on "French Poetry," based on Lamartine's "Meditations," the "Trois Messeniennes" of Casimir Delavigne, and Beranger's "Chansons." In this essay, where Lamartine is welcomed as "the best of living French poets," but congratulated unjustly for his "ample borrowings from English writers," in an essay, moreover, bound up with a review of Wordsworth's "Tour," which begins, "The Lake School of Poetry, we think, is now pretty nearly extinct," I find these general criticisms of French and English verse: —

What is most poetical in our poetry has no counterpart in theirs—nor have we anything at all akin to what they chiefly boast of and value in their favourites. If we were called upon to state, in a few words, the grand distinction of the two schools, we should probably say that our poetry derives its materials chiefly from nature, and theirs from art, that our images are borrowed for the most part from the country, and theirs from the town—that we deal fearlessly with the primitive and universal passions of our mind, and they almost exclusively with the pretensions and prejudices of persons of rank and condition—that their great dread is to be ignoble, and ours to be insipid—their triumph to surmount difficulties, and ours to give emotion.

It was singularly unhappy to make such observations as these in the same breath with an eulogy of Lamartine, which failed to note the real nature of the transformation in French poetic expression heralded by the author of "Le Lac"; but it seems to me really felicitous, in connexion with my estimate of the value of the efforts of the "symbolist" school, to be able to cite from the Edinburgh an appreciation, on the whole so exact, of the reasons for the secular misunderstanding between two great nations on so serious a matter as that of art and poetic utterance. There is now, however, no longer any reason for such misunderstanding. The critic of the Edinburgh, if he could be confronted to-day with MM. Van Bever's and Léautaud's anthology, would certainly be the first to note that the times have changed. Englishmen who do not read French may partially confirm, if they like, what I have been saying, by procuring a little sheaf of translations from a dozen poets of contemporary France by Alice Sargant: —Lyric Pastorals by French Poets of To-Day (London: Truslove, Hanson, and Comba). Read therein the translation of Rimbaud's sonnet "Le Dormeur du Val,"

A sleepy hollow where the river sings, or Louis Marsolleau's "Ophelia," and while noting with admiration the fine feeling and taste of the translator, and her conscientious respect for her models, reflect on the general atmosphere of these lines in connexion with the above passage from the Edinburgh.

THE DRAMA.

"MR. AND MRS. DAVENTRY."

Admirers of Mme. Chasmont will remember her in one of the most popular little plays of her repertory, Madame Attend Monsieur. Madame is waiting (with the intention of "going") for Monsieur in the apartment destined for his tête-à-tête with his mistress. She finds the smoking-jacket and the dressing-gown of the guilty pair and flings them on a couch. Their juxtaposition suggests a picture to her mind's eye which prompts her to blush and to cover her face with her hand. This incident might be taken to pre-figure symbolically the critical scene in Mr. Frank Harris' new play at the Royalty Theatre, Mr. and Mrs. Daventry. There is the same couch, with the important difference that the garments thrown upon it are not discarded but on the backs of their owners. The door is locked. The man remarks to his mistress that they are safe from interruption. Then ensues a conversation to which only the naive audacity of a Boccaccio could do justice—it is, in fact, precisely one of those stories which he told with such gusto and invariably rounded off with the cheerful ejaculation, "Così piaccia a Dio, che a tutti gli altri possa intervenire!" Fortunately, the couple of sinners are not so free from interruption as they had supposed. A peremptory knock is heard at the door; it is the lady's husband, a husband mad with jealousy and rage, who threatens to break the door down if he is not admitted. And now comes the coup de théâtre. The man's wife, who has been listening to the guilty conversation behind a screen, comes forward, turns up the lights, and unlocks the door. Astonishment and apologies of the jealous husband, who, instead of the expected flagrant délit (here is a case, if ever there was one, in which the obscurity of a foreign language needs no excuse), finds an ordinary party of three. There can be no doubt about the theatrical ingenuity of this situation, which, by the way, persistent rumours attribute, rightly or wrongly, to "the touch of a vanished hand." There can also be no doubt about the offensiveness of such a situation, presented before a miscellaneous crowd of both sexes, young and old, in a public playhouse. Shameless scenes of this sort were plentiful enough a few years ago at M. Antoine's Théâtre Libre, during the vogue, now happily exhausted, of what was called la comédie rosse; but English audiences have hitherto been spared their exhibition. As the play has passed the censorship, we must assume, I suppose, that the presentation of this scene is not contrary to good morals; but it will, nevertheless, strike some of us as a rather large assumption; and, in any case, it is just as well to warn playgoers who intend to visit the Royalty of what is in store for them there.

After the incident of the couch Mrs. Daventry leaves her husband, who is represented as a coarse brute in every way, and seeks refuge in the arms of a lover, a namby-pamby youth of unexceptionable manners and (mark the implied extenuation) "enormously rich." The scene in which this new pairing-off takes place is, artistically considered, the best in the play, quiet and terse, with skilful suggestion of the ground-swell of emotion beneath the surface of colourless, almost conventional, conversation. One feels throughout that such things happen just in that way, and it is a rare occurrence for dramatists to produce that impression so forcibly and yet simply as Mr. Harris produces it here. In the last act the pair are at Monte Carlo, whither they are tracked by the husband, bent on revenge, and it is impossible not to be reminded of the penultimate act of Froufrou. There is in both plays the same situation of a woman waiting in agony for the issue of a duel between lover and injured husband. But the termination belongs not so much to the play of Meilhac and Halévy as to the "shooting-gallery" of Dumas fils. The husband, finding that the death of his rival would also mean the death of the woman as well as that of her unborn child, has the grace to blow out his (lamentably inferior) brains, and the lady, now secure again in her lover's arms, says, as the curtain descends, that "she will be sorry all her life." Possibly this remark was thrown in at the last moment to convince the censor that the play is a moral spectacle. Mr. Harris knows his business—and, apparently, his censor.

As the misunderstood wife, described as an "idealist"—an idealist, it must be, with a marked turn for practice—Mrs. Patrick Campbell is in her element. Her passionate frenzy when she blurts out to her husband the secret of the "young life" which must prevent him from slaughtering his rival is the very thing; and one felt that the mild young man with whom she has cast her lot (admirably played by Mr. Gerald du Maurier) will have his hands full. And one can have nothing but praise for Mr. Frederick Kerr's unfailing tact and self-repression in what, without these qualities, would be the outrageous part of the husband. Mr. Kerr is by temperament and habit a representative of the decent, frank, agreeable English gentleman. It must be terribly hard for him to play a downright blackguard—every speech and action of the person represented being calculated to make an actor of this stamp writhe with disgust. Yet the miracle happens; the actor fits himself perfectly, and loyally, to his part. One cannot help being sorry for the bevy of subordinate ladies who have to handy about witticisms which would be considered bad form in the smoking-room. And now I suppose we must resign ourselves, with what philosophy we can command, to a prodigious "success of scandal" for Mr. and Mrs. Daventry.

It will do no great harm, I daresay, to mundane persons of a certain age (for "a man," as Johnson said to Mrs. Piozzi, "commonly grows wickeder as he grows older"), and if Colonel Newcome is foolish enough to take young Clive to the Royalty, he will deserve the reproof he received at the Cave of Harmony —"Why do you bring young boys here, old boy?"

MR. TRAILL'S LAST BOOK.

England, Egypt, and the Sudan. By H. D. Traill, D.C.L. (Constable. 12s.)

There are three preeminently good books on the renascence of modern Egypt. The first is Sir Alfred Milner's "England in Egypt," of course, one of the most lucid and statesmanlike records of administrative reforms ever written. Another is Mr. Silva White's "Expansion of Egypt," which, whilst riding the Mahan doctrine to a sweat, is nevertheless a very able and thorough survey of the industrial and commercial conditions and results. A third, slighter but not to be despised, is Mr. Cameron's "Egypt in the Nineteenth Century," an historical retrospect, chiefly of the earlier half of the century, strongly marked by the author's vigorous personal opinions, which have the advantage of being founded on intimate knowledge. There are many other books, more or less authoritative, on the subject, but these stand far in front. It may be asked whether there was any need of yet another addition to what is becoming a special library, but those who read the late Dr. Traill's posthumous publication will not be in doubt as to the answer. His work differs from all the three to which we have referred. It supersedes none of them, but it adds to all. Without pretending to the completeness of detail exhibited in Milner's or White's volumes, it gives the main results; and whilst touching but slightly on the events of Mohammed 'Ali's career, to which Mr. Cameron devoted the greater part of his book, it picks out the salient and governing facts, and carries the history on to the latest phase—the death of the Khalifa and the reorganization of the Sudan. But the essential quality that distinguishes it from these predecessors is its political character. The history of the Egyptian renascence is here treated largely in relation to European politics, and not merely as a question of internal reform or provincial expansion. Readers of Literature knew the late editor chiefly in his capacity of a singularly acute and accomplished literary critic; but they do not need to be told that he was something more. Few writers were more versatile, and Mr. Traill's brilliant political articles exerted wide influence in the Conservative Press. Among the subjects which peculiarly attracted him, the Egyptian question was perhaps foremost. His biography of Lord Cromer—though without the charm of his purely literary essays—evinced a thorough knowledge of the work of the English administration in Egypt, and a profound admiration for its governing hand. The present volume is conceived in a similar spirit. We need not perhaps apologize for a somewhat lengthy extract to illustrate the temper and style of the book.

> Of all the great reforms which were to convert Egypt from a land of official malfeasance, of fiscal oppression, and of judicial corruption, into a country which, as regards Government taxation and administration, will bear comparison with British India, Sir Evelyn Baring was the life and soul. The band of able officials who served under him were informed by his experience and drew inspiration from his example. In every department of the public service which they purified and vitalized, his influence was felt; his advice was always accessible; his support in their encounters with native opposition was never wanting; and there is not one of them from the highest to the lowest who, whatever they may have been able to achieve by their personal exertions, would not unreservedly admit that the British Consul-General has from the first been the leading spirit in the work. . . . Never, perhaps, has it fallen to the lot of any nation to rescue a whole people so speedily from the depths of oppression and misgovernment in which for long ages they had been plunged, or to set their feet so firmly and to lead their steps so far on the path of civilization. When we entered the country it presented many of the worst features of an Oriental despotism, aggravated rather than mitigated by those borrowings from Western methods of Government and administration which had been engrafted on its system in the interest of anybody rather than the natives of the soil. These unfortunates, the heirs to centuries of extortion and persecution, were suffering under that reduplication of those evils which result in most Eastern countries from the financial embarrassments of Monarchs. Their taxes were wrung from them at the arbitrary will of the collector, at irregular intervals, with illegal frequency, and often by the use of torture. That primary condition of success in the fellah's industry—his share of the Nile water—was in continual jeopardy from the defects of the irrigation system and the diversion of the supply by his richer and more powerful neighbours. The guardianship of his life and property was in the hands of an inadequate and ill-disciplined police; the maintenance of his legal rights was at the mercy of corrupt and incompetent tribunals; and the protection of his country against attacks from its savage neighbours of the desert was committed to a spiritless and ill-trained army, into whose ranks he was liable himself to be driven as an unwilling recruit under the lash of the conscription. Within two years after the commencement of the British occupation a beginning had been made in the correction of these grievous abuses; before five years had passed, the worst of them were in process of removal; long before the end of the decade the last of them had been swept away. The finances of the country had been reduced to permanent order; the sources of its industrial wealth had been invigorated by the happily bold expenditure of the irrigation million, and its resulting benefits were being distributed with all the stern rigidity of British justice among large and small cultivators alike. The cruel extortions of the tax-collector had been suppressed, and the whole fiscal system of Egypt had been regularized and simplified, made humane and equitable; her police had been reorganized and rediciplined; her army had been pushed far forward on the road of improvement and was steadily developing into a trustworthy instrument of national defence. Last, and perhaps greatest feat of all, the fount and stream of justice had for the Egyptian peasant been purified of its pollutions, and the British Consul-General and his able coadjutors were justified in claiming some share for themselves of the noble praise awarded to that great legal reformer in our own country, of whom it was said that he had "found law dear, and left it cheap; found it the privilege of the rich, left it the patrimony of the poor; found it the two-edged sword of fraud and oppression, left it the staff of honesty and the shield of innocence."

The irony of fate was never more cruelly exhibited than in making Mr. Gladstone the author and beginner of the intervention which has proved so beneficial to Egypt. As Mr. Traill says in epigrammatic antithesis, > Alike by victory and defeat, Mr. Gladstone was fated to enlarge the borders of that Imperial power for which he was always anxious to apologize, and to increase the burden of those Imperial responsibilities which he always contemplated with dismay. His term of office was scarce two years old when the British flag had been carried to the capital of Egypt; it had still some months to run when he involved our name in a disgrace and our arms in a disaster which were ultimately to be effaced by planting that flag on the citadel of Khartum. His resolution to advance and his determination to retreat were equally fruitful in results which he cordially detested, and contributed equally to a policy which he had spent his life in denouncing.

Mr. Traill has small mercy for Liberal statesmanship, and he has not a few shrewd hits at "the Radicals of that day, who to a man were much too innocent to have ever heard before of gambling on the Stock Exchange"; but we must add that he is fair to the Gladstone Cabinet in regard to the Gordon Mission, in so far, at least, that he admits that they could not have conceived that Gordon would hold to his pact after events had proved its hopelessness. The very admission, however, may imply a sarcasm, and mean that the Cabinet could not comprehend the honour which stands by its pledges even in despair. In one of the fine rhetorical passages, which he knew so well how to use, he doubts whether, if one could undo the past, one would willingly destroy the chapter, at once so glorious and so shameful, of the immortal sacrifice at Khartum:—"One would not willingly part with the inspiring story of Gordon's high-souled heroism, even to efface the record of that official cowardice, apathy, and irresolution to which he owed his fate. And we should hold the faster by the nobler memory, because Time, which only adds to its sanctity and splendour, has done something to mitigate the pain with which its baser side is recalled. The halo of Gordon's martyrdom grows more luminous with the years; while, although we do not and cannot forgive the default of those who allowed the sacrifice to be consummated, we understand it better, and are thus nearer to that full comprehension which, in the profound French saying, is but another word for pardon."

There is not much of pardon, nevertheless, in the relentless record of Ministerial hesitancy set down with rigorous exactness in these pages. The examination of the Wilson episode is a good example of Mr. Traill's clear judgment. After going carefully over the evidence, he concludes that every unprejudiced student of these events must agree with Sir Charles Wilson's chief defender in treating with contempt the fiction that Gordon could have been relieved, at the last moment, by fifty men of the advance guard of an expedition which started two months too late. Lord Wolseley receives full justice in this latest narrative of his Egyptian campaigns. The seizure of the Suez Canal and the brilliant night attack on Tell-el-Kebir are placed in their true light, and the lateness of the Nile expedition is not ascribed to its general, though we do not think that Mr. Traill has made it clear why the Suakin-Berber route was still rejected. But perhaps the most able part of a remarkably judicious volume is the refutation of French attacks on English honesty. These attacks are mainly due to ignorance of our political peculiarities. As Mr. Traill observes, when we are charged with a "policy of grab," "we have only to say this, that the one great Egyptian crisis which brought English soldiers and civil officials to Cairo, and has kept them there ever since, occurred during a Gladstonian Administration. To that answer to the charge of greedily or even willingly fishing in troubled waters, not a single Englishman feels any necessity of adding a single word." French politicians cannot be expected to grasp the meaning of this. They are, however, less honest in totally ignoring what Mr. Traill calls the "diplomatic episode" of 1887, when England, under Lord Salisbury, actually signed a Convention with Turkey agreeing to evacuate Egypt in 1890, and was only frustrated in this virtuous resolve by the furious and successful efforts of France herself, by whom the Sultan was induced to cancel the agreement. This point is never sufficiently remembered when the question of unfulfilled promises of evacuation is discussed. The promises were in a fair way to be fulfilled, when the chief complainant stepped in and blocked the road. The other argument, of the "estoppel" of France by the precedent of Tunis, is good enough—and the broken pledge about Algiers might have been added—but it is slightly academic. France's wrong does not make England's right, and the Convention of 1887 is the true rebutter for Continental charges of breach of faith.

All this is, perhaps, somewhat over-political for these columns; but the party debate may be regarded as closed. As Mr. Traill says, whatever efforts may be made to dislodge her, England "will never suffer herself to be driven from this post of duty by anything short of the overthrow of her naval supremacy and the collapse of her Empire." The English protectorate—or whatever it should be called—in Egypt has become accomplished history rather than present politics, and the judicious and lucid record of that history, in brief but well-proportioned outline, by a publicist and critic of Mr. Traill's ability well deserves to be carefully perused by all students of events in the latter half of the nineteenth century. Had he survived to revise his book, many little misprints and oversights would doubtless have been corrected; but, as it stands, his "England, Egypt, and the Sudan" is worthy of his reputation and will be read with interest, not only for his sake, but for its clear and balanced narrative of an eventful chapter of history in which all Englishmen must take pride.

DR. CONAN DOYLE ON THE WAR.

The quality which one misses in Dr. Conan Doyle's novels is subtlety. One does not miss it in THE GREAT BOER WAR (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d.), because subtlety is hardly wanted in military history. Instead, one looks for vigour and lucidity; and Dr. Doyle is both lucid and vigorous. He is even a stylist—it is a style in which infinitives are apt to fall apart with distressing frequency, and which talks of "both" infantry, cavalry, and gunners, but which, as the song says, "gets there all the same" by means not too easy to analyse. It is Homeric, though not perhaps the more artistic on that account. Cronje is spoken of as "dark" as regularly as Odysseus is referred to as "wily" and the sea as "polupholoisboisterous," and the hypercritical may weary of the constant allusion to De Wet as "the gentleman with the tinted glasses." These little tricks are—well, they are what distinguish Dr. Doyle's style from Napier's. On the other hand, Dr. Doyle keeps the various threads of a complicated narrative well in hand, and he has the art, so conspicuous in Froude and Macaulay and J. R. Green, of luring the reader on, even when he is weary, from one paragraph to the next. It is a good deal to be able to say in favour of a book which, having been hurriedly put together before the truth was known, can hardly be of permanent importance, and is no doubt mainly intended to be a book for the moment.

The note of the book is the author's jubilant, not to say truculent, confidence in the future of the British Empire. He catalogues our fighting men: "Cowboys from the vast plains of the North-West, gentlemen who ride hard with the Quorn or the Belvoir, gillies from the Sutherland deer forests, bushmen from the back blocks of Australia, exquisites of the Raleigh Club,' &c., over and over again, even to the point of tickling one's sense of humour and reminding one of Mr. Imre Kiralfy announcing a great show; and he keeps on patting our gallant opponents on the back until we cannot help recalling the speeches that are heard at the dinner-table after the Oxford and Cambridge boat race. But, of course, it is the right line to take, even if it be a little overdone. As regards military criticism, we note with satisfaction that Dr. Doyle does not lightly repeat irresponsible camp gossip or attempt to judge generals on evidence that must necessarily have been inadequate. His "military lessons of the war" have little to do with the incompetence, real or alleged, of individuals. His main ideas are that "it is better and cheaper for the country to have fewer soldiers which shall be very highly trained than many of a mixed quantity," even if we have to pay them like police constables in order to get them; that the cavalry should be turned into mounted infantry; and that officers ought to be clever as well as brave, and diligent as well as clever.

> During five months' intercourse with officers [says Dr. Doyle] I have only seen one of them reading a professional book. Young lawyers and young doctors cannot take their profession in this dilettante spirit. As a point of honour it is surely indefensible to accept certain duties and to be paid for them without carrying them out with all the industry and energy that is possible.

Wise words, to be recommended to the attention of those whom they concern, though it is singular that Dr. Doyle should have gone so far afield as the law and medicine for his analogy, when the state of things in the sister service of the Navy would have furnished a more effective parallel, as well as one more calculated to appeal to soldiers.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

A Vindication of Protector Somerset.

Mr. A. F. Pollard, the author of ENGLAND UNDER PROTECTOR SOMERSET: AN ESSAY (Kegan Paul, 6s. n.), who has so long assisted in the excellent work of the "Dictionary of National Biography," has learnt in that somewhat severe school its characteristic merits and defects. In the first place, to speak of the defects—defects in the case of an original history, not in that of a dictionary pledged to conciseness—he is severely chronological and statistical, without an attempt at grace of style or vivid presentment of facts, and with hardly an intimation of insight into the depths of personality. He has in so remarkable a way enlightened our ignorance as to the work of Somerset that it is the more disappointing that he so signally fails to analyse his character. His book, therefore, must remain rather a mine of materials, an exhaustive collection of references, than a classic biography or illuminating historical study.

On the other hand, the book has most conspicuous merits. It is thoroughly original, and, within its self-assigned limits, exhaustive. It may in strict truth be said to shed a flood of light upon a period which has been much misunderstood. Briefly, the result of the book is to show one of the most interesting characters in our history in quite a new aspect. It has passed into the common historical stock that Jane Seymour's brother, the Protector during the first years of the reign of Edward VI., was an unprincipled, self-seeking politician, who embroiled England with Scotland and France and who did his utmost to make the religious differences of Englishmen incurable. On almost every point Mr. A. F. Pollard goes very near to a complete vindication. Of personal avarice and greed, indeed, he cannot clear his hero, but he makes a very strong case for the mildness of his rule, for his personal devotion to the best interests of England, and for the moderation of his ecclesiastical policy. Special attention may be directed to an interesting chapter on "The Protector and the Social Discontent," which contains the best short sketch of the agrarian history of the time with which we are acquainted. The book will be welcomed, and it must certainly be studied, as an important historical rectification. To the minuteness of the work we can only allude. It is worthy of the best traditions of the Oxford school of historians. Having at every step found errors among the most distinguished of his predecessors, Mr. Pollard does not lack courage to note them; and we find him commenting without bitterness upon mistakes in Hallam, Froude, Canon Dixon, Mr. C. Oman, Mr. A. L. Smith, Mr. C. R. Beazley, Dr. Gasquet, Mr. Bishop, and other writers less well known. We cannot but regret that Mr. Pollard did not tell his story a little more at length. We hope he may at least continue it to the death of Edward VI.

Military Essays.

Mr. Spenser Wilkinson undoubtedly has a great knowledge of military literature and of as much of the art of war as can be learnt from books. He can always tell you what the soldier said, whether the soldier be Napoleon, or Scharnhorst, or Kraft, or Moltke, and show in what way any given military event illuminates his sayings. In WAR AND POLICY (Constable, 15s.), however, this great erudition seems to be frittered away. The book is a collection of newspaper and magazine articles, and though the attempt is made in the preface to show that they are organically inter-related, the impression left on our mind was one of incoherence and unprofitable repetitions. The author's favourite points as to the conditions which determine whether any given war will be a war to the death or a duel till honour is satisfied, and as to the most effective constitution of the head-quarter staff, crop up again and again in all kinds of connexions. The parallel between the war in South Africa and the American Civil War is drawn in the last essay, but most of the data on which the comparison rests are contained in the first. This condition of things was hardly to be avoided, however, in a book of the sort. Technical authors who contribute largely to the reviews have no chance but to repeat themselves, since each essay is addressed, presumably, to a different group of readers; but the effect is rather tiresome when you get all the essays together in a volume.

Dickens.

Mr. Frederic G. Kitton has added to his other works upon his favourite author THE MINOR WRITINGS OF CHARLES DICKENS (Elliot Stock, 4s. 6d.), which is a complete bibliography of those writings not included amongst "The Novels of Charles Dickens," published in 1897. The Christmas stories are naturally the most important of these, and Mr. Kitton devotes some space to Dickens' letters to John Forster on these and kindred subjects. Finding a suitable title was always a matter of some difficulty with the novelist, and he generally submitted a score or so of possible names for his friend's decision. Mr. Kitton has also spent much time and trouble in determining Dickens' own contributions to "Household Words" and other papers. In the case of "All the Year Round" he was fortunate enough to discover an "office" set in which the name of every author was written against his work, and he also succeeded in identifying many articles in Forster's "Examiner" owing to the existence of the original MSS. in the Forster collection at South Kensington. Mr. Kitton has compiled a useful and interesting volume for the "Book Lover's Library."

Theology.

Dr. Hastings has lost no time in completing the third volume of his DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE (T. and T. Clark, 28s.), and it shows no falling off in quality. It is satisfactory to note that the writers are for the most part British, but they show a thoroughness and accuracy worthy of the best German scholars. Professor Margoliouth contributes an exhaustive account of the "Language of the Old Testament," while the Rev. F. H. Woods deals adequately with the subject of the "Old Testament Canon." Professor Bennett's article on Moses deserves special mention, and is typical of the spirit in which Old Testament subjects are dealt with throughout the Dictionary, viz., that of a free, but sober and judicious, acceptance of modern criticism. Dr. Driver contributes a characteristic discussion of "Law in the Old Testament." Among New Testament articles, in point of completeness the article of Professor Findlay on "Paul the Apostle" and those of Dr. Chase on "Simon Peter" suggest some comparison with the great treatise of Dr. Sanday on "Jesus Christ," which was so notable a feature of Volume II. Dr. J. H. Bernard's article on "Miracle" is of uncommon interest; the Principal of Lampeter, Mr. J. Vernon Bartlett, and Professor Salmon deal with the gospels of St. Luke, St. Matthew, and St. Mark respectively; while Dr. Plummer writes at length on "The Lord's Prayer" and "The Lord's Supper."

There are many interesting articles on archæological and geographical points. Colonel Conder's account of "Palestine" is remarkably complete; Professor Ramsay's account of "Phrygia" will be eagerly turned to by students of Pauline geography and early Christian history; Mr. Thatcher deals with the history, language, and antiquities of Phœnicia; and there is a valuable article by Professor A. R. S. Kennedy on "Money." Professor Macalister writes with the authority of an expert on such points as "Medicine" and "Leprosy." Dr. Hastings himself discusses words and expressions occurring in the Authorised Version. We remarked on the disproportionate space assigned to these articles in the first and second volumes; but they certainly contain much curious information, and no doubt add an element of completeness to a strictly biblical dictionary which would otherwise be lacking.

This work has already abundantly established its claim to be a first-rate book of reference, and we must express our gratitude to the editor for the unsparing pains he has devoted to it, and congratulate all students of scientific theology on having within their reach the results of the best scholarship of the day.

A melancholy interest attaches to the little book, THE REFORMATION IN GREAT BRITAIN (Rivingtons, 1s.), which Mr. H. O. Wakeman left unfinished. How much of it, as it now appears, was completed before the death of the author we are not told, but we can hardly be wrong in attributing the first three chapters to his hand. They are marked by the clearness of thought and vigour of expression which were the characteristics of Mr. Wakeman's work; and they contain a most interesting, lucid, and accurate account of the religious changes in England up to the death of Henry VIII. The reigns of Edward VI. and Mary are similarly treated, probably also by Mr. Wakeman, and it is not improbable that he at least began the account of Elizabeth. We are extremely glad that it has been decided to publish what he wrote, incomplete though it is. The book has been finished according to the original scheme, by the Rev. Leighton Pullan, who is already well known for theological work both learned and attractive. We recognize his hand in the account of the Reformation in Scotland, with its quaint illustrative extracts and its pictorial epithets. We notice, too, that Mr. Pullan deals, as usual, far more in direct attack than was Mr. Wakeman's custom. The contrast indeed is noteworthy. Mr. Wakeman states the Anglican position against Rome with a simple security born of historical study. Mr. Pullan deals with Presbyterian attacks after the manner of an assailant. He scornfully rejects the claim of modern Scottish professors for a "continuity," and not content with stating historical facts, he > Proves his doctrine orthodox

> By apostolic blows and knocks,

His style, too, is much less restrained than Mr. Wakeman's. We can hardly be wrong in thinking that it is he who speaks of Erasmus as "not particularly partial to priests," or calls George Herbert a "typical English poet, priest, and gentleman"—a phrase by the way which it is difficult, so far as the poetry is concerned, to defend. While we can heartily praise the book as a whole, we cannot but think that in this work, which was not written by the two authors conjointly, and in which it is impossible to say how much of the new matter the original author might have approved of, an unfortunate precedent is set by not distinctly stating the parts which were the composition of the eminent writer whom we have lost. The public as well as Mr. Wakeman's friends will, we think, regret the course that has been adopted: while it adds a new terror to authorship to think that unfinished compositions may be completed without the writer's sanction and with no indication of the exact parts of the work which is from a different hand.

Canon MacColl's book, REFORMATION AND ITS REQUIREMENT, in its eighth edition (Longmans, 3s. 6d. n.), needs no second recommendation from us. We have only to note that in the present edition it includes a new preface, with more fragments of the author's autobiography, that a new chapter is added dealing with the Lambeth "opinions" on Reservation and Incense, and that Dr. MacColl stands up boldly and not ineffectively against the attacks of Professor Maitland.

The second volume of the EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT (Hodder and Stoughton, 28s.) contains a very careful and elaborate commentary on the Acts by Professor Knowling, on Romans by Dr. Denney, and on the First Epistle to the Corinthians by Professor Findlay. In the introduction to the Acts we have a masterly summary of the results of recent criticism, admirably fair and judicial in tone. Professor Knowling draws attention to the significant fact that Continental critics, in spite of their complicated and mutually destructive theories as to the Acts, have as a rule not been "able to separate themselves entirely from the traditional view that Luke, the companion of Paul, was more or less concerned in the composition of the book." Dr. Knowling himself holds that the work is justly ascribed to its traditional author. For the present, at any rate, this commentary on the Acts holds the field; and, in fulness, accuracy, and scholarship, it is worthy of a writer already so distinguished as Professor Knowling.

It is, perhaps, unfortunate that Dr. Denney's "Romans" should appear within a comparatively short time after the well-known commentary of Sanday and Headlam. Dr. Denney lives chiefly at expounding the argument; and his notes contain but little illustrative matter; but the commentary as a whole is a good model of sober exegesis. Professor Findlay's commentary on "1. Corinthians" is also good. The third chapter of the introduction (on "the teaching of the Epistle") is singularly fresh and vigorous, and the notes are uniformly clear and terse. A word of praise is due to the publishers for the attention they have paid to the format of this book. It has nearly 1,000 pages, but is lighter in weight than many books half its size. It has broad margins; and its type is beautifully clear. We hope the further volumes of the Expositor's Greek Testament will display the same high level of scholarship and literary skill which has been reached in its first two instalments.

Sport.

Mr. F. C. Selous' latest book SPORT AND TRAVEL EAST AND WEST (Longmans, 12s. 6d. n.) is a straightforward unembellished and detailed narrative of the chase of big game in Asia Minor—where the dignity and courtesy of the Turkish peasant forms a pleasant experience—and on the Rockies. The latter part of the book is mainly a careful diary of the days spent after wapiti. We are a little disappointed with the illustrations, mostly photographic. They are not very well reproduced, and Mr. Selous is not quite such an adept at selecting a shot with the camera as he is with the rifle.

There is more of the naturalist—and perhaps of the dreamer—about Mr. Fred Whishaw than is to be found in most sportsmen. Not infrequently he stays to moralize before he shoots; occasionally he never shoots at all. In consequence A HUNTER'S LOG IN RUSSIA (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.) contains more than a mere catalogue of "good days." Mr. Whishaw, it is plain to see, loves the forest and moor, and has a kindly feeling for all their inhabitants, from the regal elk and the capercailzie down to the tree-partridge or the snipe. Many of his stories show considerable humour: some are slightly marred by a tendency towards fine writing; but there is interesting matter in all of them. Several of the sketches, we fancy, have done duty before in the magazines, but they were worth republishing. "Notes from an Ambush" and "A Weird Night in Mid-Forest" are perhaps the best of the collection; the latter contains an excellent account of the favourite Russian practice of stalking the cock capercailzie in spring-time, when for a few weeks he tries, very ineffectually, to cultivate the small gift of song with which Nature has provided him.

Association Football (Skeffington, 1s. n.), by the "international," Mr. Ernest Needham, is excellent so long as the author is content to confine himself to hints on the way to play, but Mr. Needham is rather carried away by his enthusiasm in reviewing the history "past and present" of the game. "With the rise of leagues" (he says) ". . . the game acquired a stability unknown formerly. It was then, as now with cricket" (the italics are ours), "a common occurrence for teams to ignore their responsibilities to others, and still more frequently the individual player did not turn out when called on." The esprit de corps on the cricket field is surely every bit as strong as it is in the football field.

Messrs. F. E. Robinson and Co. have made a specialty of publishing books connected with University life, and The Book of Blues (3s. 6d. n.), edited by Ogier Rysden, is their latest contribution to the rapidly growing corpus of literature on this subject. Earlier in the year Mr. Wadham Peacock brought out a little book dealing with the boat race, giving the names of the crews and a short account of each contest. Mr. Rysden confines himself almost entirely to a list of names most carefully compiled, but he includes among his "blues" the champions at chess, golf, lawn tennis, swimming, and even such innovations as bandy and ice-hockey. The last two, we think, might well have been omitted, and we have our doubts about skating, which cannot be strictly regarded as a periodical competition. But it is as well to be thorough.

A Cyclist's Note Book, by A. W. Rumney (W. and A. K. Johnston) contains a variety of notes, more or less connected with cycling tours. The author finds something interesting to say on many topics and on many places—Lakeland and South Coast in particular—and of touring and new inventions and the possibilities of the future and reminiscences of the past. The book is scrappy but not uninteresting; it contains some useful information and hints to cyclists, and is written by a man who has read a certain amount of good literature (which he is something too fond of quoting). The illustrations, from snapshot and other photographs, are numerous and good.

Mr. F. de Lisle Solbé, who has been a member of the English International team since 1897, has brought out a little red-covered book on the principles of Hockey (Blackwood, 1s.), containing some sixty notes, detached and numbered, and a chapter or two of further hints. His "Hints for Critical Moments" will be useful, not only to beginners, but to experienced players.

China.

Careful readers of the late Mr. James Payn's works will remember an entertaining story of his in which a lady who had just travelled in the East proved such a bore to her friends that they schemed her discomfiture. A very well-informed doctor was called in whose knowledge of the places she had visited proved so much superior to her own that she was routed from the field. When congratulated on his achievement, the doctor made the startling confession that he had never been out of England, and had got it all up out of Murray. Mr. Robertson Scott, the author of The People of China (Methuen, 3s. 6d.), reminds us of the doctor. He has never been to China, but he has produced a very well-arranged and workmanlike book designed to answer all the questions people will now be asking themselves about the Chinaman. It is clearly and sensibly written, with copious references to, and a catalogue of, the best authorities, a map, a glossary, and an appendix on the men of the time in China. We can certainly recommend it to those who search for information agreeably put together.

One does not, as a rule, go to missionaries for playful humour, but one gets plenty of really good stories really well told in Mr. Thomas B. Selby's account of his labours in the Chinese vineyard, entitled Chinamen at Home (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). The best story is perhaps that of the Chinaman who told the missionary that he was sorry he could not become a Christian because he was by profession a manufacturer of base coins, but added that if the preacher of the Word ever wanted any counterfeit dollars he would be glad to sell him a few thousand at any time. The difficulty of spreading the light in the Middle Kingdom is fully realized by Mr. Selby. He points out that the Chinese versions of the Scriptures are such that the educated Chinaman feels towards them as a Don towards a passman's Latin prose, and that "the devotional language of the prayers to which he may sometimes listen is like the language with which polite Chinamen flatter each other and conveys no sense of the sublimity of God." Also the manners of female missionaries strike the Chinaman as the manners of abandoned creatures, because "any degree of friendliness between the sexes is looked upon as convicting proof of universal lasciviousness"; and the habit into which missionaries have fallen in their ignorance of patronising disreputable Chinamen who, "with no desire to change their hereditary religion, try to escape native law by putting themselves under foreign protection," does not increase their popularity with the Chinamen who live honestly and cleanly. At the same time Mr. Selby believes that if the missionaries persevere their tenets will in the end prevail. At any rate he has written one of the most entertaining books about China that we have lately seen.

The capital notes about members in the Pall Mall Gazette to which we referred the other day are, we notice, now incorporated in The New House of Commons, 1900, just issued from the office of that paper. This popular guide to the House—the fifth published from the same office—goes back further than the recent elections—to those of 1886, 1892, and 1895. It is a good example of the history which can be compiled from the daily effusions of smart journalism.

The birthday book is the lineal descendant of those gorgeous gift-books—keepsakes and books of beauty—that flourished in the Early Victorian days. It represents the sublimation of easy book-making. The compiler has only to take the latest popular novelist, dip here and there into his or her works, and mark passages with a lead pencil. Goldsmith, when rallied by his friends on the sum the booksellers gave him for his anthology of English poetry, is reported to have said with great gravity:—"These selections show taste; and a man may be twenty years cultivating that taste." But the happy compiler of a birthday book need not spend thankless years in cultivating that elusive quality. Any fragment torn from the context is good enough to put down opposite a date, and the chances are that some one at any rate will read an apt meaning into it. There is no doubt a certain honour in being selected as the fountain of these witty or philosophical aphorisms, and the Isabel Carnaby Birthday Book (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.), which contains also some valuable gems from "A Double Thread" and "The Farringdons," pays this graceful compliment to Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler. It must be confessed that some of Miss Fowler's brisk attempts at smartness have rather a melancholy air thus divorced from their surroundings, but as a birthday book this prettily bound little volume will serve as well as another.

We are afraid that Dr. Walter Kidd's Design in Nature's Story (Nisbet, 3s. 6d. n.) will not prove very convincing. The author thinks that organisms are produced into environments specially adapted for them. He forgets that only those organisms live which suit their environment. In four out of the six chapters he seems to lose hold of this thesis, and gives instances, interesting enough, to show how organisms are adapted to their environments. Here the opponent of design (in the old-fashioned sense) would be at one with him. Darwin challenged his opponents to produce a single structure or instinct which was of exclusive use to any other plant or animal than the one presenting it. Dr. Kidd does not help his cause by asking "What possible claim Darwin has to 'lay down impossible terms,' and then blandly proclaim that the battle goes by default?"

The Filipino Martyrs, by Richard Brinsley Sheridan (Lane, 6s.), is a statement of the case for Aguinaldo against the Government of the United States. It is a vigorous indictment, and sheds a lurid light upon the state of discipline in the volunteer battalions of the American army. The explanation given to the author by an American colonel is not less interesting:—

> It is because in many cases the heads of industrial and other firms who have volunteered have gone as ordinary soldiers, whilst in some cases clerks in their employ at home have been given commissions as officers, and they, therefore, have to be careful in their conduct, well knowing that their future depends upon their being so.

ART.

Sandro Botticelli. By Count Plunkett. (G. Bell and Sons. £2 2s.)

The works of Botticelli and his school have never been so well and fully illustrated as in this sumptuous volume. Not only are the masterpieces of this great Quattro-cento master, the Birth of Venus, the Primavera, the Calumny, the Magnificat, and his other most famous Madonnas, all magnificently reproduced, but a number of paintings which are plainly the work of scholars and assistants are included among the forty-eight photogravures and half-tone plates which adorn the book. The beauty of these illustrations deserve the highest praise, and Messrs. Bell and Sons are to be congratulated on a work which, in this respect, is worthy to rank with the costly editions de luxe published in Paris by the Maison Plon, or the firms of Lemercier and Goupil. Unfortunately the letter-press which accompanies these plates is distinctly inferior in quality. Count Plunkett writes with enthusiasm and evident love of his subject, but he apparently lacks both the knowledge and critical insight necessary for a work of this description, and we can only regret that so great an opportunity has been thrown away.

Sandro Botticelli, as our readers are aware, is one of the most attractive personalities as well as one of the finest artists of the Medicean age. He appeals in an especial manner to our own generation, and the materials for his life are of deep and absorbing interest. But the present writer has neglected to make use of many facts concerning the Piagnone master and his friend which have recently been brought to light by Italian scholars. He does not appear to have read the latest volumes of Professor Villari and Signor Casanova, or the Giornate of Lorenzo Violi, and makes no allusion to the curious contemporary chronicle written by Botticelli's brother, Simone Filipepi, and lately discovered in the Vatican. Even more deplorable is the want of accuracy which he betrays throughout his work. On the very first page we are told that Botticelli's master, Fra Filippo Lippi, was born in 1412, and that in the year 1438 he was only 26 years of age. Now Signor Milanesi long ago discovered documents which prove that Fra Lippi's birth took place several years earlier, probably in 1406, and that the boy was placed, at the age of eight, in the convent of Carmelite friars attached to the church of the Carmine in Florence. Again, at page 22, we are informed that "before coming under the distinct influence of Savonarola, Botticelli painted at the end of the nineties the Annunciation in the Uffizi." Since Savonarola died at the stake in 1498 (not, by the way, in 1478, as stated at page 25), we utterly fail to understand the meaning of the passage. In describing Botticelli's portraits Count Plunkett wonders at the remarkable difference between Lorenzo the Magnificent, as represented by the painter in his Adoration of the Magi, in the Uffizi, and in the Morelli portrait at Bergamo, where Lorenzo appears as a "worn, dissipated man," and consoles himself by turning to the Berlin portrait which, in his eyes, represents a far nobler character. But, as a fact, both the Berlin and Bergamo portraits, whether or no they are Botticelli's works, do not represent Lorenzo at all, but his brother, Giuliano de' Medici, as every other writer on the subject has said, and as we find correctly stated in the catalogue of the master's works in the appendix of the present book.

The same confusion attends Count Plunkett's attempts to give the correct chronology of Botticelli's pictures. He accepts Vasari's statement that, after leaving Rome in 1481, Sandro neglected painting, and devoted himself almost wholly to engraving and the illustration of Dante. This, our author tells us, accounts for the fact that the paintings of this time are evidently school works. But in the next sentence he goes on to describe what he calls the mythologo-allegorical works of the "nineties," and under this head he includes the Birth of Venus in the Uffizi, the Mars and Venus of the National Gallery, and the "Pallas and Centaur." Now these paintings are recognized by all the best critics to belong to the early period before Botticelli's visit to Rome. This theory is supported by the evident connexion between the Venus panels and the famous Tournament held by Giuliano de' Medici in 1475, while the newly-discovered painting of Pallas and the Centaur is justly considered to represent the victory of Lorenzo de Medici over his foes and his triumphant return from Naples in 1480. But in any case these mythological works were certainly not painted, as Count Plunkett states, "in the nineties," when Botticelli no doubt fell under Savonarola's influence, and devoted himself chiefly to religious subjects. Once more we must point out that the Dante drawings, of which Count Plunkett gives a short and meagre account, were not as he states (p. 82) executed for Piero de' Medici, but for Lorenzo the Magnificent's cousin, Lorenzo di Pier Francesco de' Medici, one of the few members of the family who were allowed to remain in Florence after the expulsion of Piero and his associates in November, 1494. Count Plunkett, we notice, takes Ulmann as his principal guide and follows him in assuming that Botticelli worked in the shop of Andrea Verrocchio, and supposes him to have been intimately associated with the great sculptor who was Leonardo da Vinci's master. Following Sandro to Germany the biographer, in this also, accepts a large number of Madonnas, which are rejected by Morelli and most other critics. But he has, it appears, opinions of his own on the subject, and opinions, it must be owned, which are shared by no other critic. On the one hand, he accepts as genuine not only the Madonna and St. John of the Louvre, the Annunciation of the Uffizi, the Allegory of Abundance at Chantilly, and the Seasons in Lord Rosebery's collection, but a whole group of female portraits, which he describes as "fine examples of the artist's treatment of ideal types" (p. 10). On the other hand, he dismisses the lovely group in the Ambrosiana, at Milan, which Morelli justly styles a work of rare beauty and value, as a mere "bottega" picture altogether unworthy of the master, and in the same breath condemns the charming Madonna of the Poldi Pezzoli Museum as a school work, which may have been produced in Sandro's atelier, but "does not show the master's hand." A great deal of attention has of late years been devoted to the different scholars and imitators, who, working in Botticelli's atelier, and often under his eye, produced many of the works in which we recognize the original design of the master without a trace of his execution. Thus, Mr. Berenson and Mr. Logan have made it possible for us to distinguish several of the Madonnas, mythological subjects, and portraits that were formerly ascribed to Botticelli, as the work of Jacopo del Sellajo, or of the artist known as Amico di Sandro, while the famous Assumption from the Hamilton collection is now generally recognized to have been painted for Matteo Palmieri by a far inferior master, Francesco Botticini.

In conclusion, we should recommend Count Plunkett not only to revise his own text carefully, but to see that it agrees with the catalogue of the painter's works placed at the end of the volume, a list which differs on so many points from the statements made in the earlier pages of the book that we are forced to conclude it to be the work of another hand. That lovely work of Botticelli's early days, formerly in the Chigi Palace in Rome, should not be included under the head of pictures in French collections, since it is at Boston, in the United States; while the Madonna and Child, mentioned as being in the Musée of Chantilly, is a copy of the same well-known picture, and the angel is not presenting a basket of flowers but a bunch of grapes and ears of wheat to the child. Sandro Botticelli, we feel, still awaits his true biographer, and we shall look with renewed eagerness for the long-expected life of this master, which has been promised us from the pen of Mr. Herbert Horne, who is known to have devoted many years to the study of the great Florentine painter.

The desire to build has taken possession of the Royal School of Art Needlework, and the new structure at the corner of Imperial Institute Road should be worthy of its site. Although hardly reconcilable with the avowed intentions of the Royal School of Art Needlework it is understood that the department recently formed for the sale of old furniture has been a success. It will be made even more a feature of the institution when possession is taken of the new house.

With reference to the "Protest," editorially made by the Magazine of Art for this month, against the selection of artists for the Grand Prix by the authorities of the Paris Exhibition, it is a matter on which it would be well to await developments. Mr. Whistler, to take one case, exhibited a picture painted before the last decade, which is contrary to the regulations of the Exhibition. But he also exhibited pictures painted since 1889, and one of these won him the Grand Prix.

The Scottish National Gallery has for some time past been very much in need of a proper catalogue, and the one now published will be welcomed by visitors to the building at the foot of The Mound in Edinburgh. "The National Gallery of Scotland Illustrated Catalogue," by Robert Gibb, R.S.A., can hardly be termed, as it is, the 30th edition, as it is really a new work. The descriptions of the pictures, the notices of the artists, and the forty illustrations are very fine.

Artists who complain of the indignity of including soldiers returned from the war in the Lord Mayor's Show do not seem to take the proper ground. Rather should they protest that the war is so much with us, waking and sleeping, that the city pageant might be allowed to drag its slow length along guiltless of khaki. Four and twenty soldiers baked in South Africa are as part of a pageant but a poor substitute for a triumphal car, and, instead of protesting against the indignity of including returned warriors, artists should see to it that the only annual pageant we indulge in should be better done. Surely there is a latter day Hans Mackart who could be trusted to do something that would not put us to artistic shame.

EDUCATIONAL.

Oxford Texts.

Two more volumes of the excellent "Bibliotheca Classica Oxoniensis," have been published, VERGILI OPERA, edited by F. A. Hirtzel (cloth 3s. 6d., paper 3s.), and CAESARIS OPERA I., by R. du Pontet (cloth 2s. 6d., paper 2s.). To the usual brief account of the MSS., Mr. Hirtzel adds an interesting collection of would-be corrections of Virgil, subscript in the manuscripts. As no MS. contains Virgil entire, it would have been useful to learn exactly what each MS. used for this text does contain, as in Postgate's "Corpus"; but particulars are not given under the list of "Sigla." The foot notes, however, give the authority for each passage. The readings are, we think, sometimes chosen with less judgment than Nettleship's in the new "Corpus" (see e.g., Ecl. iii., 110, where this edition reads haud—haud, vi. 33 exordia as one word); on the other hand, Hirtzel seems to have the advantage—e.g., in Æn. i., 636, dii (i.e., dici), though perhaps die might be better still. The criticism of Virgil turns on such minute questions that it is impossible to deal with it fully here. Enough that the lover of Virgil will not be disappointed in this new edition. Mr. du Pontet is conservative in his text of the "Gallic War," though, following Nipperdey, he gives rather more weight to the second-rate MSS. in cases of difficulty than the fashion is. Fewer various readings are noted than in the other texts of this series; and very few conjectures admitted.

Illustrated Classics.

It is really delightful to see and to handle school books so nice as Messrs. Blackie's "Latin Series," edited by Professor Tyrrell, two more of which are now issued: VIRGIL'S GEORGICS, Book I., by S. E. Winbolt (2s. 6d.), and LIVY, Book VI., by C. Laming (1s. 6d.). These are issued, we are glad to see, without vocabulary; when a pupil can tackle Virgil or Livy undiluted, it is high time to teach him how to find his way in a dictionary. Mr. Winbolt's introduction is capital, save for a trifle too much of allusiveness here and there, which may be obscure for those who do not know what he wishes to teach. Mr. Winbolt has clearly studied Virgil's metre and rhythms with great care, and much of what he says on this topic is new. The notes hit a happy mean between bareness and diffuseness. Altogether this is an excellent school book. In his "Livy," Mr. Laming discusses the credibility of early Roman history. Like most of his predecessors, he refuses to accept tradition as the sole evidence of facts; but it is not sufficiently recognized that tradition is good evidence for national feeling about facts. The notes are good; but "res" in i., § 5 needs explaining. There are some useful remarks at the end on translating, and some English exercises for retranslation. Both these books are illustrated with a number of pictures, some in colours, those in the Virgil volume fully explained. Print and general appearance are excellent. In these important respects Blackie's series holds the first place among school books.

The cover of these books, pretty and tasteful as it is, must yield to Messrs. Bell's ANTIGONE OF SOPHOCLES (3s. 6d.), adorned with a graceful design of twining lotus. We fear that the editor, Mr. G. H. Wells, has not been sufficiently thorough in writing his notes. That on αὐτοστονοῦντε (56) seems to show a confusion of thought; the difficult line 263 is not properly explained at all; and the antistrophic system of the Greek chorus ought surely to be explained. The literary criticism is poor. Mr. Wells, like most people, mistranslates Aristotle's famous definition of tragedy; which is not to purge the mind of pity and terror, but to purge those passions by homœopathy. He is right, however, in his discussion of the Unities, where many go wrong. The interpretation of μέγεθος, too, seems strained; the context in Aristotle shows that it is rather contrasted with things "microscopic" than with "small." And could the theatre of Dionysus ever contain 25,000 people?

In print and get-up "Bell's Illustrated Classics" (1s. 6d. each) can hardly compare with Blackie's or Blackwood's, and we think their small format and scanty margins unsuitable for school books. Otherwise there is much to praise in the half-dozen new additions which lie before us. Mr. Conway's STORIES OF GREAT MEN, taken from Livy and others, will certainly be useful for beginners in Latin, who find Nepos rather hard. The idea is a good one; and a similar book, by Lhomond, has gone through many editions in Germany. Mr. Conway's versions in the notes are rather clumsy at times, but they are sufficient. A SELECTION FROM PHAEDRUS, by Rev. R. H. Chambers, will be equally welcome to those who teach the early stages of Latin. It was a happy thought to dispense with the summaries now so common in school books, and to prefix instead pictures of the scenes described in the fables. The notes are quite rightly very elementary. Mr. J. F. Charles edits an easy book of SELECTIONS FROM CICERO; they are interesting and show much variety of choice. The notes are satisfactory, and the book will be useful for a stage just above the last two. One step further and we reach Mr. H. Latter's HORACE, ODES III., and Mr. J. T. Phillipson's VIRGIL, ÆNEID VI. Mr. Latter is studiously brief in his notes, as he should be; he is sometimes, however, too brief; as in the note on v. 42, where capitis ought to be explained as due to the analogy of locatives like animi, with a glance at Greek idiom, or to the familiar genitive with verbs of accusing. A few passages from English poets are quoted in illustration, but there should be more; and we should have been glad to see some specimens of verse translations. Mr. Phillipson offers some good remarks on the difficulties of translating Virgil. Great pains have been taken in the notes to make Latin constructions clear to the pupil, and French is used sometimes with good effect to illustrate. The scansion of videō (779) might have been more fully explained; and we fear the note on 126 will convince the average boy that "Averno" is ablative of the agent. Mr. E. C. Marchant's name is warrant that his edition of Xenophon's ANABASIS I. will be excellent; and so it is. There is a freshness about it which is too rare in school books; and the perplexed urchins who use it may really believe at the end that it is a "delightful book of travel and adventure written by a soldier and a sportsman." All these books have vocabularies; but why in the name of worry and puzzledom are the proper names sometimes given in a separate list? The grammatical indices are uneven; the Cicero presents us with a huge mass of quotations which can be of little use. The choice of pictures is judicious, and the pictures really illustrate and explain the text.

Messrs. Blackwood send us another of their "Classical Texts," SELECTIONS FROM OVID'S METAMORPHOSES, by J. H. Vince (1s. 6d.). The book will be an agreeable change from the inevitable Ovid for small boys, who will learn a modicum of mythology from it. The introduction and notes are good, and Mr. Vince writes English with taste. He makes a specialty of folk-lore in this volume. The plan of the series includes a very full grammatical analysis, which we think a mistake; boys should do this for themselves. The marginal summary in the text is unpleasant to the eye, and we hope it will be done away with. There are several good process blocks of mythological figures, vase paintings in colours, and other useful illustrations, all carefully explained.

Other Commentaries.

In the company of these new and gaily bedight books our old friend the "Pitt Press Series" looks unattractive. Yet it would be so easy to have a larger margin, and that alone is a great help to the reader. Otherwise Mr. Peskett's Book III. of CAESAR'S CIVIL WAR (2s. 6d.) is a useful little edition. There is an unpretending historical introduction, which includes a good paragraph on the state of feeling at Rome as shown in Cicero's Letters. The notes deal very carefully with questions of history and antiquities; it is a pity Mr. Peckett was not able to use Mr. T. R. Holmes' work on Cæsar, which is now indispensable to the student. There are three capital maps.

The Proem to the Ideal Commonwealth of Plato: With Introduction and Notes by T. G. Tucker, Litt.D. (Bell), is a thorough and scholarly edition of that immortal piece of literature. The steps of the argument are traced, and criticized with minute care and with less verbiage than in Bosanquet's "Companion." The notes give everything that is wanted—with a trifle over perhaps; only we should like to have seen a description, or a sketch, of the votive tablet to Bendis in the British Museum (327 A.); γάρ, by the way is not "for" in phrases like καὶ γάρ, ἀλλὰ γάρ. On the whole, a most useful book, and full of interest.

In the "University Tutorial Series" Lucian's Timon and Charon have been edited by Mr. T. R. Mills (Clive, 3s. 6d.). We have to thank the London Matriculation of June, 1901, for suggesting these dialogues, and we must not forget to put this down on the credit side when we cast up the score against examinations. As usual in this series, the editor keeps strictly to business. The introduction tells all the facts, and the notes explain grammatical points which are likely to occur to the Matriculation examiner. We have several times expressed our regret that the series makes so little appeal to a higher taste and intelligence.

We should have thought Sallust surely too hard for an elementary classic, but Messrs. Macmillan do not agree, and here is Sallust's Catiline (1s. 6d.), edited by Mr. G. H. Nall, in their little blue series. The notes seem to us very good indeed, but not for quite elementary students.

Virgil, Æneid, Book III., edited by Philip Sandford (Blackie, 1s. 6d.), contains an elaborate introduction full of the sort of thing that is useful for "general" papers in scholarship examinations. Another interesting feature is the inclusion in an appendix of some examples of verse translation by William Morris, John Conington, Canon Thornhill, and Sir Charles Bowen, who seems to us to have been the most successful of the four translators in catching the spirit of the original.

Translations.

Messrs. Plaistowe and Hayes accompany their edition of Horace's Satires with a translation (Clive, 1s. 6d.). In accuracy there is little fault to find, although the emphasis is too often false or blurred; for instance, perrideas, i. 3, 25, is hardly so strong as to justify "Your thorough insight into your feelings is gained with eyes bleared." There is also a little obscurity sometimes due to faulty order; and the right tone is not always preserved. Eke and such archaisms are out of place except in mock-heroics. The translators are better in the latter parts, where they have warmed to their work, and often quite happy. Mr. E. C. Marchant continues his Thucydides with Book VII. (Bell, 1s.). We have already noticed the sixth book of this version, which strives to be "literal as well as idiomatic," and on the whole succeeds. Preface and Introduction are repeated from the previous volume. Since Mr. Marchant thus renews his attack on Hobbes' translation, we would again offer our tribute to the dignity of its style, which Mr. Marchant never approaches. We do not propose to discuss matters of interpretation, where there is often a lawful difference of opinion, but if the renderings are such as can fairly be defended, that is enough. Mr. Marchant's version is scholarly and pleasant to read, although he too much affects the short sentence, which, when used habitually, is fatal to a dignified rhythm. Three books of Livy (XXI.-XXIII.), translated by J. B. Baker, M.A., are issued by Messrs. Bell in the same series (paper covers, 1s. each). Each has an introduction by J. H. Freese, M.A., on the life of Livy, his work, his authorities, and his manner of using them. A few notes are also prefixed; the place-names in alphabetical order, the army, and other archæological matters. These are surely out of place in a translation. Mr. Freese has, we think, scored a success in his version. The narrative is not without dignity, and there is force and vigour in it. There is room, however, for some improvement in details. Thus in xxi. 4, pauci ac ferme optimus quisque is not idiomatically rendered by "few, including nearly all the chief nobles"; there is an incongruity in the first two words. In the same chapter, indole virtutum ac vitiorum is translated as though these were descriptive genitives, which Latin usage forbids; indole must be taken in its literal sense of "ingrowth" or "endowment" of vice and virtue. Some of the renderings are happy, as "half-caste Gauls" for Semigalli, "with cold steel" for the frequent ferro, "the glamour of the Roman name" for fulgor nominis Romani. Notes are given on disputed readings, and Mr. Freese is usually judicious; but we question tum itaque in xxii. 24, 8, and his reading in xxi. 33, 4 we do not understand. There are several incorrect references in these notes, and in the last quoted "rendering" seems to be a mistake for "reading." "An Eton Master" offers us Fifty Epigrams from the First Book of Martial (Rivingtons, 2s. 6d.), which are not remarkable for rhythmical grace and are stuffed with outlandish slang. Martial's neatness and point have disappeared in the English, we regret to say; but they may appeal to a schoolboy's sense of humour, and at least they are an attempt in the right direction. This is not bad of Chef Taratalla:

> If 'tis funny to call your cook Monsieur Cooper
> It is less so to call mine Lorette Dudiner?

We are glad to recommend Mr. Huntingford's verse translation of the Frogs of Aristophanes (Methuen, 2s. 6d.). He is not so happy in his allusions as Frere, nor quite so easy in his versification as Rogers; but he has shirked no difficulty, and some parts of the book are very good. A fault to be found is, however, his condescension to slang like "O lor," and "biz." We have noted a split infinitive; and "hanged'll" is hardly a neat rime for "candle." Some of the lyrics are dainty; and his skill in weaving rimes may be seen from the following extract:—

> Ho! clear the way for us we pray, and speak with breath abated,
> Each one whose mind is unrefined and uninitiated,
> Who has not glanced at, much less danced at, true artistic revelries,
> And draws the line at old Cratinus' bully Bacchic devilries.

His parodies of Euripides are very funny, and he is clearly as happy as he can be all through.

Composition and Grammar.

A Latin Composition, by A. H. Allcroft and J. H. Haydon (Clive: University Tutorial Series, 2s. 6d.), appears in the fifth edition; and we are told that the type has been reset throughout and the matter revised, but the paragraph numbers have not been interfered with. The book seems to us remarkably good. It is clear and concise, and does not attempt too much; without doubt it has been tested by practical use, and on every page shows the fruits of experience. A good point is that all doubtful quantities are marked. The rules for Latin conditional sentences are based on time, not on reality or unreality; useful cautions not always found in books, but very much needed, are given in § 141, note 3, and § 211. We make a few suggestions for the sixth edition, which is sure to be wanted. It is not unnecessary to say clearly that the verb to be cannot govern an accusative case (§ 7, 13). The ablative is not an object, as stated in § 50, but an instrumental; and the ablative with opus should be explained to the beginner in the same way (§ 55). The literal translation of, e.g., morierdum est mihi, "dying is for me," would explain the apparent dative of the agent (§ 111). It is dangerous to render audientes "hearing"; it should be "while hearing" (§ 81). In § 113 the construction of domum with suam should be given. The authors profess to keep English grammar in mind, but we have not observed much of it in their book; a good chance was missed in § 130, where the original case of the in the more the merrier might have been stated. The only serious fault we can find with this book is that Appendix II. on abstract expressions is hopelessly inadequate. Latin uses abstract nouns freely in speaking of qualities as such; and many mistakes are made from not knowing this. The appendix ought to be omitted, or written again, and the subject properly dealt with. There are thirty-four pages of exercises, useful sentences no doubt, but no hint is given as to the principles of arrangement. Perhaps they are meant to be miscellaneous. The same authors publish the fourth edition of their Latin Grammar (Clive, 3s. 6d.). It is sound and good, though not so original as the composition. We commend the following points: the use of varieties of type to distinguish important nouns or verbs; and an alphabetical list of the verbs which are usually classified according to stem. Teachers will at once recognize the great convenience of this, and will also be grateful to have the chief verbs printed in thick type. The stem-lists are given as well. We fear § 494 will prove misleading, and boys who use this grammar will be apt to take quod est for the form of est in reported speech.

Most public schoolmasters have learnt to their cost that boys are taught nothing of English grammar in their young days; and the few pages of explanation and exercise prefixed to Mr. K. P. Wilson's First Latin Sentences and Prose (Blackwood, 2s. 6d.) will undoubtedly be useful. The Latin sentences are very plain and easy, and the special point of the book is that it introduces the compound sentence early, and tries to lead up naturally to continuous prose. How far he has succeeded can only be judged by careful experiment; but the idea is a good one.

FICTION.

Eleanor.

ELEANOR (Smith, Elder, 6s.), the new novel by Mrs. Humphry Ward, seems to us her most masterly and most mature production. It emphasizes once more the peculiarity, as compared with other novelists, of her outlook on life. In one sense that outlook is a narrow one. It is closed towards an immense extent of country in the "Map of Life." Novelists give us social types in profusion; they distil the humours and the pathos of sport, of fashion, of commerce, of the rustic and the cockney; their love stories are complicated only by the intricacies of pure emotion. For Mrs. Humphry Ward this is not enough. She leaves aside that large class of mankind who have no intellectual or spiritual interests. People who are more engrossed in the condition of their bank books, their families, and their digestions than in politics or theology—and these form the "cast" of most novels—do not attract her. She does not care laboriously to depict their manners and their talk. Yet human nature, no doubt, is the same both in the cultured and the uncultured, and "Eleanor," more than any other of her novels, shows that Mrs. Ward is aware of it. But even here she is selective, for she prefers, if we may borrow the language of science, to isolate those "phenomena" of love in which emotion moves side by side with thought.

In the case of other writers this propensity would be likely to deaden the vitality of the story. It is Mrs. Ward's achievement to have shown that a general atmosphere of intellectuality may give scope for the highest qualities of the novelist. The plot in "Eleanor" is one of the most simple and familiar—that of a woman crushed by finding that she cannot win the man she loves, effacing herself, and assisting his marriage with her rival. But it is wrought out with extraordinary power. The man, Manisty, though considering his social position his good manners are a little too much to seek, is a fine and consistent study of an egoist; but, as we should expect from Mrs. Ward, his egoism is an intellectual not, like Sir Willoughby Patterne's, a personal one. "It would almost seem as though nature for her secret reasons had thrown a special charm round the egoist of all types, for the loving and true." Lucy Foster, the rival of Eleanor, is a Puritan from New England—not the too familiar American girl of fiction with her millions and her breezy good nature. The pathos of Eleanor's life, a life which had seemed to begin anew with Manisty's affection after the tragedy by which she had lost both husband and child; the change wrought in her rebellious heart by her love for Lucy, and, by the influence of Father Benecke; the tender links of sympathy which unite her with Brooklyn, the young diplomat, and with the Contessa Guerrini, who had lost her only son in the Abyssinian war; the passion and the self-control of her relations with Manisty; her touching friendship with her rival; the profound and beautiful character of Lucy Foster; the unerring and poignant effect of every incident through which the story develops—it is these things that give so intense an interest to the book. And over all is the light and colour of Italy, the spell of the land where every foot of ground recalls countless historic memories.

> So old it was!—and yet so fresh with spring! In the mornings, at least, the spring was uppermost. It silenced the plaint of outraged beauty which the place seemed to be always making under a flutter of growth and song. Water and flowers and nightingales, the shadow, the sunlight, and the heat were all alike strong and living—Italy untamed. It was only in the evenings that Lucy shunned the path. For then, from the soil below and the wall above, there crept out the old imprisoned forces of sadness, or of poison, and her heart flagged or her spirits sank as she sat or walked there. Marinata has no malaria; but on old soils, and as night approaches, there is always something in the shade of Italy that fights with human life. The poor ghosts rise from the earth—jealous of those that are still walking the warm ways of the world.

It was during Eleanor's constant companionship with Manisty as his secretary and adviser in a book defending Roman Catholicism that thoughts of a new life had dawned upon her. How strange she thought that they should be engaged on such a work together!

> He—one of the most thorough sceptics of his day, as she had good reason to know—she a woman who had at one time ceased to believe because of an intolerable anguish, and was now only creeping slowly back to faith, to hope, because—because—
> Ah! with a little shiver, she recalled her thought, as a falconer might his bird, before it struck.

Slowly came the change in their relations, and Eleanor's gradual perception of the truth.

> "No, no! False! She does'nt—does'nt love him!" her heart cried, throwing all its fiercest life into the cry. She sat up in bed trembling and haggard. Then she stole into the next room. Lucy lay deeply, peacefully asleep. Eleanor sank down beside her, hungrily watching her. "How could she sleep like that—if—if she cared?" asked her wild thoughts, and she comforted herself smiling at her own remorse. Once she touched the girl's hand with her lips, feeling towards her a rush of tenderness that came like dew on the heat of the soul. Then she crept back to bed and cried, and cried—through the golden mounting of the dawn.

Yet at the end—"Eleanor through all anguish had remained mistress of herself, and she had her reward. No irreparable word had passed between them. In silence the old life ceased to be, and a new bond arose." The artist's frontispiece of Eleanor is excellent. In his illustrations he wisely chooses portraits rather than incidents; but he fails in one landscape background.

Religion, whether as a matter of the heart or of the head, is not here the pivot of events. It is no "conviction of sin" or submission to the Church that softens Eleanor. Roman Catholicism permeates, but does not influence, the story; and is represented by Manisty, an agnostic in love with her "system," and Father Benecke, a priest excommunicated for heresy. Rome is painted from the outside—her beauty and her ugliness alike—in the true historic spirit. There is a magnificent picture of a Papal ceremony at St. Peter's, one among many fine descriptive passages, of which, perhaps, the finest is the story of the "Rex nemorosus," by the lake of Nemi, culled from the book on which Manisty is at work. The novel, as a whole, is sombre; but the characters—Manisty, Eleanor, and Lucy—strongly and clearly conceived from the very first, are so continuously sympathetic, their surroundings appeal so strongly to the imagination, the conversations are so necessary, so natural, and so interesting, that the book in its leisurely unexciting progress is as engrossing as one of pure sensation. There is one sensational incident, that of Manisty's mad sister—a powerful study in insanity. No tragedy, no sentimental deathbed mars the dénouement. The story moves throughout in a high range of emotion, never out of touch with ideas, never commonplace. Sorrowful, though it be, it is not depressing or pessimistic, and in the dignified pathos of its end the highly wrought sympathies of the reader sink naturally to repose.

Tommy's Sequel.

It was a remark of Mr. Frederic Harrison's, we believe, that the reason of the decay of modern fiction lay in the growing lack of self-confidence in our authors. In the spacious days of Scott, Dickens, or Thackeray our novelists were afraid of no man; they wrote what they wished in defiance of critics, public, or literary agent. Now the rising novelist feels that he has to be careful, and too often he fears to "let himself go." He may get hold of a good idea, but his courage fails him; he has one eye on the reviewer, the other on the booksellers, and illogicality triumphs. What might have been a work of genius is marred by over-caution. It is very certain that Mr. Barrie, at all events, will not come to grief for any reason of this kind. In TOMMY AND GRIZEL (Cassell, 6s.) he has carried a masterly analysis of the artistic temperament to a pitch of pitilessness unknown since the days of "The Egoist." Indeed, there is at first sight a singular resemblance between Meredith's book and Mr. Barrie's. The ironic method is strong in both; both probe the souls of their creatures remorselessly; both are inclined to err from excess of subtlety. Of the two characters, Sir Willoughby Patterne and Tommy Sandys, it is enough to say that the latter is every whit as real a creation as his predecessor. He should be real, for Mr. Barrie, himself a sentimentalist, has set himself here the task of drawing a prince of sentimentalists. He hampers himself little with plot or minor characters; it is clear that his chief object was to limn the sentimentalist and the two women, respectively his sister and his wife, with whom he is chiefly concerned. Tommy, Grizel, Elspeth—upon these three rest the fortunes of his book. Tommy by himself would suffice to make any novel something more than remarkable. The book is very well written, in the vein of quiet, ironical humour that Mr. Barrie has made his own. His sentences rarely close without an illuminating touch—rarely, too, without a dexterous stab. The man grows before us with each successive stroke. There are one or two pieces in the book of exquisite prose. Read the love-scene on page 159 and the following pages, and you shall find the true successor to the man who wrote that song of love in "Richard Feverel"—or, say, the man who might have written a pendant to that exquisite chapter, could he have withheld himself from the delights of over-refinement. Mr. Barrie must always sound an original note. His courage is remarkable. Is there living another writer who could pen the delightful rhapsody on pp. 112, 113, and then add, as Mr. Barrie adds—how with filmy eyes the sentimentalist searched himself for the "little pocket-book in which he took notes of such sad thoughts as these"? It is done of set purpose, and it fixes the character of the man in our minds more than any other artifice could do. It is not the commonplace trick of obtaining a humorous effect by a sudden change of key. It is done in the interest of truth. Nevertheless, the sequel to "Sentimental Tommy" falls short of being a great book. It opens admirably; it continues admirably until somewhere about the love-scene which we have mentioned; and then the author's grasp seems to weaken; there is a vague sense of dissatisfaction. But Mr. Barrie has added to the slender gallery of real characters two that the world will not easily forget. Grizel is one of the most "womanly" women in fiction. Tommy is the prince and paragon of his kind. And even at the end we are convinced that his merciless painter comes near shedding a tear over his untimely fate.

Mr. Robert Hichens.

Mr. Robert Hichens writes fluently and well—rather well and very fluently, having a decided turn for saying the same thing over and over again in different words. He has also a weird and fantastic imagination, and a great delight in toying with the supernatural. If we had to criticize his TONGUES OF CONSCIENCE (Methuen, 6s.) in Aristotelian terms, we should say that we were sensible of the pity and the fear, but missed the cathartic effect. Our own attitude towards the supernatural in fiction is not particularly sympathetic, but we are bound to admit that Mr. Hichens excels in it. His "How Love came to Professor Guildea" is convincingly uncanny on a first reading, though a second reading discovers flaws in the machinery. The idea—that of a supernatural visitor that is not seen, but only felt—is not quite new. It occurred, if we recollect rightly, in a story by Mr. Marion Crawford called "The Upper Berth"; and we fancy Grant Allen also availed himself of it. Mr. Hichens works the idea with sufficient creepiness, and also with sufficient novelty of detail to justify his appropriation of it. The story of the young wife who murdered her husband to prevent him from writing advanced novels of the sort that do harm to the silly and susceptible is also original and gruesome. We should think it might itself do harm by encouraging women who suffer from suppressed religious or moral mania to set themselves up as critics of things they do not understand—a disturbing practice already too much indulged in by them. We sincerely trust, however, that Mr. Hichens will not suffer at their hands. He is clever, and he is not always morbid. Some day, perhaps, he will cease altogether to be morbid.

Miss Arabella Kenealy.

A character in Mrs. Atherton's latest novel is responsible for the dictum "Problems exist principally in works of fiction and in the minds of unoccupied women." Now we feel pretty certain that Dr. Arabella Kenealy is not to be classed among the unoccupied women. Yet her work of fiction, CHARMING RENÉE (Hutchinson, 6s.), does not state any question for our solution. It simply tells the early struggles and development of a beautiful girl into a beautiful woman amidst a collection of ill-bred suburban people. Later Renée becomes Lady Stratheldon under rather remarkable circumstances, but the interest of the story by no means wanes after this event. The characters are cleverly drawn, and the development of the plot well worked out. Miss Kenealy has one affectation which gets on our nerves. Her characters do not "say" things, they "submit" them; thus Renée's mother, Mrs. Quentin, of two bulldogs in Lord Stratheldon's room: "Now, are they perfectly safe? she submitted, with a flutter." This is done on almost every page. If, however, the reader can surmount a trifle of this sort he will find "Charming Renée" a very pleasant and interesting novel.

In Russia.

Those of us who do not know St. Petersburg look towards that city as the centre of vivid romance, superhuman sacrifice, supersubtle wickedness, and "Red Lamp" like stories of bravery and crime. Miss Olive Garnett, who does know it, takes the same point of view in PETERSBURG TALES (Heinemann, 6s.) In "The Case of Vetrova" she gives us as painful and powerful a narrative of an attempt on the part of a girl of the people to make herself heard in the interests of the suffering as could well be imagined. In "Roukoff" the almost tragic story of an impostor, is cleverly told. "The Secret of the Universe," though not especially a Petersburg story, is of vital interest, and that is reason enough for including it. There is also little connexion with Petersburg in "Out of It," a suggested story which to our simple minds would be more admirable were it less unintelligible. The lady who tells the story says:—"The enclosed sheets will explain. I wrote them for myself. I have the habit of writing. But they won't be too vague for you, with your habit of reading between lines." Perhaps we have not the habit; at any rate we should advise Miss Olive Garnett not to permit the heroines of her stories to adopt the dot and dash system if they have the habit of writing. "Petersburg Tales" is a book worth reading, but it could easily be made more so. No doubt Miss Garnett has never read a word of Mr. Henry James. That is always so when a reviewer dares to hint a resemblance between an established and a rising writer. But if the author of "Petersburg Tales" does not know the work of the writer of "The Soft Side" let her study his manner and learn how to be suggestive without being intangible.

Whatever Mr. Frederic Carrel's previous books may be from a literary point of view, they are at least not tedious. His REALIZATION OF JUSTUS MONAN (John Long, 6s.), though it has reached a second edition, has probably done so through the success of its predecessors. It is not only profoundly disagreeable, but excessively tedious. An intrigue between uncle and niece is offensive to English minds, even when it takes place on foreign soil and there is no blood relationship. But when it is spun out through pages of importunities on the woman's side, met with interminable harangues on the man's, what is there to be said? It is true that in the multitude of words there is occasional wit or wisdom. But of humour there is not a trace. The lingering cremation of Justus did not horrify us as it might have done, for we felt that he could at least talk no more after it. We do not grudge the book a certain dreary originality: but it should not be read during influenza.

RUE WITH A DIFFERENCE, by Rosa Nouchette Carey (Macmillan, 6s.), is better and stronger than a good deal of its very popular author's work, but characteristic in its pleasant simplicity. The almost infantile ingénue is missing from the cast of characters, which is made up of wholesome women and girls and rather more unreal men—mostly lovers. The wearer of the rue (with a difference) is a charming young woman who pursues happiness through two married lives. We are left with a cheerful impression that a third experiment will not be necessary.

In A Suburban Vendetta (C. Arthur Pearson, 6s.) Mr. John K. Leys handles a familiar theme—the spoliation of a Brahmin temple by a party of English officers and the vengeance of its implacable guardians. Depiction of character is ruthlessly sacrificed to evolution of plot. But the incidents are neither probable nor convincing, and one or two scenes otherwise effective enough are marred by unnecessary minuteness of detail. We may be wrong, but there are indications that the author's study of the Rajah of Nagore and his knowledge of Indian life and manners are derived from occasional glimpses of a famous Sussex amateur in the cricket-field. At the same time Mr. Leys writes clear and vigorous English, and the development of his story is not without merit.

The Cross Triumphant, by Florence M. Kingsley (Ward, Lock, 6s.), takes us back to the days of Vespasian. The sketch of the state of Jerusalem under the early Roman Emperors, and of its final reduction by Titus, is full of vigour, and we follow with interest the mental struggles of a young Jew in his transition from the strictest traditions of Judaism to Christianity. If there is in the local colouring an occasional whiff of the midnight oil, that only shows that Miss Kingsley has read up the authorities with care. The book is not a great historical novel, but it will appeal successfully to readers who prefer to have their history judiciously blended with a love story.

Helmet and Spear (Seeley, 5s.) is another of those volumes of ancient stories picturesquely retold for which the Rev. A. J. Church has established a reputation. Battles after battles, from Marathon, Thermopylae, and Salamis down through the long list of the Punic wars to the invasions of Alaric and Attila, are dealt with and described in turn by the author who delighted our boyhood with "Stories from Homer" and "Stories from Virgil." Even the warlike spirit of the present age should find satisfaction, if not satiety, in this thick volume of solid and varied fighting. The illustrations are numerous and spirited.

In D'Arcusé: A Reminiscence (Burleigh, 1s. 6d.) Mr. J. C. Shannon tells a short story in a soothingly garrulous manner reminiscent of a gently-flowing brook. There was no sort of need to make a volume of it—even an eighteenpenny volume—but probably the author wished to see his name upon the title-page, and the whim is sufficiently harmless. Shorn of some of its verbiage, for the characters address each other in studied cadences with all the circumlocution at their command, the story might have figured in a magazine without attracting much praise or blame. In its present state it strikes us as slight, verbose, and unnecessary.

Vivian of Virginia, by Hulbert Fuller (Jarrold, 6s.), goes over well-trodden ground. Virginia, especially old Virginia of the Rebellion, is a wonderfully picturesque scene for a romance. Its only danger is that it may be over-exploited. In the present book the hero is the usual gigantic young man of chivalrous heart, the heroine also of the accepted type—merry and arch, and (finally) loving. Berkeley and his brutalities figure effectively in the tales. Nathaniel Bacon figures in it. In fact, the whole thing is precisely what the title gives you a right to expect, no more, but certainly no less. There are clever illustrations by Mr. Frank Merrill.

The Living Remnant, by "K. K. K." (Headley Brothers, 3s. 6d.), is a collection of quiet Quaker studies, full of tenderness and sincerity, and giving a good idea of "the Friends" and their kindly, peaceful lives. The state of things it describes is chiefly an affair of the past, for the book opens "half a century ago, when Quaker bonnets and shawls, collarless coats and broad-brims, were not yet a thing of the past. Sweet girlish faces still looked out from behind their silken fences, and boyish ones supported the old-fashioned stock or choker." "K. K. K." is a faithful and sympathetic chronicler, probably feminine.

D'Annunzio's "Il Fuoco" we reviewed at some length on the 19th of last May. It now appears in an English translation—the work of Kassandra Vivaria—under the title of the Flame of Love (Heinemann, 6s.). Apart from the controversy which has raged round the personality of the heroine and D'Annunzio's treatment of her, apart from his intimate self-revelations, the book possesses a power which cannot but appeal to English readers—particularly in its marvellously coloured pictures of Venice. If we may quote what we said on a former occasion, "It is painful yet fascinating in its colossal egoism; and yet art shines through the book like a jewel in the forehead of a toad." Of the translation we need only say that it reads like an original, a virtue not too common in translations.

OBITUARY.

PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER.

In Friedrich Max Müller Orientalists have lost their doyen and Oxford her most illustrious professor. Whatever may be thought of his teaching on certain disputed points and theories, there is no question that he has stood for many years at the head of the Orientalists of England, and that no man has done more, or half so much, to promote and encourage the studies to which he devoted a long and honoured life. Few people realize what an indomitable worker he was, or reckon the years and decades of tedious collation and revision and correcting of proofs that were needed to bring out the hundred volumes which he wrote or edited. To the last his energy was unabated. It seems only the other day that we noticed the second part of his reminiscences of "Auld Lang Syne," in which he told us how he "fell in love with India" so long ago as 1833; and his elaborate work on the "Six Systems of Indian Philosophy" appeared but last year, when their author was approaching his seventy-seventh year.

To many he was probably known chiefly as the delightful host, full of kindly humour and graceful courtesy, the well-bred man of the world, who knew everybody worth knowing, the eloquent persuasive lecturer, who could make the driest discussion of philology as fascinating as a romance. They did not look back to the hard ascetic apprenticeship, the long years of single-minded application, the silent hours in the study, where "the Professor" must not be disturbed, which preceded and made possible this finished ease of exposition, this air of urbane leisure. Max Müller was one of the hardest workers of his time, and he had the gift of making others work with him. He got his industry and perseverance from his German blood, and his poet father in those early days at the little town of Dessau gave him his romantic German sentiment, his poetic outlook upon life, his warmth of sympathy. Those who have not read "Deutsche Liebe" do not know the real man, though indeed the same gifts of sympathy and idealism shine out even in such a work as the "Indian Philosophy." It was perhaps this sympathetic insight and poetic imagination, more than any literary and philological training (thorough as that was), that made him such a master of exposition. His English prose is "the envy of Englishmen," clear as a bell, yet warm, sometimes impassioned. But this clearness of thought and expression is no German inheritance. It was not the house at Dessau nor the teaching of Brockhaus and Bopp at Leipzig and Berlin that gave him his surpassing lucidity. He may have caught it at Paris, when studying under Burnouf in the "forties"; sons of Oxford may perhaps claim that that University had her share in developing and refining his powers. The result was undeniable; Max Müller was an exceptionally lucid and fascinating teacher, whether by mouth or pen. He had the rare gift of being popular without ever descending from the cathedra of a scholar. Even his most popular works are the writings of a learned man who prizes learning above everything. He did not bring learning down to the level of the multitude, but he gave the multitude eyes and ears to take in what he had to teach.

Max Müller was, of course, first and last a Sanskrit student, though his labours upon Sanskrit texts are necessarily the least known. The great edition of the "Rig-Veda" with Sâyana's commentary, in six volumes, occupied more than twenty years of hard drudgery and small earnings to which he looked back with pride: "I was as happy as a king all the time." The work was reissued, after detailed revision, under the patronage of the late Maharajah of Vizianagram a few years ago. The hymns of the "Rig-Veda" were the professor's favourite study, and several volumes of text or translation were published. A "History of Sanskrit Literature" went to a second edition in 1860. The "Veda" led him to comparative philology and mythology, for which the lectures of Bopp had already prepared him. His contributions to the "Science of Mythology," and still more his famous lectures at the Royal Institution on the "Science of Language" (1861, 1864) took England by storm. They were even the talk of the town. The lectures on the "Science of Language" were, it is true, original rather in form than in ideas; they familiarized English people for the first time with the method of Comparative Philology as elaborated by Max Müller's old master Bopp, and their merit lay in the brilliantly lucid exposition which, in spite of the obsolete character of some of the details, makes them still fascinating to read. The theory of Comparative Mythology, commonly epitomized as the "Solar Myth," was strictly connected with the method of comparative philology. To quote the words of its most distinguished British adversary, Mr. Andrew Lang, "this system rests on comparison between the Sanskrit names in the Rig-Veda and the mythic names in Greek, German, Slavonic, and other Aryan legends. The attempt is made to prove that, in the common speech of the undivided Aryan race, many words for splendid or glowing natural phenomena existed, and that natural processes were described in a figurative style. As the various Aryan families separated, the sense of the old words and names became dim, the nomina developed into numina, the names into gods, the descriptions of elemental processes into myths." Comparative mythology, in fact, on this philological method, explained myths as "a disease of language." The value of the method in relation to the genealogy of myths is generally admitted, while its efficiency in explaining their origin has been more and more warmly disputed. But the attacks of the "anthropologists" did not dislodge the author from his position, which he reasserted without essential modification, not only in the famous "Chips from a German Workshop" (1868-75) and "Selected Essays" (1881), but even so lately as last year in "Auld Lang Syne." His "Introduction to the Science of Religion" was delivered at the Royal Institution in 1870; and later, as Gifford lecturer at Glasgow, he expounded his views in a series of lectures on the origin and growth of religion, Indian, natural, physical, anthropological, and psychological, in 1887-1892. There is naturally much that is open to criticism and controversy in the views he set forth in repeated and varied forms, but at least they are the views of an acute student of early Indian religious literature and of a thinker versed in philosophy and not afraid to think things out. They represent, or rather they lead, a school of interpretation, which has many supporters as well as many opponents; but the opposition is rather against the wide application of the philological method than against its value in certain aspects. That the controversy aroused by his brilliant writings is eminently stimulating his anthropological adversaries should be the first to allow.

It is not, however, by his own works alone that Max Müller has earned the gratitude of all students of Eastern literatures. His chair at Oxford has been the focus of a wide circle of scholarly zeal inspired by his energy. No one but he could have carried through the gigantic scheme of a complete translation of the "Sacred Books of the East," now on the verge of the fiftieth volume, and secured the indispensable support, not only in a material sense of the Government and the Oxford Press, but of many of the leading Orientalists of Europe. Most of the volumes were the work of other scholars, but each was arranged for by him, and every page passed through his careful hands before it was committed to "final press." Not content with this library of translations, he turned again to urging the publication of texts. In conjunction with Mr. Bunyio Nanjio he contributed three volumes of "Buddhist Texts from Japan" to the Aryan Series of the "Anecdota Oxoniensia," and joined Kenju Kasawara in an edition of the "Dharma-Sangraha"; whilst still more recently, under the auspices of the King of Siam, he began a series of translations of the "Sacred Books of the Buddhists," of which the second volume, by Mr. Rhys Davids, was published last December. The very fact that the King of Siam and the Maharajah of Vizianagram were prepared to support a work, however costly, which bore his imprimatur shows the influence of Max Müller's writings in the East, where many of them have found their way into the vernaculars. It was his dearest wish to draw India and England closer together, to help each to understand the other. The wish is touchingly expressed again and again in his latest book, the second volume of "Auld Lang Syne," where his understanding sympathy with Indian thought, and with the efforts of Indian reformers from within, is conspicuous. Undoubtedly his works have contributed greatly towards the result he desired, and thanks to him above others there is now a far more intelligent appreciation of the Hindu people than existed before he began to write. Indeed his influence has been powerful in many directions and always for the furtherance of learning. He had his detractors, but a scholar who was Foreign Member of the French Institute, a Knight of the Prussian Ordre pour le Mérite, an honorary member of almost every learned society, and an honorary doctor of several Universities could probably afford to neglect them. The most signal honour he received was the admission to the Privy Council. No commoner, absolutely unconnected with politics, has ever been thus honoured by the Queen, save Huxley and Max Müller. It was the crown of a lifetime of high and noble work.

THE GERMAN SCHOOLBOY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I note with interest that Mr. Jerome in your columns revives the hoary old fallacy that what is "no earthly use in after life" is of no use in education. The same argument would damn gymnastic exercises. We claim for Latin a good deal more than the value of a mental gymnastic, but there is no doubt it is that; and if it is no more, it can be defended.

I do not wish to enter into controversy as to the rest of the paper, but my observation does not agree with Mr. Jerome's on the size of the average German. He has failed to observe, moreover, that the average public schoolboy is a big creature; and this class it is alone which is fed on Latin. "Little men-figures" in the large towns have been to elementary schools, or technical schools, or no schools; and they are no worshippers of the Latin "fetish."

Yours faithfully,

Rugby, Oct. 27. W. H. D. ROUSE.

BATHOS IN CHAUCER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In justice to Chaucer, will you allow me to make a criticism on a paragraph in the interesting article you published in your number of October 20th, on Chaucer as "a poet of transition."

The writer there refers, as proof of bathos or rapid change from the sublime to the ridiculous in Chaucer, to the line in the Knight's Tale—

The sough freten the child right in the cradel.

He says, "we have not a moment to shudder over such dramatic pictures as that of 'the smyler with the knyf under the cloke,' 'the colde deeth, with mouth gaping upright,' or 'the hunte strangled with the wilde beeres,' before we are confronted with the vision of a sow poking his nose into a child's cradle," &c.

It is only fair to Chaucer to point out that this charge against his poetry arises from a misunderstanding of the word "freten." In Chaucer's time "freten" did not mean teasing, or fretting, in the modern sense of the word, as your contributor evidently imagines. It meant something far from ridiculous, something intensely, horribly tragic. It meant eating, devouring, the poor child in its cradle, as swine have been known to do.

If we look but a very little further on in this same tale, at ll. 2,065 to 2,068, we find another example of this use of the word, the only meaning in Chaucer's time.

> Ther saugh I Attheon an hert y-maked,
> For vengeaunce that he saugh Diane al naked:
> I saugh how that his houndes have hym caught,
> And freten hym for that they knewe hym naught, that is, the hounds devoured Acteon when he was being turned into a deer. Or again, in the Legend of Good Women, l. 1,951; Theseus was cast into prison—"Tyl thilke tyme he sholde y-freten be." That is till he should be devoured by the Minotaur. These two examples, among many others, both before and after Chaucer's time, are sufficient to show the then meaning of the word.

It is hard upon our great poet to charge him with bathos because we do not happen quite to understand some of the words he used.

Yours very faithfully,

The Temple. CHARLES HAMILTON BROMBY.

 Our issue with Mr. Bromby is on a matter of opinion, not of fact. We were well aware of the meaning of the word "freten," and we are ready to admit that to be eaten by a sow is truly a tragic fate. But what is tragic in life is not necessarily so in literature. The treatment of the sow in tragedy is hazardous, and the passage from Chaucer, occurring where it does, is certainly, we think, grotesque.—Ed.

OIL AND TEMPERA.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The question of the medium in which the pictures of Perugino, or any of his contemporaries, were painted is not a difficult one for a painter of considerable technical experience. It is clear, moreover, that as early as Pietro della Francesca (born 1398) oil colours were used to strengthen and enrich the tempera foundation of the work. An interesting example of this manner is seen in the Baptism of Christ by Verrocchio, in which the second painting in oil was left incomplete and the portions in which the oil was used can easily be distinguished from the tempera foundation. We may suppose that this Baptism was painted about 1470, as Da Vinci was then Verrocchio's pupil, being 18 years of age. Perugino, being born in 1446, was probably taught the method, as he worked with Pietro della Francesca. Oil painting, from the laying in, probably came in with Giorgione and was possibly the manner which Titian is said to have adopted from his fellow pupil. During the entire period of Perugino's working the mixed tempera and oil must have been in use. Yours truly,

W. J. STILLMAN.

SWINBURNE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Entangled in the mass of verbiage which Mr. Noyes displays a regrettable propensity to pile up when he takes in his hand "that terrible modern weapon, the pen," seems to be the thesis that a poet's greatness is measured by the number of his imitators. Swinburne, he says, "began to write when England was under the domination of Tennyson. After twenty years there were some three hundred writers of verse. Every single one of these had forsaken Tennyson, and was under the direct influence of Swinburne."

The defection from Tennyson to Swinburne would argue facility, not a quality usually associated with great poetry; and the fact that three hundred versifiers are flung at our heads would rather seem to corroborate this view. Cannot Mr. Noyes enjoy poetry, great and excellent alike, without swashing at those who do not subscribe to every tenet which he urges with so much vehemence?

He asks for a passage equal to one he quotes. I will give him four, taken offhand from Shakespeare, Dante, Rostand, and Sheridan's distinguished granddaughter, the Hon. Mrs. Norton.

> In many's looks the false heart's history
> Is writ in moods, and frowns and wrinkles strange,
> But heaven in thy creation did decree
> That in thy face sweet love should ever dwell;
> Whate'er thy thoughts or thy heart's workings be,
> Thy looks should nothing thence but sweetness tell.

> Era già l'ora che volge il disio
> Ai naviganti, e intenerisce il core
> Lo di ch'han detto ai dolci amici addio;
> E che lo novo peregrin d'amore
> Punge, se ode squilla di lontano,
> Che paia il giorno pianger che si more.

> Un baiser, mais à tout prendre, qu'est-ce?
> Un serment fait d'un peu plus près, une promesse
> Plus précise, un aveu qui veut se confirmer,
> Un point rose qu'on met sur l'i du verbe aimer:
> C'est un secret qui prend la bouche pour oreille,
> Un instant d'infini qui fait un bruit d'abeille,
> Une communion ayant un gout de fleur,
> Une façon d'un peu se respirer le cœur,
> Et d'un peu se goûter, au bord des lèvres, l'âme!

> They who credit crime are they who feel
> Their own heart's weak to unresisted sin;
> Memory, not judgment, prompts the thoughts which steal
> O'er minds like these, an easy faith to win;
> And tales of broken truth are still believed
> Most readily by those who have themselves deceived.

I have no desire to interfere with his idolatry, but when he shouts in the market-place that there is no god but his, he should not be surprised if he fails to evoke a chorus of assent.

In taking leave of the subject I would commend to his reflection this sage advice: "To try and approach truth on one side after another, not to strive or cry, nor to persist in pressing forward, on any one side, with violence and self-will."

Believe me to be, Sir, very truly yours,

October 29. P. A. SILLARD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Is Swinburne a poet, and, if so, how much a poet? To answer this question conclusively we should first be agreed as to what a poet is; but that is a question rather difficult of answer under any circumstances, and one that cannot satisfactorily be dealt with in the space that you could afford to a mere letter.

Swinburne has, undoubtedly, a remarkable temperamental gift of versification, and, at command, a singular wealth of words; but he is perplexed and lost when it comes to a question of expressing meaning. Now it may be a mere convention that a poet should aim at expressing a meaning; but, if a convention, it is one to which all great poets have subordinated themselves. Our last great poet, Tennyson, is weak in that he tries to express the highest and deepest thought in the noblest and most fitting words; but Swinburne is generally bothered and annoyed when it becomes a question of giving meaning to words. Might he not—he has the ability to do it—become the founder of a quite new school of poetry, which should care only for sonorous and melodious words while wholly disregarding any meaning to be attached to them? He might, for instance, write, beautifully, lovely words in Greek, English, Italian, and never be hampered by thinking of meaning. This school of poetry, apart from its striking novelty, would soon have many imitators, and might attract a very large number of poetical readers.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

HOLOFERNES.

DR. A. W. WARD AND MARY FITTON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A friend of mine has directed my attention to the following statements in the new edition of Dr. A. W. Ward's "History of English Dramatic Literature":—

> Dr. G. Brandes' endeavours in this direction (in his biography of Shakspere, German translation, pp. 389 seqq.) are the most recent, and not the least courageous. I can, however, assure him that the figure of Mary Fitton in Gawsworth Church, Cheshire, is not worth drawing into the argument, more especially as this figure and that of Mary's sister Anne are virtually duplicates (vol. ii., p. 32 note.)

This paragraph contains statements so inconsistent with the facts that I am tempted to think that Dr. Ward must have written it without a personal inspection of the monument, relying on hearsay rumour, or the assertions of some prejudiced person. The coloured statue of Mary Fitton in Gawsworth Church, instead of being unworthy of consideration with regard to the question whether she was or was not the dark lady of the "Sonnets," is of the highest importance, this being the only portrait of the lady attested by evidence in the slightest degree credible. And most certainly it gives the black hair and expression of countenance entirely suitable to the identification. With regard to Dr. Brandes, I may say that he accepted completely, so far as I know, what I had said concerning Mary Fitton in the Introduction to my "Commentary on the Sonnets."

The assertion that the figures of Mary and her sister Anne "are virtually duplicates" surprises me. The difference between the two faces, showing a marked diversity of character, is striking even to an unpractised eye. Mr. Nutt, the publisher of my small pamphlet, "The Herbert-Fitton Theory of Shakespeare's Sonnets: A Reply," was so good as to commission Messrs. Bullock, of Macclesfield, to photograph Lady Fitton and her two daughters from the monument, and he prefixed a reproduction from the photograph to my pamphlet just mentioned. It is easy, therefore, for any one to satisfy himself as to whether the figures of Mary and her sister are "virtually duplicates," without a journey into Cheshire. The desire that the figures should give veritable portraits would seem to have been so strong that the face of Lady Fitton appears pretty clearly to have been modelled from a death-mask.

As questions with respect to the "Sonnets" are very much under discussion, I may add the following sentences from Dr. Ward's work:—

> For myself, I cannot but think that a satisfactory case has been made out on behalf of the conclusion that the earlier series of the "Sonnets" is addressed to a young man, and the latter to a lady; but that the two are organically connected by the circumstance that the lady was loved by both the poet's friend and the poet himself. I further consider that the youth to whom the earlier "Sonnets" were directly addressed, and who in the dedication of the entire published collection accordingly figured as its "only begetter," has with a probability approaching very near to certainty been shown to be William Herbert, second (? third) Earl of Pembroke, who about this time was in the very heyday of his youth—"the very picture and vera effigies of nobility" (vol. ii., p. 31 seq.).

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS TYLER.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Mr. Stephen Phillips' new tragedy Herod, produced last Wednesday at Her Majesty's, will be published by Mr. Lane towards the end of November.

Although "the Sacred Books of the East" were classed among the "unremunerative works" of the Oxford University Press, they have met with extremely satisfactory sales. Professor Max Müller's personal contributions have been especially successful, both Part I. of the Upanishads (published as the first volume of the series) and Part II. of the same work (the fifteenth volume) having been reprinted. His translation of the Dhammapada, and three or four of the earlier volumes by other Oriental scholars, have also attained the dignity of a second edition. Max Müller's remaining contributions were translations of the first part of the Vedic Hymns and some Buddhist Mahâyâna texts. His original scheme was to limit the series to twenty-four volumes, the publication to extend over eight years—"and I am afraid at my time of life," he wrote in his preface to the Upanishads in 1879, "even this may seem too sanguine." But the twenty-four books led to a second series of twenty-five volumes, and this has still to be completed by Dr. Thibaut's translation of Râmânuga's Sribhâshya, which will be ready shortly. Two volumes of general index are also in preparation.

Having completed his arrangements for both series of the Sacred Books of the East, Max Müller embarked on his shorter series of Sacred Books of the Buddhists, for he continued to receive offers of MSS. of important texts which he felt reluctant to leave unpublished. The King of Siam promised support, and three volumes of the new series were decided upon, with Mr. Frowde as publisher, and it was to depend upon the interest which the public might take in the work whether it was continued or not. The first volume, "The Jâtakamâla, or Garland of Birth Stories," translated from the Sanskrit by J. S. Speyer, appeared in 1895; "The Dialogues of the Buddha," translated from the Pali by Mr. Rhys Davids, appeared last year; and here, probably, the series will end, although both books went fairly well.

Max Müller, in his preface, dealt with the assertion that he had received an excessive honorarium as editor of the Sacred Books of the East. "The fact is," he writes, "that during all the years which I devoted to the superintending of the publication of the fifty volumes of the Sacred Books of the East I have not had the slightest addition to my income. . . . I have never claimed any gratitude for the sacrifices which I have made both in time and money for objects which were near and dear to my heart. It has been, as I said, a labour of love, and I shall always feel most grateful to the University of Oxford, and to my fellow translators, for having enabled me to realize this long-cherished plan of making the world better acquainted with the Sacred Books of the principal religions of mankind."

Mr. Frowde is also the publisher of the "Rig-Veda," a second edition of which, in four volumes, appeared in 1890. Messrs. Longmans publish most of Max Müller's other works, including his "Chips from a German Workshop"—which has gone into several editions—"Auld Lang Syne"—also reprinted—"The Six Systems of Indian Philosophy," "Contributions to the Science of Mythology," "The Origin and Growth of Religion" (Hibbert Lectures, 1878), "The Science of Thought," "The Science of Language," "India: What can it Teach Us?" and "Ramakrishna: His Life and Sayings." A new issue of "Ramakrishna" is being added to their collected edition of Max Müller's works. Messrs. Longmans also publish the English translation of his delightful story "Deutsche Liebe," and no doubt in due course they will issue the autobiography upon which he was engaged until a week or so before his death.

An "Oriental Text and Translation Society" has been started with the object of publishing Oriental texts in the British Museum, bearing on "Biblical, ecclesiastical, liturgical, homiletical, and polemical subjects." It is well known that there are several valuable manuscripts at the British Museum which have not yet seen the light, whilst others, though edited and translated into Continental languages, still await an English version. The idea of the promoters is to publish the text (although not necessarily in every case), with a translation and introduction. One volume, or more, will be issued during the year. Among the works contemplated in the immediate future are "An edition of ancient Armenian liturgical texts"; "Editions of the Bible Commentary of Gregory, Bar Hebraeus, and other Syriac writers"; "An English translation of the Homilies of Aphraates"; also of the "Romance of the Emperor Julian," &c. The President of the Committee is Prof. R. K. Douglas, Head of the Oriental Department in the British Museum, and the secretary, Rev. G. Margoliouth, of the same department. Among the subscribers are Dr. C. D. Ginsburg, Prof. Driver, Dr. Aldis Wright (member of the Committee), the Bishop of Salisbury, the Bishop of Worcester, Prof. D. S. Margoliouth, Prof. James Robertson, and others. The subscription is fixed at one guinea.

Half-a-dozen gentlemen who have proved their enlightened interest in Welsh literature and their capacity to deal with it in a scholarly way have formed themselves into a small society for the printing of hitherto unprinted Welsh manuscripts of genuine literary value. The first number, to be published immediately, by this new Welsh literary society (Gymdeithas Llen Cymru) will be a volume of carols by a Welsh poet of the time of Elizabeth named Richard Hughes, edited by Mr. J. H. Davies, of Cwrt Mawr, who edits the series. The second number will be a collection of original Welsh ballads connected with the Defeat of the Armada, the Parliamentary war, and the Jacobite rebellion. The business arrangements in connexion with these publications are in the hands of Mr. John Ballinger, Librarian of the Cardiff Free Library, and the other members of the society, besides Mr. Davies and Mr. Ballinger, already named, are Professor Anwyl, Mr. Gwynogfryn Evans, Mr. T. J. Evans, editor of the Celt Llyndam, and Sir John Williams.

Mr. W. P. Courtney has been for many years collecting materials for an index to British bibliography, and since the completion of the "Dictionary of National Biography" on which he was engaged from the start to the finish, has been revising and supplementing his notes. The task presents much difficulty, chiefly due to the absence from the shelves of the British Museum of many volumes printed in England and America which contain bibliographies, but he hopes to be able to bring the matter into shape for the press in a few months.

Those who looked for Sir Walter Armstrong's monograph on Turner before Christmas will be disappointed to learn that publication has been postponed till the spring. The author, who is director of the National Gallery of Ireland, thinks that this is the most important work he is likely to write, and, as he has found the problems connected with Turner and his art more difficult to discuss than he anticipated, subscribers will doubtless be recompensed for the delay by a well-considered text. Sir Walter Armstrong's "Gainsborough and his Place in English Art" causes us to look forward without misgivings. This "Turner" will introduce Messrs. Thomas Agnew and Sons, the picture dealers, as publishers. The eighty pages, mostly in photogravure, include reproductions of famous Turners in the National Gallery like "The Fighting Temeraire," and "Crossing the Brook," several of the Brantwood water-colours recently on view in Bond-street, and Lord Strathcona's "Mercury and Argus," now in the drawing-room of the British Royal Pavilion in Paris.

Mr. Murray's new list begins with the Ameer of Afghanistan's autobiography, to occupy two volumes, edited by Mir Munshi Sultan Mohammad Khan, Secretary of State of Afghanistan, who was a student of Christ's College, Cambridge, and recently published a little book with Mr. Murray on "The Constitution and Laws of Afghanistan." Another item in the list is a book on "The Greek and Persian War," by Mr. G. Brendon Grundy, who has examined the scene of the events, and made surveys of Thermopylæ and Platæa for his volume. There will be maps, photographs, and sketches of places of interest. "China and her Commerce from the Earliest Times to the Present Day," by Mr. E. H. Parker (Consul-General in Korea, 1886-7; Consul-General in Kiung-chau, 1891, &c.) is also announced by Mr. Murray. A somewhat novel school reader on "The Growth of Greater Britain" has been compiled and edited by Elizabeth Lee, the plan adopted being to give the story of the different colonies as told by the men who were instrumental in their development, from Sir Walter Raleigh to Lord Beaconsfield, with biographical and historical notes. Other announcements in Mr. Murray's list, not already dealt with in Literature, include "Small Boat Sailing," by Mr. E. F. Knight, "The Reformation: A Religious and Historical Sketch," by the Rev. J. A. Babington, M.A., "The Life of Paris," by Richard Whiteing, "The Evolution of the English Bible," by Henry W. Hoare, a new edition—in great part rewritten—of Mr. A. Hamilton Thompson's "Student's Manual of English Literature," and a new edition of Dr. George Newman's "Bacteria," in the Progressive Science Series, with an added chapter on tropical diseases, an account of malarial infection by mosquitoes, and other subjects.

Messrs. Downey and Co. are issuing "The Bankside Shakespeare"—an American edition which possesses new features. It contains the text of the earliest version of each play side by side with the First Folio text of 1623 showing at a glance the alteration which took place during their early stage life. The texts are unexpurgated and unedited—"freed from gossip, hearsay, and the guesswork of commentators." Even the antique and pedantic ornaments of the originals are reproduced; every line, whether speech, stage direction, exit or entrance, is numbered, and every typographical slip copied. The work has been carried out by the New York Shakespeare Society—with photography's faithful aid—and is completed in twenty volumes.

Mr. Morley pays a generous tribute to Dr. Gairdner and Mr. Firth as "heroes of research" in his life of Oliver Cromwell, a tribute which has already had an appreciable effect upon the sale of Mr. Firth's new study of the Protector in the "Heroes of the Nations" Series, which we notice elsewhere, just as Lord Rosebery laid the foundation of the success of Mr. FitzPatrick's "The Transvaal from Within" a year ago. Mr. Firth's book is in great demand. Dr. Perkins' life of Richelieu, which followed Mr. Firth's book in the "Heroes of the Nations" Series, has also found an excellent sale on this side of the Atlantic—rather a rare thing to record of a book by an American historian other than Captain Mahan.

The next volume in the "Heroes of the Nations" Series will be Mr. Robert Dunlop's "Daniel O'Connell and the Revival of National Life in Ireland," and the next, probably, "William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, or the Growth and Division of the British Empire," by Mr. Walford Green, M.P.

The Clarendon Press is about to publish a photographic facsimile edition of all the known fragments of the Hebrew text of Ecclesiasticus found within the last few years at Cairo. The original leaves are pretty widely scattered, some being at Oxford, some at Cambridge, some at the British Museum, and others at Paris and in the hands of private persons in London. A volume combining accurate reproductions of all the fragments will, therefore, be most useful.

The report which has been a year in preparation of the work being done in the technical and commercial schools in East Prussia, Poland, Galicia, Silesia, Bohemia, and Saxony, by Mr. James Baker, F.R.G.S., will be issued immediately by the Board of Education. The work, which is a volume of 130 pages, will be prefaced by an introductory letter by Mr. M. E. Sadler. It deals most fully with the elaborate and efficient system of education in these countries and goes far to show the reason of the success of our foreign competitors.

New Zealand, the land of economic experiments, appears to be flourishing under the compulsory arbitration system which came into force a few years ago. According to Mr. William Pember Reeves, the author of the new Act, who has written an introduction to a volume entitled "A Land Without Strikes" which Messrs. Putnam are publishing, the New Zealand workshops have not been closed through labour troubles for a single day since the arbitration law came into active use. The book itself is written by Mr. Henry Demarest Lloyd, who visited New Zealand from America to study the new system.

Mr. Murray will shortly publish a military retrospect of the South African campaign until the relief of Ladysmith, by Major S. L. Norris, R.E. An account of the organization and fighting record of the C.I.V. is being published by Messrs. George Newnes. It has an historical introduction, dealing with the trained bands of Old London and other Volunteers of bygone times who have been connected with the "City," and drawings by well-known artists.

Under the title of a Winter Pilgrimage, Mr. Rider Haggard has written an account of his travels last winter in Cyprus and Palestine. That portion of the work which deals with the Holy Land will appear serially in the Queen beginning in January next.

Judge O'Connor Morris is writing a work on "Present Irish Questions," to be published by Mr. Grant Richards.

There is to be issued in America by Mr. R. H. Russell a sumptuous edition of "Robinson Crusoe," illustrated by the brothers Rhead, who have made a special journey to the island of Tobago for the purpose.

Mr. Frowde is preparing a new and cheaper edition of "The Treasury of American Sacred Song," edited by the Rev. W. Garrett Horder, and published in 1895; also a new edition of Miss Annie Matheson's "Selected Poems Old and New," containing a prefatory note by Professor Herford.

"Free to Serve," the tale of Colonial New York, by Miss E. Rayner, which Messrs. Putnam are publishing on this side of the Atlantic, was one of the spring successes in America. Miss Rayner who lives in the United States, was born in England and educated at Newnham College, obtaining honours in mathematics in 1888. "Free to Serve" is her first book.

Towards the end of November the second and revised edition of Dr. Stout's now well-known "Manual of Psychology" will be issued at the University Tutorial Press.

Mr. W. D. Howells has been appointed literary adviser to Messrs. Harper and Brothers. The firm has also revived the old "Easy Chair" of Harper's Magazine, which was associated for many years with the name of Mr. G. W. Curtis. Mr. Howells, the literary adviser of the firm, will now occupy it.

The course of lectures on Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," which the Rev. A. B. Boyd-Carpenter, Rector of Bloomsbury, began last Wednesday with the "Coming of Arthur," will include the following subjects during the next few weeks:—"Gareth and Lynette," "Enid and Geraint," "Balin and Balan," "Merlin and Vivien," and "Lancelot and Elaine." Tickets can be obtained from Mr. E. Wild, 1, Garden-court, Temple, E.C. The proceeds will be devoted to the Church charities.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish this week a supplement containing illustrated notices of some of the earlier Christmas books, and also a further classified list of publishers' autumn announcements supplementary to that published on October 6.

* * * *

We have not so far alluded to the proposal to erect a monument by Mr. J. H. Foley to Lady Martin (Helen Faucit) in the sacrarium of the chancel of Stratford Parish Church, because, from the rather personal and acrimonious controversy about Sir Theodore Martin's offer of the monument, it was not very easy to form a judgment. Mr. Sidney Lee's moderate and weighty letter in The Times of last Saturday, showing serious objections to the proposal, put the matter on a different footing. Sir Theodore Martin, influenced apparently by it, though he does not allude to it, writing to The Times on Monday, withdraws his offer. It was a generous offer, but he has, we think, acted rightly in bowing to what Mr. Lee calls "the legitimate sentiment which seeks to secure for Shakespeare's monument that predominant place in the chancel which is due of right to his pre-eminent fame, and which has never before suffered challenge."

* * * *

While in England we have the literary drama on the stage of Mr. Tree's Theatre, they have been trying in Wallack's Theatre, New York, an even more daring experiment—in a performance of Browning's "In a Balcony." In the chaste language of the reporter of the New York World, the performance, "as an exposition of poetry vivified by characterization, and emphasized by the additional appeal to the sense of sight, was an exquisite bit of idealism in extraordinary contrast to the prevailing tone of the theatre." In addition to Browning's poem, the company acted "The Land of Heart's Desire," by W. B. Yeats—a choice upon which we congratulate them, and the audience.

* * * *

The appearance of the September volume of the Anglo-Saxon Review (John Lane, 21s. net.), clothed in a fairly successful reproduction of a fine example of a "Le Gascon" binding, affords an opportunity to Mr. Cyril Davenport to surmise, with much apparent reason, the personality of the famous seventeenth century binder. Put baldly, the case is that Florimond Badier in his signed bindings used the identical stamps employed by the earlier and finer binder, whose work is known as that of "Le Gascon"; that Badier was Jean Gillesle's son-in-law, and that Gillede is a Gascon name. Mr. Herbert Horne and M. Ernest Thoinan have already hinted at this, and until further evidence it is reasonable to identify "Le Gascon" with Gillede.

* * * *

Dr. Garnett, in a closely reasoned paper on "Shelley's View of Art," tells us that those views are in no respect authoritative, and that the poet would be consulted, not as an oracle, but as a mirror. Inasmuch as Shelley expressed his views upon Greek art when almost all that was known of it was really Græco-Roman, and when, as Dr. Garnett himself points out, "the tourist visited Italy under an obligation to adore Guido and venerate Guercino"—the one painter with a "few pale rays of fading sanctity," the other reflecting "Catholicism galvanized by terror into reactionary movement"—it is hard to attach much importance to the dicta of such a guide. Lovers of Shelley, however, will thank Dr. Garnett for drawing attention to this aspect of the poet's mind. Mr. Francis Watt endeavours also to do justice to the memory of Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh—"the bluidy advocate"—but the task of rehabilitation is almost beyond his powers. "They were good haters—those old Scots," and was not Davie Deans made to say that the Bluidy Mackenzie would "be ken'd by that name sae long as there's a Scot's tongue to speak the word"? Of very different sort from these contributions to a most interesting volume is Mr. A. Bernard Miall's translation of "Sister Beatrice: A Miracle Play in Three Acts," by Maurice Maeterlinck, written in unrhymed lines of twelve syllables. The translation has been moderately done.

You, Sister Beatrice, were she in charge, is neither sufficiently clear nor wholly grammatical; and in the line—

In silence strewn before a Queen's feet, with its almost jocular lilt, the translator is not certain of his metre. The rest of the contributions, including Sir Wemyss Reid's recollections of "London—after forty years," a "Study in Despair," by Hugh Clifford, some rather obvious remarks "Concerning some portraits of Emma, Lady Hamilton," by Lord Ronald Gower, and a mild dose of fiction by W. Earl Hodgson make up a volume which is rarely distinguished in an age which is in some danger of being demoralized by ill-considered editing and cheap production.

The good old days of the war correspondent are past and done with complains Mr. Prevost Battersby in the National Review. Between the Press censor and the field wire he can find no scope for the desperate rides and the feats of endurance that made famous the names of men like the late Mr. Archibald Forbes. It seems that the time has come, with the changes in modern conditions of warfare, for some radical alteration in the correspondent's position. Mr. Battersby has several suggestions to make. He thinks too many correspondents are allowed at the front, and the censor is hampered by having to deal with a motley and often undisciplined crowd, professing to represent every known and unknown print at home and abroad. But his chief point is a proposal for the complete severance of the correspondent from the telegraph wire. His messages are almost bound to be merely repetitions of official news, and the necessity of despatching the daily wire ties him to the spot and often compels him to miss the most interesting events. Instead of the field wire being clogged by, say, thirty different accounts of a fight—each restricted to a length of forty or fifty words—the writer suggests the appointment of one officially-recognized telegraphic correspondent, who should be able to give the public at home one full and complete account of the day's proceedings. The rest would confine their energies to the writing of letters. This would certainly save expense to the newspapers.

A volume of utmost interest to students of early printing and book decoration has just been issued to members of the Bibliographical Society. It relates to the famous fifteenth century French publisher and printer, Antoine Verard, and the author is Mr. John Macfarlane of the British Museum. As with its six predecessors in this series, it is admirably printed on good paper, and the wide margins give a restful, non-commercial look to the page. The introduction is devoted to points of particular interest, such as the scant biographical details discoverable, the sites of Verard's establishments, the sumptuous vellum copies produced by him for noble and royal patrons, including Henry VII. of England, his illustrations and the sources whence they came, the initial letters that decorate many of his title pages, his not always very honest trade practices, the famous Books of Hours for which he was responsible, and like matters. Then come lists of books, dated and undated, and bearing various addresses, which are known with certainty to be his, and others of doubtful authenticity. In each of the 286 entries the collation, description, details of illustrations, and of type are given, and the libraries wherein copies are to be found indicated. The British Museum possesses a fine assemblage of Verard books, not comparable, however, with that in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. Besides the frontispiece, 17 plates, reproduced from some of Verard's most famous books, are given, in addition to seven from as many of his Horæ, and a number of his boldly decorative L's, his various types, and his three devices. The volume, with its careful and scholarly text, is, indeed, a possession.

"Twas ever thus: trees, flowers, gazelles, and monthly magazines are subject to the same law of change. We had learnt to know and love our Pall Mall Magazine. But the new editor, Mr. G. R. Halkett, has announced "urbi et orbi" that he has "a mission to preach the gospel of Art, and more particularly of black and white art"; and "the middle-aged respectable monthly will cease to jog along in its well-beaten tracks, and a 'full-blooded,' 'new century,' up-to-date magazine will take its place." Well, well! we only hope that Mr. Halkett will show as much good taste and merit as much success as did his predecessor.

Mrs. Norton, whose life furnished the ground work of Mr. Meredith's "Diana of the Crossways," and whom Lockhart described as "the Byron of our poetesses," is the subject of an article by Mr. John Fyfe in Temple Bar. He quotes a delightful description of Samuel Rogers which she supplied to Hayward for an article in the Edinburgh Review:—

> His God was Harmony, and over his life Harmony presided, sitting on a luke-warm cloud. He was not the "poet, sage, and philosopher" people expect to find he was, but a man in whom the tastes (rare fact!) predominated over the passions; who defrayed the expenses of his tastes as other men make outlay for the gratification of their passions. . . He did nothing rash. I am sure Rogers as a baby never fell down unless he was pushed, but walked from chair to chair of the drawing-room furniture steadily and quietly till he reached the place where the sunbeam fell on the carpet. He must always have preferred a lullaby to the merriest game of romps; and if he could have spoken, would have begged his long-clothes might be made of fine Mull muslin instead of cambric or jacquenet, the first fabric being of incomparable softness, and the two latter capable of that which he loathed, Starch. . . .

Old lace pattern books invariably provoke a spirited competition in the auction room. A fine selection of these books occurs in Mr. Quaritch's recent catalogue, which includes a number of scarce Venetian works on "Ponti Tagliati" and "Ponti in aere," dating from early in the sixteenth century. But the rarest of all is a copy of Adrian Poyntz's "New and Singular Patternes and Workes of Linnen," published in 1591. Books of English designs of contemporary date are very few. Little encouragement was given to the production of native work. The spirited example of Colbert, who founded the great schools at Alençon and other French centres, was practically lost on England, and there are few examples among the earliest English designs for lace which can hold their own with their Continental rivals. Meanwhile, there will be found in "Lace-Making in the Midlands" (Methuen, 2s. 6d.), by C. C. Channer and M. E. Roberts, which is a practical, well-written little book sketching the history, the decadence (for which the Education Act is partly responsible), and the revival, due to the energy and liberality of ladies in the Midlands, of the art of lace-making. It should be read by all who are interested in or willing to do something to encourage a beautiful industry which may be a real factor in the prosperity of the agricultural poor. There are many photographic illustrations of lace-work.

The Imperial tocsin is beginning to sound in the world of magazines. For the world in general we now have the Imperial and Colonial Magazine, edited by "Colt" and E. F. Benson; for boys we have Messrs. Melrose's Boys of the Empire. The former, in its first number, ranges afar over the Empire and has a distinguished list of contributors, besides being most attractively printed and got up. The latter is a wholesome and attractive publication, and inaugurates under high patronage a "Boys' Empire League."

We are reminded by Miss M. E. Coleridge in the Northern Counties Magazine that the late Canon Dixon—"The Last Hermit of Warkworth"—was in Mr. Swinburne's opinion the right man to have succeeded Tennyson as laureate. This was perhaps going rather far. He was no mean poet, but his public was necessarily a small one. He fell under the influence of Pre-Raphaelitism, and while his work was of the same genre as Rossetti's he had not the same gift of vision or the power of varying a rather obscure and mystical style as Rossetti varies it in "Jenny" with passages more human. Later he threw off the influence of a school. "The Pre-Raphaelite attitude of seeing everything as a Flemish painter saw it" was abandoned. "The trees are no longer painted trees in a painted forest; they grow."

The Reading of the Working Classes.

"Much has been said about the reading of the "working classes" by those who do not belong to them, and whose surroundings, training, and mental habits are quite different from theirs. We are told that they read nothing but worthless fiction; that they are too much educated, and that Hooliganism is a result of it. What have these classes themselves to say on the matter? In another column a representative of the Cardiff miners has his say on the subject. He is clearly a man who has spent more time on his education than most of his brethren, and he writes from a town which has some special advantages. As to the amount of culture to be found in the busy Welsh centre, we do not say, as the American young lady said of Chicago, that "there are just tons of it" in Cardiff; but it has one of the best public libraries in the kingdom, and it is favourably situated in other ways, as Mr. Phillips shows, for spreading culture among the masses. He deals chiefly with the love for fiction; and no one can deny that there is sound good sense in a good deal that he says. But let us take the other point first. Is education overdone, and does it create the Hooligan? Here Mr. Phillips' testimony as to the raising of literary taste among the masses is less applicable. He is not writing about an immense centre of population like London, where overcrowded thousands have never seen and will never see anything but dull streets and sordid life. More apt to the issue is a letter from the President of the Metropolitan Board Teachers' Association, which was published a few days ago in the Daily News in answer to a statement made by a member of the London School Board that Hooliganism is bred in the evening schools of the Board. Mr. Litt asserts that it arises not from education but from the want of it—in short, from truancy. "There are 700,000 children of school age in the London School Board area. Of these 100,000 are always absent." From this 100,000, helped by parental neglect, emerges the Hooligan. Most, however, even of the truants, learn to read, and that, so far from being an evil, is the one hope for them. If reading urges them to crime, it is also the most powerful lever for their reclamation—they are able, at any rate, to scan the police reports, though this might be a more improving pastime if the punishments which are recorded in those reports were more drastic. The outcry against education which was heard in the seventies is dying, but it is dying hard. The key of knowledge is still but grudgingly offered to those who really need it. No serious person can believe—though the protest would seem to be needed—that education, whose one function, as every age and country has believed, is to civilize, to soften the manners, and to "let the ape and tiger die," really leads to crimes of violence. But there are two sorts of education. The main object of secondary education—of the public schools—is to educate character. The main object of primary schools is to impart knowledge and let character go. There undoubtedly lies one solution of the Hooligan problem. Those who assert that education is useless if it only creates a debauched literary taste can make a more plausible case. But there is much exaggeration both in their facts and their arguments. One critic sees in the fact that the porters at railway stations collect all the newspapers, all "the ephemeral rubbish which has been idly scanned and thrown away," a direct and melancholy result of mechanics' institutes. We need not enter now on the large question of the influence of inferior journalism; but in the matter of "good" and "bad" literature we cannot forget that these are relative terms. What is bad in the view of the cultured gentleman may be good for the uncultured working man. The former may question some of Mr. Phillips' literary judgments; but our contributor is right in saying that "the reading of fiction," even poor fiction, if it is wholesome, "is simply a symptom of an interest in things that are brighter and more alluring than that every-day dull greyness which surrounds the life of so many people." It only wants to be guided aright—here the managers of public libraries have a great responsibility—and, at any rate, the first step will have been taken towards that appreciation of great thoughts and beautiful pictures in which lies the sovereign remedy for savagery and crime.

A REMINISCENCE.—FROM THE LINKS.

Ere generous summer tossed about
Flush gratitude, or gave in lieu
Of winter rains their more than due,
I went to hear the thrushes shout
And love-lorn linnets take their cue.

The random gorses one by one
Gilded their spikes with orange tip,
And bough now red with haw and hip
Were coyly holding to the sun
The offer of a virgin lip.

The pine trees stood like masts and flung
Their sails about to taste the breeze,
And sailor tomtits by the knees
On rigging-rope and yard-arm swung
In fashion fearless as you please.

A shrew mouse pattered from the wood,
Two nimble squirrels gambolled lithe,
The fresh buds felt the swelling pith,
The young life knew the rising blood
And zest of life that comes therewith.

Now, ruddy flames have touched the leaf;
The ash is blackened by the frost;
The life beneath the trees is lost;
The seed is carried home in sheaf;
The birds are still who carolled most.

Yet never dies the spring; to-day
I catch the pink upon the larch—
The promise of the rainbow arch—
For memory makes November May,
And Hope is busy with buds of March.

Personal Views.

THE READING OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

Of late years many silly things have been said and written about the mass of toilers. One of such groundless opinions has obtained so wide a vogue lately, that I—the son of a working coalminer—feel compelled to take up my pen to defend them from this aspersion. Would-be judges say that the education provided for the working classes has not fulfilled its intention—that the working class readers do not make proper use of the facilities placed at their disposal—that instead of seeking fit and proper sustenance for their mental activities they are content to wallow in a sea of fiction.

Now, first of all, I would ask, what is the education placed at the disposal of the average English boy or girl? That of British, National, Sectarian, or Board Elementary Schools, of course, and for the greater part these are the creation of the last fifty years, there being thousands of men and women now living, of fifty years of age and upwards, who have never had the privilege of schooling of any kind. Yet the toilers form the preponderating section of the nation, and at this moment probably fifteen-sixteenths of the younger section can read with a fair amount of intelligence. Now it is the working class readers who have brought such enormous circulations to the daily and weekly newspapers, the cheaper magazines, novels, &c.; and it is they and their children who form the largest clientèle of the Free and Town circulating libraries. The reason of this is that working class boys and girls are taken from school too early, boys at thirteen or fourteen years of age, girls a year or so younger. To the one there comes the toil of apprenticeship, or ordinary wage-earning, with its demands upon faculties of brain-work and handicraft hitherto unexercised, to the other a wearying, monotonous attention to nursing younger brothers and sisters, or other household duties. To the majority of these children the ability to read with intelligence is about the only substantial factor of value that they retain after two or three years' absence from school, other subjects, not being of immediate or practical use, having been laid upon a mental shelf and forgotten.

As it never entered the ordinary schoolmaster's mind to give the children some flesh wherewith to clothe the bare bones of elementary education—as it would have been work, unremunerated by grant, to give the pupils, whose schooling years were limited, some guiding ideas as to what was best and most instructive in English reading—and more, as the bulk of schools authorities, Board, British, Sectarian, or National, have no soul higher than £ s. d., the schools and scholars were, and still are in many places, systematically starved, and kept unprovided with those appliances and books that might have kindled the scholars' interest and shown them stage by stage the motive and aims of their education.

But why say might? My own schoolboy experience in a British school speaks volumes as to the advantages of an intelligent schoolmaster's advice when distributing books from a good school library that included volumes of fiction. At the school I attended a fine selection of books was provided by that far-seeing, wise educationist, the late Lord Aberdare (the Church Sunday School was equally well equipped), and I am proud to own that I reckon these two libraries as having exercised a very great and salutary influence upon my later life. But the average boy and girl leave school with just the ability to read the evening paper, some periodical of Tit-Bits type, or interesting story; and story-reading not demanding any serious strain upon the mental faculties, and providing a stimulative salt in items of adventure or love-making, is naturally taken to on the line of least resistance.

Then in view of their squalid daily environment the revelations of a different world as depicted by the novelist, the fair scenes of mountain, valley, and river, uncontaminated by the ugly factories and workshops of industrial progress, the vivid descriptions of works of art and beauty, the account of rich dresses and splendid mansions, the clash of swords and noise of battle, or the armoured panoply of chivalric times, have an amount of attraction that cannot be very well understood by those whose lives have been cast in more favourable circumstances. I cannot see or feel that this is in any way to be deplored. Before you can raise the class level of intelligence you must first show the individual members something better, and the way to attain thereto, so that they may make their endeavour accordingly. If reading is to be cultivated at all it must be from the point of interest, and I maintain that the novelist, and he alone up to the present, has had any portion in providing the material wherewith to establish the love of reading in the masses on a firm and fruitful basis. From story reading, readers will gradually advance to works of literature other than fiction: essays and poetry will attract attention in growing ratio, and the love of good work will gradually and surely be raised. Then working class novel readers, pure and simple, fall into different ranks of mental grasp and foresight, and I am of firm opinion that the general standard is on the upward grade. There is not the same demand for the works of Emma Jane Worboise and Mrs. Henry Wood that I remember some few years back; and if all the working class has not progressed sufficiently to admire the literary skill and workmanship displayed in the "Newcomes," or in "Vanity Fair," or are not appreciative enough of the brilliance of epigrammatic force of "Evan Harrington," or "Diana of the Crossways"—they share this lack with many of the better educated—still, if they can, as they do, take up and read with interest and revel in the character drawing of Gil de Berault in "A Gentleman of France"—of Doltaire in "The Seats of the Mighty"—Napoleon in "Uncle Bernac"—Alan Breck in "Kidnapped"—or John Silver in "Treasure Island"—to mention a few among many—have they lost much? I trow not.

Or, again, if they prefer the series of biographies such as "From Log Cabin to White House," or the lives of "Wellington," "Nelson," "Buonaparte," and other great soldiers and sailors, are they to be blamed for disliking Boswell's prolixity and idolatrous adoration, or for seeing no joy in Hallam Tennyson's filial sacrifices on the altar of biography? Verily, no. It is entirely a matter of taste and grade of education, and though I may not see eye to eye with them in these particular cases, I can sympathize with their limitations and understand the trend and bias of their faculties. In a measure, also, I can see what improved standards the coming years will bring in their train, the novelist helping the working man to higher ideals of life, and by reflex action compelling a higher standard still, in a stage to stage progression—so, slowly but surely, evolving the toiling masses into appreciators of that culture and literary workmanship which is the pride and glory of the world of English Letters. It may be said that my view is limited and too optimistic. Time alone can tell. In the main my contention is correct. The reading of fiction is not a disease as estimated in the mass, but is simply a symptom of an interest in things that are brighter and more alluring than that everyday dull greyness which surrounds the lives of so many people in this land of ours. I know several youthful handicraftsmen and clerks in my circle of acquaintance the contents of whose bookshelves would do no discredit to University students.

As a closing word, I may mention that the School Board managers of this town have recognized their responsibility in providing a line of guidance for the children attending the town schools, and have furnished each school with a library of well selected books—including fiction—graded according to age and sex; and these libraries will be maintained efficiently, and their stocks increased, through the means of a yearly grant of money in the School Board Expenditure Precept. This is in addition to the provision of a very large number of books of all descriptions for boys and girls at the Central and Branch Free Libraries. Happy, happy children! What would many thousands of present-day parents have given if these facilities could have been supplied to them? I feel a compensating consolation in the thought and belief that these young people will prove worthy of their privileges, and that the years are drawing closer when the reproach of "reading fiction solely" will have passed away, and when working class ranks shall produce more than one flower to bloom in the garden of English Literature.

Cardiff. TOM CLIFFE PHILLIPS.

LAW BOOKS AND LITERATURE.

We noted lately the little book just published by his Honour Judge Willis, containing the first edition of "The Seasons," with a preface on the bibliography of Thomson. Judge Willis has the distinction of being one of the very few lawyers who, when at the Bar, was in the habit of occasionally illustrating his argument by a quotation from his favourite poets, Milton for choice. He is also, we are afraid it must be confessed, one of the few notable exceptions which go to prove that lawyers—practising lawyers that is—are not literary. We suppose that is the reason of the almost universal abandonment in law books of any kind of style, except statute-book style, and the entire failure to combine accuracy of statement with—we will not say elegance, but ordinary lucidity, of diction.

In his delightful work, "The Book Hunter," the late John Hill Burton points out that many of the "terrible folios" of the old scholastic divines, the civilians, and the canonists, with their "majestic stream of central print overflowing into rivulets of marginal notes sedgy with citations," were merely solemn shams, since they were mostly nothing but laborious compilations. He goes on to assert that only in the legal literature of England is this method of bookmaking still practised. According to him, the conventional receipt for constructing a law book is this:—Set down all that Coke, two centuries and a half ago, said on the particular subject in hand, and all that Blackstone said about it a century ago, with passages in due subordination from inferior authors; to these add the rubrics of some later cases, add a title-page and a more or less accurate index and—behold, a new "authority" is ready for the use of the practitioner. Since Burton's time, however, a second method has found a good deal of favour. A statute, or group of statutes, on some special subject is selected; a few notes are appended, with title-page and index as before, and again we have an "authority" for the lawyer's book-shelf. Some of the works compiled on these simple lines are undoubtedly useful, but they are certainly biblia a-biblia; they are as far removed as they can well be from literature. Perhaps this is partly attributable to the fact that their existence is ephemeral, and their authors therefore consider it a useless expenditure of time and labour to make them readable. Partly it is due to the negative characteristic of lawyers which we have already mentioned.

The average barrister in practice, if he possesses any literary taste, dissimulates it and lets it wither for lack of nourishment. Seldom is his address in Court characterized by any literary grace; rarely, indeed, is his speech brightened even by some illustration drawn from the masters of English literature. Sixty or more years ago we know that even in the murky regions of the Bankruptcy Court Basil Montagu would now and then "enliven the discussion of a point of law by citing some weighty aphorism, or brilliant illustration, from the De Augmentis or the Novum Organum"—a description which, it is amusing to recall, was only Macaulay's full-dress account of an incident which he relates in a letter to his sister written from Basinghall-street:—"Basil Montagu is haranguing about Lord Verulam and the way of inoculating one's mind with truth; and all this à propos of a lying bankrupt's balance-sheet"! Now, alas! there are few at the Bar who quote either Milton or Bacon, or, indeed, anything but dreary statutes and musty cases. But the great mass of law books are not only dull, they are absolutely repellent. This may account for the fact that so few lawyers evince an enthusiasm for their science equal to that exhibited by Baron Parke, who is reported to have taken "a beautiful demurrer" to the bedside of a sick friend to comfort him in his illness, or by the old conveyancer who admitted that it would be somewhat irksome to pore continually over abstracts of title were it not that now and then he met with "a brilliant deed" which rewarded him for all his labours. But there are exceptions to most rules, and a few modern law books can be read not only with profit but with real pleasure. Mr. Birrell's short sketch of "The Duties and Liabilities of Trustees," and his more recent volume on "The Law of Copyright," are almost as fascinating as "Obiter Dicta." Or take Sir Frederick Pollock's important works on "Torts" or "Contracts," or Mr. Edward Manson's delightful little book on "Dog Law"—a work which probably has the unique distinction of being the only English law book provided with a pictorial frontispiece, a reproduction of Landseer's "Laying down the Law"—or some of the articles in the recently-issued "Encyclopædia of English Law," and they will dissipate the notion that legal text-books must necessarily be mere dull compilations.

Occasionally, too, an unattractive work may be enlivened by some interesting literary reference which falls upon the stream of dreary narrative like a glint of summer sunshine. To find Sam Weller's evidence in "Bardell v. Pickwick" set out in Pitt-Taylor on "Evidence" as an apposite illustration of the working of one of our evidential rules is delightful. In reported decisions we sometimes light upon equally pleasant surprises. In one of Lord Campbell's Reports (Vol. 3, p. 539) we have a passage from Boswell relating to Jack Ellis, the last of the profession of money scriveners, set out in a note; in a Scotch report for 1829 (7 "Shaw and Dunlop," pp. 159, 160) almost a page is devoted to an extract from "The Antiquary"; in Vol. 33 of the "Law Journal Reports" (Q.B.), page 149 is plentifully dotted with poetical quotations to illustrate the use of the word "team"; in a recent case (14 The Times L.R., 532) the Lord Chancellor breaks the continuity of a prose narrative by quoting from Shakespeare, and from Carey's play "Chrononhotonthologos," the well known lines:—

> Go call a coach, and let a coach be called,
> And let the man who calleth it be the caller,
> And in his calling let him nothing call
> But coach! coach! coach! O for a coach ye gods;

while more recently still in a suit before Mr. Justice Kekewich as to the validity of an old custom (L.R. [1898] 2 Ch., 120) we find allusions to the classic pages of "Tristram Shandy," and in another, before the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 231) the Lord Chief Justice takes "judicial notice" of the fat boy in "Pickwick." Sometimes a mere name in a report will awaken pleasant fancies, remote enough from "the dusty purlieus of the law." Looking through Volume 4 of Bingham's Reports (Common Pleas) for the year 1828 the reader, familiar with his Dickens, when he chances at page 218 upon the case of "Brooke v. Pickwick" gets a pleasant shock, for the defendant there was none other than the famous coach proprietor whose name was appropriated for the work we know and love so well. Like his fictitious namesake, this Mr. Pickwick was unfortunate in his defence. Mr. Justice Gaselee was concerned in both cases, although in "Bardell v. Pickwick" he appears as Mr. Justice Stareleigh. The real Mr. Pickwick, however, was not sued by any Mrs. Bardell for damages in respect of wounded affections, but by a prosaic traveller for the loss of his trunk.

These may be small matters, but to find the prevailing dulness of law publications enlivened in any way, and to discover that not all lawyers and writers on legal subjects have vowed exclusive devotion to the shrine of the "Annual Practice" and kindred works, are, in the circumstances, matters for congratulation.

THE FRESCOES AT THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

If we have no Pantheon such as that in Paris, and no Puvis de Chavannes to relate in picture the story of the City's patron saint, we have a Royal Exchange the walls of whose interior have for long lacked decoration. Some years ago, however, the late Lord Leighton inaugurated a scheme for filling the twenty-four panels of the ambulatory wall with frescoes depicting noteworthy incidents in the history of the City. Partly because our artists have had little practice in covering considerable spaces with such decorations, the frescoes, judged from the artistic standpoint, are not a signal success. Nevertheless they are of interest. The intention is to fill the twenty-four panels with subjects in chronological order. A list of themes provisionally approved has been drawn up, and from these artists who receive a commission are allowed to select. Immediately to the left of the main or western entrance the series begins with a picture painted and presented by Lord Leighton. It takes us back to the traditional times when Phœnicians traded with early Britons on the Cornish coast, and it suggests that commerce is the foundation of London's greatness. In No. 3, from the hand of Mr. Seymour Lucas, we see William the Conqueror granting the first Charter to the City of London, King and Queen seated on a dais with men-at-arms and serving-women behind, the City ecclesiastic and other dignitaries standing beneath a great pillar in the right foreground. As we look at Mr. Goetze's presentment of the crown being offered to Richard of Gloucester at Baynard's Castle in 1483, No. 16 of the series, we apprehend whence his inspiration was drawn; from that vivid word-picture in the third act of Shakespeare's Richard III., where the wily Gloucester is described as standing "'tween two clergymen,"

> Two props of virtue for a Christian prince,
> To stay him from the fall of vanity;
> And, see, a book of prayer in his hand;
> True ornaments to know a holy man.

Gloucester, the devotional book still in his hand, has come down the steps, and the Mayor, on bended knee, is offering him "the sceptred office of your ancestors." In No. 18 has been placed Mr. Ernest Crofts' "Queen Elizabeth Visiting the First Royal Exchange, Jan. 23, 1571." The original building was founded by Sir Thomas Gresham, and the Queen, represented here on a white palfrey, came, as recorded by Stowe, from Somerset House in the Strand, entered the City by Temple Bar, passed through Fleet-street, Cheap, and so by the north side of the Bourse to Bishopsgate-street, where she dined in the house of Sir Thomas. Returning through Cornhill, she "entered the Burse on the south side; and after she had viewed every part thereof above the ground, especially the Pawn [the corridor above the cloister of the interior, and divided into stalls, was known as the Pawn], which was richly furnished with all sorts of the finest wares in the City, she caused the same Burse, by herald and trumpet, to be proclaimed 'The Royal Exchange.'" In the next panel, on the west side of the southern entrance, Mr. Solomon J. Solomon shows Charles I., accompanied by his retinue, in front of the Guildhall in 1642, on that memorable occasion when, foiled in the Commons, he demanded the arrest of Pym, Hampden, Holles, Hazelrigg, and Strode. This was the last visit of Charles to the City. Mr. Stanhope Forbes, in panel No. 20, treats an incident on Thames-side during the Great Fire of London. It approximates in picture to the scene thus described by Pepys under date September 2, 1666; moreover, Mr. Forbes had the passage in mind, we understand, while he worked. "Poor Michell's house, as far as the Old Swan, already burned that way, and the fire running further, that, in a very little time, it got as far as Steele-yard, while I was there. Everybody endeavouring to remove their goods, and flinging into the river, or bringing them into lighters that lay off; poor people staying in their houses as long as till the very fire touched them, and then running into boats, or clambering from one pair of stairs by the waterside, to another. And, among other things, the poor pigeons, I perceive, were loth to leave their houses, but hovered about the windows and balconies, till they burned their wings, and fell down." The penultimate panel, No. 23, contains Mr. R. W. Macbeth's fresco of the Queen opening the present or third Royal Exchange—Gresham's building was destroyed by the Great Fire, and the second, known as Jarman's Exchange, by a fire in 1838—in 1844.

This week Sir Alfred Newton unveiled two new frescoes, the gift of two wealthy South Africans, Mr. John Paddon and his son-in-law, Mr. Abe Bailey. In panel No. 6 is Mr. Ernest Normand's "King John Granting Magna Charta." The King, seated beneath a canopy in front of the royal tent, is supported by Peter of Winchester, the Earls of Salisbury and of Pembroke, with emblazoned pennons indicating the presence of the Earls of Warren and of Arundel. To the left are the barons: Sir William de Montecute, leaning on his sword, powerful, determined, Robert de Roos, Robert Fitzwalter, and Archbishop Stephen Langton, said to have been one of the first subscribing witnesses of the Charter. On the original list the subject is given as "John Signing Magna Charta," but Mr. Normand shows instead a press, drawn from a thirteenth century example in the Chapter House of Canterbury, with which the Charter is about to be sealed. The subject of the second new fresco had, too, to be changed, in order to maintain the historical accuracy of the series. The picturesque tradition that Sir Richard Whittington asked Henry V. to sup with him, and afterwards, on a fire of precious woods mixed with cinnamon and other spices, burned bonds for £60,000 signed by the King, is not in conformity with fact. Mrs. Normand had to fall back on a less grandiose subject. This four-times Lord Mayor of London is known to have been generous, and it is well within the bounds of possibility to suppose that, with snow on the ground, he stood, as Mrs. Normand shows him, superintending the giving of bread to poor folk of the City. From his house hangs an iron escutcheon and, above, the representation of a Kat, or merchant-boat, the origin of the Whittington legend. In each case the border of oak leaves is adhered to, the inappropriate wreath, which depends from the top in the earlier frescoes, has been abandoned by Mr. and Mrs. Normand, as well as by Messrs. Seymour Lucas, Ernest Crofts, and Stanhope Forbes. Frescoes on the following themes will in all probability be added: "Alfred the Great Repairing the Walls of London"; "William II. Building the Tower"; "Henry II., Founder of the Hospital of St. Thomas"; "A Folkmote in St. Paul's Churchyard"; "The Entertainment of the Five Kings by the Vintners' Company"; "The Insurrection of Wat Tyler"; "The Trained Bands Marching to Barnet, temp Henry VI."; "The Charter of Charles the Bold to the Merchant Adventurers"; "The Foundation of St. Paul's School by Dean Colet"; "The Opening of the Second Royal Exchange"; "William III. and Mary Founding the Bank of England"; "The Opening of London Bridge by William IV."; "Modern Commerce"; "The Quarrel between the Skinners' and Merchant Taylors' Companies"; and possibly some incident connected with the City Imperial Volunteers.

THE DRAMA.

"HEROD."

Reviewing Mrs. Dane's Defence the other day, I remarked that, though dramatists did not often let us into the secrets of their literary method, it was permissible to guess that some of them began their plays at the end and worked backwards. Oddly enough, this random conjecture has promptly been verified in the case of Herod. A friend of Mr. Stephen Phillips has let the cat out of the bag. "The last act was written first, and was submitted to Mr. Tree, who thereupon accepted the work. The other two acts (which were originally to have been three) were composed by the poet more or less in consultation with the actor." Whatever inference be drawn, it is an undeniable fact that the last act is the best of the three. It shows Herod inconsolable and distraught after the death of Mariamne. In his delirium he imagines that she is "not dead but sleepeth." Seated on his throne, gaunt, dishevelled, and ragged, amid the crowd of frightened courtiers who have been bidden by the physician to humour his madness, he tries to wait patiently until she wakes. Meanwhile the courtiers seek to divert his thoughts by the aid of singing boys and dancing girls, and by showing him models of the Temple he is building. (And admirably, let me say parenthetically, does the Chief Artificer, Mr. H. W. Varna, declaim his lines.) The King oscillates, in the jargon of the faculty, between melancholia and megalomania. At one moment he is plunged in a stupor of grief; at another he recites his inordinate visions:—

I dreamed last night of a dome of beaten gold,
To be a counter glory to the Sun.
There shall the eagle blindly dash himself,
There the first beam shall strike, and there the moon
Shall aim all night her argent archery;
And it shall be the tryst of sundered stars,
The haunt of dead and dreaming Solomon;
Shall send a light upon the lost in Hell,
And flushings upon faces without hope.
And I will think in gold and dream in silver,
Imagine in marble and in bronze conceive,
Till it shall dazzle pilgrim nations,
And stammering tribes from undiscovered lands,
Allure the living God out of the bliss,
And all the streaming seraphim from Heaven!

And then with lack-lustre eye he subsides into dotage, and toys like a child with heaps of pearls and rubies. But Mariamne comes not, and he is driven to frenzy with impatience. With the vague perception of her death at the back of his brain, he declares he will "recreate her out of endless yearning."

Do I not know her every vein? Can I
Not imitate in furious ecstasy
What God hath coldly made? I'll recreate
My love, with bone for bone, and vein for vein.
The eyes, the eyes again—the hands, the hair,
And that which I have made—O that shall love me.

Finally, since he will not be pacified without sight of her, they bring in her embalmed body on a bier. With a wild cry he staggers from his throne and fastens upon her lips, whose chill at last brings the truth home to him. He stands transfixed, "a frozen man." Envoys arrive from Cæsar, but he heeds them not. The stricken King cannot hear the words of the physician:—

Behold this Herod motionless and mute;
To me it seems that they who grasp the world,
The kingdom and the power and the glory,
Must pay with deepest misery of spirit,
Atoning unto God for a brief brightness;
And ever ransom, like this rigid King,
The outward victory with inward loss.

Then the crowd silently steals out and the lights grow dim in the vast desert of the hall—as at the close of A Midsummer Night's Dream. But the figure of the King, turned to stone like another Oriental monarch in the Arabian Nights, does not budge, and the curtain slowly hides it from sight.

Some people, I see, have made haste to assert that Herod is not a great play. Great is a relative term, and may mean what you please. I mean it in the highest sense when I describe the last act as great. Of the verse the reader can judge for himself from the extracts I have given. To my sense, it is true and thrilling poetry, a gallery of gorgeous pictures, a rich banquet for the ear. But most of us knew already that Mr. Phillips was a poet. What we were waiting to discover was not his poetic but his dramatic faculty. And who can gainsay the force of this last act as sheer drama? Note the varied series of tirades uttered by the King, and punctuated by the faltering comments of the crowd; it is like some great concerto, with the King as melodist and the crowd as orchestra. Note the dramatic catastrophe of the kiss; the prolonged wailings and ravings, the agony of doubt, followed by the sudden silence of petrifaction, as though upon sight of Medusa's head. Note, too, the contrast of the King's impenetrable gloom and the noisy, feverish gaiety of the dancers and musicians who throng round him. All this is intensely dramatic, an embodiment of the poet's meaning in picturesquely symbolic action and arrangement of the scene. Impressive as the "book" is, it could not of itself strike the mind with a tithe of the force obtained by its representation with the solidity, the movement, the flesh-and-blood of the stage. In other words, this is drama, and (I do not wish to appear defiant, but I must repeat the word) great drama.

If the first two acts are but on this high level, they are nevertheless abounding with vigour, dramatic vigour, and beauty, poetic beauty. For a taste of the beauty here are two lyric passages:—

And he shall still that old sob of the sea,
And heal the unhappy fancies of the wind,
And turn the moon from all that hopeless quest.
Trees without care shall blossom, and all the fields
Shall without labour unto harvest come.

And:—

One could not get by heart that sweetness, not
From rose-foam of the Mediterranean,
Nor solitary Lebanonian sigh,
To lone Abarah under Syrian stars.

For the vigour there is the scene wherein Mariamne fascinates Soheimus, the assassin of her brother, and wrests his secret from him; there is the scene wherein Herod quells the mutinous crowd; above all, there is the scene wherein the King stalks proudly to Mariamne's door to share with her the new honours just conferred on him by Cæsar, ignorant that on the other side of the door the woman he idolizes lies dead. Her death, by the way, has taken place "off"; so has that of her brother Aristobulus in the first act; and many people have pointed out how Mr. Phillips here reverts to the "classical" traditions. He does; but yet Herod and frigid classicism are poles apart. Compare it with some classic Orientalism, I will not say of Voltaire (for Voltairean tragedies are the stock examples of how not to do it), but of Racine—with Bajazet, for instance. Racine faintly scents his Versailles corridors with attar of roses, his is the "Turquerie" of a fancy ball; Mr. Phillips "holds the gorgeous East in fee," and fills his whole stage with its hot blood and passion-laden air. If anything, Mr. Phillips has been too anxiously Oriental. To show the viperine intensity of Eastern jealousy he drags in those superfluous intriguers Cypros and Salome. Their poisoned cup is too familiar a stage "property." At one time the action of the play is suspended in order that females may fan themselves and languish in the stifling heat. This seems an unnecessary dotting of the i's. And the frivolous may be tempted to compare Cæsar's envoys, who are perpetually arriving a day after the fair, with Offenbach's gendarmes, who were always so careful to march on after the brigands had cleared out. But this, let me hasten to confess, is only a perverse afterthought of mine. No such incongruous idea occurred to my mind as I watched Mr. Phillips' play, which dominates the spectator too completely to permit his fancy to play truant.

We all owe so much to Mr. Tree for his courage and skill in the production of this play that it would be ungrateful to pick small holes in his acting. He is one of the players who are never to be fairly judged by first-night experience; but even on the first night his Herod only fell short by a certain impression of strain from being a masterly performance. Miss Maud Jeffries makes a beautiful Mariamne, a little indistinct at times, perhaps a little lacking in fire. Miss Calhoun, Mr. Fulton, and Mr. Somerset are the next best in a numerous cast. And everything that can be done in the way of "decoration" has been splendidly done.

"GENERAL BONAPARTE."

NAPOLEON: THE LAST PHASE. By LORD ROSEBERY. (Humphreys. 7s. 6d.)

Lord Rosebery's brilliant study of Napoleon's uncomfortable and ignoble end in a little house on an island infested by rats has the double interest due to a fascinating subject and to an author whose distinction as a man of letters is only overshadowed by his distinction as a man of affairs. He has certainly enriched the literature of Napoleon, voluminous as that literature is—partly by giving us a masterly character-study of the Emperor at a moment when his character was tested by the "chilling frost" of failure, and partly by devoting close attention to a period which specially required impartial and candid investigation. Gourgaud's private journal Lord Rosebery takes as "the one capital and supreme record of life at St. Helena," and he gives a delightful character-sketch of the writer. For the most part the literature of the subject consists of small talk—sometimes the small talk of adulation and sometimes the small talk of depreciation—contributed by diarists who remind one of the "lesser men" creeping in and out between the legs of the Colossus that bestrode the world. Lord Rosebery, at any rate, has the air of approaching the theme in that temper of freemasonry which naturally links distinguished personages, assists them to take broad views of each other's shortcomings, and draws them to the conviction—intuitive rather than reasoned—that, whatever crimes they may have committed, and however many homes they may have made desolate, it is still the business of less distinguished personages to treat them with consideration and respect. They are above laws in general, and above the lex talionis in particular. When once their power for evil has been checked they must receive, not contempt, but consideration from their victims.

Such is the spirit in which Lord Rosebery approaches the controversy which once raged round the name of Sir Hudson Lowe. Not for him is the obvious view that Napoleon, having achieved, quocunque modo, and enjoyed, the consummation of his ambition during his marvellous career, had no ground to complain of any inconveniences that he encountered at the end of it. On the contrary, he relates, not without some acrimony, the long list of the illustrious prisoner's grievances, which the "man in the street" might regard as a well-merited retribution recoiling upon the head of the man from whom, as a statesman who is the subject of Lord Rosebery's admiration remarked, England had had to save herself by her exertions and Europe by her example. The first grievance is that the gaoler was not a gentleman. But was the prisoner a judge? The man who wrote letters to his divorced wife begging her to take lessons in domestic economy from the wife who had supplanted her had surely no right to be exceptionally sensitive about minor breaches of good manners. Then there is the question of the title. Napoleon was forbidden the style of Emperor—to which he clung as an American to the style of judge or colonel—and denominated General Bonaparte. Lord Rosebery well points out that "Napoleon was emphatically, as Napoleon III. said of himself, a parvenu Emperor. To Charles V., the heir of half the world, the descendant of a hundred Kings, it could matter little what he was called after his abdication, for nothing could divest him of his blood or his birth." But "to Napoleon the title of Emperor represented the crown and summit of his dazzling career, and he declined to drop it at the bidding of a foreign enemy." Here, again, it is but human to recur to the law of retribution. Napoleon was only being treated, in this regard, as he himself had treated other people. Is it not on record that he sent a brutal message to a King whom he had deposed to the effect that that Monarch must not address him as "Dear cousin," but as "Sire"? To go a little further back, was he not a member of the party which spoke of the King and Queen of France as Louis and the Widow Capet respectively? Thirdly, we have the grievance of the inadequate allowance. It was, at all events, a better allowance than Napoleon made to the hundreds of unoffending English tourists whom he caused to be arrested and detained as prisoners of war when hostilities were resumed after the Peace of Amiens. Moreover, money was scarce just then; and who, but Napoleon, with his English blockade, was to blame for that? As the poet put it, "Who made the Luddites and the bread to rise?" Why, indeed, seeing that, as Lord Rosebery admits, Napoleon "had ample funds in Paris and ample funds even at St. Helena," should he have been given any allowance at all? Would it have been so very unreasonable to require him to live on the income of his own economies, invested and administered for him by trustees? Finally, there was the grievance of the restrictions, amounting, in Lord Rosebery's view, to persecution, imposed upon his liberty, and of the discomfort of the accommodation provided for him. It is, of course, permissible to see in this the petty tyranny of a Jack-in-office; but it is also permissible to see in it the inflexibly just operation of the lex talionis already referred to. In what conditions had Napoleon imprisoned the Pope at Savona? Lord Rosebery himself answers the question, though apparently without perceiving how his answer bears upon his case. The Pope was put into captivity "almost as malefactors are imprisoned."

These facts do not prove, of course, that Sir Hudson Lowe was an agreeable man. At the most they only prove that there was no conclusive reason why an agreeable man should be chosen to fill the onerous office of custodian to the fallen Emperor. But they are worth remembering because they were facts of which Sir Hudson Lowe was cognisant, and because they may partially account for his attitude towards his prisoner—as well as for the instructions as to what that treatment was to be, sent to him by the Cabinet at home. Perhaps, too, we may find a further explanation by admitting the hypothesis that Lowe was, in a fashion, afraid of Napoleon, who had a way of making people afraid of him, even when he was no longer in a position to order them to be court-martialled and shot. He was a little man, told off to look after a great man, who laid himself out to make things uncomfortable for the great man and to put him in the wrong. It was an exceptional situation, for which Lord Rosebery is perhaps justly severe on the Ministers responsible for the selection of a gaoler, but it was one to which history affords many a parallel, and the temptations of which commonplace humanity could not resist. At the same time we cannot pretend to be sorry that Lord Rosebery is more in sympathy with Napoleon than with Sir Hudson Lowe, even though we firmly believe that Sir Hudson Lowe was the better man of the two. If he had been capable of doing justice to Napoleon in the sense in which justice is understood in the police-courts, he would almost certainly have done him less than justice in the literary and artistic sense. Measuring him as a criminal, he would have failed to give us the measure of the man, and it is as an attempt to solve the Napoleonic riddle rather than as a careful collation of biographical documents that Lord Rosebery's book is interesting and valuable. He chose the St. Helena episode, he tells us, because he thought that "in this final phase we have some chance of seeing something of the man." Lord Rosebery's insight into character is equalled by the picturesqueness and literary skill of his description of the surroundings of the Emperor at St. Helena, and of the prisoner reading the Bible, and speculating on what might have been.

Then follows a masterly summing up, so closely written that any attempt to summarize it must do it grave injustice. One can only quote. Of the effect of the "last phase" on Napoleon's reputation, Lord Rosebery says admirably:—

> No one remembered, or at any rate cared to recall, that he had knowingly ceded his throne and yielded himself a prisoner rather than place himself at the head of a popular insurrection.
> But had it been remembered, it would have been held to be expiated by the martyrdom of St. Helena. Napoleon was quite aware of the advantage that his memory and cause would derive from his imprisonment. His death in lonely captivity cancelled all his errors and all his shortcomings. His memory, purged of all recollection of his iron rule, of his insatiable demands on the blood and resources of France, of the two invasions of her territory which he had brought about, became a tradition and a miracle.

The two questions to which Lord Rosebery mainly addresses himself are:—Was Napoleon a good man? Was he a great man? The answer to the first question is that allowances must be made, as the circumstances were exceptional.

> His lot was not cast in a monastery or in a pulpit. He came from Corsica, a little Pagan, viewing the world as his oyster. He was reared in the life of camps and the terror of revolution. He was raised to rule a nation which, in the horrors of a great convulsion, had formally renounced and practically abjured Christianity. He had to fight for his own hand against the whole world. It was breathless work which gave little time for reflection.

It is an eloquent plea; but one cannot help remembering that Napoleon had much time for reflection in his island prison, and that reflection did not lead him to regret anything except failure, not even that crime of crimes, the murder of the Duc d'Enghien. The case is different with the discussion of his greatness:—

> Under the fiercest glare of scrutiny he enlarged indefinitely the limits of human conception and human possibility. Till he had lived no one could realize that there could be such a stupendous combination of military and civil genius, such comprehension of view united to such grasp of detail, such prodigious vitality of body and mind. . . . No name represents so completely and conspicuously dominion, splendour, and catastrophe. He raised himself by the use, and ruined himself by the abuse, of superhuman faculties. He was wrecked by the extravagance of his own genius. No less powers than those which had effected his rise could have achieved his fall.

That, at any rate, is true, and is perhaps the final word upon the subject as well as the closing passage of the best—if not in all particulars the most convincing—character-study of Napoleon that has yet been written in the English language.

COVENTRY PATMORE.

Memoirs and Correspondence of Coventry Patmore. By Basil Champneys. Two Volumes. With Illustrations. (Bell, 32s. n.)

Mr. Basil Champneys tells us that Coventry Patmore invited him, in 1891, "to take charge of his papers and act as his literary executor after his death." By his will the author of "The Angel in the House" devolved this charge on his third wife, the present Mrs. Coventry Patmore, at whose request Mr. Champneys has undertaken the task of the biographer. He has, we think, performed a thorny and difficult duty with discretion, and he has produced a well-written and amiable book which both those who knew and those who did not know the remarkable man with whom it deals will read with great interest. Such as only know Coventry Patmore from his published work will be grateful for the way in which these handsome volumes enable them to form a mental picture of the man as distinguished from the poet. The numerous portraits which are admirably reproduced add special charm. But those who knew the poet personally will feel that Mr. Champneys has not always made the most of his opportunity. He scarcely does justice to the second Mrs. Patmore. One of the few failures in taste of the work is in the reference to her as "old maidish." She introduced to the Patmore family wealth, domestic ease and contact with refined society—the aristocracy of intellect is not quite the same thing. Too little recognition is given to her fulfilment of the difficult role of stepmother. Patmore's children took to her from the first. The chapter dealing with her does not show that the writer has taken all possible means of getting at the facts. He should have indicated Mrs. Patmore's unselfishness, her sensitiveness for people's feelings—wherein it must be said she was a striking contrast to her husband—her delightful hospitality, and the many other qualities that made her as distinguished a woman in her way as was "The Angel in the House" herself, of whom a charming account is given.

Mr. Champneys omits another point of much interest. Coventry Patmore is remembered by all who knew him well for the extraordinary brilliance and variety of his talk. We miss any adequate indication of this fact. Notably, Mr. Champneys should have told his readers that Patmore was, unlike so many great talkers, always careful to put forth his best powers of conversation in the lesson of his daily. Indeed, he showed to greater advantage in the most intimate circles, partly on account of the curious lack of bonhomie, the tendency to opposition, and the rapid mental reflex which made him rather a difficult personality in a larger circle. There was no getting him to smile at a poor jest uttered with the best intentions—a failing which one of his friends pronounced to be the reason why this man, who was a poet for poets and not for politicians, never obtained the Laureateship, which we believe to have been—in spite of what Mr. Champneys tells us—a real, if secret, ambition. "Ill singing 'tis, when there is none to hear," he said in the sixties; and, possibly, it was the lack of public recognition which helped to dry up his poetic vein in his last twenty years. Mr. Champneys is out-spoken enough—there can hardly, indeed, be any limitation to a biographer who is capable of printing so very intimate a letter as that on page 133 of the second volume—and he would have given a better picture of Patmore's character if he had dwelt a little more freely on his habitual conversation and social manner. This was, to say the least of it, subject to moods. Patmore was capable of equally sudden fits of amiability and of other things. If he received a letter from an unknown young versifier that struck him as being conceived in a spirit of sincere admiration, he was capable of writing him a long and charming reply, and asking him to drop in for a pipe any afternoon. But he was equally capable of "jumping down the throat" of his oldest friend, and his hospitality was normally characterized by a spirit of "Take what I want you to have," which was exhibited even in so minute a detail as the choice of drinks! His emotional generosity to injured strangers was a characteristically poetic trait; if he saw a child run over, he would have caught the offending driver, paid for his prosecution, and probably given the injured infant an annuity, though he might be in much need of a new coat himself. This well-known turn of his mind, rather than his religion, prevented him from being put on the Commission of the Peace; his justice would certainly have had a bizarre quality. He was capable of giving three months for some offences that are normally punished with three days' imprisonment, and, on the other hand, might have thought it right, in certain circumstances, to acquit a girl who had killed her illegitimate child, to get up a subscription for her on the Bench, and, finally, to order one of his workmen to "make an honest woman" of her. He once said that in his youthful days, when he found himself totally ignorant of a subject, he was accustomed to write to one of the leading magazines and offer an article on it, in order to learn something about it; if the offer was accepted, the article—as we know from other sources—turned out to be a very sound and well-informed one. A curious and vital element of his nature, again, was surely involved in his combination of marked reticence, reserve, and even hauteur, with a rollicking readiness for fun and frolic in conversation. He never said a foolish thing, but he was willing to say the most absurd things with deliberation. His thoughts and actions, one was convinced, were as carefully pruned and as highly finished as his poetry. In conversation he was accused of needing an audience rather than an opposite. Mr. Champneys tells us that he often refused to talk freely to more than one at a time; another explanation of his tendency to monologue was that he was wont to dictate dogmas with such argumentative force and wealth of illustration that most of his friends preferred to listen rather than to risk disturbing the flow of language by any interruption beyond the merest form of assent. His persistent worship of truth was consistent with the wildest exaggeration, but never with conscious fiction; his exaggeration was that of the microscope, though the lenses were not absolutely achromatic. All his geese were swans, and the poetic temperament threw a strange sheen of glory on much that seemed quite ordinary to plain mortals.

We must not be supposed to mean that these details are more characteristic than many that Mr. Champneys has included, but we think that they indicate features that he has omitted from his somewhat insufficiently coloured picture of Coventry

Patmore. It is very difficult for one of a man's friends, however intimate, to grasp the whole of his personality, especially when it is so elusive and has so many facets as that of a poet usually has. No doubt other friends will in due time contribute their views on the subject by way of supplement. We must highly recommend Mr. Champneys' work, with these limitations, and praise his fluent and agreeable style. He has confined his biography within the first volume, and the second is occupied with much supplementary material, including a spiritual autobiography, and many letters written to and by Patmore—among the correspondents being Carlyle, whose letters are characteristic and delightful, Tennyson, Ruskin, who indulges in a fascinating picture of a certain critic of his friend's poetry as "a little devil jumping on a bed of lilies," and others of scarcely less interest. A special charm is given to the volumes by the inclusion of much of Patmore's own characteristic prose, taken from his intimate letters or from his notes for unfinished work. We have only space left to quote one or two of the best of these, among which we may note a fine saying on hope and ambition :—

> What I am doing now is merely groping about to find if there lies any unsuspected pass between or over the seemingly insuperable heights. Such hidden ways often lurk in mountain lands. You seem to be travelling all day towards a dead upright cliff, and when you come to the foot of it you find a flowery pathway winding through the heart of it.

One is reminded of Johnson's dictum that none but a blockhead ever wrote except for money by the following statement, rare on the lips of a poet, but remarkably true :—

> A man who thinks he has got anything to say should always write for money. There is always some air of priggishness in one who "gives his advice gratis." Modesty is preserved by the money-motive. Besides, the subtlest truths are like the remoter stars ; you cannot see them unless you look a little on one side of them. You are likely to say your say the better for having your direct gaze fixed upon the five, ten, or twenty pound note which your prophecy is to bring you.

FLORENCE.

The Story of Florence. By Edmund G. Gardner. Illustrated by Nellie Erichsen. (Mediæval Towns.) (Dent, 4s. 6d. n.)

It can have been no easy matter to compress the history of the City of Florence and all there is to tell of the countless treasures of art stored up in her churches and palaces within the limits of one small volume. Yet Mr. Edmund Gardner, it is fair to say, has accomplished this difficult and, at first sight, almost impossible task, with a considerable measure of success. His story of Florence, which is the latest addition to Mr. J. M. Dent's excellent series of mediæval towns, supplies a fuller and more accurate introduction to the study of Florentine history and art than either of the similar works by Mr. Hare and Mr. Grant Allen. It gives a popular and spirited account of the rise of the Republic in the twelfth century, and of the successive political revolutions that marked the course of the next 500 years. The long struggle between Guelfs and Ghibellines, the times of Dante and Boccaccio, the brilliant days of the Medici, and the great Quattrocento scholars and artists who adorned Lorenzo the Magnificent's Court, are all clearly brought before us in turn. The striking and picturesque figure of Savonarola stands out conspicuously in Mr. Gardner's narrative, and the chapters describing the religious revival which the Dominican Friar effected, and the sad story of his downfall and death, are of especial interest. Full accounts of the chief buildings and works of art in Florence, of the Duomo, and the bridges, of the churches and the picture galleries, of the Gates of Paradise, and the bas-reliefs of the Campanile, of the frescoes of San Marco, and the Tombs of the Medici are given for the benefit of the traveller, while most of the artistic information contained in the volume is derived from the works of Morelli, of Mr. Berenson and of M. Marcel Reymond, whose admirable history of Tuscan sculpture has already proved so valuable to students of the Renaissance.

Nor have the precious memories of modern times been forgotten in this brief summary of Florentine story. The gardens where Shelley wrote his "Ode to the West Wind," the palazzo where Elizabeth Barrett Browning lived when she wrote "Casa Guidi Windows," the Piazza where Robert Browning found the square old yellow book with the "crumpled vellum covers," which inspired his noblest poem, are all carefully indicated, and on the hill of San Miniato we are reminded of Burne-Jones' "unforgettable picture of the Merciful Knight," S. Giovanni Gualberto. A few of Ruskin's finest passages on the Shepherd's Tower, and the paintings of Botticelli, of Fra Angelico and Perugino, are introduced, as well as lines from Browning's "Fra Lippo Lippi" and the "Ring and the Book," and Pater's eloquent description of the Birth of Venus is given at length, but as a rule quotations are sparingly used and selected with judgment and discretion. A genealogical table of the house of Medici and a chronological index of Florentine architects, sculptors, and painters, have been added at the end of the volume and will greatly increase the usefulness of the book, which also contains a good map of the town and a plan of Florence in the days of Lorenzo the Magnificent, taken from an old engraving of 1490, which is preserved in the Berlin Museum. The last chapter is devoted to the environs of the City of Flowers. The churches and convents of Fiesole, of Prato, and Pistoja, and the villas of Careggi and Poggio a Caiano are all described. But it is a pity that in speaking of the mediæval sanctuaries in the Casentino, Mr. Gardner did not mention the beautiful terra-cotta bas-reliefs by Andrea della Robbia and his school which adorn the church and chapels of La Verna, the famous shrine of St. Francis on the fir-clad heights of the Apennines—Dante's "erudo sasso, intra Tevere ed Arno." Miss Erichsen's drawings of the old bridges and towers on the banks of Arno, and of the few quaint nooks and corners which have escaped the ruthless hand of the modern builder, are a great addition to Mr. Gardner's little book, and a fine photogravure of Botticelli's "Pallas Taming a Centaur" forms an appropriate frontispiece to this tale of the past glories of Florence.

THE SALISBURY MANUSCRIPTS.

Calendar of the Manuscripts of the Most Hon. the Marquis of Salisbury, K.G. Part VIII. (Eyre and Spottiswoode, 2s. 8d.)

Another volume has appeared of those manuscripts which were placed at the disposal of Mr. Froude, when he was at work on his History, and which he exhausted in a single day. The year 1598, which has furnished all the material for the eighth volume, was not prolific of stirring events. Sir Robert Cecil's embassy to Paris, the death of the first Lord Burghley, Southampton's disgrace and Elizabeth's anger with Essex, Tyrone's temporarily successful rebellion—these are the most striking features. But it is not here that the chief attraction of the volume lies. The art of history was revolutionized contemporaneously with the triumph of landscape painting. The ancient idea of history, surviving far into modern times in writers like Hume and Robertson and Roscoe, was to embody the tendencies and movements of an age in a generalized representation, avoiding or despising detail, as the Greeks embodied their apprehension of complex nature in a single generalization, whether in legend or marble. The modern spirit adores detail, and for this nothing can be better than such a collection of miscellaneous records.

Men who are utterly unknown to history, who have figured in no biographical dictionary, and have escaped even the omniscience of the genealogist, live here in unmistakable sincerity. Such a man is James Reade, steward to the Earl of Essex, of whom a Welsh lady, named Susan Morgan, makes bitter complaint. This James Reade would go into people's houses, and take their pots and pans. If they objected he would beat them until the blood followed, and if they attempted a rescue, they would be indicted and fined, till the poor souls said they would rather die than be made his bondslaves. He terrified every one by saying that he was his lordship's steward and musterman. He was wont "to take bribes of aldesmen, to bring people to consume themselves." This bribery and extortion was "to maintain his lewd life." He had seven hundred marks in marriage with Mistress Morgan's sister, and married, in her lifetime, an old dame of three-score years. When indicted before the Bishop, he refused to appear, alleging in excuse that he was in Essex's service.

Equally vivid is the self-drawn picture of the outlawed Scottish Presbyterian divine, Camden's "impious, ungrateful Scot." He sold himself to Essex as a foreign "espion," but apologized for keeping up a correspondence with the King of Scots, a little, as he puts it, to receive out of his hand sums of money that were due, but especially from pure desire to do a notable service to her Majesty. He was apparently a tender husband and father. He stipulated, in case he should perish, for some "gracious consideration" to his wife and children. At one time he believed that he was deep in the secrets of the exiled Earl of Bothwell—grandfather of Serjeant Francis Bothwell, of "Old Mortality" renown—"being moved thereunto by his terrible oaths and protestations," but was forced to alter his opinion, "finding him light as a feather and more fraudfull nor a fox." Bothwell and the Bishop of Glasgow all but succeeded in having him seized by the authorities of Cambrai that he might receive the reward which he so richly deserved.

Some long-winded and circumstantial versions of a quarrel between Sir Melgar Levens and Sir Charles Blunt, each giving the lie direct, with graceful insinuations of cowardly behaviour, to the statements of his opponent, might have furnished an episode for Dumas. The delightfully romantic insecurity of life in the "spacious days" is illustrated by the fortunes of two English knights, who were exiled in Paris for a short period before obtaining pardon, for the murder of a country neighbour, ancestor of the President of the Board of Agriculture, after which act they had been first harboured, then safely smuggled away, by Harry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton. Southampton intended to have taken the younger brother, Sir Henry Davers, with him into Italy, a country of which he knew nothing by experience, and to which his friends refer in terms of fascinated horror: but a sudden pardon arriving for the homicides, Southampton consoled himself for their loss by reflections of friendly sympathy, though he admitted that Davers' absence would be an "exceeding maim" to him. Lingering still in Paris in hopes that his friend might return, Southampton became the laughing-stock of the French Court. He gamed heavily, though he had gone abroad to escape from pecuniary embarrassments by plain living. He lost, in a very short time, 3,000 crowns to the Duc de Biron at paulone. Yet his recall to England came rather in the guise of a calamity than a salvation. He had made a secret marriage with Mistress Elizabeth Vernon, one of the Queen's maids of honour, to whom the young earl's ardent love-making had left no choice but between marriage and disgrace. Elizabeth has been described as one of the greatest Platonists among the Renaissance women. But she expected to be the sole inspiration of her Court; she expected her love to be sufficient at once to kindle and to soothe the virile, passionate warriors who surrounded her. The result was often disastrous, as in this present case, and as in the case of Leicester, Hatton, and Raleigh.

This year finds Essex also in disgrace with his Royal mistress. Elizabeth had "chased" him from her, and her "indignation did take hold of all things that might feed it." Yet when the "unhappy news came from yonder cursed country of Ireland," and he apprehended how much Elizabeth "would be grieved to have her armies beaten and her kingdom like to be conquered by the son of a smith," he roused himself from the "deadest melancholy" to offer his attendance and, afterwards, his "poor advice in writing." At first Elizabeth repulsed his advances, but before the year closed he had succeeded in obtaining for himself the chief command against Tyrone—a success which was absolutely ruinous for himself. It was apparently at the instigation of Francis Bacon—his evil genius throughout—that he pressed for the appointment. Of Bacon there are only a few letters, and those insignificant, the most notable being a complaint to Sir Robert Cecil, his cousin, and to the Lord Keeper, of "one Symson, a goldsmith," who had been so insolent as to serve an execution on him, in respect to a loan of £300, as he returned from serving her Majesty by the administration of "the question" at the Tower.

As early as March Lord Burghley had begun to alarm his friends and dependants by grave symptoms. Two years before, in spite of failing health, he had read and answered some 1,200 documents in the course of twelve months. Now "the grasshopper had become a burden." He was obliged to take out a licence to be absent from the feast of St. George when it was celebrated by the Companions of the Order of the Garter. Sudden fits of gout and qualms of the stomach, with great pain in the throat and mouth, aggravated by the effects of being surprised by a shower of rain at Theobalds, threatened the worst, in spite of the "colours in his face, which is very good and his eye quick." His death caused great rejoicings among the enemies of England. The Archduke's Ambassador in France exclaimed, "Il ne reste qu'une vielle a mourir, et en apres nos affaires se porteront bien."

Lord Burghley had a greater fondness for literature and the arts than his famous son. Still Sir Robert appears to have taken pleasure in music. There is a correspondence connected with this subject which does not induce high opinions of the liberty of the subject in those times. Sir Percival Hart wished to engage the services of one Henry Phillips, a musician just returned from the Low Countries, but discovered that he had once been in the following of Sir Robert, and had left against his master's wishes. Cecil expressed a wish to have "him sent up"—ill-omened phrase! To this Phillips violently objected, and Sir Percival made excuses for a time, on the grounds of the young man's sickness and "lewdness," but promised to exercise such surveillance as was possible over "one of his fleeting condition," until he could be handed over to the just chastisement of his forsaken lord.

Several names occur which have interesting literary associations. The author of "Gorboduc" writes about Newcastle coals, ordnance, taxes, and muster-rolls. The Earl of Pembroke often mentions his servant Arthur Massingham, the father of the dramatist. Lyly the Euphuist—of whose family almost nothing is known—encloses a copy of memorial verses on Lord Burghley, by his brother, Chaplain of the Savoy, and apologizes for being late with his own obituary notice. "When I balanced the matter with words, I found the worth to weigh down all wit. He that studies to be longest in the commendation, must come short. I leave discourses to those that have more copy (sic) of words, but not more feeling of grief, and content myself that all my epitaphs be written in amazedness, leaving them as heads for others to anatomize." Gabriel Harvey, the friend of Sidney and Spenser, and champion of classical metres in English, pleads for the endowment of research in his own person. He had written five cantos—"nigh as much in quantity as Ariosto"—in "celebration of her Majesty's most glorious government." His studies ranged from Humanity, History, and Policy to "the true Chymique without imposture, which I learned from Sir Thomas Smith, not to despise." He concludes with the appalling suggestion, "I can in one year publish more than any Englishman hath hitherto done."

The editing and transcription of this volume is all that we are accustomed to expect from the Public Record Office, and reflects the greatest credit on the general editor, Mr. R. A. Roberts, Mr. R. T. Gunton, private secretary to the Marquis of Salisbury, and their collaborators.

RECENT BIOGRAPHIES.

The Late Archbishop of Dublin.

Mr. Frederick Douglas How is rapidly acquiring a speciality as a biographer of Bishops. He began with his father, the late Bishop of Wakefield, and then told the story of the devoted John Selwyn, of Melanesia. Now, in William Conyngham Plunket (Isbister, 16s.), he has written an attractive, if rather long, life of the late Archbishop of Dublin. If Mr. How is becoming a professional writer of episcopal biographies, it has hardly less been the business in life of the Plunkets to supply peer-Bishops to the Church of Ireland. The second Lord Plunket held the See of Tuam; his nephew, the fourth Baron, was successively Bishop of Meath and Archbishop of Dublin. Mr. How has been fortunate in having for his subject an exceedingly interesting man, broad-minded and singularly unecclesiastical in his ideas. He may not have been a great Churchman, but he accomplished much useful work for which he did not always receive the credit he deserved. The chief event of his official life was unquestionably his consecration of a Bishop for the Spanish Protestants—an action around which an acrid controversy surged. The Irish Low Churchmen did not approve because they fancied he was neglecting his own Diocese; the extreme High Churchmen disapproved because to them the Spanish Reformed Church was little better than schismatic. But, like many worse storms, it passed over and nobody is the worse. This was only one of several controversies in which Lord Plunket was engaged. He took a prominent part in the discussions upon Irish Disestablishment, upon Prayer-book Revision, and upon the chimerical dream of Re-Union, while his labours in behalf of education in his own country will not speedily be forgotten. His earnestness, sincerity, and moderation, are obvious in every line he wrote; and with a noble presence and a winning manner it is not surprising that he was popular. Mr. How draws a delightful picture of the Archbishop's home life, for which we may forgive him much of the unimportant padding with which his well-written and well-informed volume is bulked out.

A Great Engineer.

Great engineers, like some other "men of action," do not lend themselves well to the purposes of the biographer. Materials are scanty, and the constructive genius is not for ever pouring out his soul on paper. This reflection is suggested once more by Mr. T. Mackay's Life of Sir John Fowler (Murray, 16s.), a book which, in addition to being far too large, presents no clear-cut definite portraiture of its subject. Mr. Mackay is an exceedingly loyal biographer; but he has a trick of labouring the obvious, and seems to have considered himself under an obligation to produce as large a book as possible. With perhaps the exception of the story of Sir John Fowler's concern with the abortive Sudan Railway, and of his consequent relations with Gordon, which, after all, do not amount to much, the volume contains nothing that is new. It was, no doubt, inevitable that so great a figure as the engineer of the Metropolitan Railway and the Forth Bridge should have his literary memorial; but had the force been smaller the fiction would have been clearer. Moreover, nothing in itself could be more interesting than the story of how this young Yorkshireman, with practically no help from birth or means, tore his way at an early age into the very heart of things, and seized the opportunity of the railway mania of half a century ago to make himself essential to that kind of enterprise. In the light of what the engineer can do now the passengers grumble at the ventilation of the "Underground Railway" and the shareholder repines at its cost; but when the two lines which bear that name were made John Fowler was a pioneer and had to contend with difficulties which his successors are able to play with. And the firm grasp and lasting virility of the man are shown admirably in his Forth Bridge, which was the work of his old age. He was unquestionably a real mechanical genius. He made mistakes, no doubt—to the last he stuck to his belief in the feasibility of a Channel Ferry, which may, perhaps, lie in the future, but for which engineering science, as he knew it, was not ripe. The most entertaining part of Mr. Mackay's volume is the description of Sir John Fowler's home life as a Highland laird. At Braemore, like that Earl of Shrewsbury who laid out Alton Towers, "he made the desert smile," and did well by the State by planting nine millions of trees. He was a sturdy, downright type of Englishman whose work is his best monument.

Francis Parkman.

A Life of Francis Parkman, by Charles Haight Farnham (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. n.), is appropriately issued as part of the uniform edition of the great American historian's works. It is a life which ranks with that of Henry Fawcett as an example of what unconquerable resolution may accomplish in the face of difficulties before which all but the strongest men would throw up their hands. Parkman was a cripple. He was so nearly blind that for a long period he could only read for five minutes at a time. He had some mysterious brain trouble which his physicians expected to culminate in insanity. On several occasions his health was such that he could do no work at all for months, and even for years. But by sheer will-power he kept himself alive and sane and did his work, producing a series of volumes which rank high in historical literature. With it all he was one of the most reticent and reserved of men—so reserved as almost to seem unsympathetic. One reads the story with admiration and pity—almost with awe. Parkman might almost have lived to prove Zola's doctrine that work is the great consoler. His stoicism very nearly seems inhuman. And his stoicism was his life—that and the writing of history under difficulties. The biography is not interesting in the way in which some other biographies are. It throws no new light on great events and contains no revelations. It is just the story of a strong will in a weak body fulfilling its manifest destiny in despite of untoward circumstance.

A Master of Medicine.

The popular idea of Thomas Sydenham (3s. 6d.), once a young cornet in the Parliamentary Army and afterwards a physician great enough to be placed by Mr. Fisher Unwin among his "Masters of Medicine," is based upon an old story, ignored, no doubt with good reason, by his present biographer, Mr. J. F. Payne. In those bloodthirsty days, when physicians emulated the phlebotomy so popular on the field of Naseby and elsewhere, a patient called upon Dr. Sydenham, expecting nothing less drastic than a free bleeding, and was agreeably surprised to be recommended a roast chicken and a bottle of Madeira. Such was the originality of Thomas Sydenham! The story is true to his character if not to fact. It leaves the same impression upon the mind as Mr. Payne's critical estimate of the old physician—that of a strictly practical and independent-minded man. Applying to medicine the method of investigation that Bacon had introduced into philosophy, Sydenham was a powerful opponent of all abstract theorists. The value of Mr. Payne's criticism consists in the impartial manner in which he weighs the advantages and disadvantages which accrue from a character such as Sydenham's. The independence of mind which made his treatises on the cure of fevers, on gout, and hysterical diseases, of such value caused him to underrate the work of other men. He showed a curious indifference to the discoveries of Harvey and other anatomists, and was equally disdainful of physiologists. But the practical service that he rendered to mankind outweighed his limitations. The man who among other things was the first to recognize hysteria as a special form of disease, and invented a new and more beneficial treatment of small-pox, was in the best sense a master of medicine. Mr. Payne's book is valuable, too, from a purely biographical point of view. The careful sifting of evidence and the thorough investigation of State Papers, diaries, and other contemporary statements, has enabled him to add to our information as to the facts of Sydenham's life, and in one or two important particulars—e.g., in the account of Sydenham's military service and of his journey to Montpellier—to clear up matters about which doubt has arisen.

The Empress Augusta.

The author of AUGUSTA, EMPRESS OF GERMANY (Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.), Clara Tschudi, enjoys a popularity, we know; yet she seems to possess few of the qualifications which one would naturally look for in an historical writer, as, for instance, thoroughness and picturesqueness of style. She does not grasp the nettle of her subject, and she is far from accurate in matters of detail. Hardly does she give a name correctly; she writes complacently of Lady "Blomfield," wife of the English Ambassador at Berlin in 1851, and of Count Paul "Vatili." In her former volumes on "Marie Antoinette," the Empress "Eugénie," and "Napoleon's Mother," Miss Tschudi found matter which in itself was so interesting as to compensate in some measure for the faults of treatment. Here she can count on no such extraneous aid. She says herself: "Without exaggeration, we must confess that Augusta of Prussia was one of the least attractive Royal ladies of her time; in her youth she was hated for her studied condescension which was called pride, and in her advanced years she was wearisome with her almost theatrical graciousness." This unpromising biographical beginning is not belied when the reader is treated to such details as the following: "On the writing-table, before which the Empress spent the greater part of the day, were likenesses, in several styles, of the members of the family, and a carved clock of the Black Forest, a present from the Grand Duchess of Baden"; or "she began the day with a cup of strong tea or coffee, followed at 11 o'clock by strengthening meat soup; for dinner she liked nothing better than game and spinach, with a glass of old Malaga and water; then before going to bed, about 10 o'clock, she had cake, with a cup of tea, or an ice." She gave insufferably dull tea parties, when, "unable as she was to rise from her reclining chair, she yet exerted herself as hostess in her formal manner to keep up the conversation, but her phrases were so stereotyped that, in spite of a real esteem for the Empress, the guests could not respond to her efforts, and the ladies yawned behind their fans, while the gentlemen nodded in their chairs." When we reached a list of the exalted personages who sent wreaths for the poor lady's coffin, and were invited to notice the dedicatory words accompanying each wreath, we sympathized with the feelings of the Empress's guests. That the dullest life-story can be made interesting and vital in the telling of it is quite true, but then the telling of it demands qualities which Miss Tschudi does not, we are afraid, possess.

The Friend of Livingstone.

Few books are so generally depressing as the modern lengthy and unnecessary book of biography, and it cannot be said that Mr. W. E. Oswell in the life of his father, WILLIAM COTTON OSWELL (Heinemann, 2 vols., 25s.), has succeeded in raising the average of merit among such works. And yet that picturesque hunter, who was Livingstone's friend and companion, offered great opportunities for a rapid sketch of reasonable limits. The fact that to him was due the first crossing of the Kalahari and the discovery of the Zambesi hardly justifies 180,000 words which, on the most charitable view, only constitute the materials of a biography. The principle of incorporating letters is here abused to its utmost extent. This is all the more to be regretted as Oswell was a fine and noble character whose modest reluctance to exhibit himself has almost denied him the position that is undoubtedly his due as an explorer. But there is rarely any discrimination among biographers, who by their very nature are hero-worshippers, and this lack of discrimination usually defeats the very object aimed at. To see as much space devoted even to the noblest gentleman of them all among hunters as would suffice for Napoleon or Cromwell is discouraging to any one with the most rudimentary critical faculty. The two photographs of Oswell are worth all the rest of the book.

A Baptist Preacher.

In WILLIAM LANDELS, D.D. (Cassell, 6s.), Mr. Thomas R. Landels, his son, gives a modest yet adequate account of the work of this distinguished Baptist divine. The interest of such a book is, necessarily, to a great extent, denominational; but Dr. Landels had many admirers outside his own religious circle who were drawn to him by his transparent sincerity and earnestness, and by a liberality of mind which was not invariably to the taste of the more conservative persons in his own communion. He had unusual opportunities of impressing himself upon great populations, for he ministered successively in Birmingham, in London, and in Edinburgh; and although he was a hard hitter—sometimes, indeed, he was even a bitter antagonist—he conquered respect by his personal character and his evangelical fervour. His twenty years' friendship with Spurgeon was shattered by their lamentable controversy over things that did not matter; but the biographer deals with the matter delicately and discreetly. This is by no means a bad example of the minor ecclesiastical biography.

Mr. Tinsley's Recollections.

RANDOM RECOLLECTIONS OF AN OLD PUBLISHER (Simpkin, Marshall, 21s.)—the two portly volumes in which Mr. William Tinsley gossips in desultory fashion about the notabilities he has met—contain a smaller proportion of anecdote than any book of this kind we remember to have seen. The story of Edward Tinsley, the brother who died comparatively young after starting in London as a bookseller, and of his first great success as a publisher with "Lady Audley's Secret," was told by Mr. Sutherland Edwards in his recent book of recollections. Justice is hardly done to Edward Tinsley in the present book. Mr. Tinsley has led an interesting life and met interesting people, but it is surprising how little he finds to tell us about them. One or two little bits of interesting literary gossip turn up here and there, as the story of Hardy's "Under the Greenwood Tree," which Mr. Tinsley thinks did not sell because it lacked sentiment. But as a rule the volumes are dull, and the workmanship cannot be said to make amends.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Captain Mahan on the War.

Captain Mahan's STORY OF THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d. n.) is very different from Dr. Conan Doyle's work on the same subject. There is no word-painting, and there are no proposals for a reformation of the British Army, but there is a careful dissection of the tactical and strategic problems illustrated by the campaign, which is naturally interesting as coming from an expert who has no patriotic equation to mislead him. We have the satisfaction, if it be a satisfaction, of knowing that, in Captain Mahan's opinion, whatever the faults of our own leaders may have been, those of our opponents were far more glaring; they lacked "exclusiveness of purpose," with the result that their case was hopeless long before they had ceased to win victories that sounded well in bulletins. It will be observed, too, that Captain Mahan considers defensible much of our strategy that has been denounced in no measured terms by the experts of our own daily newspapers. He holds, for instance, not only that it was necessary, in the circumstances, to let a strong force be cooped up in Ladysmith, but that it was wiser anyhow to hold Ladysmith than to retire on the line of the Tugela, which could have been turned. His criticisms, too, of the Boer evasiveness and cunning, about which there has been some misplaced enthusiasm here, are by no means favourable.

> The nervousness of the Boers at any seeming threat to their line of retreat has been so obvious as to elicit frequent comment. As a predominant motive it is ruinous.

And, again, comparing Boer with British methods:—

> It is not too much to say that at the supreme moment, when man stands foot to foot and eye to eye, and when the issue depends upon superior aggressive momentum of temperament, the national trait, whether original or acquired, asserted itself; and the heroes who had scaled the heights barefoot, and clung with undying resolution to their rocky cover, exchanging shots almost muzzle to muzzle, did not muster the resolution which might or might not—the true soldier reeks not which at such an hour have carried them, more than decimated, but triumphant, across the belt of withering fire to victory. The reply of the British Colonel on the other side of the sixty yards of plateau that separated the opponents, "We will try," . . . expressed just the difference.

Captain Mahan believes, as Lord Kitchener is said to do, in frontal attacks, and by no means agrees with those critics who hold that they will be impossible in future wars. "Not only is it not demonstrated that modern weapons can stop the uphill advance of a resolute infantry on broken ground; it has been shown to probability that they are incapable of doing so." Captain Mahan's is, we think, the sanest of the war books that we have seen, though we think that, for the price, we might have been given small maps to illustrate the tactics as well as a large map to illustrate the strategy.

The Merchant Service.

It cannot be said that Mr. Frank T. Bullen in his new book, THE MEN OF THE MERCHANT SERVICE (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d.), has produced anything of very startling novelty. That was, perhaps, not his intention, and yet the life of all classes of seamen to one who knows them is a matter of such interest that we looked for something better than rather tame journalism. Mr. Bullen's method, too, is curiously inverted. He deals with the master, who is by commercial courtesy a captain, first of all, and gradually works downward through the mates to the seamen and apprentices. A more natural and rational method would assuredly have commenced at the other end, and to understand the subject without difficulty it is best to begin where Mr. Bullen leaves off and read the last chapter first. And indeed, though his conclusions are by no means novel these contain what is best in the book. It is undoubtedly a scandal and a national danger that so many foreigners should be shipped before the mast in English vessels. Whatever may be the cause the evil is undoubtedly on the increase. It is due we imagine not so much to the actual worsening of conditions of service at sea as to the better prospects on shore. For the provisioning of English ships, though by no means on a level with that of vessels hailing from the United States, is much better than it was. But it is not only that better jobs are to be obtained on land. The life on a steamship is undoubtedly less arduous than that on sailing vessels. There is more variety on it and more chance of fresh provisions. And from another point of view the Navy competes far more with the Merchant Service than it did when its average personnel was not above thirty thousand men. We by no means agree with Mr. Bullen in his view that the sailing ship is practically doomed. The great cargo carrying ship of three to five thousand tons is rapidly increasing and will tend to increase even more as freights fall, as they must with the increase of international competition.

It seems rather odd that Mr. Bullen has not once referred to "Two Years before the Mast," for although that book is to some extent out of date, it remains to this day the best general picture of life at sea outside some of the masterpieces of fiction. It is true that Dana was interested almost wholly in the life of the fo'csle, while Mr. Bullen's book purports to be a guide to the whole of the Merchant Service, yet even so we regret the omission. Dana, who was not a seaman by profession, has undoubtedly done more to make outsiders realize the Merchant Service than any one since his time.

The Marvels of Invention.

FLAME, ELECTRICITY, AND THE CAMERA, by G. Hes (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d. n.), is a popular exposition of what man has done in the way of mechanical invention. Apart from surgery, our material progress rests on the three instruments named in the title, and as Mr. Hes is an American he is well "up to date" with the most recent marvels of that progress. Very few American writers of popular books on learned subjects succeed in acquiring a really attractive style; and sometimes, as in the account of the Voltaic battery, the reader of this book will be better for some previous knowledge. But it is an able and complete presentment (with abundance of illustrations) of the progress—from its origin in each case—of man's manipulation of fire and the electric current, and of the art of photography, and of the material results achieved, with a good many acute reflections on the manner and significance of our rapid scientific progress.

ART.

Art of Japan.

The French National Library has acquired the collection of Japanese illustrated books and albums formed during the past twenty-five years by M. Theodore Duret. M. Duret has himself prepared a catalogue of these treasures that is an excellent model of methodical classification, learned exposition, delicate criticism, and dainty presentation—LIVRES ET ALBUMS DU JAPON (Ernest Leroux). M. Duret, who was one of the first Frenchmen to make known to his compatriots the artistic riches of Japan, tells us how he was led to begin collecting Japanese books and albums in 1871-72, the period when he accompanied M. Henri Cernuschi on a voyage to the East. While M. Cernuschi was gathering up the old, rare bronzes that he afterwards presented to the city of Paris, his companion turned his own attention to securing illustrated books and albums, within whose covers the product of artistic Japanese engraving was, for a long time, almost exclusively enclosed. A quarter of a century ago not all the Japanese dealers were the acute and enterprising tradesmen they have since become. If owing to the political and religious revolution then in progress the Buddhist priests were ready and willing to sacrifice their ancient bronzes, nearly all of great worth, the book sellers were not so profuse. M. Duret was obliged to display an untiring perseverance in overcoming an astonishing indifference to commercial transactions on the part of those vendors of artistic literature. With all his activity M. Duret was unable to make any great headway during his stay in Japan, and when he returned to Paris he brought home only a small nucleus of his future library. In 1880 he had the good fortune to make the acquaintance in London of Dr. William Anderson, who had spent several years at Yeddo as professor of surgery and who was well informed on Japanese art. Thanks to the aid given by Dr. Anderson and, later on, by Mr. (now Sir Ernest) Satow, the present British Ambassador in Peking, M. Duret succeeded in completing his collection. Englishmen may therefore take some pride in knowing that the assemblage of fine and rare specimens of Japanese illustrated books and albums in the French National Library is, in part at least and indirectly, the work of two of their countrymen.

M. Duret's collection consists of 581 volumes, all minutely described, beginning with some of the primitive books of the seventeenth century, and continuing with choice samples of the works of the principal artists of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Amateurs can here follow the chronological development of the art of wood engraving as applied to books and prints in Japan, where, we may add, owing to its rapid disappearance among us before the perfection of mechanical processes, it seems likely to find its last refuge. To each artist is given a discriminating notice, giving all the facts known about him, his methods of work, his special line of subjects and manner of execution; so that in running through this catalogue even the uninitiated reader is soon made conversant with the names and achievements of all the leading Japanese illustrators—Moronobou, Massanobou, Sonkenobou, Kyonaga, Shounsho, Outamaro, Hokousai, Korin, and the others whose names are now so familiar to connoisseurs—from the end of the sixteenth century down to the present day. He can also follow in detail the development of the Japanese people, their manners, their history, literature, amusements, and their picturesque costumes. There is also an admirable historical study of Japanese engraving, with its technical methods carefully explained. Without pretending to offer it as a work of grand luxe, the publisher has, nevertheless, given us a fine specimen of the particular knack our French neighbours have of issuing catalogues in a quiet, sober, and yet sumptuous style that spreads around them an artistic atmosphere, so to speak, the moment we put our paper-knife between the uncut pages. M. Duret's catalogue is a joy for the eye, the hand, and the mind.

The first serious attempt that has been made during the lifetime of the present generation to beautify London on an extensive scale has met with exceptional opposition. Whilst more than one journal can find nothing good or new in any of the designs sent in for the new street from Holborn to the Strand, at least one leading London morning paper takes the London County Council to task for throwing away £2,000 of the ratepayers' money. Neither criticism, it seems to us, is deserved. The designs by Mr. Leonard Stokes, Mr. Reginald Blomfield, and by Mr. Ernest George are better than most things we have recently seen on paper of the same ambitious kind, and if the L.C.C. had decided to "save" the £2,000, the present objectors would have been the first to cry out that expert advice had not been solicited. There are architects as good as the eight invited to send in suggestions for the proper treatment of the great Strand improvement, but those chosen—Messrs. Reginald Blomfield, Ernest George, Leonard Stokes, Flockhart, Hare, Mountford, Runtz, and Macartney—have at least the merit of diversity. Surely if London is to be beautified architecturally, architects should be asked to do it. London has suffered too much from the commercial builder.

Not the least interesting feature of the plans is the respect shown by the architects for the merits of the existing church of St. Mary-le-Strand and of Somerset House. Considering that St. Mary-le-Strand was designed by James Gibbs at a time—1714-17—when architecture in this country shared the fate of the finer arts, and that the steeple was an afterthought, it is remarkable that it should be so happy in its proportions, and should really demand preservation. Otherwise the church, which is a real obstruction to the traffic, would have been demolished years ago. If any corporate body less enlightened than the L.C.C. had come into power upon the demise of the Board of Works, it would probably have gone the way of Hanover Chapel.

Somerset House was never seriously threatened. The style adopted by Sir William Chambers, which is Italian, "refined to a degree scarcely excelled by Palladio himself," has affected nearly all the eight architects, and not without justice. Almost the only respectable business thoroughfare is that which was built in 1813, by Nash, and named after the Prince Regent—and the precedent has its value, even for architects. Neither Leicester Square nor Northumberland Avenue does us much credit, nor do Shaftesbury Avenue and Charing Cross Road. It should cause no surprise, then, that the L.C.C. should have some idea of uniformity. As to the "waste" of £2,000, there is more wisdom in paying for proper advice than there was in commissioning a John Bacon to make a bronze statue of George III. and a poor figure of Father Thames for a similar sum—as was done for the quadrangle of Somerset House. If the L.C.C., under the guidance of Mr. Norman Shaw, decides to pick the brains of eight eminent architects at the price of £250 a head, it surely is a very small tax indeed upon Londoners.

The Suffolk-street exhibition has called forth an unusual amount of abuse. The reason for this is hard to find. When Whistler remarked years ago that "the artists have left and the British remain," he epigrammatized almost all that the most copious criticism can express. The work at the R.S.B.A. is neither better nor worse than usual, and good work can be found even here, such as the landscapes of Giffard Lenfesty, E. Borough Johnson, A. J. Ryle, and A. E. Proctor, "My Friend Fynn" by Blundell Thompson, Tom Brown's groups of Dutch people, Mr. Sheard's study of Rusties, Mr. Graham Robertson's soft and luminous "Silver Mirror," a seapiece by Mr. Spenlove Spenlove, some sketches by Mr. Rooke, and a portrait by Mr. Bunny.

The storm raised by the Magazine of Art over the Paris Grand Prix seems to be exhausting itself, probably because, as a matter of fact, the announcement of the Prize in the case of Whistler was affixed to a portrait quite recently painted and never before exhibited. The only regret is that it has not drawn from Mr. Whistler one of his inimitable letters.

FICTION.

Mr. Anstey.

In THE BRASS BOTTLE (Smith, Elder, 6s.) Mr. Anstey returns to his earlier manner—the supernatural machinery of "Vice Versa" and "The Talking Horse." Probably no man living can extract so much fun out of the sharp antithesis of real and unreal as Mr. Anstey. He makes the most surprising actions wear an appearance of actuality; he treats the realm of magic and fairy-tale so naturally that he almost persuades us to believe in the astounding adventures of young Mr. Ventimore, just as in old days we could not withhold a certain pity from the prosperous City merchant transformed into a school boy. "The Brass Bottle" is not quite so convincing as the sad case of Mr. Bultitude, nor has not so sound a moral. But there are passages in it, such as the arrival of Fakrash's camels at the door of Ventimore's humble lodgings or the behaviour of the Professor's household when that gentleman has been turned into a mule, which we would defy any one to read without laughter. Mr. Anstey's plots may be extravagantly impossible, but his characters are more alive than those of most serious novelists. Even the Jinnee of this book—who is none other than the Genie of the Arabian Nights—is no indefinitely terrible monster; he is almost as real as Professor Futvoye, his wife, and daughter, or Horace Ventimore himself. The story is a little weak towards the close. It is necessarily difficult to keep up an interest in the supernatural through some 300 pages. But the effort is scarcely felt until we near the conclusion, which is no small tribute to Mr. Anstey's resource and humour.

Mr. Capes.

JOAN BROTHERHOOD, by Bernard Capes (Pearson, 6s.), is an uncommon novel. That it is uncommonly good we should hesitate to say, but it is not like other books. Mr. Capes' work seldom is. In "Joan" the people and their doings are not life as we know it, but they have a very distinct life of their own. The plot is weak, but the situations are strong. The author boldly makes careless use of the veriest stale convention when he chooses. And yet conventionality is the last thing the book suggests. Raw human passions are presented, side by side with light social froth and pretty tenderness. The tramp which ended in the baby's death is painfully real and touching; one cannot help feeling that a quiet tale of real life would be well worth reading if Mr. Capes wrote it. But there is no denying that through the sheer melodrama of some of his scenes a strong human note is heard. He has an uncanny imagination and a gift of words that suit it. Take the crypt under the old church, which plays so large a part in the story. Mr. Capes makes us feel its vaulty air and hear its echoes. "It is thick with graves," she said, and stamped where she stood. . . . . It answered, as if some old father disturbed in his rest were coughing underneath." Then take the little picture of the vaults when a door has been opened into the outer world. "The vault was luminous. The arches seemed to yawn, the old pillars to stretch and relax as if awakened; and in the midst the doorway framed a little landscape as bright and clean-cut as if it were thrown by a lantern on a sheet." In his metaphors, too, Mr. Capes is vivid and daring. But, as in all other books, they often strike a wrong note. They are material or ugly, and add nothing of beauty or suggestiveness to the picture. They are, in fact, mere displays of ingenuity. "Presently he saw a blackbird perch in the sunshine on the steps without. There it sat in the flame like a little black kettle, till the warmth took it, and its throat began to bubble and sing."

Mr. Leonard Merrick.

A good plot, clever characterization, and a style quick and virile are to be found in Mr. Leonard Merrick's new book, THE WORLDLINGS (Murray, 6s.). The plot alone will probably suffice the hardened devourer of novels. But since, if the pace be too hot, there is danger of missing the delicate flavour of not a few subtly conceived situations, we would recommend adequate leisure and a clear fire for their proper enjoyment. The conduct of Maurice Blake presents an interesting field for speculation. Most readers who follow his fortunes will, we think, feel quite sufficiently sympathetic. He is tempted into launching out upon a perilous and heartless imposture; and though he is rather pushed and tapped, as it were, upon his course by the smaller breezes of fact than hustled by its hurricanes, the consequences of his sin are none the less appalling before he is suffered to find a haven. There is irony, too, in the peculiar kind of trouble which he has to face. As Mr. Merrick puts it, his Nemesis arises from his love. The moment the woman he loves begins to quicken his higher self his punishment begins. And this girl, the instrument first of his punishment and afterwards of his salvation, is a vividly-drawn heroine. One of the many enjoyable things of the book is the contrast between big-heartedness of the worldling, whose sin is for ever staining and belying him, and the narrowness of the spotless young beauty whose confident inexperience is without fear and without reproach. But all narrowness is swept away by the rising tide of her love for her husband, and she suffers her passion to flow broad and strong about him to help him in what will probably be years of stress. The rough edges of the tale appealed to us; we found ourselves wondering exactly what happened afterwards—whether Sir Noel's generosity bore still more fruit, and whether he grew happier. The fate of Rose Fleming, we confess, interested us very little; she seems by far the least satisfactory character in the book. The restraint of the book is admirable, and it is all the pleasanter to feel the tingle of the blood as we do in the really fine love-passage of the last two or three pages. On a point of style, a few rather unusual words here and there, such as "absentment" for example, would be better for their—absence.

Miss Gertrude Dix.

Since the early days of the "Keynote Series" we have looked forward to the next book from the author of "The Girl from the Farm." At her leisure and after due consideration Miss Gertrude Dix issues her new book THE IMAGE BREAKERS (Heinemann, 6s.) and we are slightly disappointed. It is powerfully written—the work of a skilful hand—but the characters and the subjects do not arrest one. Socialism and incompatibility of temper belong by right to the nineties. Justin Ferrar, Leslie Avant, Charles Whiston, Rosalind Dangerfield, the very names of the serious reformers and humourless types suggest a period that is past and the rash unforgiving earnestness of youth. But while we express this personal point of view we must do full credit to Miss Dix's sincerity and capability. Her book is full of careful thought and sound analysis; the only fault being that she appears to have lost the secret of interesting us very greatly in her characters. Leslie Avant, with her rather feeble ideals and gushing conduct, does not attract; yet viewed as an essay in the direction of social reform and the probable failure of reformers there is much in Miss Dix's book which should delight and instruct.

Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne.

Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne's THE FILIBUSTERS (Hutchinson, 6s.) is not a bad example of the novel of adventure. He can write, and he had always the inventive faculty; he has travelled, and kept his eyes and his note-book open. And he is an expert borrower, which is much to his credit, for all men have not the talent of profiting by adroit assimilation. He would not now be writing quite in this manner were it not for the prose works of Mr. Kipling; but he has taken just enough of his model and no more. The escape by swimming through the cañon, again, recalls a certain incident in the career of one Dr. Nikola, but not unpleasantly, for Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne writes better than Mr. Guy Boothby. "The Filibusters" contains no character that will live; there is no man in this crew of cut-throats who will rival Captain Kettle in the affections of the errand-boy, and the lady is of the normal type. But he has a touch of style, and, sometimes, a happy phrase, while there is the customary plethora of incident, and everything is brought to a satisfactory finish with the help of some sanguinary work in the last chapter.

John Strange Winter.

Mrs. Arthur Stannard's (John Strange Winter's) latest scarlet and purple novel, A SELF-MADE COUNTESS (F. V. White and Co., 6s.), is a readable specimen of those light, brisk stories of hers which seem to have been thrown off by a kind of happy, careless instinct. They are tales to gossip with pleasantly over a cup of tea. This is one of the best we have read; so let us imagine it tea-time for the moment and briefly gossip. "If your poor dear father" (sighs Lady Darlington) "made pickles instead of natives, I should have been a rich woman by now." But though not rich she was very, very clever, and proved it by marrying off her daughters really beautifully. Of these, Miss Blanche, the youngest and our heroine, tripped into the lists of love uncommonly well equipped. One can do wonders with red-gold hair and a rose-leaf complexion; besides, the youngest Miss Darlington had excellent brains, in addition to an even larger share of naiveté than Mrs. Stannard would perhaps admit. At any rate in the tilt she vanquished, even as she loved, a wight of high degree, one known in "the service" as "The Grinder" and out of it as Lord Grindlebury. By his own account he was "a decent enough chap as men go," and though his taste in engagement rings is not ours, we haven't a word to say against him. The wedding occurs about the middle of the book, but it is just as "interesting" afterwards.—But tea-time is more than over—so passons.

The dramatis personæ of Mrs. Inchbold's new book, THE SILVER DOVE (Hutchinson, 6s.), interest us at once. The principal theme of the story, the alcoholic habits of an otherwise pleasant husband, is made possible to the general reader by the fact that out of a tangle of unhappy circumstances happiness is at last forced into being. Mrs. Inchbold is sincere and observant and fluent; she has not the great gift of humour, but she can write clearly and of people with human emotions and desires.

There is still much virtue in a title. What could be more pleasant than that of Mr. Charles Lee's latest book, CYNTHIA IN THE WEST (Methuen, 6s.)? Perhaps after the full promise of the title this little history of the loves, despairs, and happy issues of a party of artists in the Cornish village of Tregurda is not quite satisfying. But it is a pleasant book and the Cornish peasants are admirably drawn. The Blewetts, "our Nellie," who "can dialogue with the quality like a good one," and the rest are in the best spirit. "Cynthia in the West" will increase Mr. Lee's reputation as an observer of Cornish life.

We are glad to welcome Mr. William Westall back from his pseudo-historical books, such as "With the Red Eagle" and "A Red Bridal," to the life of to-day, of which he gives us an entertaining picture in AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT (Chatto, 6s.). The reader is at once interested in Lord Alwyn and his kinsman Godfrey; their fortunes are complicated after a fashion as dexterous as it is exciting, and they are recounted with irresistible élan.

THE WORLD'S SLOW STAIN (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.), by Mr. Harold Vallings, the author of many other novels, has something of the touch of the amateur about it. And it has the advantages of such a quality; there is freshness and humour, a breeziness which does not come to those who seek for originality and the absolutely right word. Mr. Vallings' story is one that will entertain; the manipulation of his plot is ingenious and convincing.

A CASE OF BLACKMAIL (Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.), by Mr. Chas. K. Moore, is in the old, lively manner. There are very wicked people like St. John (afterwards Grahame) and lots of nice people like Captain Colclough and the American widow. They all get most conveniently mixed up in various little plots and chances, and come through in a way one would like to see as often in life as one does in fiction. The book is written with spirit and is light and amusing. It is for the Pullman car rather than the library.

Mr. Edmund Mitchell does not hesitate to wander to and fro on the face of the earth in seeking the subject of his stories. His "Towards the Eternal Snows" and his "Lone Star Rush," an Australian story, now running as a serial, suggest wide limits. Any one who has not yet made his acquaintance can pleasantly do so in the PLOTTERS OF PARIS (Hutchinson, 6s.), an eminently readable tale of modern Paris. In it certain Englishmen are responsible for the running to earth of a good many French villains; and the three divisions into which the book falls have thus a continuity of interest. Mr. Mitchell inevitably suggests Gaboriau and Du Boisgobey by the fertility of his invention and the skill with which he keeps hold of the many threads of excitement. One of the incidental merits of the "Plotters of Paris" is its pitiless exposure of Parisian blackmailers. The author shows that he not only knows Paris, but, a good deal more than most, its seamy side.

Mr. George Manville Fenn is one of the "old hands" of fiction, who can always be trusted to be strong, steady, and skilful. In the commonplace happenings of the ordinary man's life he finds ample material for the construction of tales of mystery—tales which are no great strain on the reader's attention, and yet leave him interested, and ready to ask for more. This is the object which Mr. Fenn avowedly sets himself in the BAG OF DIAMONDS (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), and he worthily attains it. Between the covers of this volume are four sterling stories, which—welcome announcement!—"are sent forth with no pretensions to being analysations of life problems or psychical intricacies." They are too compact and full of life and movement to be dissected without cruelty, but each and all may be commended to those who find recreation in small doses of wholesome mental excitement.

Mr. John Bloundelle-Burton is an old hand at the costume story or what he does not hesitate to call romance. SERVANTS OF SIN (Methuen, 6s.), has the artistic faults of its many stirring qualities. Over this tale, which opens in the Paris of 1719, hangs the heavy, artificial air of an old-fashioned stage play. We soon meet with one of those highly-explanatory soliloquies which appear to assist the dramatist and yet have damaged many a good play. Most of the characters speak in dialogue which does not convince; most of the personages are well-worn types. But the plot's the thing, and that is well planned and dramatic in the sense in which that word was used in the old days before Ibsen. We note that Mr. Bloundelle-Burton has already dramatized his book. We should be inclined to predict a very successful run for "Servants of Sin" in the provinces. The name alone should be enough to bring it victories.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The value of the proposed Subject-Index to the British Museum, on which we published an article on Sept. 29, has been discussed at length in the columns of The Times. The interesting letters of "A Scholar," who started the correspondence, hardly convince us that some kind of Subject-Index is "superfluous, misleading, impossible, and a waste of the public money and of the time of public servants." The controversy seems to resolve itself into one between scholars thoroughly conversant with the British Museum and its Catalogue, who do not want a Subject-Index, and other persons with little time and perhaps little knowledge to whom a Subject-Index might be invaluable. The present Catalogue answers the purpose to some extent no doubt, if its cross-references are properly used. Dr. Garnett says that all books professedly discussing Darwin's "Origin of Species" may be found by the cross-references under Darwin. Will two books just published, for instance, be found there—"Problems of Evolution" and "Design in Nature's Story"? The Catalogue does more or less completely provide for the subject-indexing of some subjects—such as Biography. But, as Dr. Garnett says, there remains a large number of books which might be classified with great advantage to ordinary readers, and the Museum has an excellent groundwork on which to build.

The Sandars Readership in Bibliography at Cambridge has been fitly conferred upon a scholar of the stamp of Mr. F. G. Kenyon, Assistant Keeper of MSS. in the British Museum. The editor and translator of Aristotle's Constitution of Athens and the fragments of Bacchylides has also been joint editor of the poems of Robert Browning and the letters of Mrs. E. B. Browning, and has issued a work on "The Brownings for the Young."

During the past University year the Bodleian Library at Oxford received 64,752 books and MS.—almost all being books printed in England.

"Lectures in Libraries" is a subject to which some recent announcements have redirected attention. At Bootle lectures on various topics are given weekly, ranging in subjects from Bess to the beauties of the Alhambra. A reading list for the library lectures is published. Under the auspices of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching courses of lectures on English Novelists and Novels are now being given in London public libraries at the cost of Mr. Passmore Edwards. It is an excellent idea, and one which will possibly mitigate the idea that no good can come of novel reading in our libraries—a matter on which one of the working classes has something to say in our issue of to-day, under the heading "Personal Views."

The war—we learn from the annual reports from the public libraries of Cambridge, Cheltenham, Southampton, and Newark-on-Trent—has induced a large attendance in the reading rooms. During one fortnight in February no fewer than 57,808 persons visited them, the highest number in one day being 6,474. At Cambridge, in response to the representations of teachers, one thousand volumes are to be provided for the use of children. At Southampton Sunday opening is continued, despite the storm which the announcement raised some months ago. From the Croydon Public Library we have received the current number of the "Reader's Index," which gives a useful reading list on Chaucer.

William Morris, who was born at Elm-house, Walthamstow, "on the very border of Epping Forest," as he once wrote, is to have a permanent memorial in the shape of a bust to be placed in the Walthamstow Public Library. The Socialist artist poet would probably have valued this distinction more than a statue in Westminster Abbey.

The town of Govan possesses a beautiful park, the gift of Mrs. Elder, who has now added to her previous generosity the offer of £25,000 for a public library in the park on condition that the institution shall be open on Sundays. We trust that the terms of the gift will not stand in the way.

The Rev. S. Baring-Gould has presented to the public library at Plymouth his transcripts of a large number of the old parish registers in Devonshire. The fruits of his researches and labours should be of much value.

Correspondence.

THE LATE PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I do not see in any of the notices of the late Professor Max Müller an adequate recognition of his extreme kindness to young and perplexed students. When I came to England in 1869, after eight years' residence in Italy and Greek islands, during which I had made protracted and earnest study of the prehistoric monuments, I went to Max Müller, without any introduction, to get advice as to the studies which might help me to clear up the problems of ethnical import connected with those monuments. He not only gave me the soundest advice, but sent me books and wrote me several letters concerning the matter, and, until a short time before his death, we were in occasional correspondence, while his contributions to my library are considerable, not only of his own books, but of others on subjects of mutual interest. His large intellectual generosity is unequalled in my experience of literary men.

I am, &c., W. J. STILLMAN.

THE CANTERBURY TALES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—None can be more conscious than I am of the numerous necessary imperfections to be found in my edition of the "Canterbury Tales," and I shall be much obliged to any reader who can supply me with corrections.

But I do not in the least understand why I am, for no reason, told by Mr. C. H. Bromby that "the learned reader" is aware that prime necessarily means 6 o'clock in the morning, for the unlearned reader may very reasonably take quite a different view of the case.

The question is not what prime ought to mean, nor yet what it originally did mean, but what it meant to Chaucer. That, for him, it meant 9 o'clock is told us in the plainest language; or, rather, in a language plain to any astronomer. In my note to Group B, l. 4,045, I show, in the clearest way, that Chanticleer crowed when the sun was a little more than 41 degrees high on May 3, 1380-9—i.e., at 9 o'clock; and the reason why he crowed was because "it was pryme," l. 4,387. The same solution was given by Mr. A. E. Brae, a skilful astronomer, in his edition of Chaucer's Astrolabe, where he devotes the whole of pp. 90-101 to an Essay on the meaning of Chaucer's Prime. Indeed, the passage was explained by Thynne in 1598—300 years ago.

If Mr. Bromby will only do me the justice to read what I have written upon this extremely difficult word, not only in my notes to Chaucer, vol. v., pp. 115, 169, 171, 250, 286, 373 (cf. the eighteen references in the Glossary, vol. vi., p. 303), but also in my notes to Piers Plowman, C. ix., 119, and will look up all the passages in Chaucer, Langland, and Lydgate, I think he will find that I am perfectly justified in the humble position which I take up—viz., that the word is one of great difficulty, having been originally used to denote 6 o'clock, then to denote the period from 6 to 9, and finally (notably by Chaucer) to denote the end of that period—viz., 9 o'clock. And this is why Florio, in 1598, explained the Italian terza as "the hour which priests call prime."

I am almost weary of explaining this, especially as every one must surely know that our common word noon does not now signify the ninth hour, as "the learned reader" might naturally suppose.

As to the matter of the arrangement of the Tales, not much can usefully be said, because so many of them are wanting. But the new proposal helps us very little. No doubt the pilgrims could have done the distance in three days, only it so happened that they stopped for the night at Ospringe. At this rate, they went from Southwark to Ospringe, about 46 miles, in two days. If we compare this with the fact that, in 1749, the coach from Edinburgh to Glasgow, 44 miles, took two days for the journey (Chambers, Book of Days, ii., 228), we should have to suppose that the pilgrims rode faster than an eighteenth century coach, although "the speed at which the coaches travelled was a great marvel at that time."

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

WALTER W. SKEAT.

THE GERMAN SCHOOLBOY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—As I have myself for a number of years been a German schoolboy you will perhaps permit me to make a few remarks on the Personal View of Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, which appeared in your number of October 27th. Charming and brilliant as this essay is, I consider it calculated to spread a false conception of the ideals of German education, which at the present period, when we are inclined to welcome all Teutonic renovations in this respect, might be detrimental to the cause of true education. Mr. Jerome rightly points out that the school life of German boys does not begin until the age of six. He attributes this to the necessity of the young mind accumulating force to attack the "wiles of deceit and trickery" of the German Buchstabe. The error here lies in comparing matters of education in England and Germany, instead of in England and the rest of the civilized world. And surely if such an advanced age is necessary to face the slight external resemblance of a few letters, how much more must it be necessary to cope with the difficulties of English spelling, the very name of which recalls the black art.

In his contempt for Latin and Greek Mr. Jerome may imagine himself modern, but we live at a time, when that which was thought a few months ago appears to lie decades behind us. In representing the German youth as proceeding to University with "small Latin and less Greek" he is decidedly in error. The study of modern languages and natural science are the only two branches which may be pursued at German Universities without a Leaving Certificate from a "Humanistisches Gymnasium," the curriculum of which is founded almost exclusively on Latin and Greek. What in this country is frequently taken for an abandonment of classical education in Germany is, in truth, only a return to the true study of classics as the foundation and basis of all modern civilization.

It is only resting on classical yesterday that modern to-day can hope to bring forth a classical to-morrow. This, I believe, to be the firm conviction of the leading German educational bodies of to-day. I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

CH. H. CLARKE.

53, Brisbane-street, Greenock, N.B., Nov. 3.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Will you allow me to make a single comment on Mr. J. K. Jerome's article with this heading on points of accuracy? Two statements must have startled those of your readers who are familiar with the German school system—(1) that German boys leave the gymnasium at fourteen or fifteen years; and (2) that "Latin is not the fetish in German education that it is with us." For "fourteen or fifteen" Mr. Jerome should have written "seventeen or eighteen." The "Abiturienten-Examen" does not take place before the earlier of these years, and generally not until nineteen. As to the prominence which Latin takes in the German scheme of education, it is absolutely unique! To-day Germany is endeavouring almost vainly to emancipate her gymnasia from the classical traditions. It is to be desired that the emancipation, if it comes, will not be too complete. Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

THE VICTORIA COUNTY HISTORIES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am sure that all lovers of books will agree with the spirit of Mr. Rouse's letter, but surely his list of proposed recipients can be improved upon. May I suggest that, in place of "prisons, lunatic asylums, and workhouses," the free libraries of Great Britain be substituted? In consequence of their income being limited to a 1d. rate but few can afford to subscribe for more than their own county, and it would be a graceful and generous act to distribute any surplus copies of this truly national work to those libraries who have been public-spirited enough to subscribe for one or more counties.

Yours faithfully,

FRA. J. BURGOYNE.

A PROTEST.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I beg space to expose a mistake which is often made by the public and by reviewers—a mistake that can be set right only by aid of the Press? I refer to the erroneous association of my name with the numerous "statistical" articles that have been published in magazines and newspapers during the last two years. I desire strongly to protest against this association of my name with writings that have no similarity to my own work other than the mere surface likeness these articles are made to show. To speak plainly, the numerous articles to which I refer are too often silly as regards subject, confusing in treatment, based on artificial "facts," and lacking qualities that are valued by every sincere literary craftsman.

Some years ago the idea occurred to me that many subjects of social interest and of national importance could be satisfactorily handled by means of diagrams, &c. I realized my idea, bringing to the work professional actuarial knowledge of many years, and I was pleased to read the unanimous opinions of the Press which told me that I had succeeded in a task that was not too easy. I find that during 1899 and 1900—a period when these imitative articles have been specially numerous—I have published thirty or forty miscellaneous articles, and, of these, only five have been statistical diagrammatic articles. All these five articles were written upon important subjects, and they were well reviewed by the Press. But I read lately in an important London newspaper a statement made by a reviewer to the effect that I am constantly publishing statistical diagrammatic articles. This quite erroneous statement was obviously based upon the false impression conveyed by the innumerable statistical articles written by other persons, and the specific instances mentioned by the reviewer had no connexion with any of my writings. The foregoing example of the mistake I desire to correct is only one of several similar instances of my work being confused with that of other persons. All my published work is invariably signed by me, and I may justly ask to be released from this burden of erroneously ascribed authorship of articles not written by me, and of an erroneously ascribed sympathy with such articles—a burden that has been put upon me by persons who have been misled by the imitative articles in question. I regret to see the useful and worthy tool—diagrammatic illustration—mishandled to such poor purpose, but I do not ascribe the frequent mistakes connected with my name to any cause other than sheer error produced by the circumstances I have stated.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

JOHN HOLT SCHOOLING.

November 6. ("J. HOLT SCHOOLING.")

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Original writers are none too common, and it will be good news to those who have read any of Mr. Samuel Butler's works to hear that he contemplates a continuation of one of his most original books. "Erewhon Revisited" is to be the title. The original "Erewhon, or Over the Range," is one of the most remarkable pictures of an imaginary State published since the days of Swift. It was, so far as we know, Mr. Butler's first book, and it is still that by which he is best known to the public. He never had a large circle of readers. He was too daringly original and too catholic in his tastes. He dared to publish a work, "The Authoress of the Odyssey," in which he maintained that the tale of Ulysses was written by a woman, who incidentally introduced herself into the story under the name of Nausicaa. And as for his subjects, he has written on evolution and unconscious memory, on the "Alps and Sanctuaries" of Piedmont, he has translated Homer, and compiled a biography of his grandfather, the Dr. Samuel Butler, who was headmaster of Shrewsbury school, and afterwards Bishop of Lichfield.

Mr. Birrell will not, as has been stated, write a biography of the late Lord Chief Justice of England for the forthcoming supplement of the Encyclopedia Britannica. The "official" biography, as we have already said, is to be written by Mr. Barry O'Brien, who has circulated an appeal for help in the way of letters and other materials. The biography for the supplementary volume of the Dictionary of National Biography will be by Mr. Justice Mathew.

The tendency of authors to choose the same subjects each in ignorance of the other's intentions is one of the familiar mischances of the literary life. It was illustrated early in the reign by Thirlwall and Grote, as it has been in these last years by a sudden and unexpected rush on the history of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory. The latest victim of this kind of mischance is Mr. Clement Shorter, who has in hand a book on "Napoleon at St. Helena," just when Lord Rosebery's book, on the same theme, which we review elsewhere, is upon the town. Mr. Shorter will incorporate "Some Hitherto Unpublished Correspondence by Mr. Thomas Brooke, Secretary to the British Government on the Island During Napoleon's Sojourn"; and his book will in part be published serially in the Sphere. It may be hoped that it will find the appetite of the public only whetted by the perusal of its predecessor. The more Englishmen who stand in the sheet of penance on account of this depressing close to the Napoleonic epopee the better—that, no doubt, would be the sentiment of England's hostile Continental critics whose most brilliant spokesman was Heine. Britain, said Heine, ruled the sea, but not all the water in all the seas she ruled could wash from her hands the stain left by her treatment of the great Emperor at St. Helena. Lord Rosebery seems to share the opinion.

Lovers of the works of Captain Mayne Reid will sympathize with his widow in her loss of the annuity which has for many years been her chief income. She has still, we understand, an annuity of about £80 from Messrs. Sonnenschein, who published some of her husband's works, but her loss is a serious one, and we hope the appeal on her behalf may meet with a generous response. Donations can be sent to the account of Mrs. Elizabeth Reid, care of the Manager, London City and Midland Bank, Paddington Branch, Edgware-road, London, or to care of Mrs. Bramley-Moore, 26, Russell-square, London, W.C. Mrs. Mayne Reid published a brief memoir of her husband in 1890. She has since, with the help of Mr. Charles H. Coe, prepared a more detailed life which will be published by Messrs. Greening next week. Mrs. Mayne Reid has also written a novel, which Messrs. Sonnenschein published.

Mr. Henry R. Plomer, who contributes an interesting account in the "Library" of some of the private presses of the present century, has written "A Brief History of English Printing," which Messrs. Kegan Paul are adding to their "English Bookman's Library." There is, so far, no adequate general history of English printing available for the student, and the mass of material sadly needs sorting out and arranging.

A new African book is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock, "The Cape as I found it," by Miss Beatrice M. Hicks. The same publisher is issuing a new "Herbert Calendar" for 1901, containing extracts from the works of George Herbert, with his portrait and a view of Salisbury Cathedral. Mr. Elliot Stock is also publishing the fourteenth volume of Mr. Slater's "Book Prices Current," from which it appears that notwithstanding the depression which has occurred through the war, the average for the year has been high. Good prices were paid for the early printed books and eighteenth century classics, which were a notable feature of the year's sales.

According to "Claudius Clear," in the British Weekly, the volume of poetry by the Primate of All Ireland," entitled "The Finding of the Book," just published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, is the first volume of a series to comprise a selection from the Writings of Archbishop Alexander. As "Claudius Clear" says, for an adequate understanding of the Primate's gifts it is necessary at present to turn over many a volume of the Dublin University Magazine, of the Christian Remembrancer, of the Church Quarterly Review, and many other periodicals. There must be many to whom such a selected edition of his work will be welcome.

The trustees of the British Museum have recently issued, and have presented to some of the provincial public libraries, "Illustrations of the Botany of Captain Cook's Voyage Round the World in H.M.S. Endeavour in 1768-71." The engravings contained in this work of plants collected during the voyages have never before been published.

Messrs. Williams and Norgate's Book Circulars from October, 1899, to June, 1900, are now collected in a single volume, and make a useful guide to books of learning published on the Continent, a very detailed account being given of all the more important publications.

The Cambridge University Press announces a Grammar of the Greek of the Old Testament, by Mr. H. St. J. Thackeray, of King's College, and an edition by Mr. J. H. A. Hart, of St. John's, of the Greek text of Ecclesiastics after the Vatican M.S. Gr. 346 (Holmes and Parsons 248).

The Donellan Lectures delivered before the University of Dublin (1899-1900) by the Rev. M. Kaufmann, M.A., are to be published in book form by Messrs. Kegan Paul under the title of "Social Development under Christian Influence."

Messrs. Hutchinson and Co. announce the "Secret Memoirs of William II. and Francis Joseph," written under the nom de plume of Madame la Marquise de Fontenoy. It is understood to be the work of a continental lady of rank, married to a well-known Englishman.

The proprietors of Knowledge are issuing an annual entitled "'Knowledge' Diary and Scientific Handbook, 1901."

Books to look out for at once.

By VALENTIN MARIN.

BLACK

WHITE

White [illegible] three moves.

PROBLEM No. 88, by G. Reichelm. White (3 pieces)—K at Q 5; Kt at Q 6; pawn at Q R 3. Black (5 pieces)—K at Q R 3; pawns at Q R 2, Q Kt 3, Q B 4, Q R 5. White to play and win.

NOTES.—Mr. C. A. L. Bull, now of Natal, a noted problemist, remarks that in the forties the chess problem as a general rule savoured more of an end-game from actual play than anything else, and the desired end was usually brought about by a single forced line of play embodying the sacrifice of one or two important pieces, no attention being paid to the economy of force or variety. A quiet key move was exceptional, and therefore, as a matter of course, variety in the play was exceptional. A two-move problem was then rarely met with. It was practically an impossibility under the conditions then existing. Then came a transition period, when the better order of things began to be observed. Conrad Bayer was a pioneer of the modern style of quiet analytical play in these problems. The gradual development of the problem art from the elaborated end-game to a distinct branch of chess is very interesting.

Blackburne and Pillsbury, the latter very recently, have been explaining how blindfold chess is done. A few years ago a Frenchman collected and published a variety of statements of a like character. We imagine the mystery remains as great as ever. Of course memory comes largely into play, and the faculty of picturing the boards, each one individually, must be one of the necessary accomplishments.

Pillsbury beat all records last year with twenty blindfold games against Philadelphia, all the best players of the club taking part and some consulting. This far surpasses everything before heard of, though Zukertort is said to have tried sixteen, taking two days for it. Pillsbury will hardly repeat his best performance in that line; but he started on his recent tour in the States by playing sixteen such games at the celebrated Brooklyn Chess Club. In such performances the young American is invariably successful, and he never takes long.

Blackburne is touring North. It is to be feared his health is indifferent and professionalism in England is nowhere. Lasker and Maroczy give notice of special performances in London. They have been on tour on the Continent and intend going to New York in December, returning to Monte Carlo in February (?) for a proposed tournament of chess and salts, whatever the latter may be. These projects are always open to variation according to circumstances.

There is great activity among the amateurs all over the country, the clubs being in full going order. The City of London C.C. takes the lead with several tournaments among first-class men. In this club, as in all others, the weaker men receive odds. Such handicap tournaments last all the winter. The Hydro, Llandudno, announce an amateurs' meeting in January.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

FURTHER LIST OF AUTUMN PUBLICATIONS.

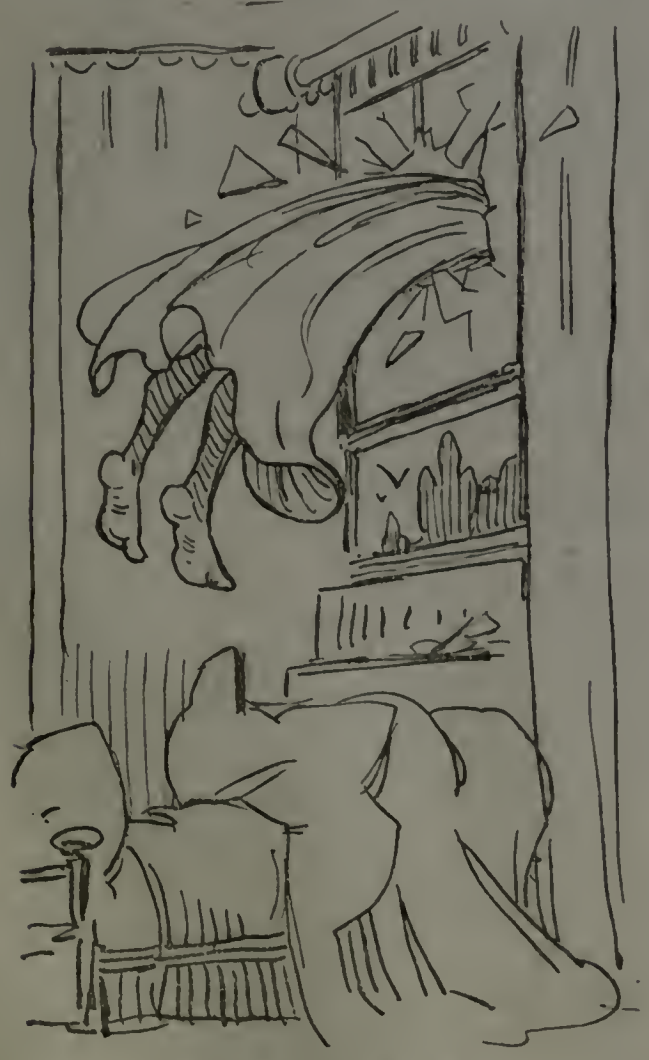
CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

"THE RAINBOW IN THE BUBBLE."

The cautionary stories of Mrs. Turner and the grey moralities of the Misses Taylor and their contemporaries are certainly being revenged. The early crop of children's books this year is delightfully colourful and entertaining. It would seem that the authors and publishers of this class of book are of the same opinion as a poet of yesterday, who sang:—

If Life an empty bubble be
How sad for those who cannot see
The rainbow in the bubble!

and are determined that there shall be no lack of rainbow tints and general gaiety in the ephemeral Toy Books they offer as their contribution to the bubble reputation of the cosmos.



Impetuously I sprang from bed,
Long before lunch was up,
That I might drain the dizzy dew
From day's first golden cup.

[From "Greybeards at Play" (Brimley Johnson).]

The most amusing author we have met in the present collection is Mr. Gilbert Chesterton, who describes his work, GREYBEARDS AT PLAY (Brimley Johnson, 2s. 6d. n.), as literature and art for old gentlemen. But we have no doubt that the acute juvenile will equally appreciate the humour of his rhymes and sketches. In a few dedicatory verses he points out to his elderly contemporaries, in somewhat the same spirit as that which Mr. Locker-Lampson showed in the lines already quoted, that joy might still be with them:

Old happiness is grey as we,
And we may still outstrip her;
If we be slippered pantaloons,
Oh let us hunt the slipper!

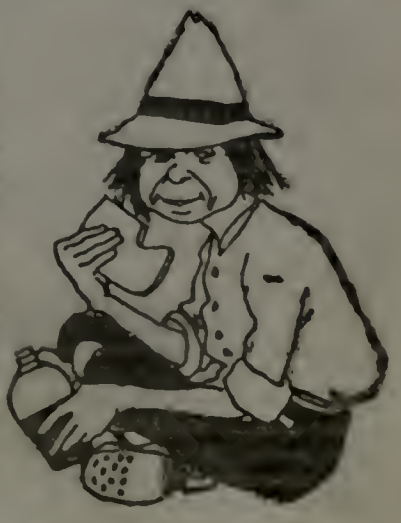
The old world glows with colours clear;
And if, as saith the saint,
The world is but a painted show,
Oh let us lick the paint!

[From "The Bountiful Lady" (Grant Richards).]

His drawings are equally vivacious. The one we give illustrates the opening lines "on the disastrous spread of aestheticism in all classes." We could with pleasure continue to quote from Mr. Chesterton—the "Envoy" especially tempts us—but instead we will advise the reader to obtain a copy of "Greybeards at Play" before it runs out of print.

THE BOUNTIFUL LADY (Grant Richards, 1s. 6d.) is number five of those delightful Dumpy books for children which Mr. E. V. Lucas edits so discreetly. This clever story, which tells "how Mary was changed from a very miserable little girl to a very happy one," is by Mr. "Thomas Cobb," a pseudonym almost too thin to suggest that the writer is a lady, as, indeed, does this admirable realistic fairy tale itself. Mrs. Earnshaw makes the volume more pleasant by reason of the end papers she supplies, one of which we reproduce, and in all "The Bountiful Lady" may be considered to follow creditably the first of the series, "The Flamp"; for a Dumpy book we know of no higher praise.

TEN LITTLE BOER BOYS (Dean, 3s. 6d.), with pictures by Mr. A. S. Forrest and verses by "Norman," is produced as a companion book to "Little Englanders" and "The Baby Patriots A. B. C." by Mrs. Ernest Ames. The drawings, of which we reproduce one, are funny enough, but even for so light a production we do not feel that the book is always conceived in perfect taste. Our enemies have fought bravely and died for their country, and a jingle about lyddite blowing them up and a picture of a mother weeping at a grave is neither amusing nor instructive. But Mr.



"ONE LITTLE BOER COMMANDANT."

[From Ten Little Boer Boys (Dean).]

Forrest has another book THE DIVERTING HISTORY OF JOHN GILPIN (Dean, 6d., or linen, 1s.), in which this clever draughtsman is seen at great advantage. The exciting adventure gains a new interest on account of the vigour of the pictures.

"TRY AND BEAR IT.

[From "Droll Doings" (Blackie).]

This year Mrs. Ames, whose work we have just mentioned, sends a very amusing book on how the Boers were beaten by THE TREMENDOUS TWINS (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.). The way these young gentlemen treat the good and the bad generals, and put everything in excellent order, is told with no small wit and skill by Mr. Ames. There is no offence in't, and both the pictures and verses are sure of wide appreciation. "The Tremendous Twins" are topical without being tedious.

Mrs. Farmiloe's own volume this year is entitled PICCALILLI (Grant Richards, 6s.). She gives us once more a long series of her delightfully vivacious drawings in colour of the child-life of all nations. Last year we criticized her style and method at some length, and therefore we will merely content ourselves with saying that no nursery must this winter be without "Piccalilli." Mrs. Farmiloe's legends attached to each picture are pleasant, but hardly good enough for the drawings; she should go into partnership with some dexterous writer of children's verse. We regret that the pictures are too large for our space to do justice to them. A TRIP TO TOYLAND (Grant Richards, 6s.) is a book of the same size and class with an excellent story told in words and cleverly drawn and coloured pictures by Mr. Henry Mayer. The "Babe" of the story has remarkable adventures, of which every child will love to hear; the pictures, such as "The Babe dresses himself," are full of character. Those who purchase "Piccalilli" should also possess "A Trip to Toyland."

DROLL DOINGS (Blackie, 6s.) is a merry book in a rougher method, possibly intended for rather younger children. Mr. Harry B. Neilson's comic animals are irresistibly funny, and the verses, by one who does not mind calling himself "The Cockially Bird," are full of verve and often contain a queer moral, as in the story of "Bad Little Sue." The drawing opposite is the tailpiece to an amusing story called "Try and bear it," and is a fair example of Mr. Neilson's method.

[From "True Annals of Fairy-land" (Dent).]

In another and not very fortunate manner is THE HOME OF SANTA CLAUS (Unwin, 6s.), which tells of a little boy's visit to Father Christmas, and of the strange sights he beheld in the town of toys. The story is well enough, but the illustrations are from photographs made up by Mr. Arthur Ullyett to suit the tale. This is a form of illustration which, we fear, is growing in popularity both in America and here. The result of these made-up photographs is vulgar, ugly, and many other things that are inartistic.

At the other artistic pole is a volume called by Mr. William Canton, the editor, THE TRUE ANNALS OF FAIRY-LAND (Dent, 6s.). It contains "The Reign of King Herla," and stories from Kingsley and other excellent writers. It is an admirable collection and one that all boys and most girls will greatly appreciate. Mr. Charles Robinson supplies hundreds of wonderful and fantastic illustrations, but some of these show an inclination on his part to put too much work into a given space, with the result that some pictures are bewildering and over-elaborated; others, however, are in Mr. Robinson's well-known delicate and telling manner. Where they are complicated with colour—except as regards the frontispiece, which is very fine—they are spoilt by careless printing. As a whole Mr. Canton's book is far above the average and should be widely enjoyed; it contains the iridescent fairy lights of the rainbow, but they illuminate a somewhat more substantial foundation than is generally found in this class of book.

Mr. Gellett Burgess is markedly American and quaintly original. In THE LIVELY CITY O' LIGG and GOOPS (Methuen, 6s. each), he gives us amusing works, respectively, in prose and verse. "The Lively City" contains a preface "for Skeptic Parents," headed "the cidivation of inanimate things," from which we learn the true inwardness of his amusing histories of such animate things as "The very grand piano" and "The hilarious Hansom." Mr. Burgess' drawings are exquisitely ingenious, the colouring, said to be by another hand, is of merit. The "Goop" is a peculiar person; our illustration gives the remarkable anatomical conformation of this family and is a good example of Mr. Burgess' lively method. If any should wish to be a "Goop" this is how the author teaches us to become one.

"BRAVERY"—THE RUNAWAY HORSE.

[From "Goops" (Methuen).]

Tease to linger longer when your mother bids you go;
Tease to have a penny when your father answers "No!"
Tease to have a story when your uncle doesn't please;
That's the way to be a Goop—tease, tease, tease!

Hint about the carriage when there's only room for three;
Hint about the toys you like and every doll you see;
Hint about the candy, say you're fond of peppermint;
That's the way to be a Goop—hint, hint, hint!

From this little example it will be seen that the author's verse is as flowing and amusing as is the artist's line.

"THE HOLLOW TREE INN": THE ARRIVAL OF THE GUESTS.

[From "In the Deep Woods" (Heinemann).]

In the Deep Woods (Heinemann, 3s. 6d.) is one of those clever and charming American books of, as it were, humanized animal life which we are not often permitted to see. Mr. Albert Bigelow Paine will be remembered as the author of "The Hollow Tree" and other books of the same entertaining character. The present volume is illustrated with great freedom and ability by Mr. J. M. Condé, who, apart from his accomplishment as an artist generally, has a particular talent for giving human character to the wonderful Mr. Possums and Mr. Coons of Mr. Paine's laughable tales. "In the Deep Woods" is, in its way, a liberal education in American humour.

Bubbles His Book (Unwin, 3s. 6d.), written by R. F. Irvine and illustrated by D. H. Souter, is a totally different kind of book. Yet it is not without its rainbow qualities. This story of adventure into Fairyland is such as all children would love; and among many well-illustrated books this one is especially charming. Mr. Souter, whose name is new to us, is an artist of no small accomplishment. His strong, graceful, and humorous work lends point to every page of the admirable "Story that Daddy told the night the Flying Squirrel first appeared in the old Gum Tree." It will be seen from this phrase that "Bubbles" is not of English origin, but it is none the less just the book for our little boys and girls.

The joint authors of "The Book of Shops," Miss F. T. Bedford and Mr. E. V. Lucas, try their hands again with Four and Twenty Toilers (Grant Richards, 6s.). Although the artist is skilful to some extent, we do not like her drawing of the human figure; it might easily suggest to an impressionable child a number of serious anatomical errors. "The Farmer," for instance, would be very unwise to dismount from his horse; there would be parts of him missing. Mr. Lucas' verses are clever and fluent. They have not the note of humorous inspiration that we have sometimes marked in his work, but "The Toilers" is something of a new idea and is therefore welcome.

Among the books of more familiar type and intended for very small children come such collections as Leading Strings (Wells, Gardner, 1s. 6d.); Animal Land for Little People (Cassell, 1s. 6d.), with many excellent photographs, no doubt from the Zoological Gardens; Our Darling's First Book (Blackie, 1s.), founded upon Miss Jennett Humphrey's "Laugh and Learn," and filled with amusing illustrations, some of which we have met in other books of this class; Peter Piper's Peepshow (Cassell, 1s. 6d.), with an excellent story called "The Extraordinary

THE PRINCESS ON THE GLASS MOUNTAIN.

[From "True Annals of Fairy-land" [illegible].]

Adventures of Dicker and Me," for which Mr. Lewis Baumer has made a lavish amount of clever and laughable drawings; and RIGMAROLES AND NURSERY RHYMES (Bousfield, 5s.), by Mr. Alfred H. Miles. These five books are all in the conventional style, which, although without distinction, fills a large demand, and has often before been tried by the publishers and found wanted.

The educational picture book does not appear in great force this year, but some attempt is made by Miss S. Rosamond Praeger in the volume she draws and writes called THE CHILD'S PICTURE GRAMMAR (Allen, 3s. 6d.). We trust that the amusing pictures may do something towards making the reply to Dr. Brown's question :

Don't you love the things I teach ?
Don't you love the Parts of Speech ?

other than Bobby's negative, and, we fear, broadly typical answer.

Mr. J. A. Shepherd has made some excellent drawings for our old friend A FROG HE WOULD A-WOOING GO (Grant Richards, 1s.). The one we reproduce will give an idea of his freedom and attractive humour ; this is a book all children will enjoy. The same artist also illustrates Mr. Stephen Townesend's A THOROUGH-BRED MONGREL (Unwin, 3s. 6d.), which is described as a tale of a dog, told by a dog, to all lovers of dogs, and, although not primarily intended for children, will, we think, interest as many of them as are among the friends of dogs.

With the last book on our list we come back to old friends, and they are, perhaps, the best after all. FIDDLESTICKS (Pearson, 3s. 6d.), by Miss Hilda Cowham, is merely a collection of the old, old nursery rhymes such as "Oranges and Lemons," and "Little Dame Trot," but the artist attacks the worn subjects with so much freshness and courage that the result is a clever, amusing, and most artistic book. The small picture we give has something to do with the story in which "one little pig stayed at home" ; the larger coloured pictures, however, show the talent of Miss Cowham to greater advantage.

THIS LITTLE PIG STAYED AT HOME.
[From "Fiddlesticks" (Pearson).]

ANTONY ROWLEY.
[From "A Frog he would a-wooing go" (Grant Richards).]

We have already received some of the best known of the annuals. Messrs. Cassell's Magazine of Art (21s. n.) gives its usual full and admirably illustrated conspectus of all subjects in English and foreign art which have attracted attention during the year. It also contains contributions from such well-known writers as Mr. Baring-Gould or Mr. Le Gallienne. Cassell's Saturday Journal (7s. 6d.), bound into an annual volume, is a mine of information agreeably put together ; Chums (8s.), from the same firm, has lost none of its capacity for making friends of its readers, and, like Young England (Sunday School Union, 5s.), has taken full advantage of the war to stir the imagination of its boy readers. Even the more peaceful pages of the Sunday at Home (Religious Tract Society, 7s. 6d.) have drawn some inspiration from the same field, and from China. The coloured illustrations—notably the reproduction of Gainsborough's Orpin—are a good feature of the volume. Two other magazines also devoted to the Sabbath—Sunday Reading for the Young (Wells Gardner, Darton, 3s.) and the Dawn of Day (S.P.C.K.) have kept up their reputation for stories of precept and example and miscellaneous information easily imparted. The Leisure Hour (Religious Tract Society, 7s. 6d.) started propitiously with a serial story by Sir Walter Besant, "The Alabaster Box," while to improve the hour much has been done by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Birrell, and Mr. Bryce. The Girl's Realm (Bousfield, 8s.) is attractively got up and as well printed as ever, and we feel sure that its fair readers have had nothing to complain of in their old favourites, L. T. Meade, John Strange Winter, Mrs. C. N. Williamson, and the rest.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS'

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

THE TROUBADOURS AT HOME.

Their Lives and Personalities, their Songs, and their World. By Professor JUSTIN H. SMITH, Professor of Modern History in Dartmouth College. 178 Illustrations. 2 vols., 8vo., cloth, 25s. net.

The troubadours were not mere vagabond minstrels, but the élite minds of a remarkable age—soldiers, diplomats, and princes, as well as poets and musicians.

They were the teachers of Dante and Petrarch, the founders of our literature, music, and general culture; and without knowing them we cannot understand modern life—cannot even understand ourselves.

This work not only gives all the significant facts about them in the light of recent scientific scholarship, but reconstructs their world and places them in it as real personalities, living, loving, and fighting. It is poetry, romance, and travel based on history and literary criticism.

There are 178 fine engravings, mostly from unpublished photographs, specimens of troubadour music, full critical notes, maps, indexes, &c.

REVIEWS:—

"It fills a real gap, not only for the Anglo-Saxon public, but even for us."—ANNALES DU MIDI, Paris.

"Truly a fascinating book."—ACADEMY.

"We feel quite satisfied with the banquet of romance and balladry on which the author has invited us to feast."—MORNING POST.

[Translation.] "The list of sources is ample, and it is evident that these sources have been used with care. The translations in verse or prose prove a real knowledge of the Provençal language."—ROMANIA, Paris.

"The book is a good example of that American scholarship in the Romance languages of which the Johns Hopkins University at Philadelphia has already provided several notable examples."—ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"Mr. Smith's book is well worth reading, if only as a historical guide to one of the most interesting regions in Europe—for he dwells lovingly on the charms of valleys and mountains, cities, and villages—and for the literature it treats may at least open the way to a rediscovery of much beauty."—The SPECTATOR.

"He has interwoven with these matters much traditional lore, together with biographical details of famous Troubadours, both professional and amateur, the latter including many high and mighty personages who, in the far-off days to which this study transports us, sought the rhyming infection of their time."—The DAILY NEWS.

"There is nothing about the Troubadours which he does not know."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"We can heartily recommend his work as being generally trustworthy and informing. Its utility is greatly increased by an admirable bibliography and index."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"Professor Justin Smith has done his work thoroughly, and he deserves the thanks of all who care about his old-world subject."—YORKSHIRE POST.

"His illustrations, mainly from his own photographs, add charm to his book, which must be ranked among the most attractive works that American scholarship has devoted to the literature of Europe."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"A monumental work, that has evidently been to him a labour of love, involving infinite industry and pains."—LITERATURE.

"Professor Smith has attained no small measure of success."—BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

"Mr. Smith is an enthusiastic admirer of the poetry of the Troubadours. Critical enough to be dissatisfied with second-hand information, he has sufficient knowledge of old Provençal to read for himself the songs—the tensons and sirventes of Southern France in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries."—ATHENÆUM.

The booksellers of Canada look forward to a prosperous season. A larger number of English books are finding their way into Canada, and both English and American publishers are beginning to recognize the possibilities of the country. Fuller than usual are the lists of the chief Canadian houses—the Morang Company, the Fleming H. Revell Company, Messrs. W. J. Gage, the Copp Clark Company, Mr. William Briggs, Publishers' Syndicate, and Poole Publishing Company. All the publishers make Toronto their centre. Most of the chief English works of fiction now appearing will be published there. We note that in eight chief centres in Canada, such as Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, the books that have been popular during the past few weeks number twenty-four, of which eleven are English, ten American, and three Canadian. In Winnipeg "David Harum" seems to have caught the townsfolk. There has just been issued a small book called "Canadians in Khaki, South Africa, 1899-1900," with a most patriotic cover of a Canadian officer leading his men up a kopje. It contains the official correspondence, nominal roll, casualties, &c. It gives an interesting account of the Canadian losses to date.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

It is seldom that an event so keenly impresses upon the mind a sense of severance from the past as does the announcement of the death of Mr. Thomas Arnold. The last survivor of the sons of Dr. Arnold, he was at school the friend of Clough and Tom Hughes; as an undergraduate he saw the rise of the Oxford Movement, and later, when he joined the Church of Rome, fell under the influence of Newman. In his "Recollections of a Wandering Life" he reveals a character gentle, chivalrous, absorbed in spiritual things, and neglectful of personal advantage to a degree rare among modern scholars, and tells the story of his search for a freer, purer life in New Zealand and Tasmania, where he became (like his brother Matthew in England) an inspector of schools. As a scholar he will be remembered by his well-known "Manual of English Literature," his editions of Wyclif, his translation of Beowulf, and his work in connexion with the Rolls Series. For some twenty years before his death he had been a Fellow of the Royal University of Ireland, and chiefly resided in Dublin, where he was engaged in educational and literary work. He was the father of Mrs. Humphry Ward.

* * * *

Dr. Conan Doyle is just now very busy—at the hard work of being entertained. He is a good speaker, as those who heard him at the Authors' Club on Monday and at the "Vagabonds" on Thursday know. The former probably went away with a higher opinion of the British soldier—officer and private alike—than they had before. Dr. Doyle was with Generals Ian Hamilton and Pole-Carew, and not the least interesting part of his speech was that in which he described the manner of these two commanders in an engagement—the one always courteous and self-possessed, the other regarding a possible action with the joyous anticipation of a schoolboy on the football field. Indeed, the spirit of all appears to have been admirable. Malingering would have been easy enough, but Dr. Doyle met with but one instance, which was speedily cured by a threatened operation—on which occasion a grave and reverend correspondent was hastily subpœna'd as consulting surgeon.

* * * *

Mr. Herbert Spencer's appeal for mercy from his American admirers may convince obscure persons who hunger for fame how uneasy lies the head that wears even an intellectual crown. But for the honour and glory of the thing it is decidedly more comfortable not to be a Master with Disciples, as Ibsen and Browning and others have proved in their time. Mr. Spencer has evidently been too patient and polite with the people who pester persons of distinction. Such self-styled admirers are generally thinking wholly of themselves and of their own advertisement. Some of them, we learn, calmly ask for a fresh exposition, for their private benefit, of the Synthetic Philosophy which it has already taken Mr. Spencer his whole life and strength to expound. Victor Cousin at least had a certain status as an apostle of German philosophy to the French Gentile; yet when he similarly asked Hegel for a succinct account of his philosophy, Hegel drily replied that these things were not to be said succinctly even in French.

Schools of journalism have never met with much success, though one does not quite see why some sound preparation for the journalistic struggle should not be gained from the "mimic warfare" of a school. The first and certainly the most successful was that founded in 1887 by Mr. David Anderson, whose death has just been recorded. He had a good many pupils who have had some success both in literature and on the Press. Among them are included Mr. Robert Hichens, Mr. Herbert Vivian, Mr. Francis Gribble, the Hon. Stuart Erskine, Mr. Stewart Meade, Mr. Cranstoun Metcalfe, Mr. A. H. Girdlestone, and Mr. H. Greville Montgomery. Mr. Traill used to say that of a crowd of journalists who came to him, wanting to write notes, when he assumed the editorship of the Observer, those who came from Mr. Anderson best understood "the limitations of the art."

* * * *

Mr. David Anderson had himself a most varied career. He was, with Mr. John Hollingshead and Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, one of the few survivors of the brilliant group that worked for Charles Dickens on Household Words. At different periods of his career he concocted one-line jokes for comic papers, acted as dramatic critic for the defunct Bell's Life, edited a defunct satirical organ, the Hornet, and founded, in conjunction with Mr. Robert Hichens, a trade journal for domestic servants. He was also for many years one of the best all-round men on the staff of the Daily Telegraph.

Quite unlike the ordinary company meeting was the first gathering of the shareholders in the National Drama Company (Limited), recently held. The place of meeting was a cosy room in the Temple, and the proceedings were refreshingly informal. It seems that the public only took up £6,000 out of the £10,000 Preference Shares offered for subscription. Therefore Mr. Benson agreed to take less than had been settled as the purchase price of his undertaking. As every one knows, the Benson Company come to the Comedy Theatre just before Christmas for a four months' season. The cast will be materially strengthened. In particular, the talent available for women's rôles will be increased. Every one who takes pleasure in Shakespeare on the stage should subscribe for a series of performances. The eight plays are Hamlet, The Merchant of Venice, Richard II., The Taming of the Shrew, The Merry Wives of Windsor, As You Like It, Henry the Fourth (Part II.), and Coriolanus. The last two are interesting novelties. Neither has been seen in London for a very long time.

The revival of Patience shows that there is more life in the wit of Mr. Gilbert than many people imagined. It is mainly the wit and the music that win applause to-day. The humour of the situations has evaporated. It has a far-away flavour of curious unreality. But just as the wit of Congreve and Sheridan still makes us smile at their castigation of the follies of their day, so does Mr. Gilbert's wit embalm the imbecilities of the sham-æsthetic movement. In short, he raises them from the particular to the general, and co-relates them to the kindred silliness and affectation of all ages. The one thing to be regretted is that Mr. Gilbert should have allowed any of the allusions to be brought up to date. The "threepenny-'bus yonng man" was in the picture. He brought back 1880 and fitted in with the rest. The "twopenny-tube young man" is out of the pictnre altogether. "The genius of Roberts in chasing a cannibal" has, we are glad to see, been replaced by the original "genius of Garnet." Lord Roberts has never commanded against cannibals; Lord Wolseley—then Sir Garnet Wolseley—had just been doing so when Patience first appeared. To interpolate modern instances in this fashion is as damaging to the value of the piece as if we should substitute "Maeterlinck and the kinematograph" for "Shakespeare and the musical glasses," or make the bear-leader at the Three Pigeons talk of "A Frangesa" and "The Absent-minded Beggar" instead of "Water Parted" and the minuet in "Ariadne." If it be the actors' not the author's fault, let Mr. Gilbert see to it that his clowns speak no other than is set down for them.

Next month the Stage Society, which began its season last week with Mr. Thomas Hardy's Three Wayfarers and with Macaire, the "melodramatic farce" by Mr. Henley and R. L. Stevenson, will present Mr. Bernard Shaw's new piece Captain Brassbound's Conversion. After that come Ibsen's Lady from the Sea and Mr. Gilbert Murray's Andromache. The latter is awaited with keen interest.

To the reading public Mr. Roger E. Fry is known as the author of a monograph on Giovanni Bellini. Just now, however, Mr. Fry is giving an instructive course of lectures at the Albert-hall on some Florentine painters of the Renaissance, from Paolo Uccello and other of the scientific realists, to those lyrical artists who worked in the manner of Botticelli. Speaking of Fra Filippo Lippi, Mr. Fry alluded, of course, to Browning's word-picture of the artist, who as a lad in the Carmelite monastery was told by his prior to "dash away." The Guidi of Browning's poem,—"they call him Hulking Tom,"—is, it need hardly be said, Masaccio, and in this connexion an interesting question arises. Browning makes Filippo Lippi allude to Masaccio as a "youngster" who "comes to our convent, studies what I do." As a fact, however, Masaccio was Lippi's senior by about five years, and died many years before him. Are we to regard this as a poetic licence, or was Browning unaware of the facts?

In reviewing Mr. Morley's book on "Cromwell," the Athenæum takes one more opportunity of urging that history should be "scientific" and not literary. On this subject we have often expressed our views. If the true method is to prevail, we learn, "the function of such a writer as Mr. Morley will vanish. The composition of history for the purpose of subjective criticism or of ingenious parallelism, or of blame or praise, or, finally, for mere purposes of literature, will probably cease"; and the reviewer turns to welcome Mr. Morley "with the large mental reservation that, if the time has not already come, it is, at any rate, coming, when the views of a philosopher on an historical problem will be held needless." The modicum of salutary truth contained in this view is obvious enough. It is unquestionably the business of all history, however "literary," to make every effort to get at the facts and to tell the truth about them. But "the passionless pursuit of simple, uncoloured fact" is not even a possible path to truth. There are no such things, strictly speaking, as "simple, uncoloured facts" in history. The "facts" of history are the characters, motives, faiths, policies, meanings of men and women who have passed beyond the reach even of such an inadequate method of verification as cross-examination. Such facts are matters utterly beyond the province or powers of mere research. Hence the absolute need, even for the merest conjectural approximation to truth, of the creative interpretation of the historian.

The popularisation of history can, of course, be carried to excess. Chicago University is gaining a reputation for "fads," and this seems to be one of them. Here is a literal report of part of a lecture by Professor Thatcher on Charles I.:—

> Charles was a good many different kinds of a chump. He couldn't play a square game, and made ducks and drakes of everything he got his hooks on. He had a first-class show at the king business, but he slipped his trolley every time he undertook to touch the democratic bosses. He tried a lot of monkey business with Parliament, but it landed him in the soup; and when he tried to tackle old Pym, who was a tough proposition, he found himself up against it to beat the band. Pym took a fall out of him every round. He had no more chance to win out than a pair of deuces against a straight flush, and though he put up a first-class bluff it didn't go. It took him a good while to drop to it that the old gag of divine right was well enough when playing to the gallery, but that the orchestra and boxes were on to it, and that it was played out anyway. Cromwell and Ireton were too fly to be scooped by any such tommyrot. Charles had always been a high roller, and when his gang got to scrapping with the Roundheads he was dead broke and had to pull the leg of all the dead-easy tenderfeet in the kingdom. The ante was too much for him. Cromwell finally sized him up and got the District Attorney to press the indictment of his royal nibs for everything that was out. Charles worked his pull for all it was worth, but he got the razzle-dazzle just where the chicken got the axe. They waltzed him off to the boneyard p. d. q., and Cromwell had the innings. See?

The Professor's study of the American language and its resources would seem to be more profound than his study of English history.

The Homes for Indigent Artists and Literary Men and Women which have been erected at Colinton, near Edinburgh, by the trustees of the late Sir William Fraser, and to which we have before alluded, are expected to be ready at the beginning of the year. The trustees have prepared the necessary regulations, and are in a position to consider applications. Sir William Fraser bequeathed a sum of £25,000 for the foundation and endowment of these homes. The buildings comprise twelve houses, of from two to four rooms each. After paying the whole cost of the erection and furnishing of the homes the trustees are to apply the income from the invested funds first in the payment of the expenses of management. "The balance (of income), or part thereof, may be applied," it is stated, "for behoof of the inmates by way of alimentary allowances, or otherwise, as the trustees may direct." Each beneficiary may have the use of one of the houses, or two unmarried beneficiaries may occupy one of the houses jointly, and every beneficiary, to whom a house is assigned "for his or her occupation, shall furnish the same, if required by the trustees, to their satisfaction." The rules to be observed are by no means of an unduly onerous or stringent character. The trustees may remove any beneficiary on giving a month's notice; but this power is not likely to be enforced arbitrarily. The houses occupy a commanding site facing the Pentland Hills. The occupants will have the use of a large hall and a reading room in common.

The historic Hampstead Long Room—the pride of Well-walk in the days of the old-world Spa, which transformed Hampstead from a village of laundresses at the beginning of the eighteenth century into a teeming, fashionable watering-place—is, it seems, still standing at No. 5, Well-walk (Weatherall-house), but, according to a correspondent in The Times, its demolition is threatened by the London School Board. Hampstead has lost so many mementoes of the days when Well-walk was thronged with ladies in farthingales and "hoops of wondrous size," accompanied by dandies with wigs and gold-headed canes, that it can ill afford to part with Weatherall-house. "Well, this Hampstead's a charming place," said the wife of a citizen in a forgotten comedy; "to dance all night at the Wells, and be treated at Mother Huff's; to have presents made one at the raffling shops, and then take a walk in Caen-wood with a man of wit."

* * * *

Well-walk was the fashionable promenade of the place when the chalybeate springs were at their best, and it has many interesting associations of later days. Keats, in the last stages of consumption, loved the shady grove of elms which leads to the heath at the end of the walk. "Winding southwardly from the Heath," writes Hone in his "Table Book," "there is a charming little grove in Well-walk with a bench at the end, whereon I last saw poor Keats, the poet of the 'Pot of Basil,' sitting and sobbing his dying breath into a handkerchief—glancing parting looks towards the quiet landscape he had delighted in—musing as in his 'Ode to a Nightingale.'" This was Keats' favourite resting-place; he lodged not far away; and sitting here on one occasion he told Leigh Hunt, who lived in the Vale of Health close by, "with unaccustomed tears in his eye, that his heart was breaking."

If in truth, as is rumoured, the Marble Arch is to be removed from its present position at the north-east corner of Hyde Park, two interesting questions arise—Where will it be placed, and what name will be substituted for this busy spot where converge the ancient high road from Oxford and that from Edgware and the north? The Marble Arch, adapted by Nash from that of Constantine in Rome, originally stood in the Mall, facing Buckingham Palace. Constructed of Carrara marble, it cost about £80,000, and its gates, designed and cast by Samuel Parker, an additional £3,000. The arch was to have been surmounted by Chantrey's equestrian statue of George IV., now in Trafalgar-square. In 1851 the Marble Arch was removed to its present position at Cumberland-gate, where it replaces a brick structure by Sir John Soane. There is an older, a more significant but an ill-omened name—Tyburn Gate. The Tyburn Tree has associations which date back to the reign of Henry IV. The three legs of the gallows are frequently alluded to in literature; by Shirley as "the three wooden stilts," by Tarlton, "like the shape of Tiborne, three squares," and by Shakespeare in Love's Labour's Lost—

> Thou mak'st the triumviry, the corner cap of society,
> The shape of Love's Tyburn, that hangs up simplicity.

Again, Dekker alludes to Derrick, the hangman of Tyburn; and the name of John Ketch, who adjusted the "anodyne necklace" in Dryden's time, has become a synonym for his unlovely calling. Of the hundreds of noteworthy executions here, from that of Perkin Warbeck to Jack Sheppard, or from the lady maid of Kent to Lord Ferrars, one, at any rate, was witnessed by Boswell. Like Selwyn, the biographer loved to witness scenes of the kind, and on April 19, 1779, he rode in the morning coach from Newgate to Tyburn with the Rev. James Hackman. In Evelyn's Diary, again, under date Jan. 30, 1661, we have an account of how the bodies of Oliver Cromwell, Bradshaw, the judge who condemned Charles I., and Ireton were "dragg'd out of their superb tombs in Westminster among the kings, to Tyburne, and hang'd on the gallows from 9 in ye morning till 6 at night, and then buried under that fatal and ignominious monument in a deepe pitt; thousands of people who had seene them in all their pride being spectators. Looke back at November 22, 1658 (Cromwell's funeral)," concludes Evelyn, "and be astonish'd! and feare God and honor ye King; but meddle not with them who are given to change." In his "Miscellaneous Poems" Dryden has some lines "On Tyburn":—

> O, Tyburn! could'st thou reason and dispute,
> Could'st thou but judge as well as execute;
> How often would'st thou change the Felon's doom,
> And truss some stern Chief Justice in his room.

In another column we publish a letter from an artisan on the teaching of literature in primary schools. Meanwhile the literary work that may be done by a professor and his students at a University is the subject of "The Study of English Literature" (Macleh ose, 6d.), the inaugural lecture of Mr. Walter Raleigh, the new Professor of English Literature at Glasgow. He is so modest as to think that the words of a professor cannot make great writers of his listeners. What, he avers, they can produce is good readers, and the lecturer is full of good hints in reading. Read an author through before you read his critics; avoid "elegant extracts"; do not be content with the "hundred best books," but also study the minor writers. This is Professor Raleigh's sound advice to all readers, but perhaps the most interesting part of his discourse was his exhortation to literary research in the Universities, and his remarks on the want of a really first-class history of English literature. Referring to Professor Dowden's article on this subject in our columns, he suggested that the key to the position is held by the Universities. The same research that had given the world the Dictionary of National Biography, through the diligence of the Oxford Historical School, might bring forth a history of our literature as complete as the story of French literature edited by M. Petit de Julleville.

Mr. C. R. Ashbee is evidently determined that the spirit of the Kelmscott Press shall descend upon the Guild of Handicraft of the Essex-house Press. Among the books promised by the Guild in the new type designed by Mr. Ashbee are several which had been considered by William Morris. The best includes Sir Thomas Hoby's Translation of Baldassare Castiglione's "Courtier" (recently published among Mr. Nutt's "Tudor Translations"), Piers Plowman, Burns, Froissart, the Psalms, and Erasmus' "Praise of Folly" in Sir Thomas Chaloner's Translation. But the first book to be printed in the new type will be Mr. Ashbee's own "Endeavour Towards the Teaching of John Ruskin and William Morris: Being an Account of the Work and Aims of the Guild of Handicraft." In the Guild's "Vellum Series of Great Poems of the Language," in which Shelley's "Adonais" has already been issued, other poems promised are Keats' "Eve of St. Agnes," Gray's "Elegy," Milton's "Comus," Spenser's "Epithalamion," Tennyson's "Maud," and Whitman's "Hymn to Lincoln." There will be about twenty poems in all in the series, to be illustrated with frontispieces by artists of the Guild. The "Adonais" is beautifully printed, but the affectation of printing the verses like prose, the beginning of the lines being marked with red, seems scarcely admirable. Written poetry should appeal to the eye as well as to the ear.

A copy of the rare 1810 edition of Cowper, with landscapes painted on the edges, is included in a catalogue recently issued by Messrs. Maggs, of Church-street, Paddington. Though seldom employed, the painted fore-edge is one of the most attractive devices in the decoration of books. The earliest-known example of it in England dates from the end of the seventeenth century, when our binders were trying to free themselves from Continental traditions. Previously the decoration of book edges was chiefly confined to the gauffered edge. The gauffer, a modification of the ordinary gilt edge, was popular when Samuel Mearne and the binders of his day adopted the use of the painted fore-edge. Examples of their work are now very rare. Later on an effort was made to revive this method of book decoration, and at the end of last century Edwards, of Halifax, Kalthoeber, and others turned out some fine work. Modern attempts in this direction have been rare. The great French binders occasionally use the painted fore-edge, though it is generally limited to floral designs. In this country an example is afforded by Sir Walter Besant's "Westminster," which has an exquisitely coloured view of the Thames near the Houses of Parliament painted on the edges of the leaves.

Some weeks back we published several translations from correspondents of Montenalken's well-known lyric:—

Le vie est vaine,
Un peu d'amour,
Un peu de haine,
Et puis—bonjour.

La vie est brève,
Un peu d'espoir,
Un peu de rêve,
Et puis—bonsoir.

No poem as it stands could be more easy for the worst of French scholars to commit to memory and quote when required. And it may be asked, Why translate it at all? Nevertheless, having admitted so many others, we cannot refuse to print the version of a Cape Town correspondent, simply because she could not get hers to England in time to appear with the rest. And, moreover, her version is a good one, and differs from all the others in boldly changing the metre of the original from lines of four to lines of eight syllables.

Life is vain and fraught with sorrow,
A little love beams on to-day,
A little hate clouds o'er to-morrow
And thus we tread the mortal way.
Life's span is brief, else none would crave it,
A little hope, a transient light,
A little dream to help us brave it,
A vain regret, and so good-night!

FRANCES GOODMAN.

An article published by General Tcheng-Ki-Tong, who was some years ago attaché to the Chinese Embassy in Paris, gives a remarkable and interesting account of Chinese journalism, which deserves quotation. The General, with a true Chinese contempt for the lapse of time, finds in Confucius' "Book of Verses" the origin of the newspaper in China:—

Although there has been no similar publication for a long time, and the custom of popular songs has not been kept up, the fact remains that the sovereigns of China have always kept themselves informed of the state of public opinion with regard to the various acts in connexion with their government. There has existed for many centuries a permanent Council composed of censors whose mission it is to present to the sovereign reports of the state of public opinion in the various provinces of the Empire. These reports formed a kind of journal, which was read by the Emperor and the high dignitaries of the country. Later on these reports obtained greater publicity, and at present they constitute the journal entitled the Pekin Gazette, which is in reality the official newspaper of the Empire.

The liberty of the Press does not exist in China, as it would be contrary to the idea we have of the dignity of truth in history. With us contemporary history is not published. History only publishes the annals of the dynasties, and so long as the same dynasty occupies the throne the history of that dynasty may not be published. Our history is written as the events take place by a Council of men of letters who work as deliberately and conscientiously at their task as the French Academicians at their Dictionary. It will, therefore, be understood that it is necessary to keep all these documents secret so that they may be an exact reproduction of the truth. As a matter of fact celebrated European statesmen follow the same rule in publishing their Memoirs relating to contemporary events. Frequently these memoirs are not allowed to appear until a certain length of time has elapsed after the death of the author, and they will only be used as historical documents when the time arrives to write history after the manner of Tacitus, without passion and without hatred. In certain circumstances, however, some of the more daring of these censors have ventured to accuse the highest dignitaries of irregularities in administrative affairs, and they have insisted on the case being examined and punishment meted out to the offenders. The sovereign himself is not exempted from reproaches of this kind.

This Council of Censors is a unique institution, inasmuch as it realizes the ideal which European journalism aims at. It is composed of the most celebrated men of letters in all the provinces, who by favour of the Emperor have the right to tell everything they know, even rumours which may prove to be idle ones. The Official Gazette is only read, as a rule, in official circles. The people are completely ignorant of all that takes place in political matters. There have been various attempts to bring about a change in this condition of things, but hitherto all efforts have been vain. Since the ports have been opened to international commerce, foreigners have founded Chinese newspapers, edited by Chinese writers, on the same lines as the European newspapers. The example has been contagious, and the Chinese themselves have endeavoured to bring out similar papers in the provinces, but these enterprises have always failed as they have been censured for exceeding the liberty allowed by existing laws. This local journalism has thus died a violent death, and no one seems to have any idea of endeavouring to bring it to life again. Foreigners, who are treated as neutral, continue to run certain newspapers in China. Those which have the largest circulation are the Shanghai Journal and that of Hong-Kong. There are also newspapers published in English, but these are only circulated amongst the foreign residents.

There is also another kind of journal which the Chinese have and which they greatly appreciate. It is the one in which they write about their voyages or about any important event which they have witnessed; anything in fact which seems to them worth remembering. Should any accounts they give touch on political questions they cannot be published so long as any member of the reigning dynasty is on the throne. This law may seem excessive, but it is necessary, if we are to have absolute historical veracity.

London Literary Landmarks.

London, it is to be feared, can never now be one of those great historic cities which like Rome, or even like Paris, shelter the spirit of the past, and treasure its memorials. In another column some account is given of old literary landmarks which are passing into oblivion. They are only typical of hundreds of others which have vanished during the last half-century. The process is in fact inevitable. To borrow the language of botany, London is both an endogen and an exogen. It expands with irresistible growth at every point of its circumference; and at the same time it is being continually changed and revitalized at the core. Visitors to London such as Heine, literary Londoners such as Charles Lamb, have alike found the marvel of the city not in its past but in its present; in the ever-shifting scenes of life, its vastness, its order, its animation, its comedy and its tragedy; its "awful rush of love, hunger, and hate." In monuments of antiquity London is, for the greatest city in the world, extraordinarily poor; and its unceasing development, whether we describe it as the glorious march of civilization or the "shabby tide of progress," leaves these monuments scarcer as each year draws to its close. In the face of a demand for more room to live, the antiquarian cannot be importunate in urging his modest plea. It is a compromise only for which we can strive; the adjustment of some terms with materialism—that can be the only practical object of the excellent movement in favour of the "preservation of ancient buildings," so far as London is concerned. The Prudential Assurance Society has destroyed Furnival's Inn, but it has so far preserved the picturesque Staple Inn with its memories of Johnson and Dickens. The Cock Tavern in Fleet Street, where Tennyson had his "pint of port," has left its old site, but has renewed its old-fashioned life on the opposite side of the street. We might perhaps have been spared the demolition of Milton's "pretty garden house" in York Street, subsequently the home of Hazlitt; and of the Tabard Inn in Southwark. But in the absence of any proper official supervision of literary landmarks, London must continue to be denuded of its memorials of the past. At least the memory of them might be preserved—but how? It is enshrined in books—in the exhaustive library at the Guildhall, and in the abundance of new publications continually being issued on the old life of the metropolis. Sir Walter Besant's "Survey of London" will be an invaluable record. The London Topographical Society has undertaken an excellent work in preserving in its "Year Book" illustrated memorials of disappearing London. All praise is due to the Society of Arts for its work in localizing literary associations by means of inscriptions. One means, however, of preserving a perpetual, obvious, and interesting link with the past, that namely of nomenclature, is sadly and unaccountably neglected. Nothing is more amazing than the contrast in this respect between London and Paris. In every quarter of the French capital there are names recalling historic and literary associations, stirring the imagination with memories of the great dead. In literature, Froissart, Rabelais, Boileau, Beranger, Voltaire, Rousseau, Balzac, Dumas, Lamartine; in science, Paré, Arago; in divinity, Bossuet, Lacordaire; in drama, Corneille, Racine, Molière; in art, Claud Lorraine, Watteau, Rubens, Ruysdael, Vandyck, Velasquez; in music, Gluck, Mozart; all these great names—to say nothing of those of distinguished foreigners, Milton, Franklin, Lord Byron—are commemorated in the street names of Paris. Londoners would seem to have no desire to celebrate by the same means the greatness of their past. What of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Marlowe, Goldsmith, Gibbon, Tennyson, Sir Walter Scott? The suggestion made by a correspondent in these columns that the new street between Holborn and the Strand should be called Dickens Avenue was, on the ground of euphony, not wholly a felicitous one, but it was conceived in the right spirit. We who have the finest literature in the world do not show half the respect for our literary worthies that our neighbours do for theirs. Occasionally, as in the Rossetti and Carlyle Mansions in Chelsea, in Dryden Chambers, and the new Kingsley Hotel in literary Bloomsbury, we find a laudable attempt made by private enterprise in the right direction. But in our street names there is neither imagination nor patriotism. They are mainly of three classes:—The venerable City names bequeathed to us through the centuries, Cheapside, Ludgate, and so on, with the strange little ecclesiastical cluster round St. Paul's—Creed Lane, Godliman Street, Paternoster Row, and the rest; the mass of wearisome commonplace iterations on the note of Gloucester, Cambridge, King, Queen, New, North, South, &c.; and a large number of names commemorating nothing but the owners of the ground-rents, their residences and their relations, which are sometimes euphonious, but are hardly of public interest. It is a melancholy confession of the failure of London to be in the true sense an historic city. Parallel to the line of the new street to which we have just alluded runs a street named after a celebrated general, and leading to a railway station commemorating his greatest victory. We make no suggestion; but merely note, in conclusion, the significant fact that it has, so far as we have seen, occurred to nobody to follow this precedent, and to suggest a name which would recall another great commander to the minds of our grand-children as they pass in days to come down "Roberts Avenue."

WEAKNESS.

He was not strong enough to break away
From ignorant bonds which hinder men and blind;
To snap the prison-bars of yesterday,
Or curb the natural follies of mankind.

Nature and Beauty called to him, but here
Old thoughts and aspirations bound him still—
Abortive hopes, and dreams confused and sere,
Darkened the vague horizon of his will.

Part of Eternal Beauty—crowned with light—
A thought of God—even thus and thus his soul
Conceived itself—but subtle hands of night
Wove webs of shadow and obscured the whole.

He heard the ages calling, and the skies
And mountains, and, to greet him, song on song
Of deathless poets crowned with music rise—
Yet swooned 'midst clashing chords of right and wrong.

Once, rising on wide wings of song, he grew Strong for a moment, but the accustomed chain
Of sterile weakness round about him drew
And dragged him helpless to the earth again.

Personal Views.

"BROWN'S HOUSE."

As readers of Literature are aware, the publication of T. E. Brown's Letters and the re-issue of his Poems in collected form have awakened a widespread interest in his personality. Mr. Henley, in the Pall Mall Magazine; Mr. Tarver, in Macmillan's; and Mr. Hughes-Games, in the Fortnightly Review, have recently dealt with his work from different standpoints, and the first number of the Monthly Review, edited by a distinguished Old Cliftonian, Mr. Henry Newbolt, contained an appreciative and vivid sketch of Brown by another distinguished Old Cliftonian, Mr. Quiller-Couch. My excuse for supplementing these articles by a short "personal view" is that I can claim an even closer connexion with Brown than any of the above-named writers. For not only was I, like Mr. Newbolt and Mr. Quiller-Couch, a boy at Clifton when Brown was in the maturity of his powers and influence, but I was a member of his House, and eventually Head of it. I have thought, therefore, that it may be of interest to say a few words about him from a point of view hitherto little touched upon—namely, the impression which he made as a Housemaster upon those of us who lived beneath his roof, and were under his especial tutelage. I will not attempt an elaborate appreciation—it would be impossible within the limits of an article like this. But I wish to set down a few reminiscences which may perhaps help to fill in some details in the picture of Brown which the reading world is seeking to form, and which may possibly do something to correct one or two misconceptions that might easily arise as to the exact nature of his influence.

My first meeting with Brown was in September, 1877. I was a shy newcomer to Clifton, fresh from an Irish school, and after all these years I have an ineffaceable memory of the impression of mingled strength and geniality which his presence at once inspired. He was, as is now well known, the Head of the "Modern Side" at Clifton, and his House therefore was composed mainly of boys on that "Side," though personally I was on the "Classical Side," to which most boys who were going to the Universities belonged. It was inevitable that a man of Brown's commanding personality should leave the impress of it upon his House, but it was, in the main, the energy and breezy vigour of his complex nature rather than his distinctively intellectual gifts that were reflected in "Brown's House." If there are any who may be forming fanciful pictures of a poetic master training up a band of youthful literary aspirants, they may perhaps be surprised to hear that, though our House had always its full share of School and University honours, its dominant passion was to become "Cock House" at football, and especially to triumph over the Head Master's House, between which and "Brown's" was a traditional rivalry. The first occasion on which this distinction had been achieved was when Cecil Boyle, as Head of the House, had led his team to victory. To us of a later generation he was a hero of almost legendary prowess, and the gallant death in South Africa of this "young Achilles of the field" (to quote from his friend, the President of Magdalen's touching elegy) seemed the fitting climax to the achievements of his school career. Another distinguished Head of the House, Mr. Charles Cannan, now the Secretary to the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, did much to foster the keenly public-spirited tradition of "Brown's," and in my own time I had the pleasure of seeing the triumph of Boyle's day at last repeated on the football field. Brown's letters prove that he was not the type of schoolmaster who unduly magnifies games, but he took a genuine interest and pride in the athletic achievements of his boys. And, man of genius though he was, he had no sympathy with the view that the routine of a great public school crushes out individuality. An address had one night been given to us emphasizing this idea, but Brown at dinner next day expressed to me his strong dissent from it, save in a very few exceptional cases, and he even jocularly began to tag a few verses on the topic which ran something as follows :—

A boy, as a rule,
At a public school,
Is a bit of a fool . . .

who does not join in the general life of work and play.

There were occasions, indeed, when his sense of the importance of corporate life and collective responsibility showed itself in a somewhat drastic way. It happened that a piece of furniture in the dining-hall had been injured. Brown announced that unless by a certain fixed time the boy who had committed the offence came forward the whole House would be "kept in" on the next half-holiday. The culprit did not confess, and all of us consequently, to the number of over forty, paid the penalty, Brown himself sharing our afternoon's detention. My own belief was, and is, that, however the damage may have originated, it was not really due to any member of the House. Such stringent exercises of authority were, however, very rare. As a rule, if anything were amiss, a few words from Brown, generally addressed to the House after evening prayers, were sufficient to set matters right. As readers of the letters will not need to be told, his power over language was extraordinary. His picturesqueness and raciness of phrase were inexhaustible, and his talks to the House were nearly always illumined by some characteristic flash of humour or some apt literary allusion. On one occasion, soon after I entered the House, some boys had been detected in the nefarious practice of cooking in their studies. Brown kept us in roars of laughter while he depicted the scene, and wound up by comparing the culprits to the witches in Macbeth interrupted when engaged in their weird dance round their cauldron, with its grisly ingredients. His speeches, too, at the annual House-Supper held just before the Christmas holidays, were always looked forward to by us with keen enjoyment. And at a time when he was in the deepest domestic sorrow he showed his lofty public spirit by insisting that the festivity should be held in the usual way.

But probably nothing in his relations to us will be of greater interest to the general world than the circumstance that we had the privilege of making acquaintance with several of his poems, including "Betsy Lee" and "The Doctor," before they became known to the public. On Saturday evenings Brown himself, or one of the other masters used from time to time to give the House a "reading." On one or two occasions we were surprised to hear Brown read us poems, of which none of us had ever heard, and which were in an unfamiliar dialect. Recited as they were in his rich, and wonderfully flexible tones, and with keen dramatic power, they made a deep impression upon us—even those of us who had least care for poetry. There was a good deal of conjecture among us as to their origin and it was not till some time after that we learnt that the reader of the poems was also their author, and that it was our good fortune to enjoy the first fruits of a literary genius which was afterwards to become the property of the world at large. And I imagine that Brown himself enjoyed watching the effect produced upon his "young barbarians" by these readings. He could scarcely have put his work to a severer test; poetry, to impress the average schoolboy, must indeed have the root of the matter in it.

Surprise has been often expressed that Brown, a Fellow of Oriel, and a master of English of "the centre," should have chosen his native Manx dialect as his chief poetic medium, and thus limited his range of influence. But I remember that on one occasion when some person was being unfavourably criticized on account of local idiosyncrasies of speech and manner, Brown stood up for him, and said he liked a man whose foot was firmly planted in his native earth, and who showed the traces of the soil whence he sprang. I believe that it was in this spirit that he clung to the homely vernacular of his "lil oilan," and turned his back on the rich treasury of "English undefiled." He would have welcomed as a tribute, whether intended or not, the verdict on his work that "his speech bewrayeth him." His famous jest that he was not included in a notice of the minor poets of the day because, perhaps, he belonged to the major ones, had in it, I believe, a touch of the legitimate self-assertion of genius. But the major poets with whom he felt the bond of kinship were not the imperial masters of song, the Olympians—they were rather the Titans, the "inspired Fauns," piping "rustic ditties" to the music of the oaten flute.

The pieces of literary criticism scattered throughout Brown's letters show his passion for the real, the elemental, at whatever cost. How characteristic is his preference of the "Orlando Furioso," the "hard enamel" of the "Italian reprobate" over "the soft velvet carpet" of the "Faerie Queene." How entirely applicable to himself is the phrase he uses of Scott, "the inexhaustible streaming and bubbling up of the great old heart of him, his own boundless enjoyment of it all!" And in daily talk, in the most off-hand judgments, the same strain was ever present. In a "personal view," I may, perhaps, be permitted to introduce a personal reference in illustration of this. Like most boys with an interest in literature I dabbled in rhyme at school, and Brown once asked to see some verses I had written on some stock poetic theme. After a few words of comment on my production, he turned to me suddenly with the characteristic suggestion, "Now try what you can do with an unpoetic subject—a chimney-sweep, for instance." The chimney-sweep still remains, as far as I am concerned, one of the "things unattempted yet in prose or rime," but my vision of the boundaries of song was forthwith enlarged. A different illustration of Brown's "realistic" temper may interest Mr. Quiller-Couch, should his eye fall upon these lines. Soon after "Q." had "commenced author," I was paying a visit to Clifton, and I had some talk with Brown about "Dead Man's Rock," which had been recently published. Brown spoke of the novel in very appreciative terms, but thought that the lover, when accepted, did not salute his lady with sufficient empressement! One of Brown's most darling "adventures in criticism" must, I imagine, be still fresh in the memory of many of my contemporaries. An excellent institution at Clifton, which doubtless still survives, was a meeting on Sunday evenings in "Big-School" where, after the singing of a Hymn and the performance of some classical music on the organ, there was an address on some subject, generally by one of the Masters. This, though known irreverently in schoolboy parlance as "a jaw," was highly popular. On one Sunday Brown, to the no slight scandal of some of his colleagues, gave an inimitable lecture on Hymns, considered from the literary and musical point of view. It so happened that the hymn sung before his address was Heber's "From Greenland's icy mountains," and while allowing the words to pass muster with faint approval, he denounced unsparingly the tune to which they were set. To those who recall such utterances it is difficult to think of Brown, deeply religious as he was at the core, as a potential Archdeacon of the Isle of Man. "Had it rained mitres from Heaven," said Jowett in a funeral sermon in Balliol Chapel upon Stanley, "none would ever have fitted that oddly-shaped head." As little would the cramping Archidiaconal gaiters have fitted the robust, virile limbs of Brown. He belonged to a seventeenth-century rather than a nineteenth-century type of Churchman, and it is easy to imagine him chatting in his fine lusty English with the Reverend Robert Herrick, or the Reverend John Donne, or, at a later date, with the Reverend Jonathan Swift, whose fate he mourned in one of his comparatively rare sermons in our School Chapel.

It was a happy day for Clifton when fate sent her, in her early youth, such a Master as T. E. Brown. The older schools are, most of them, rich in literary associations. The shade of Gray lingers over Eton, of Byron over Harrow, of the Arnolds over Rugby, of Coleridge and Lamb over Christ's Hospital. But Clifton had no such inheritance wherewith to appeal to the imagination of her sons. Her traditions had all to be formed. And though, as I have sought to show, Brown's direct literary influence on his boys should not be exaggerated, it is obvious that his presence would leaven from day to day the character of a great School. And among those whose influence was on kindred lines mention is due of the Editor of the Letters, Mr. S. T. Irwin, to whose fine taste and scholarship many an Old Cliftonian owes a lasting debt. And now that the "fair humanities" of the older culture are being threatened by powerful alien forces, it is surely of good omen that in a school like Clifton, where the modern elements in education have been allowed free play, the influence of men of genuine creative or critical power can so soon establish a literary tradition, and amidst the contending cross-winds of the hour keep the "sacred lamp" of Poetry alight.

FREDERICK S. BOAS.

LITERARY LANDMARKS OF LONDON.

The literary ghosts of the Strand must be wringing their hands in despair at the transformation schemes which are sweeping away their best-loved haunts in that neighbourhood. Holywell-street has long been doomed, and now it is announced that portions of the churchyards of St. Clement Danes and St. Mary-le-Strand are to be given over to the improvements in connexion with the new thoroughfare to Holborn; and the bones of the ancient dead which must necessarily be disturbed are to be removed for reinterment in Brookwood Cemetery. St. Clement Danes, besides being "Dr. Johnson's Church" (a simple inscription marks the pew in which he sat after resolving to go to church every Sunday and strive to solve the great problem "how to purify his soul and hold real communion with the Highest"), is the burial-place of a number of interesting personages, including the two contemporary dramatists Nathaniel Lee and Thomas Otway. Lee drank himself to death in 1692, and Butchers'-row, in which he fell after his fatal visit to the Bear and Harrow—to be killed or stifled in the snow—was one of the streets leading from Clare-market to the Strand until the early part of the present century, when it vanished with the mass of old houses which almost touched the walls of Wren's handsome church. Lee had not long been released from Bethlem Hospital when he came to his melancholy end; and Thomas Otway, whose career was wrecked by similar indulgences, was buried in St. Clement Danes-churchyard while his contemporary was still under detention. Early in the same century Sir John Roe was buried there—"Glad-mentioned Roe," the beloved friend of Ben Jonson, in whose arms he died of the plague which devastated the district in 1605-1606. Jonson wrote some of his finest verses upon Sir John Roe:—

> I'll not offend thee with a vain tear more,
> Glad-mentioned Roe; thou art but gone before,
> Whither the world must follow: and I, now,
> Breathe to expect my When, and make my How.
> Which if most gracious Heaven grant like thine,
> Who wets my grave can be no friend of mine.

Thomas Rhymer, who compiled the "Fœdera," and died in Arundel-street, close by, in December, 1713, belongs to the same company of distinguished dead.

St. Martin's Church is another object of topical interest at the present moment on account of the approaching removal of its spacious steps. Nell Gwynne was buried in the churchyard here two years after the death of Otway, who appears to have sought the good graces of "Sweet Nell of Old Drury" as some compensation for his disappointed passion for Mrs. Barry—a passion which accelerated his ruin and helped to shorten his life. Nell Gwynne shares her mother's grave at St. Martin's, and her funeral sermon was preached by Archbishop Tenison, then incumbent of the parish. She sleeps in a strangely-assorted company, ranging from Jack Sheppard, and the Royal gardener, who succeeded in raising the first pineapple grown in England, to the unfortunate Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, who was murdered shortly after receiving the "Popish Plot" depositions of Titus Oates, and Lord Mohun, who was killed in a duel by the Duke of Hamilton. The literary associations of the place date back to 1626, when Sir John Davys, the poet, was buried there. Stanley, the editor of "Æschylus," joined him in 1678; Farquhar—the Irish dramatist who abandoned the stage in remorse at having accidentally stabbed a brother actor—in 1707; and James Smith, of the "Rejected Addresses," in 1837.

Burke's old house, 37, Gerard-street, has recently been opened as a restaurant, and the imitation marble of the ground-floor front is not suggestive of those historical associations which it is so important to preserve. So great have been the changes in Old London during the last hundred years that few of the houses in which Burke is known to have lived can now be found. "The Pope's Head, over the shop of Jacob Robinson, bookseller and publisher, just within the Inner Temple gateway," where he spent his first years in London, has disappeared; so has that dwelling at the end of Tothill-street, Westminster, which contained an arch of the eastern wall of the Old Gate House, leading into Dean's-yard. Two of Edmund Burke's most noteworthy achievements date from the time when he lived in Gerard-street, whither he removed in 1787 from the neighbourhood of St. James's-square; the speech with which he opened the trial of Warren Hastings in 1788 ranks as a masterpiece of eloquence; and his "Reflections on the French Revolution," 1790, had an influence more potent than that of any other work by him—in a year it reached its eleventh edition. Within, the house has undergone many alterations, but a room on the ground floor is pointed out as Burke's study, while the old-time dining room is to be used for writing and smoking. This little picture of Edmund Burke in No. 37 is left by J. T. Smith:—"Many a time, when I had no inclination to go to bed, at the dawn of day I have looked down from my window to see whether the author of 'Sublime and Beautiful' had left his drawing room, where I have seen the great orator many a night, after he had left the House of Commons, seated at a table covered with papers, attended by an amanuensis, who sat opposite to him."

A few paces away, at the corner of Compton-street, "The Club," founded by Reynolds and Johnson in 1764, was wont to meet. Of this club, known after Garrick's death as the Literary Club, Burke was an original member, as were Dr. Nugent, Beauclerk, Langton, Goldsmith, Chamier, and Sir John Hawkins. If we are to credit Boswell, who was proposed for membership by Johnson, Sir John was not always scrupulously accurate in his statements. For instance, he represented himself as a seceder from the little coterie of distinguished folk, giving as reason that its late hours were inconsistent with his domestic arrangements, the fact being, according to Boswell, that one evening he attacked Burke in so rude a way that at the next meeting he was received with studied coldness. In 1783 the landlord of the Turk's Head in Gerard-street died, the tavern was converted into a private house, and the club removed to Sackville-street.

We associate another man of letters with Gerard-street—John Dryden, the 200th anniversary of whose death in No. 43 passed almost unnoticed on May 1 last. In 1686, when he removed hither from a house on the north side of Long-acre, facing Rose-street, many beautiful gardens still remained in this part of London. Thus, in dedicating "Don Sebastian" to the Earl of Leicester, Dryden calls himself "a poor inhabitant of your lordship's garden, whose best prospect is on the garden of Leicester House." Lady Holland gives an amusing account of a visit paid by her father, Sidney Smith, to this house—he and Moore being driven thither by Rogers. "It was very wet; the house looked much like other old houses, and having thin shoes on they both remonstrated, but in vain. Rogers got out and stood expecting them. 'Ah, you see why Rogers don't mind getting out,' exclaimed my father, laughing and leaning out of the carriage; 'he has got goloshes on; but, Rogers, lend us each a golosh and we will then stand on one leg and admire us long as you please.'" The spectacle so suggested is worthy the pencil of a Cruikshank.

Not many months ago the admirers of Dickens had occasion to deplore the destruction of No. 15, Furnival's-inn, where the major portion of "Pickwick" was written. Now they have cause for regret in the demolition of another Dickens residence, viz., Tavistock House, Tavistock-square, which is being pulled down by order of the ground landlord, the Duke of Bedford. Before the novelist acquired the property, Tavistock House was the home of his valued friend, Frank Stone, A.R.A., whose son, Mr. Marcus Stone, R.A., illustrated "Our Mutual Friend." Dickens took up his residence here in 1851, and here he wrote "Bleak House," a portion of "Little Dorrit," and several of his minor works. Tavistock House, too, was the scene in Dickens' time of some delightful amateur acting, these private performances being organized by "Boz" himself, who, on the playbills, described the apartment which had been specially adapted for the purpose as "The Smallest Theatre in the World," and facetiously adopted the name of "Crummles" as manager. As Christmas approached the house was in a state of siege, with Clarkson Stanfield, R.A., and the three Dansons all painting the scenery at once! One of the scenes by Stanfield, representing the Eddystone Lighthouse, realized nearly a thousand guineas at the sale of Dickens' effects in 1870. The novelist sold Tavistock House in 1860, having resolved to settle down at Gad's Hill, which became his property some four years earlier. Mr. and Mrs. Weldon subsequently occupied Tavistock House, after which it was utilized as a Jews' College. Mrs. Weldon, during her residence there, published (in 1880) a remarkable pamphlet, bearing the title "The Ghastly Consequences of Living in Charles Dickens' House," in which she endeavoured to make clear that she "narrowly escaped being locked up, and probably murdered, in a lunatic asylum," through living in Tavistock House. She describes the place as "a dear house, in a nice, quiet, shady garden, where grow fine large old plantains (out of the Square proper), and where, in summer, from every window of the house, you may imagine yourself in the country—the real country!"

NOVELS OF THE SEA.

Considering to what an extent the sea must necessarily influence the literature of a maritime race, it is, perhaps, not so easy as it might seem on the first glance to pick the six best sea novels or stories written by Englishmen and Americans. The selection made in FAMOUS NOVELS OF THE SEA (Sampson Low, 21s. net) contains among the six only one by a living writer. It would, we think, have been better to confine the series altogether to writers who are dead than to include Mr. Clark Russell. For though the "Wreck of the Grosvenor" is his best book, he cannot stand in the same rank with Michael Scott, Herman Melville, George Cupples, and Captain Marryat, who, with Fenimore Cooper, make up the authors of this series. Nor, indeed—though for other reasons—has Fenimore Cooper the least right to be in the same bookshelf with his four great companions. What Fenimore Cooper knew of the sea by actual experience was extremely little, and it only needs to open any one of his sea stories to perceive his ignorance. His claims to the title of the "American Scott" are only justified by the steady tiresomeness which characterizes him and the least interesting stories of the Wizard of the North.

But as regards the four books remaining of the six nothing can be said against their right to speak on behalf of the sea and on behalf of sailormen of all sorts and conditions. "Midshipman Easy" has been made a classic by the united boyhood of England, and has sent more boys to sea than anything else except the very smell of tar and salt water. It is truly the model for an adventure book, and has neither a dull moment nor a dull sentence in it. Marryat, who was naturally soaked in salt water, showed his knowledge by what he left out. The chief fault of amateur sea-writers, and there are many of them, is the desire to show that they know their subject. The results are too often laborious failures which excite the sombre derision of the seaman. Marryat knew what to omit, and his power of humour and character-sketching has given the world a series of portraits which must live so long as the sea excites the imagination of the English race.

But strong and humorous as was Marryat, it is doubtful whether his greatest admirers would claim genius for him. For genius implies something that gives a book permanent value, not only for its subject, but as literature pure and simple. In Michael Scott's "Tom Cringle's Log" there are undoubtedly flashes of real genius. The book is astoundingly fluent, absolutely natural, and contains passages of descriptions which are true, unforced, and brilliant. Indeed, Michael Scott was one of the few writers who can use "description" properly as a background, and not as padding. And Scott knew not only the naval man but the English and American merchant seaman. There is no air of his having learnt anything. The narrative flows like a river, and has, like a tropical mountain stream, a thousand glimpses of the unexpected. His humour at times partakes of the pantomime, but even so it is unforced and boyish. And when he touches the tragic string his feeling is utterly sincere. Even his greatest villain is not without touches of real humanity. Few who have read the book once but will be ready to read it again.

The signs of real knowledge at first hand, not gathered from books nor noted by a passenger on the "fo'c'sle head," are visible in George Cupples' "Green Hand." Perhaps he invented the trick, now done to death, of the passenger who is also a seaman and plays the deus ex machina when the inevitable and necessary disaster at last occurs. The trick in the "Green Hand" is, at any rate, well done, and any man who reads the book through and understands it must have a competent knowledge of seamanship, even if he acquires an unjustifiable contempt for the seamanlike qualities of the merchant service.

But of all these six books the one, the only one, which is supremely great and undoubtedly a work of genius is Herman Melville's "Moby Dick." And it just as surely has no claim to be in the collection at all. It is not a novel. It is hardly a story. It is an epic, and a most astounding epic too. The human hero is nothing to the great white whale which dominates the intense and imaginative narrative. For this book is the first and, properly speaking, the last book ever written upon the greatest big game hunting of the world. The cachalot, singly and collectively, in the huge personality of Moby Dick, is the theme. And the book is an encyclopædia. Its knowledge is deep, inclusive and conclusive. No man after reading it can hope to exceed or to equal or even to comment upon it. It has peculiar qualities; the peculiar qualities of Melville. In one place he names the world as one might name an inn. He calls it "At the Sign of the Thunder Cloud." The book is half a nightmare; it is like a thunder-storm in the brewing; there are spaces of clear sky, and great blurs of gloom in it. It is natural history raised to the highest power of tragedy. It is monstrous, inchoate, suggestive, and full of speculation and astonishment. Ahab Peleg, the demoniac Captain, hunts the whale that dismembered him through the seas of the earth as the Opium Eater was hunted through the forests of Asia. But the drugged one here is the hunter, and the cold, acute, and horrible intellect of the epic whale dominates the play upon the mighty stage of the wandering sea. The book is full of pictures. They are pictures of imagination, fervid and deep. The characters are types, human but superhuman. The humour is tragic humour; the talk of the players is astounding. The scheme of the book is no scheme, but it grows Æschylean and concludes inevitably upon an inexorable vortex. Only those who have not read the book may conclude that this is the language of indiscriminate eulogy. A reprint of it upon this side of the Atlantic has so long been desired by the few who knew its value that the series will be welcome if only for the work of perhaps the greatest natural genius produced upon American soil.

These six books are, however, only concerned with the sailing ship, and nowadays, when the romance of the steamship is beginning to be understood, it would be possible to make another series, not, perhaps, inclusive of so many books of very great merit, which would show us the modern seaman under changed aspects. The modern battleship has yet to find its true historian in fiction, but the cargo-boat and the "tramp" have been excellently done, and there is no doubt that they are popular with the public which nowadays has little acquaintance with the "windjammer." And in one respect, at least, the modern writer of sea fiction is ahead of his earlier rivals. He does not insist upon describing the sea, which, at sea, is mostly intolerably dull, as something always worthy of a marine painter. And as it is usual to put the narrative into the mouth of a seaman there is nothing falser than to make him wallow in ecstasies over a beauty which does not exist, and which, even if it did exist, would appeal to him about once in a "blue moon." The average sailor, of any rank, is not given to raving over sea-scapes, and has a tolerably correct notion that fine words butter neither parsnips nor monotony. He takes the seas as they come, and looks upon them from a professional point of view. The fine cross seas of the Cape after three days of a gale from three-quarters of the compass only make him rave in a manner which (to quote Mark Twain) would not improve the sale of a Sunday school book if his language were to be sampled in it. He makes a hard living on the ocean, and though he may find it difficult to avoid going back to it, more often than not he does so because he cannot help it. As sailors say "only a fool would sell a farm and go to sea."

Foreign Letter.

POLAND.—II.

During the eighteenth century the influence of French literature had been in Poland a real obstacle to the development of the national drama. That drama received its first encouragement from King Stanislaw Poniatowski, who, in 1765, established a permanent theatre in Warsaw; and when, in 1810, Wojciech Boguslawski founded a school for dramatists the right impulse was given to original dramatic talent. To-day it can hold its own with that of any other country of Europe.

Notwithstanding the drawbacks created by the political situation—the restricted admission of the Polish language, the censure, which forbids the representation of any play dealing with an episode of modern Polish history, the pecuniary difficulties which hamper the realization of scenic effects—the new names added each year to the list of Polish playwrights bear testimony to the flourishing condition of the drama in Poland. Many causes combine to bring about this result—first and foremost the question of demand and supply. The theatre in Poland, like elsewhere, has become the favourite recreation of the masses; but more than elsewhere, perhaps, the Polish public scorns exotic productions and demands plays in which the traits of the national character and the trend of national ideas predominate. As a consequence it is in the Comedy of Manners that the Polish playwrights excel. With sober realism and a mirth which has an undertone of sadness, they represent the anomalous types and peculiar situations produced by the contradictory influences which have reacted on the national character, the prejudices and foibles of the landed proprietors, the middle class, the country people, in whom the traditions of former days still survive in one word, all the phases of the conflict between the old order of things and the new. But, though they cater thus for the public taste, the authors do not lose sight of the literary exigencies of their plays. Political discussions being almost entirely banished from the periodicals, the void is filled by artistic, literary and dramatic criticism, to which some of the ablest writers devote their talents. Many of these critics are also successful dramatists; their literary canons have the double weight of word and example, and they exercise the most beneficial influence on the efforts of young dramatists.

The Comedy of Manners had its greatest vogue between 1865 and 1880. The plays of Narzymski, Sabowski, Sarnecki, Blizinski, Bekikowski, and many others form a gallery of portraits taken from all the ranks of the society of the time, among which Pan Damazy, by Blizinski, bears off the palm. But the author who has enjoyed the greatest and longest popularity is Michal Balucki. His plays are bright and sparkling, full of wit, and, at the same time, imbued with a healthy philosophy. His Open House first gained him the favour of the public. Among his other well-known comedies are Neighbours, The Bachelors' Club, Flirt, Geese and Goslings, and Big Fishes. His historical drama Kilinski treats of a conspiracy against the Russians during the time of the first division of Poland, the hero of which, a man in humble circumstances, represents the patriotic sentiment of the people. Blizinski and Balucki show that literary activity and excellence are not confined to Russian Poland; they are both natives of Galicia.

The success obtained by Kazimierz Zalewski is perhaps as great as that of Balucki. He is a writer of serious comedy and at the same time an eminent theatrical critic. In their construction his plays are modelled after the modern French drama; they evince an intimate knowledge of stagecraft, a remarkable intuition of artistic proportion, and much literary merit. He takes his types from the elegant society of Warsaw, the aristocratic snobs, the world of parvenus, the potentates of the Stock Exchange. Our Sons-in-Law, The Apfels, The Queen of Clubs, Article 234, The Rights of the Heart, The Son, and many others have gained for him the favour of the public as well as the praise of the critics.

Edward Lubowski, who belongs also to the older generation of Polish dramatists, was born at Cracow, but settled later in Warsaw. He is a brilliant writer; but his views are pessimistic and misanthropic. Some of his comedies are among the best productions of the stage; others have no claim whatever to literary or dramatic merit. Bats is universally considered his best play. In it he severely flagellates the slanderers or backbiters who work in the dark to destroy fair reputations. The Prince is a highly effective drama with a sound moral teaching. Lubowski has also written some interesting historical studies and translated some of the works of Shakespeare, Heine, and Musset.

Two of the most remarkable dramatic authors of the younger school are Alfred Konar (pseud.) and Aleksander Mankowski. The former writes in the same vein as Lubowski—he is bitter, satirical, and vehement; the latter, in his first play, Mimowski, at once revealed himself as a writer of great power. An Original, which also met with an enormous success, is perhaps, in some parts, too didactic for the purposes of art. The influence of the school of Sardou and Dumas fils is especially discernible in the plays of Zygmunt Sarnecki. He is the leader of the literary criticism in his country and thoroughly in touch with the intellectual movement of the day in other parts of Europe, and his plays are models of elegant writing, artistic treatment, and careful psychological dissection. If he had produced nothing else, his Febris Aurea would give him a high place among writers for the stage.

The female dramatic authors who deserve mention are Zofia Mellerowa and Gabryele Sniesko-Zapolska. The False Expectations of the former is an excellent comedy, and ought, as well as her other pieces, to have obtained a better success than it has. The plays of Madame Zapolska bear the same stamp as her novels. Zabusia (little frog) is considered her best comedy, but it is doubtful whether the subject would recommend itself to an English audience. Her dramas, in which the hero is generally a Jew, have also been well received.

In farcical comedy the first honours belong to Adolf Abrahamowicz and Ryszard Ruszkowski. They are endowed with an inexhaustible fund of wit, for, although they produce on an average two or three pieces a year, they are always fresh, sprightly, and fanciful. Their plays recall in their form the best farces of the French stage, but they have a tone and humour of their own which is essentially Slavonic. The same kind of indescribable humour is also the charm of the plays of Michal Galasiewicz, who in his popular dramas excels in the portraiture of the placid and fatalistic resignation of the Polish peasantry.

Although modern taste prefers the comic muse to the tragic, historical drama and tragedy are not altogether neglected. Adam Asnyk, equally distinguished as poet and dramatist, wrote two powerful historical dramas, Kiejstut and Cola Rienzi. Stanislaw Kozlowski, in Master Albert, The Taborites, and The Tournament, paints some telling episodes of the national history and revives the heroic struggles of the past. Kazimierz Glinski's tragedy in verse, Almansor, deals with an incident of Spanish history. Like his drama Boleslaus the Bold, it is perhaps better adapted for perusal in the study than representation on the stage.

During recent years Polish dramatic literature has been able to register several new names full of promise. The homely comedies of Julian Wieniawski (Jordan) find great favour with the public. Stanislaw Graybner has found in the reception given to his first plays, Fredzio and The Count, ample encouragement for further work. Sewer, the novelist, is also devoting his talents to the drama with success. Lucyan Rydel, who became first known by his fairy plays and comedies, has lately produced two dramas, Dies Irae and The Mother, which show that the influence of the current of thought which at present pervades Western Europe is also being felt in Poland.

HUXLEY.

Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley. By his Son, Leonard Huxley. In two vols. (Macmillan. 30s. n.)

It seems ungracious to say at the outset anything even in apparent disparagement of a book full of interest, portraying on the whole faithfully a singularly attractive character; the record of a full and useful life; the story of a great soldier of truth. We have in mind, however, only a minor defect; our criticism does not affect the sense of indebtedness for a truthful and interesting account of one of the foremost Englishmen of his time—one who profoundly impressed his generation and whose influence is still with us. In the first volume to some extent, in the second in a marked degree, there is a lack of editorial supervision; there are letters altogether too trivial to be printed—letters which have no reason to be in the book unless it was essential to make two volumes of it. Nothing can be more valuable and instructive as to Huxley's character than the extracts from his early journal, for example; they might well have been extended and multiplied. Nothing could be less called for than some of the business or domestic notes printed in the second volume.

Two views of Huxley were entertained by his friends. According to one he was meant to be a great investigator, who, fortunately for science, in his early years yielded to his bent, but who was later in life allured into controversies and discussions in which, being untrained, he could do no more than every man of capacity can perform, no matter how alien the field which he enters. According to another view he was born to be a controversialist and a combatant; a sort of Luther for modern science, he found his true vocation only when, in the Nineteenth Century and elsewhere, he fought fiercely for intellectual freedom. The impression left by these volumes is that neither judgment expressed the whole truth; that his nature was larger than some of his friends conceived; and that the man was never completely revealed until he had fought all his many fights, and wandered into many regions.

Huxley was, according to the interesting bits of autobiography which are quoted, his mother's son intellectually, morally, and physically. Of his father he could find no trace in his composition except an inborn capacity for drawing, "which, unfortunately in my case, has never been cultivated, a hot temper, and that amount of tenacity of purpose which unfriendly observers sometimes call obstinacy." From his mother he got all that he most prized, and, in particular, her rapidity of thought. He rated no gifts higher than sound sense; his notion of scientific capacity was nothing else. "If my time were to come over again there is nothing I would less willingly part with than my inheritance of mother wit." Never sent to a public school or a University, with discursive tastes and indefinite ambition, with no sympathy or help extended to him in intellectual matters—two years spent in a pandemonium of a school—he educated himself in ways as effectual as if he had travelled by the ordinary high road. Fortunately there has been preserved a fragmentary spiritual journal kept by Huxley when fifteen, and entitled "Thoughts and Doings"; and remarkable is the maturity, surprisingly wide is the range of thought of the youth struggling with no aid or compass to penetrate into the region in which he was, in later life, to move. "I have been pondering for some time over a classification of knowledge. . . . I am in doubt under which head to put morality, for I cannot determine exactly in my own mind whether morality can exist independently of others, whether the idea of morality could ever have arisen in the mind of an isolated being or not. I am rather inclined to think that it is objective." His medical education was, according to modern standards, casual, haphazard, and imperfect. Nor was he at first—perhaps he was never—a systematic student. But it is clear that he had read far more widely than the best of his fellow students, and that from the outset his mind was full of speculations remote from the routine work of his classes. It was not a piece of good luck—it was a natural incident in his unremitting microscopic researches—that at nineteen he should be the discoverer of a hitherto unnoted membrane in the root of the human hair known as "Huxley's layer." His first letters, and in particular those written on his scientific cruise in the Rattlesnake, show the same command of simple, perspicuous English, the same lucid and direct statement as marked the mature, practised writer and lecturer. The four years which he spent on the Rattlesnake were of great value to him, and the scientific work which he did was excellent. The letters written on shipboard are vivid and bright, and it is to be regretted that he did not leave some record of his travels in a volume which might have been as interesting and classical as "The Voyage of the Beagle."

To all appearance Huxley had many of the gifts which ensure rapid success; health, strength of will, confidence in his powers, courage, delight in contest, powers of speech, an admirable written style, and, not least, no illusions as to the difficulties confronting him. "The world is no better," he half playfully remarks, "than an arena of gladiators, and I, a strong savage, have been turned into it to fight my way with my rude club among the steel-clad fighters." But well-equipped though he was for the combat, he met with a series of reverses; he was a candidate for professorships and failed, he had seasons of darkness and despair; and, confident though he was as to his powers, he writes as late as 1852 in such terms as these:—"I was talking seriously with Fanning the other night about the possibility of finding some employment of a profitable kind in Australia, storekeeping, squatting, or the like." If Huxley's friends or foes found him in after years sometimes brusque and hard; if he was a little too eager to "smite all humbugs, big or little," without being always careful whether he had found the humbug; if he had little patience to spare for the minor mistakes of life, this was the result of the stern struggle, the vicissitudes and hardships of the early years.

Of all the letters published in these volumes none show the deeper nature of the man more clearly than those written to his friend Kingsley. Poles apart though they were in convictions and temperament, they drew to one another; Huxley tells his innermost thoughts to none more freely than to one who had, in regard to religious and kindred topics, scarcely a conviction in common. Writing in answer to Kingsley's expressions of sympathy with Huxley on the loss of his little boy, on whom he doted, he pours out his whole soul, as strong men do only once or twice in a life. The blow had struck him hard; but he was not crushed.

> Had I lived a couple of centuries earlier, I could have fancied a devil scoffing at me and them—and asking me what profit it was to have stripped myself of the hopes and consolations of the mass of mankind. To which my only reply was and is:—Oh, devil! truth is better than much profit. I have searched over the grounds of my belief, and if wife and child and name and fame were all to be lost to me one after the other as the penalty, still I will not lie. . . . To begin with the great doctrines which you discuss, I neither deny nor affirm the immortality of man. I see no reason for believing in it; but, on the other hand, I have no means of disproving it. Pray understand that I have no a priori objections to the doctrine. . . . But the longer I live, the more obvious it is to me that the most sacred act of a man's life is to say and to feel, "I believe such and such to be true." . . . It is no use to talk to me of analogies and probabilities. I know what I mean when I say I believe in the law of the inverse squares, and I will not rest my life and my hopes upon weaker convictions. I dare not if I would.

Huxley was among the hardest intellectual workers of his generation. At almost every page of the two volumes we are struck by the variety of the occupations and the intensity of his application. He is writing elaborate scientific papers, lecturing in all sorts of places on many subjects, serving on Royal Commissions, keeping up one or two lively controversies in the public Press, in the rare intervals of leisure penning long letters into which he puts his whole energy of nature, and throwing himself with fervour into all the pleasures and occupations of the world about him. Perhaps he would have lived longer and done better work had he taken the advice of Hooker and other friends, and devoted himself to a few subjects. That was sometimes his own opinion; overwhelmed with engagements, he once said to Professor Marsh, "If I should only break my leg, what a lot of scientific work I should do!" But, less discursive, he would not have been the Huxley whom we know and who stirred his generation at many points; with his nature, it could not, perhaps, have been otherwise. If we have misgivings as to the wisdom of any of his many undertakings it is as to his excursions into the regions of philosophy, for which he had no training and, it is probable, no particular aptitude. "Do take the counsel of a quiet looker-on," wrote Hooker to him, "and withdraw to your books and studies in pure natural history; let modes of thought alone." His biographer may be right in saying that he "got through an immense amount of philosophy in the course of several years"; his capacity for work was daunted by nothing; and he had the true philosophic temper, which always seeks in a multitude of facts for principles. But the strong man becomes weak—at all events, his superiority over so many of his contemporaries disappears—when he reasons about metaphysical problems.

Huxley did not devote himself exclusively to his books, his studies, and his controversies. He took delight in his family and his friends; and he was essentially human and "clubbable." One of the most interesting parts of the book, by the way, relates to the X Club, which Tyndall, Hooker, Lubbock, Spottiswoode, and a few other friends of Huxley formed for social and scientific ends. The club had never, Huxley remarks, any purpose except to bring together a few friends who did not wish to drift apart. But it did much more than was intended at the outset; it helped to create a powerful body of scientific opinion, and to accelerate that New Reformation which it was Huxley's pride to have advanced. Much is told also of the Metaphysical Club, of which Huxley was one of the most active members.

Huxley had great practical ability, which he showed in many capacities, and nowhere more than as a member of the London School Board. Events are so quickly forgotten in the hurry and bustle of these days that it is a public service to recall his work as an educationist. It will be a revelation to many persons who cite his name in support of extreme views to find that he was opposed to extremes of all sorts; that, for example, he deprecated divorcing intellectual from moral training, which would make the gutter child "the subtlest of all the beasts of the field," and that, while inexorable as to the expulsion of all theological teaching, he deprecated the abolition of religious teaching, which would be like "burning your ship to get rid of the cockroaches," or to "throw away the child with the bath." He voted for the retention of the Bible in the Board schools because he believed that "the mass of the people should not be deprived of the one great literature which is open to them—not shut out from the perception of their relations with the whole past history of civilized mankind." In fact, a clear line of cleavage was drawn between Huxley and the seven extreme Secularists on the Board—the Seven Champions of Unchristendom as they were styled. He voted for the famous compromise of 1871 proposed by the late Mr. W. H. Smith, providing for the reading of the Bible in Board schools, not as a "hush up," but, as he expressed it, as "an armistice in respect of certain matters as to which the parties were absolutely irreconcilable." One of the most striking of the many letters is that addressed to a secretary of a free thought association rebuking the vendors of heterodox ribaldry, which disgusted him even more than orthodox fanaticism. It was characteristic of him that he did not draw, "personally, socially, or politically," to Bradlaugh; and equally characteristic that he took up the cudgels for the cause of toleration when it was proposed to exclude Miss Bradlaugh from the classes at University College. On no subject does he speak with more wisdom and precision than on education. In these days when it is assumed that nothing valuable can be done without State aid, it is useful to recall his opinion that Government intervention in intermediate education was needless. He did not overrate the advantages of education of any kind; "mere learning and mere cleverness are next to no value in life, while energy and intellectual grip, the things that are inborn and cannot be taught, are everything."

Possessed of keen wit, fearless and confident, he did not hesitate to pass stringent judgments on the most eminent of his contemporaries. Dazzled for a time by Mr. Gladstone, he ended by entertaining an indifferent opinion of that statesman. He had at one time described him as the greatest intellect in Europe; later he dubbed him a "copious shuffler." Towards Lord Salisbury, as a scientific student, he was drawn; but he does not mince matters when speaking of his Presidential address at the Oxford meeting of the British Association. Frederic Balfour, the physiologist, was particularly admired; his early death and that of W. K. Clifford seemed, to Huxley, the greatest losses sustained by science in our time. Of Mr. Arthur Balfour's work, on the other hand, he spoke disparagingly; in his "Foundations of Belief" he had acted like the French in the war of 1870, having gone to war without maps or any adequate preparation. For Darwin he had a deep affection; but he could not endorse some of the inordinate praise showered on the author of the "Origin of Species" at the expense of his predecessors. There are few letters from Professor Tyndall, and for a time there was a little misunderstanding between them, but not such as "to put even a momentary strain upon the cable which has held us together for nine and twenty years." Of Mr. Spencer he was a life-long friend; but even before he fell out with him on the province of government he was candid in his criticism of his friend's philosophy. "He (Spencer) has endorsed me as a sort of devil's advocate for thirty odd years." Here is his friend Dean Stanley's foible happily struck off:—"Stanley could believe in anything of which he had seen the supposed site, but was sceptical where he had not seen. . . . The account of the Creation he dismissed as unhistorical; but the call of Abraham and the historical narrative of the Pentateuch he accepted. This was because he had seen Palestine—but he wasn't present at the Creation."

Every reader will close the book with admiration of the strong, manly spirit which it depicts—its fearless love of truth; its hatred of meanness and evasion; its sincere desire to leave the world better than he found it. The book braces as well as instructs; it cheers as well as edifies. A word is due to the excellent portraits, of which there are several. It is interesting to watch the transformations of the expression on the face until we find the Huxley whom most of us knew.

THE CHINESE PROBLEM.

THE FAR EAST: ITS HISTORY AND ITS QUESTION. By ALEXIS KRAUSSE. (Grant Richards. 18s.)

Mr. Krausse's aim is "to afford in handy form a complete account of the history of the countries of the Far East, in so far as they have come into contact with Western civilization." Five chapters deal, therefore, with history. We need not linger in detail over such very familiar matter, and may content ourselves with saying it appears to be intelligently summarized and fluently narrated. Then come controversial chapters on such topics as "Rival Policies," "The Situation," "The Duty of Britain," and "The Prospect." And the book is concluded by over a hundred pages of appendices, in which all the most important diplomatic instruments dealing with the Far East are given in full. Thus this large volume is divided into two sharply-marked parts—the historical and the controversial. Much of the latter, we must add, has already been given in substance to the world by the author in his work called "China in Decay," and it is again handicapped, as we pointed out in our review of the latter book, by his hatred of Russia and his lack of discrimination in dealing with her aims and methods. From this point of view Mr. Krausse's writing is polemics rather than exposition.

It is unnecessary to follow the author's views in detail. In brief they are those of the majority of the writers on the Far East that he has consulted—he leads us to infer that he has no first-hand knowledge of his subject—views which recent events have strongly emphasized and confirmed. This is his last paragraph:—

> The prospect in the Far East is clouded. Its ultimate outcome must, by dint of the working of the forces I have discussed, be partition and absorption until the whole of the map becomes reconstituted. The lion's share must go to Russia. Of that there can be no question. China will by slow degrees be divided, first into nominal spheres of influence; subsequently into protectorates; finally into colonies and possessions of the various Powers. Korea as a national entity is doomed. The only question is whether it will fall to Russia or Japan, and it remains only to be seen whether England will at the eleventh hour pull herself together and strive to save the Yang-tsze valley as her share of the spoil, or whether she will, by a continuation of her past and present tactics, allow herself to be elbowed out of Central China even as she has been out of Manchuria and is about to be out of the North. Such is the outcome of the situation, such the problem to be solved. The prospect is not a pleasant one; but there is yet time to divert it, if only we bestir ourselves and act before it is too late.

This summary misses its effect for one simple reason—it is too "cock-sure." No writer who really appreciates the infinite complexity and uncertainty of the Far Eastern situation will use the word "must" about any outcome. Why "must" China be ultimately divided among the Powers? Why "must" the lion's share go to Russia? Mr. Krausse means that in his opinion such will be the result, and he should express his opinion with great modesty, for it can only be based upon data supplied to him by other writers and students, many of whom do not share these views. All who agree with Mr. Krausse in his assertions that the present deplorable situation is chiefly due to the ignorance and carelessness of British policy in the Far East, and that unless a vital change comes over this, and soon, we shall continue to lose both influence and markets, cannot but sincerely regret that he should weaken a good case by over-statement and over-confidence. He says in his preface that he is proud to call this country his own. He writes, we are sure, with a single eye to her interests, but he serves her badly by going much further in his criticism than those who have always been Englishmen and have often been in China.

This spirit of exaggeration manifests itself also in statements of mere fact. For example, he says of the Japanese, "Her people are neither creative nor progressive of themselves"; and "the case of a Chinese breaking faith in the matter of a compact is of extremely rare occurrence." Both these statements rest upon a basis of truth, but are false as thus unconditionally made. He has not grasped, again, some of the fundamental conditions upon which the Far Eastern problem rests. For instance, he says that when the inadequacy of our land defences in the Far East is pointed out, "the reply given to these strictures is generally an appeal to the strength of the British fleet, which, it is urged, would deal with any enemy before she approaches our territory; but in order to do this it is necessary to have a superior fleet on the spot to that maintained by any other Power, and it is open to question whether we have this." It is not at all open to question whether we have this; we have not. He proceeds:—"A strong squadron in the Mediterranean or the Indian Ocean would avail us little in the event of an attack upon Hong-kong." On the contrary, a strong squadron in the Mediterranean would make all the difference in the world, for any Power that attacked us in the Far East would instantly be attacked by us in every other part of the globe where it had ships or possessions, and the foreknowledge of this fact is our best safeguard in the Far East, as everywhere else. Mr. Krausse is evidently unaware that some of our best strategists view with much disapproval the despatch to the China Seas of more of our strongest Ironclads. Our markets in China depend more upon the Channel Squadron than upon the defences of Hong-kong. Again:—"It has been suggested that a species of alliance is about to be arranged between this country and Germany in regard to the Far East. . . . It seems to me that the suggestion is, on the face of it, manifestly absurd, and a little consideration will show its utter fatuity." The Anglo-German exchange of Notes places this exaggeration in a rather foolish light. We might, if space permitted, give many more examples of this tendency of the author, but we do not desire to be hypercritical concerning a writer who certainly means well and points, on the whole, in the right direction. He will never attain, however, to the influence he merits by his industry and his good intentions until he thoroughly rids himself of "cock-sureness" and exaggeration, and also of his hatred and suspicion of everything that emanates from Russia, the day for which is past.

POETIC PAINS.

In The Unpublished and Uncollected Poems of Cowper (Unwin, 3s. 6d. n.), Mr. Thomas Wright, one of the poet's biographers, presents us with some short pieces which have either never been printed before or have appeared only in periodicals not now easily accessible. Besides these Mr. Wright gives some previously unprinted versions of Cowper's translations from Madame Guion, which differ considerably from the revised versions known to the world. "The Bee and the Pine Apple" was also based on the same theme as an earlier but far inferior poem, here reprinted. Of much greater interest are the earlier readings of "Yardley Oak" and the well-known poem addressed to "My Mary." Cowper has himself dilated upon the "pleasure in poetic pains," and in comparing these earlier readings with the lines which he finally adopted we get a very good glimpse of the poet in his workshop. Some of the corrections only amount to the substitution of one epithet for another—e.g., the "loamy" for the "nurturing" clod—but here and there whole passages are excised. Cowper's second thoughts seem, like Tennyson's, to have been the best. These lines in the poem, addressed to Mary Unwin,

> Thy needles, once a shining store,
> Discernible by thee no more,
> Rust in disuse, their service o'er
> My Mary!

were much improved into

> Thy needles, once a shining store,
> For my sake restless heretofore,
> Now rust disused, and shine no more
> My Mary!

And the stanza which followed—

> But thy ingenious work remains,
> Nor small the profit it obtains,
> Since thou esteem'st my pleasure gains
> My Mary!

was certainly poor in comparison with

> For though thou gladly wouldst fulfil
> The same kind office for me still,
> Thy sight now seconds not thy will
> My Mary!

But in "Yardley Oak" we are not so sure that the alterations were for the better. Of one passage Mr. Wright gives us an original version which is, at all events, more graphic than that of the ordinary editions:—

> He (Adam) was excused the penalties of dull
> Minority; no primer with his thumb
> He soiled, no grammar with his tears, but rose > Accomplished in the only tongue on earth
> Taught then, the tongue in which he spoke with God.

Perhaps the transition from the thumbed grammar-book to the higher flight of the last two lines may have been too sudden, or possibly Cowper on reflection may have thought that the smallest suggestion of a primer or a grammar in connexion with Adam was too comic. But in any case this rejected passage is in the poet's more popular style, and is much more picturesque than the lines which he substituted—

> No tutor charged his hand
> With the thought-tracing quill, or tasked his mind
> With problems.

Of the poems printed for the first time or from periodicals some of the lighter ones—one or two epigrams and the poems addressed to Lady Austin and Miss Ann Green—are not without the easy grace and wit of the poet, and the two poems called forth by the Court-martialling of Admiral Keppel and Sir Hugh Palliser are not bad specimens of occasional verse. But "A Song of Mercy and Judgment" shows Cowper in one of his more morbid and less poetical moods, and the lines, written as he was taking shelter from a thunderstorm, are crude and were obviously never intended for the public. The absolutely new matter will, we think, add very little to the poet's reputation.

ANGLO-AMERICAN RELATIONS IN THE PAST.

England and America after Independence, 1783-1872. By Edward Smith. (Constable. 11s.)

From the vantage ground of an excellent mutual understanding the two great English-speaking nations can contemplate their past differences and occasional downright quarrels with equanimity. Not that all possibility of their falling foul of each other is at an end. For years to come there will doubtless be plenty of Americans in whom some sparks of hostility to the mother country remain unquenched, nor will politicians be wanting who will strive to fan the smouldering embers, for their own purposes, into a flame. But this trick is already stale, and will probably, as time goes on, become less and less effective. Englishmen and Americans alike know that no two nations are more useful to each other in time of peace, or are capable of doing so much harm to each other in war. They know, moreover, that whatever damage one might succeed in inflicting on the other, the blow could not fail to recoil with fatal force on the assailant.

A century ago this lesson had yet to be learned. England's cool politeness to America was mingled with some contempt. America, comparatively weak, and with all her experience as a nation to be acquired, mistook this coolness for deeply-rooted hostility. The mother country, it was freely said, had never forgiven the revolted colonies, and was only waiting her opportunity to reconquer them; and anything like cordiality towards her would be unpatriotic. This feeling furnished a cue to the politicians; and Jefferson, in words quoted by Mr. Smith, probably told Americans rather what he thought would tickle their ears than what he knew to be the real truth.

> That nation hate us, their Ministers hate us, and their King above all other men. . . . The spirit of hostility to us has always existed in the mind of the King, but it has now extended itself through the whole mass of the people, and the majority of the public councils.

With Jefferson this idea evidently became a craze. America chiefly owed her independence to her alliance with the European enemies of the mother country. Chilled by the repellent attitude of England. It might be supposed that she would turn for sympathy and consolation to the Continental nations. But Americans detected a kind of taint in the atmosphere of Europe generally. The Dutch disliked them, the French patronized them, and no other nation cared, or, indeed, knew much about them. Americans shook the dust from their feet when they recrossed the ocean. Jefferson declared that an American going to Europe for his education would lose "in his knowledge, in his morals, in his health, in his habits, and in his happiness. . . . No man living will ever see an instance of an American removing to settle in Europe, and continuing there." Even the sensible John Adams, the first Minister accredited by the United States to the old country, fancied that everybody in England was ashamed to meet his gaze. "This people," he wrote, "cannot look me in the face. There is conscious guilt and shame in their countenances when they look at me. They feel that they have behaved ill, and that I am sensible of it."

The story of the national quarrels which this obstinate misunderstanding did so much to foster, and which long embittered the mutual intercourse of the two countries, is not a pleasant one; and, but for the fact that American writers usually think it a duty to dwell upon it and to throw most of the blame on England, the majority of English people, who cordially esteem their American cousins, would probably prefer to forget it. Mr. Smith's volume, in which the English side of the question is frankly presented, will form in this respect a useful supplement to the ordinary "History of the United States." It is largely based on original documents, some of which have only lately become accessible; and by making statesmen and diplomatists, as far as possible, speak for themselves in quotations from their letters and despatches, Mr. Smith often throws a gleam of light over a subject of which a sententiously disposed reviewer might fairly say that not even Gibbon's vivacity could enliven it, nor Hallam's impartiality so handle it as to convince the reader that its rights and wrongs had been definitively settled. He has done wisely in abstaining from bringing the work up to date; and no better halting-place could have been selected than the settlement of the Alabama claims. However unsatisfactory as a specimen of the kind of justice to be expected from international courts of arbitration, the Geneva award was in other respects a veritable auspicium melioris aevi. Loyally accepted by the losing party, it put an end to a violent and protracted dispute, and established an inestimable precedent; and the previous quarrels of the two countries, reviewed in the light of the altered conditions produced by it, assume something of the character of ancient history. It has, at any rate, become a less invidious task to turn the search-light of history upon them as Mr. Smith has so successfully done in this volume.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The Sonnets.

A NEW STUDY OF THE SONNETS OF SHAKESPEARE, by Parke Godwin (Putnam, 6s. n.), is an inconsiderable book, although it proposes to itself to effect "a complete revolution in this branch of Shakespearian literature," and professes to lift the Sonnets "from a low level of petty concern up to a high point of æsthetic interest and significance." A few examples will serve to test the qualities which entitle Mr. Godwin to intervene in a controversy over which a good deal of superfluous ink has perhaps already been shed. He indulges in the wildest emendations, converting, for instance, "olives of endless age" into "a lease of endless age," and "the perfumed tincture of the roses" into "the perfumed cincture of the roses." He uses the a priori argument from Shakespeare's perfection and asserts that the poet "could never, under any circumstances, have written to or of any woman whose acquaintance he had sought that her sensuality was as insatiable as the sea." Mr. Sidney Lee may be interested to know that his contrary opinion on this point is "so grossly offensive that it is a disgrace to literature." Finally, he thinks that the famous sonnet which begins:—

> My Mistress' eyes are nothing like the Sun,
> Coral is far more red than her lips red,
> If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun;
> If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head;

may be a serious compliment to—Anne Hathaway. Mr. Godwin says:—

> A sonnet like this could not have been addressed to a lady of rank, or in high society, because such ladies were accustomed to a very different style, and would have been offended by its qualified and negative praise. It might, however, very well have been addressed to a person in the poet's own condition to whom he pays the greater honour by disclaiming for her those artificial compliments which seem to have been needed by the others.

It does not seem necessary to expound at length Mr. Godwin's unconvincing interpretation of the Sonnets. He dates them much too early in the poet's life, and he courts failure by rearranging them in a fanciful sequence of his own. To do this is to invite immediate chaos.

In the Commons.

Once upon a time there was a member of Parliament who wore a white waistcoat; a large waistcoat, for he was a large man. There was also a certain journalist, who perceived that his readers were less interested in his accounts of the business of Parliament than in his descriptions of the white waistcoats and other external characteristics of the members. A new and easily worked vein of newspaper humour was thus opened up, and the original discoverer, being unable to patent his trivialities, soon had many rivals and imitators. We are strongly reminded of these gentlemen by Mr. Kinnear, whose book, OUR HOUSE OF COMMONS: Its Realities and Romance (Blackwood, 3s. 6d.), just touches the fringe of interesting subjects in a disappointing way, and too often enlarges on matters of no importance at all. Frankly, we learn nothing from his gossip about the mace, the terrace, working hats, five-line whips, the dining room, and the ladies' gallery. Nor do we care to be told which of the members wear white trousers in summer, or to hear that Mr. Balfour sometimes plays golf without a hat, and that Lord James of Hereford likes to wear red neckties. In a free country, one tolerates even these amazing eccentricities. Mr. Kinnear, we are sure, could have written a better book if he had taken himself and his subject more seriously, and if he had been more careful with his English. We should like to ask him—What is the proper use of the Scotch word "ilk"? How do you explain the statement that "Mr. Balfour suffers from musical euthanasia"? Is it correct to say "But these are not dandies to be circumvented in a band-box"? What are "Parthian paragraphs"? How do you reconcile your statement that "pairing is a modern invention. Thirty or forty years ago it was unknown" with the fact that Disraeli speaks of it in 1845 as a well-understood practice? Criticize the following sentence:—"I shall have more to say of these worthy people, who, curious as it may seem, the more the social exclusiveness of the House of Commons is fined down, the less easy it is for them to make their way at St. Stephen's." And, finally, how far is it true to say of Cabinet Ministers that "No one, unless he be some superconscientious public servant, like the late Mr. Smith, is inclined or silly enough to take his office seriously"?

Reprints.

Messrs. Methuen's "Little Library" of tasteful booklets, which we have already commended once or twice, now contains the EARLY POEMS and MAUD of Tennyson and Kinglake's EOTHEN. The first of the Tennyson volumes is edited by Mr. Churton Collins, the second by Miss Elizabeth Wordsworth, with appropriate introductions in each case. These are not school books, and we cannot think that readers will get pleasure or much profit from such a note as this of Miss Wordsworth's:—

> And ever he muttered and madden'd and ever wann'd with despair.
> [Wanned. Grew wan. Unusual. Notice the alliterations here and in verse 6.]

Mr. Churton Collins' notes are what is wanted. But it is a pity that he should introduce errata into his errata. The correction which he notes on p. 212, line 11, should be p. 212, line 6.

The "Eothen" of Methuen's "Little Library" has a remarkable preface by an anonymous writer, containing, besides a good estimate and criticism of Kinglake, an account, by way of comparison, of the Turkey of to-day—interesting, almost brilliant. "Anon." is a wide traveller. Writing in a New York journal, he gives an amusing account of a journey to Karakeui—how, after quarantine, he promised the doctor in charge that he would procure him the fourth class of the Garter, with the result that when the jet of corrosive fluid was turned on, the Turkish medico directed "an odoriferous douche to the right and left," leaving "Anon." unwetted in the middle. Also how he discovered from a liberal-minded Muhammedan "Inspector of Reforms" that "a mixture of brandy and champagne does not fall under the Prophet's ban, inasmuch as it cannot accurately be described as either wine or spirits."

A more complete collection of TENNYSON'S EARLY POEMS than the one just mentioned, 1830-1857 (text only), is contained in a new and delightful little volume, with clear print on India paper, issued by Mr. Frowde as "The Oxford Miniature Edition."

An important library reprint, clothed in the elegant style which marks Messrs. Dent's issues of English classics, is that of Meric Casaubon's translation of the MEDITATIONS OF MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS (7s. 6d. n.). It is edited by Mr. W. H. D. Rouse, with a capital introduction, critical and biographical, on the author of the "Meditations," an appendix dealing in an interesting way, by the help of extracts, with Antoninus' correspondence with Fronto; brief notes, mostly textual, a glossary, and index of subjects. The only thing we rather desiderate in this well-edited book is some bibliographical matter—the history of the "Meditations" in this country from their first great popularity a century before Casaubon, in Lord Berners' translation (from the French), would be worth a chapter. Mr. Rouse aptly compares the work of Marcus Aurelius with that of Thomas à Kempis, and finds this great difference—that "the 'Imitation' is addressed to others, the 'Meditations' by the writer to himself." A revised translation of THE IMITATION OF CHRIST, printed on India paper, comes from Mr. Frowde, and uniform with it a CHRISTIAN YEAR (2s. to 7s. 6d. each). In the "Imitation" the traditional arrangement into verses is wisely abandoned, the index of subjects much enlarged, and an index of Scriptural and other quotations added.

Mr. Lane's "Lovers' Library" begins with the LOVE POEMS OF SHELLEY and the LOVE POEMS OF ROBERT BROWNING—delightful booklets charmingly printed with ornamental borders, the very thing for a lovelorn swain on a summer's eve to put in his pocket—his waistcoat pocket would hold them—and pore over by the gurgling brook. If the uncertainty of the sex makes him turn philosopher, he will, perhaps, take rather another little book of exactly the same size, DR. JOHNSON'S TABLE TALK, which now appears as one of Messrs. Gay and Bird's Bibelots, with a preface containing a happy collection of diverse criticisms on Johnson.

Of the Fitzgerald MISCELLANIES in the Golden Treasury Series (Macmillan, 2s. 6d. n.) we have already given some account. It is not an important volume, but there is a pleasant, old-fashioned flavour in the dialogue about many things called Euphranor; some good criticism of Crabbe; some capital reading on the subject of apothegms and truisms in the "Preface to Polonius"; and some characteristic letters of Lamb in the "Life of Bernard Barton," and all is in that graceful, amiable, unpretentious English prose which is, it would seem, becoming a lost art.

The Scott Library.

The voluminous Scott Library has now reached its 113th volume. It steers a middle course between the "Library Edition" and the book "for the pocket," and is in many ways—its print among other things—one of the most attractive of literary series. It has ranged widely over literature—ancient and modern, English and foreign; and it now gives us SELECTED THOUGHTS OF PASCAL, translated and edited by Gertrude Burford Rawlings, and—a very interesting work which deserves more general study—THE LETTERS OF THE YOUNGER PLINY, translated and edited by Mr. J. B. Firth, in two volumes. Mr. Firth's introduction is well adapted to put his readers in touch with Pliny, but in comparing Pliny with Virgil as an admirer of natural scenery he seems to be unaware that the latter wrote the work called "The Georgics."

Personalia.

It occurred to Mr. T. P. O'Connor some time ago that the Interview was "played out." Like a true journalist he determined to substitute the Autobiography, and the result is now visible between boards, covered in red cloth and lettered IN THE DAYS OF MY YOUTH (Pearson, 7s. 6d.). Mr. O'Connor has lured the secrets of their past from those who are distinguished in music, letters, art, or the drama; and we may learn here from the very lips, as it were, of Mr. Fred Terry or Mr. Clement Scott how they became great. Mr. O'Connor's discovery was not altogether new. Novelists had already told the history of their earliest books, but the revival proved a feature of his popular weekly. In these sketchy chapters these thirty-five ladies and gentlemen discourse on the subject that interests them most. The journalistic net has included within its meshes divers eminent personalities—the Duke of Argyll and Mr. Phil May, Mr. Maskelyne and Mme. Sarah Grand. Sir Richard Temple labours at the oar in the same galley with Mr. Frankfort Moore. It is a curious medley, but it will no doubt sell.

THE STORY OF EGYPT in the Story of the Empire Series (Horace Marshall, 1s. 6d.), by W. Basil Worsfold, is a valuable addition to an interesting group of books. The ancient history of the country is only given in outline, but from the Dual Control onwards the subject is treated carefully and exhaustively. More attention is very properly given to the mysteries of Egyptian irrigation and finance than to the military expeditions to Suakin and the Sudan. Mr. Worsfold's manner is a little professorial and ponderous, but he is lucid. No one can rise from the perusal of his pages without understanding exactly what is meant by Mixed Tribunals, Caisse de la Dette, Capitulations, &c. The frequent quotations from the Blue-books are well selected.

A further volume in Mr. Nutt's little series of Arthurian Romances contains GUINGAMOR, LANVAL, TYOLET, AND THE WEREWOLF (2s. n.). Here we have Breton lais which are not, with the exception of the second, definitely Arthurian. They are, however, rightly included in the series as representing the mass of tradition on which the Arthurian Epic was founded. Three of the lays are from the French of Marie de France, who lived in the reign of Henry II.

Those who pick up Mr. Frederick Treves' THE TALE OF A FIELD HOSPITAL (Cassell, 6s.) in the hope of finding piquant details about the "plague of women" will be disappointed. This branch of the subject is altogether ignored. Instead, there are stories of what the soldier said under chloroform or while waiting to have a limb amputated. It is an unpretentious little book, very prettily bound in leather, and illustrated with photographs of varying merit. Some of it has appeared before in the British Medical Journal.

THROUGH FIVE TURKISH PROVINCES, by Mark Sykes (Bickers, 7s. 6d.), is a relation of a journey, as it would have been called in the eighteenth century, from Damascus to Baghdad, and thence by way of Lake Van to Tiflis and Batum. It is quite short and quite unimportant: but it is pleasantly written, and there are some tolerable pictures.

Mr. Jesse Page has produced a very interesting and readable handbook in his ALFRED THE GREAT (Partridge, 2s.). Asser is his chief authority, but he does not approach his subject in a spirit too severely historical, and rejects none of the ancient legends.

ART.

French Architects and Sculptors of the Eighteenth Century. By Lady Dilke. (George Bell and Sons. 28s. n.)

In her writings upon the Art of the epoch which she has most studied Lady Dilke sets an excellent example to more than one of her contemporaries, who, by means of an unbridled diffuseness of style, economise their own labour. They possess a double reward; for, not only is their own effort diminished, but they commend themselves by their very verbosity to a public that likes to read much and that insists on reading hastily. Lady Dilke, like one or two chosen writers who love the Eighteenth Century as she does, adopts another and, in the end, a preferable plan. She gives us, in limited pages, the quintessence of her knowledge and her thought. In this book upon French Architecture and Sculpture she errs, where she errs at all, upon the side not exactly of terseness — for that is hardly possible — but of unadvisable reticence. She has rightly made it her aim, or one of her aims—and she tells us so in her preface—to give "such an account of the artists' lives as may render them something more than mere names to us," and yet in writing about him who was the most vivacious artist of all, and certainly also one of the most considerable—we mean Clodion—she tells us very little of his life save that in his actual days there was reflected something of the licence of his work. In one or two other ways Lady Dilke's treatment of Clodion is not exactly what one would wish it to be. Clearly, she appreciates him; and, therefore, in a book which by reason of its very theme is scarcely likely to penetrate to the bourgeoisie—which must be written and meant for amateurs and critics, gens du monde—she would have done well, we think, to have been, in regard to her illustrations, less restricted in choice, and so to have shown more plainly to the eye wherein it was that Clodion's talent differed most from that of the sturdy giant Houdon and that of the more or less austere Falconet. Edmond de Goncourt, mannerisms apart, might have written well upon Clodion; and his would have been a liberty Lady Dilke might have done not ill to imitate. We should never ask or expect her, or any really serious critic, to address herself to the description of more than "risky" productions in the spirit in which it pleased M. Huysmans (whose work in the matter had better be forgotten) to address himself to an elaborate commentary on what in Fine Prints has been described as Felicien Rops' "disordered dream." So much for that matter. Where Lady Dilke has erred, it has been upon the side of reticence and restraint.

The public, even the artistic public, naturally turns first to the second part of her book. It is a naughty habit; but it is easier to take interest in the achievements of Sculpture—pure Art from end to end—than in performances and efforts whose first cause is convenience or necessity. The architect designs because he must, the sculptor because he will. Yet Lady Dilke, whose grasp of the whole matter is broad and firm, who is a grave and comprehensive student, and neither an accidental dilettante nor an academic dry-as-dust, appropriately points out to us that much of the best Sculpture and Modelling of the great French Eighteenth Century was a result of its Architecture. The two are welded indissolubly. The decoration, not only of the garden or the façade, but of the apartment, engaged the attention of those supple modellers who understood the value of proportion in Ornament; the place or part that is played by scale as well as by workmanship, by juxtaposition as well as by individual brilliance or character. The ordinary public is a little too apt to consider sculptor, modeller, decorative painter even, as the performer of a solo. But, properly judged, he has his place in the orchestra, and, even there, can hardly expect to be the leader of the violins. Like an actor at the Français, the sculptor who is in association with Architecture knows how to withdraw himself into the background while others have advanced to "the flout." His conception of his proper place is not that it is one upon which the lime-light must be ever turned. Of course, not only is his subordination far from being continuous, but his performance upon his own instrument may sometimes take thought only of himself, his theme, his instrument's display. There are times when he may have nothing to do with others. Wholly individual and isolated are some of the smallest and most characteristic performances of this or that brilliant modeller. The sculptor on a large scale, like Constean le fils, in his Tomb of the Dauphin in the Cathedral of Sens — still more in his "Venus" at Potsdam—and like Bouchardon, in his Fountain of the Rue de Grenelle, like Houdon in his noble "Diana," his Gluck, his Voltaire, his Mlle. Brogniart, is often independent of that which is around him. All the same it must be remembered that not a little of sculptured work waits of necessity in the train of the architect, and that its success or failure, its appropriateness or inappropriateness, will depend much upon what measure of suppleness may exist in the talent of its author. Now flexibility, suppleness, is one of the very "notes" of the French temperament.

That portion of Lady Dilke's new book which is concerned expressly with Architecture is treated with at least as much of judicial, true critical, ability as that which deals with the creators of individual work in marble or terre cuite. Indeed, as far as Criticism is concerned, the subject of Architecture as a whole is fresher, presents more of virgin ground, than that of Sculpture, though French Sculpture has certainly been little enough written about by any English historian of æsthetic progress. Lady Dilke's comprehensive view of her theme and her power of generalization are evidenced in almost her earliest pages, where, instead of inviting our attention to the merits of a particular man or a particular work, she reminds us of what was, broadly speaking, the great task of the French Eighteenth Century Architecture—to adapt to the private service and pleasure of men that Art which had been exercised under Louis the Fourteenth for collective purposes and for public glory. It was often not a case of originally planning; it was a case, literally, of adapting. With a zeal which, had it been possessed by inferior minds, there would, unquestionably, be reason to call destructive, not to say desecrating, artists of taste and fine capacity set themselves to carve out a dozen chambers where the first architect had planned and made but a vast salon. But in new work also—in an abundance of it, scattered between Rennes and Rheims, between Bordeaux and Nancy—the architects of the younger school, of whom Ange Gabriel, the creator of the Petit Trianon and of the École Militaire, was one of the most exquisite, employed their best faculties in designing, right and left, the comfortable private house. And it is remarked with some subtlety that the squares, the Places which make so much of the charm of the French Eighteenth Century Town—great Places still left to us in abundance—are the result at once of the comparatively novel need for the charming residence and of the retention of the great traditions received from the time when French Architecture was devoted mainly to stately and august purpose. In these great Places—of which the Place Stanislas at Nancy, and the Place Royal at Bordeaux, and it may be even the never-finished Place St. Sulpice in Paris, may stand for examples—the ambition of the financier, more probably than that of the noble, was gratified by the juxtaposition of his abode to such public buildings as the town required, and there was thus secured for private buildings, or rather for the town that contained them, a participation in the symmetry and dignity of a general scheme.

We could have wished the illustrations to the architectural section of Lady Dilke's volume to be more abundant. The Portail of St. Roch, which Lady Dilke writes of most reasonably, should have been figured. And, indeed, in the text, more might have vouchsafed of Ecclesiastical Architecture generally. Many churches of the French Eighteenth Century merit, at least, as much comment as Lady Dilke has properly and interestingly bestowed upon the Church of Sulpice, whose front—almost too visibly the work of three artists—dominates the quartier du Luxembourg. Servandoni's is the main part of it, but neither of the towers by which the extremities of his spectacular façade are flanked or capped is the work of this showy yet often original artist—decorator, and master of pageants, quite as much as architect. Whatever be the book's deficiencies, Lady Dilke is to be congratulated on her good judgment, and thanked for the continuity of her devotion to her great and necessary theme.

Those who remember the first exhibition—about the year 1885, we think—of the New English Art Club will recognize in the pictures now on exhibition at the Dudley Gallery some of the qualities which brought fame to the public inauguration. The spirit of protest is less apparent and less necessary. With Mr. W. Orpen's work, especially "The Mirror," in which the poetry of the subject is quietly insisted on, the two studies by C. H. Shannon, the "Old Farmyard," by Frank Mura, the better of the two Rothensteins (No. 101)—not the portrait of a gentleman with his head in the air—the portrait-sketch of Lord Roberts, by Chas. Furse, and the graceful and pleasantly coloured "Memories," by David Muirhead, we get back to the best qualities of the earlier exhibitions of the club. There is less of the work—with the possible exceptions of Nos. 38 and 45, the "blobesque" No. 63, the badly-drawn and opaque No. 68, the unfinished No. 73, the affected No. 79, the sham Monticelli (No. 116), and the Jill and the Beanstalk (No. 93)—which caused the scoffers to hint that the members were hiding their inefficiency behind their self-sufficiency. The freedom of "The Escaped Bird," by Henry Tonks, is in the barely declared new manner, with the sentiment of the fifties expressed in the handling of to-day. Mr. W. W. Russell in his two pictures (Nos. 70 and 71) which hang side by side, seems to disclose the fallacy of many former efforts by members of the club, and leads us to conjecture whether "the breadth" which has so long been their boast is either sheer laziness or a mere convention.

The thirty-nine pictures "painted specially for Messrs. Thos. Agnew and Sons by distinguished artists of the English School"—so runs the catalogue—demand no great effort at recognition. It is, perhaps, difficult to justify the title. It is questionable whether there is any "English School" to-day, and if there is the majority of these thirty-nine cannot be said to belong to it. They are excellent painters, all of them, and they paint what we should expect them to paint. Mr. Arthur Hacker almost alone seems to have striven to avoid a mere repetition of himself. If Art is the science of painting only the collection justifies all praise, for the dexterous artist is strongly represented. The public also which likes pictures will see them to better advantage at Messrs. Agnew's than it can at the Royal Academy. It will find a characteristic example of Orchardson, a typical Abbey and Waterhouse, a fine Sargent, a poetic landscape by Waterlow, a Leader much as usual, a loosely-painted Macbeth, a powerful La Thangue, a Gow, a very "tight" Storey, and a small replica of Fildes' "Doctor." The little collection is so well hung, the charitable object so worthy, and the pictures so well selected as examples of well-known painters that no member of the picture-seeing public should miss it.

To cross the road to Messrs. Forbes and Paterson's loan collection of pictures by Monticelli will be, for many people, to step out of their depth. It is late now to re-fight the battle of Monticelli and the romanticists. Monticelli's position is assured. He is novel, daring, and unexpected. The empâtement of his technique is prodigious. Let the new-comer look beyond what may appear to be obvious faults for the positive virtues and he will understand the enthusiasm for so great a colourist. Many of the pictures now shown belong to the Montparnasse period, and each is worthy of inspection.

Mr. Herbert J. Finn follows up his successes of former years with a collection of water-colour drawings at the Modern Gallery which will arrest the student. In his treatment of architectural subjects Mr. Finn has arrived at a compromise which is unusual. The insistence upon detail, the almost painful accuracy of the architectural draughtsman is absent, and yet the knowledge of it is present. The artist has attained to great certainty of hand, and yet sees his subjects broadly, and treats them quite as much as atmospheric effects as records of eleventh and thirteenth century buildings. In this combination Mr. Finn has no rival amongst English painters.

In the pleasant little collection of "Some Recent Work," by Oliver Hall, at the Dowdeswell Galleries, the well-known painter-etcher discloses a mastery over his new method which was not so conclusively shown two years ago. In the forty-eight pictures now displayed there is a more certain touch; the positive virtues of the work are more readily recognizable. Mr. Hall has gained in colour without losing any of that sense of tone which he has always possessed to perfection, and we may expect him in the fulness of talent to approach his master Corot.

FICTION.

Mrs. Steel.

One is tempted to review Mrs. Steel's THE HEARTS OF THE LORD (Heinemann, 6s.) in the terms of musical criticism. It reminds one of those difficult symphonies which leave behind them a vague general impression, but no definite recollection of a tune. The average client of the libraries who ploughs conscientiously through it will infallibly be left wondering what it is all about. We ourselves, fresh from its perusal, would very much rather not try to make a précis of it, or undertake to say who all the characters were, and what they were all doing, and why—though we have, and shall retain, a vivid recollection of one very spirited scene in which a mob tries to break into a gaol, and the governor and two other men, and a lady and a little child stand siege in the tower over the entrance gate. The rest is vague—a kind of symbolism of the better sort, from which emerges the impression of the clashing of the ideas of the civilizations of the East and West, at issue over the functions of a river. The West conceives the river as a place in which pilgrims may wash away their sins; the East regards it as the feeder of a canal. Hence mutual misunderstandings and a riot. There are those who salute Mrs. Steel, on the strength of such work, as the great interpreter of the Hindu mind: but this is, if not exaggerated praise, at all events praise of the wrong sort. Criticizing the book from that point of view, one would have to say that the interpretation itself requires to be interpreted. At the end of the book, as at the beginning, the Hindu is a mysterious person with his own way of looking at things, which is quite different from our way. But the actual operations of his mysterious mind are not made clear to us, and we do not think that they were meant to be. Mrs. Steel is not one of the writers who take their characters to pieces to show us how the wheels go round. The element of mystery is essential to her picture. She is not the interpreter but the impressionist of Anglo-Indian life; and though impressionism may be instructive after a fashion, it is not quite the same thing as interpretation. How much greater is Mrs. Steel's own interest in her impressionism than in her story—or stories, for there are several, and no one of them stands out beyond the others in importance—may be judged from the fact that she dismisses the most fascinating of her heroines at the very moment when the real drama of her life is about to begin. This heroine is a missionary, very earnest, but very beautiful and very human, and very much in love with a cavalry officer, and on the last page she marries an unattractive preacher with whom she has nothing but her religious sympathies in common. That way lies drama, stronger than any drama unfolded in the book. Did Mrs. Steel fail to see it? Or did she deliberately ignore it, as disturbing to the general impression of her picture? Or is she keeping it for a sequel? If so, it is a sequel to which we shall look forward.

Mr. Percy White.

It may be presumed that Mr. Percy White does not desire THE JOURNAL OF A JEALOUS WOMAN (Nisbet, 6s.) to be taken seriously as an essay towards the criticism of life. If he did, it would be necessary to protest against the moral of his story which seems to be nothing less than that a wife's jealousy ought by no means to be aroused by her husband's infidelities, real or only apparent, provided that he is amiable and allows her a share of his heart. Even if there were something to be said for this view in a world of compromises and accommodations, it is hardly one of the verities that it is well to proclaim from the house-tops. Let us be contented, therefore, to accept the book as a comedy of modern manners. In that respect it is admirable. Few of our social satirists have so light a touch or so true an instinct for the weak place as Mr. Percy White. His hero is a young man of talent and culture who makes a fortune by founding popular newspapers—a penny weekly and a halfpenny daily—which delight the man in the street and the young woman in the shop; but which he himself regards, very justly, as beneath contempt. The reported saying of an actual newspaper proprietor that "a fool is born every minute of the day, and he is the man I mean to cater for," may well have suggested the idea, though we are inclined to believe that the newspaper proprietor misjudged himself, and had a far less cultivated and more vulgar mind than in his vanity he imagined. But this is by the way, and hardly affects the merit of Mr. White's amusing work. Towards the end of the book the note of pathos is struck; and Mr. White's pathos, of which he is usually so chary, is as true as his humour. The same thought occurred to us when reading "The West End"; and we shall look forward with interest to seeing Mr. White write a novel in which the central interest is serious and the humour only incidental.

By Edmund Fullerton (Longmans, 6s.), by Mr. B. B. West, which bears the alternative title of "The Family Evil Genius," we are not sure that many readers will be greatly entertained. The "Goswell Montagues" and the "Gorhambury Capulets," as Mr. West allusively describes the two families with whose histories he deals, are not very agreeable. Aided by many a dark scheme and financial plot Mr. West produces a long and, in some ways, skilfully-written book. His hero is minutely analysed and all the characters drawn with almost loving care. But Mr. West's argumentative and commentatory method of presenting his story must modify the praise which, were it more lucidly set forth, would certainly be its due.

Major Arthur Griffiths has found time in the intervals of dissertations on the Army to write a detective story, The Brand of the Broad Arrow (C. A. Pearson, 6s.). On prison life Major Griffiths is, of course, always interesting, and we felt regret when the villain of the book escaped from Portland in the opening chapter. After that George Gringo, alias Vaughan, behaves much as any self-respecting convict feels bound to act in the pages of a novel. He finds his wife married to a foreign prince, and proceeds on the inevitable course of "squeezing" the unfortunate woman by threatening an exposure. The story moves without flagging, which is the great point, and the policemen, warders, and other officials of this kind are presented with a refreshing accuracy of detail.

The Poitet Show, by Marian Bower (Constable, 6s.), is a depressing but vigorous novel. The types are well realized, but disagreeable. The dying girl and her dying lover haunt one—she all bitterness and toleration of his feverish devotion, he all morbid jealousy and moribund passion. It is an unsavoury subject, and though these two are only minor characters they flavour the book. Babette's painted mother, with her horrible coquetries and her fat and fatuous husband, do not sweeten it much. It is a relief when at last a wholesome love affair becomes possible, and John Thisselton discovers the madness in his family to be "the particular form which is proved not to be hereditary." Miss Marian Bower can certainly write. We shall hope for another novel from her with less of wormwood about it.

Miss Florence Montgomery, whose "Misunderstood" was such an extraordinary success in more sentimental times than ours, has given us a rather commonplace novel in Prejudged (Macmillan, 6s.). The story runs smoothly and the hero is sympathetic; the heroine, however, is conventional, too prone to blush, to look shy, and to bend over her drawings. Miss Montgomery's hero thinks that American and French women are more agreeable and understand better the "art" of conversation than Englishwomen. What he saw in the stiff and unpleasant heroine we are at a loss to understand. As for Miss Montgomery's French, the less said about it the better. Such mistakes as Rien de tout, une bonne ménage, Une triste Casino, and mieux loin que près, la dotte, are depressing.

The Pilgrim Sire (C. A. Pearson, 6s.) is ingenious, but Mr. Headon Hill contrives to pack so much exciting incident into it that most readers will become weary before the finish. "Cleverly conceived" is the only verdict that can be passed on it. For whom are books of this kind intended? There is no portrait here, no key of sixteen with the brain and muscle of twenty-five, so it cannot be a "boy's book." But it is odd that grown men should care to lose themselves in the maze of adventures that befell Walter Lynden, that sordy-tried chief mate of the Sea Hawk. Mr. Hill is fertile in ideas, and it is a pity he cannot employ his talent to better purpose. But presumably he has his public—of what age and position it is, perhaps, idle to inquire too curiously.

Farthest South, by Harold E. Gorst (Greening, 2s. 6d.), is an ostensibly humorous story of a preposterous journey to the South Pole. It is poor fooling, and quite unworthy of Mr. Gorst, who has shown himself capable of much better work.

Correspondence.

LORD ROSEBERY'S "NAPOLEON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your Reviewer makes two allegations which seem to require correction. One is sufficiently trite and inconsequent—viz., that Napoleon was not a gentleman. Now a gentleman, properly speaking, is a "man of ancestry"; and to Dr. Johnson all other definitions "seem whimsical." There can be no question that Napoleon had this right to the name—even Sir John Seeley admits so much. But Emerson, in a frothy ebullition of inflated Carlyllism, has dubbed Napoleon no gentleman, and the cheap sneer has become a psittacism, like that of Pope on Bacon, and equally vapid. With regard to the specialized double meaning of the word, is it not a solecism to call any victorious War Lord a gentleman?

Secondly, and to take the battle into the field of literature—can a historian dispassionately distort facts or insert unproved scandal into his work at the expense of a great man's reputation and himself retain any claim to the title of gentleman? If Julius Cæsar was a gentleman, what about Froude; if Frederick the Great, what of Macaulay; if Marlborough, what of Lord Wolseley? With the exception of Hannibal and Von Moltke I can think of no past master of warcraft who was not either "no gentleman" or—a prig.

The greatest living general has declared that the more we study Wellington the more we admire him as a warrior and the less we like him as a man. Napoleon, said Metternich, was born an administrator, a legislator, and a conqueror. If, however, he had wasted his active life in rubbing up his reputation and varnishing his portrait for posterity, the verdict of history might have been that of St. Peter on the soul of Tomlinson:—

> "Ye have read, ye have heard, ye have thought," said he,
> "and the tale is yet to run:
> By the worth of the body that once ye had, give answer—
> what ha' ye done?"

Rudeness was a weapon in the hands of Napoleon, which was at once a revenge and usually his sole punishment, if the victim had the sense to take the hint. Such was the well-merited rebuff that he gave to the egregious busybody who "talked down Europe and wrote Corinne." We have the grudging testimony of the somewhat cross-grained Admiral Keith, as to the charming manners of Napoleon—a statement confirmed by Maitland and Sir Henry Bunbury—at a time when his temper was most sorely tried. We know how, later, he was compelled to hide in order to avoid the involuntary anger which supervened whenever his gaoler forced his unwelcome presence upon him.

This brings us to the second statement of your Reviewer, that Sir Hudson Lowe was the better man of the two. What is meant—a better man intellectually or morally? No one can read Lord Rosebery's chapter on Lowe, or the quotations therefrom in the current Weekly Times, and remain in doubt as to his mental calibre. Can we seriously be asked to believe that such a creature was intellectual peer to the Man of his Century, the man who had "made his Marshals out of mud"; who had stamped out the glowing embers of the French Revolution, restoring, as if by magic, order and religion; who had destroyed Feudalism in Europe and the Inquisition in Spain; who has bequeathed to his country the best Bank, and to the human race the finest Civil Code that the world has ever seen? Even as a patron of literature he will well serve as a model for to-day: he who inspired Egyptology, the Biographie Universelle, and the Order of the Legion of Honour.

But morally? Lord Rosebery has pointed out that "truth was in those days neither expected nor required in Continental statesmanship"; and for that matter Napoleon would have held his own as a liar with difficulty against our Queen Elizabeth. Finally, we have had his character summed up by Sir Walter Scott, a Tory of the Tories, but the most keen-eyed and competent of contemporary critics: "If, instead of asserting that he never committed a crime, he had limited his self-eulogy to asserting that in attaining and wielding supreme power he had resisted the temptation to commit many, he could not have been contradicted. And this is no small praise. . . . In closing the life of Napoleon Buonaparte we are called upon to observe that he was a man tried in the two extremities of the most exalted power and the most ineffable calamity, and . . . it is scarce within the capacity of those whose steps have never led them beyond the middle path of life to estimate either the strength of the temptations to which he yielded or the force of mind which he opposed to those which he was able to resist."

Yours faithfully,

Sheffield, Nov. 12, 1900. H. F. HALL.

 Mr. Hall does not, as it seems to us, give a fair impression of our Review on either point. Our Reviewer will deal further with the matter next week.

THE READING OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—As a young artisan I must express the pleasure it gave me to read the admirable article of Mr. T. C. Phillips in last week's Literature. The common assertion—made generally by those who do not know—that fiction is the only mental pabulum of the working classes is far from the truth. An ampler, juster consideration of the question was needed, and the article proved Mr. Phillips' fitness for the task.

One point only I wish to emphasize—that is, the necessity for a sound knowledge in every scholar of the beauties of English Literature. What is being done in this direction? In the curriculum of most primary schools English Literature is conspicuous by its absence, or, if taught at all, is in the form of a few extracts from a school reader or a play of Shakespeare's forced into the mind of the young pupil to be repeated parrot-like on some future Examination Day. Such methods excite disgust rather than interest, and when schooldays are done he either does no reading at all or else gluts his mind with the scraps and refuse of the newspaper shop. In small towns where there are no public libraries school libraries should certainly be provided, where the scholar, with the help of a sympathetic and capable guide, could acquire that love of good literature which alone can give real pleasure and solace to a life of toil.

To the improvident minds of school authorities generally, libraries are luxuries which, now that fees have been dispensed with, are altogether beyond their power to supply. Cardiff has proved the contrary.

It is to be hoped that every school in the country will soon be as well equipped and as intelligently managed as are the schools of that progressive town.

Yours faithfully,

Stourport. REG. JONES.

THE VICTORIA COUNTY HISTORIES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It appears to me that Mr. W. H. D. Rouse does not understand the motive of the publishers of the Victoria History in destroying any volumes which are not subscribed for.

As I understand the conditions from a careful perusal of the prospectus, the arrangement was made to prevent anything in the shape of a "remainder" appearing in the market. Many of us have learned from bitter experience that, shortly after purchasing an expensive book, it is to be had at a fraction of the price we paid for it, and, as a consequence, we not unnaturally are inclined to wait until the remainders make their appearance. It is not surprising, I think, that in the case of so important a work as the Victoria History the publishers have felt it necessary to protect their subscribers from the "remainder man."

With reference to Mr. F. J. Burgoyne's letter, every free public library throughout the country ought most certainly to possess a set of the Victoria History. It seems, however, to have escaped the notice of your correspondents that if the committees of the public libraries conceive the idea that the spare copies are to be had eventually for nothing, they will scarcely be such fools as to subscribe for even a single volume.

The libraries ought to be supplied with the History, but it seems to me that this is a case for public spirit among the wealthier residents in each locality.

I am yours faithfully,

ALFRED HUTTON.

"THE CANTERBURY TALES."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Though I feel diffident in entering into a controversy with Dr. Skeat, I still hope to be able to convert him to my view of the meaning of the word Pryme, in a spirit of deference due scholar to a master.

I intended in my last letter to submit that 6 o'clock a.m. was not only what Pryme ought to mean, but what it did mean in Chaucer's time, and that Dr. Skeat had given the meaning too broadly when he makes Pryme equivalent to 9 a.m. The passages in his notes to which he refers in his answer I am well acquainted with. In one of them, vol. v. p. 286, he takes pryme not in any ordinary colloquial sense to mean 9 a.m., but in its clerical or canonical sense. He seems to lay it down not only that it did mean, but that it ought to mean 9, even in its canonical sense. For on the lines 661-662 of the Pardoner's Tale, where the Pardoner wishes to show how very early in the day the bad men began their riot, and says—

> Thise ryotoures three of whiche I telle, > Longe erst pryme rong of any belle had begun their riot; though this, as Dr. Skeat admits, clearly refers to the bell summoning the monks to their canonical office of pryme, which was said at 6 o'clock, and the word is not here used in any colloquial or general sense; yet, nevertheless, even here Dr. Skeat's note has "about 9 o'clock." In a note to the Ryme of Sir Thopas Dr. Skeat somewhat softens this absolute law which he lays down elsewhere, and says "Prime commonly means the period from 6 to 9, fully prime refers to the end of that period." So, here it is not prime which means 9, as in the two passages I referred in my last letter, but only "fully prime." But what is it Sir Thopas says (ll. 2,013-2,015)—

> Thy mawe
> Shal I pereen, if I may
> Er it be fully pryme of day.

I suggest "fully pryme" here only means quite prime—i.e., Sir Thopas boasts he will slay Sir Oliphant before sunrise. He is boasting how soon he will slay him. To say he will slay him before 9, which was a late hour, often after dinner, would have little meaning.

But Dr. Skeat relies on the words of the cock in the Nonne Preestes Tale. What do they amount to? At l. 4,362 the cock "fley doun fro the beem, For it was day." Chaucer knew the habits of birds, and that they begin their day as soon as it is light. Having flown down the cock struts about for a time, and acted as cocks do even in the early morning, then he discovers (l. 4,386) "That it was pryme and crew with blisful stevene. 'The sonne,' he seyde, 'is clomben up on hevene Fourty degrees and on.'" Dr. Skeat and Mr. Brae work this out seriously, and no doubt correctly conclude, if the cock had been an astronomer, that it ought to have been 9 o'clock on the morning of May 3 towards the end of the fourteenth century. Dr. Skeat assumes it was May 3; Mr. Brae, I think, writing from memory, makes it May 2, though Chaucer distinctly says it was (l. 4,380) "syn March begonne thritty dayes and two," which to any ordinary reader, despite all any professors say, means April the first. It was a suitable day. The fox makes a fool of the cock, and the cock afterwards makes a fool of the fox. Chaucer lets us know the day and the month. But, whatever the date, Chaucer is laughing at the cock throughout and his astronomical observations, and showing the danger of a little knowledge. He did not mean us to take the bird seriously as Dr. Skeat and Mr. Brae have done, and as Thynne did long before them. Indeed, he says further on at l. 4,455, "Thise been the cokkés wordes and nat myne." And at ll. 4,401-4,402, lest his readers should suppose he was serious, he assures them—

> This storie is al so trewe I undertake
> As is the book of Launcelot de Lake.

Chaucer meant to point out the absurdity of the sun being 41 degrees in the Heavens at pryme. So impossible did this appear to those who lived then that the scribe of the Harleian MS., one which Dr. Skeat calls a "helpful MS.," and the one which was adopted by Mr. Thomas Wright for his edition of the "Canterbury Tales" for the Percy Society, reads not 41 degrees here but 20, where the sun on April 1 would be, I suppose, at about 6 o'clock. Mr. Wright on this passage quotes, and adopts, the note to Tyrwhitt's edition that Pryme here, as elsewhere, means 6 o'clock. Dr. Skeat, by the way, does not mention this reading of the Harleian MS., either in his notes or his variorum readings at the foot of the page. The passage in the Shipmanne's Tale is, at first sight, the strongest I know of in Chaucer, or any other contemporary writer, in support of Dr. Skeat's view. But, when carefully considered, it does not support that view, but rather the contrary. At l. 1,265 seq., "The Marchand upryseth" and goes to his counting-house. We know how very early people rose in those days. We are in fact told how very early it was, for "the gode wyf," when her husband had risen, went into the garden and there meets Daun John, who is also up so early that she says to him (l. 1,289) "What eyleth yow so rathé for to ryse," to which the monk answers "fyve houres" to sleep are enough. Now people not only got up early then but they went to bed early. So that five hours' sleep would bring him to a very early hour in the morning, certainly long before six. They have some conversation together, perhaps for an hour, and then the monk says (l. 1,391)—

> Now goth your wey, quod he, al stille and softe.
> And lat us dyne as sone as that ye may,
> For by my chilindre it is pryme of day.

That is, I suggest, about 6 o'clock. It could not well be much later, or there would be no point in the lady's remark about the monk being up so early. By "chilindre" I suppose the monk alludes to his appetite, his empty stomach, and the lady goes off to her cooks to see about preparations for dinner, a duty which takes some little time, and must be performed a considerable time before dinner is ready, especially as we are told they dined "richely." Then she goes to her husband in his counting-house and gains admission. They have a serious talk. The Marchand has to explain how his affairs will take him away from her, and to break it to her that he must go on a journey to Flanders, a very serious undertaking in those days. Then they go to church, at least they hear Mass, and Mass was not said in private houses except under very special circumstances. At the end of all this, although, no doubt, Mass was said rapidly, they might indeed be ready for breakfast, which is what dinner then meant. It was the first meal in the day, actually and literally breakfast. We get our word dinner from the old French disner which was short for desjeuner, and the meal was often taken at 8 o'clock. So that when the monk says "It is pryme," there is nothing to show it was later than six, whereas if we take it to mean nine, there would be an inconsistency in the lady's remarks, and they could not have done all they did do before the usual hour of dinner.

In my former letter I did not allude to Mr. Brae's notice of the meaning of pryme, appended to his work on the astrolabe, because, however learned and useful the body of the work is, the appendix on Pryme seems so very unsatisfactory, and shows how far a learned man may go astray when trying to support a thesis.

Mr. Brae differs from Dr. Skeat, for while the latter makes Pryme 9 o'clock, Mr. Brae continues it on wonderfully and makes another pryme at 1 o'clock in the afternoon. He supports his theory from a passage in Troilus and Criseyde, where (Bk. v., ll. 470-473) Troilus is in great distress at the loss of Criseyde—

> The Lettres eek that she of oldé tyme
> Hadde hym y-sent, he wolde allonè rede,
> An hundred sythe, a-twixen noon and pryme.

So, says Mr. Brae, pryme means 1 o'clock, and he pictures Troilus reading all these letters over again a hundred times between 12 and 1, at what he calls the hour of siesta. Besides the difficulty of getting this done in an hour, how different is this to the picture we had imagined of the forlorn lover shunning as much as possible the society of others, shutting himself up all the afternoon and evening, and rising with the first daylight in the early dawn to read over and over again these dear but sad remembrances of happier times.

I have followed the word in Troilus, but I do not find any passage where it is not at least quite as consistent with the earlier as with the later hour. I wish I could say the same for "all the passages in . . . Lydgate." When Dr. Skeat, or some other competent, I will not say equally competent, editor enables us to read them all without our having to go to MSS. in a few great libraries, we shall be able to do so. But on this subject perhaps you will allow me to say something on some other occasion. The passage in Piers Plowman (Pass. I. ix., 119) Dr. Skeat refers to throws no fresh light on the word. Only one sentence more as to Florio's definition. When Florio gives "terza" as the hour priests call prime he reminds one of the story of Dr. Johnson, who being asked by a lady how he had come to give some preposterously wrong meaning to a word, replied "Sheer ignorance, Madam."

Yours very faithfully,
CHARLES HAMILTON BROMBY.

SWINBURNE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I suggest to Mr. P. A. Sillard that his quotations in answer to my challenge do not quite answer their purpose?

> For Heaven at thy creation did decree
> That in thy face sweet love should ever dwell.

This may be a beautiful exaggeration, but it cannot be compared with "who cannot hate can love not," for pregnant thought succinctly expressed. Certainly it is quite laughably out of the running when compared with the "individuation" of ideas in the lines—

> Nor can belief touch, kindle, smite, reprieve
> His heart who has not heart to disbelieve.

The "distinguished granddaughter of Sheridan" could not write poetry, and Dante was not included in my challenge; but, as for the quotation from Rostand, it is about a very unimportant matter, and is absolutely lacking in pregnant thought. Nevertheless, if there is one man in England who has written, perhaps even a little too often, this sort of thing—

> Une communion ayant le goût de fleur—that man is Swinburne.

I think that if Swinburne's case is thus easily arguable against that of Shakespeare, he can hardly be said to have "more sound than sense," and certainly cannot be "damned to the infernal deeps."

Yours faithfully, ALFRED NOYES.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Now that the Paris Exhibition has closed its gates the superb and perhaps unique collection which formed the Retrospective Exhibition of French Industrial Art must be dispersed. It is satisfactory to learn that a representative series of reproductions has been prepared as a permanent memorial of the Exhibition. It will appear in ten parts, with an introduction by M. Émile Molinier, who arranged the exhibits with M. Marcon, a notice of each collection of works of art by M. Gaston Migeon, and a detailed description of each object reproduced. There will be a hundred photogravure plates, many of them in colours (facsimile). The work is being issued in Paris, but Messrs. Goupil, the publishers, will have a limited number of copies available at their London house—at £40 the set.

The Author prints the full text of the Canadian Copyright Act. Its provisions may be summarized thus :—

1. Whenever a Canadian publisher has lawfully acquired a licence to produce copies of a book for sale only in Canada, then the Minister of Agriculture may prohibit the importation into Canada of copies printed elsewhere. Copies intended for the bona fide use of public or University and College Libraries are, however, excepted.

2. This prohibition may be withdrawn if the Canadian publisher fails to meet the Canadian demand for the book, or to print and publish it "suitably having regard to the demand in Canada."

3. The licensee may be required to import and supply to any Canadian purchaser a copy of any edition of the book in respect of which he is licensed that is on sale and reasonably obtainable in any other part of the Empire.

4. The Customs Department shall be notified of all prohibitions.

5. The penalty for unlawful importation shall be a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars.

This is the sort of Copyright Act for Canada that we have always favoured. It is much in advance not only of Sir John Thompson's measure, but also of the concessions proposed by Mr. Hall Caine, as delegate of the Society of Authors. The purpose of Clause 3 may not be instantly evident. It is inserted to keep the Canadian printers and binders up to the mark, and also for the benefit of purchasers who want library editions of books of which only popular editions are printed in the Dominion.

A note which we published some time ago on the probable price of novels in the future brings us a letter from Mr. Charles Walch, bookseller and publisher, of Hobart Town, Tasmania, who some years ago foresaw the inevitable cheapening of the novel. His proposal is: "Bring out two editions simultaneously—a six-shilling one on best paper, bound in cloth, and a half-a-crown one in paper, similar to the present Colonial Library." It sounds plausible, but there are difficulties. The chief is that it would not cost three-and-sixpence, but only a few pence, to put the half-a-crown edition in a decent binding. And publishers are not the only people for whom binders can work. They can also be employed by booksellers, distributing agencies, and circulating libraries. The circulating libraries, in particular, requiring bound copies but indifferent to "best paper," would certainly bind the half-a-crown copies instead of buying the six-shilling ones. And hard experience has shown that when two editions of a book at different prices are simultaneously in the market—as was the case with the Acme Library, the Pioneer Library, &c.—purchasers show such a marked predilection for the cheaper format that very few booksellers find it worth while to stock the other. In the case imagined by Mr. Walch, a few copies of the six-shilling edition would no doubt go off as Christmas presents.

Mrs. W. K. Clifford's play The Likeness of the Night will be published by Messrs. A. and C. Black next week. Mrs. Clifford has written a preface.

The latest addition to Messrs. Macmillan's Library of English Classics is Thomas Shelton's translation of "Don Quixote," and it occupies three volumes. Shelton was the first translator of "Don Quixote," publishing his version of the First Part before Cervantes himself had published his Second Part, and publishing his version of the Second Part, too, by the time that a French translator had been found for the First. The first German translation followed the French at an interval of nearly thirty years. Of the English versions that survive, Peter Motteux's was the second and Charles Jarvis' the third. Jarvis' is the most faithful of the early translators, but no subsequent version has ever excelled Shelton's in the vitality and raciness of its rendering.

Borrow's works—the copyright is gradually expiring—are now very popular. "The Romany Rye," at two shillings, will be ready shortly in Ward, Lock's Minerva Library, with an introduction by Mr. Watts-Dunton, and illustrations from old prints and portraits. "Lavengro" has already appeared in the Minerva Library. Both books have also been brought out in Mr. Lane's new twoshilling Pocket Library, and "The Bible in Spain" is following them. Mr. Murray, Borrow's original publisher, was, of course, first in the field with his half-a-crown editions; and he will soon be completing his "Authoritative Edition" (six shillings), with "Wild Wales," illustrated by Mr. A. S. Hartrick.

Readers with a taste for the true touch of the essayist—one of the most uncommon of literary graces—will do well to note two items among the announcements of Messrs. Smith, Elder. One is of a small volume by Mr. E. V. Lucas, entitled "Domesticities": the other of "Conferences on Books and Men," reprinted from the Cornhill Magazine. The "Conferences" have not perhaps been quite so happy as "The Pages from a Private Diary"; one missed the dramatic setting and the pleasant assumption of the character of the retired Anglo-Indian so successfully sustained as to have imposed on even Mr. Lang's acuteness. Still, there have been several capital stories and many pages of excellent criticism in the "Conferences." Both writers are among the wiser as well as wittier of contemporary critics.

The Cambridge University Press are publishing Dr. Otto Gierke's "Political Theories of the Middle Ages," translated by Professor William Maitland. The book forms only a twentieth part of the great work—as yet unfinished—bearing a title which, as Professor Maitland explains in his preface, can hardly attract many readers in this country, and for which an English equivalent cannot be found—namely, Das deutsche Genossenschaftsrecht. The third volume of that work contains a study of mediæval politics likely to be of service to English students, and it is this which Professor Maitland has detached and translated. The Cambridge University Press will also publish shortly a second edition of Professor Forsyth's "Theory of Functions of a Complex Variable," containing some changes and about 100 pages of new matter. This book has proved a useful introduction to modern pure mathematics since its first appearance in 1893. The sections dealing with the properties of certain binomial differential equations of the first order, which appeared in the original edition, have been transferred to the second volume of the author's "Theory of Differential Equations," and the space thus gained has been assigned to the theory of birational transformation.

An American publisher, Mr. E. S. Gorham, is issuing two little books of devotional extracts which are described as being compiled by ladies of the most "exclusive social circle" in New York. They are called "Mosaics" and "The Golden Treasury of the Bible," and they would seem to show that the American lady of our novelists and of Mr. Dana Gibson's drawings presents a not wholly complete portrait of that many-sided and interesting personage.

The following is a selection from the chief American books published or to be published this "fall." Some of them are also published in England :—

GENERAL—
The History of the American Slave Trade. By John R. Spears.
Concerning Children. By Mrs. Charlotte (Stetson) Gilman.

Paul Jones. By O. C. Buell.
Volumes in the "Heroes of the Nations" Series (already announced in Literature).

Novels are also announced by the following authors :—Thomas Nelson Page, John Uri Lloyd, Paul Laurence Dunbar, General Charles King, John Kendrick Bangs, Frank R. Stockton, Cyrus Townsend Brady, Anna Katherine Green, Booth Tarkington, Grace Gallatin Seton-Thompson, Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, Hamlin Garland, F. Marion Crawford, W. L. Alden, Winston Churchill, Mark Twain, David Dwight Wells (the late), Harry Thurston Peck, Emma Rayner, R. H. Savage, Edward Bellamy (the late), Lilian Whiting, Joel Chandler Harris, Andrew Black, Archibald Clavering Gunter, E. W. Townsend.

Reports from libraries across the Atlantic in nineteen representative centres show that literature on China has been everywhere in most demand, especially Miss Seidmore's "China, the Long-Lived Empire," and Mr. Colquhoun's "Overland to China." Interest in South African affairs has declined, and only eight of the libraries return African books as among the most sought after. Chiefly in demand are Mr. Winston Churchill's "From London to Ladysmith," Mr. Hillegas' "Oom Paul's People," and Mr. Abercrombie's "The Rise and Fall of Krugerism." Other books everywhere read are Allen's "Reign of Law," "To Have and to Hold," "The Gentleman from Indiana," "Wild Animals I have Known," by Seton Thompson, and Professor Fiske's histories of the Colonial period. One of the smaller libraries in New York State, by the way, which is representative of a good many others, reports that "fiction, including juvenile fiction, shows a decided falling off, while the percentage of useful books read shows a corresponding increase."

It was said of Curll, the pirate publisher of the Augustan age, as it was afterwards said of Lord Campbell, that he had added a new terror to death. Major Pond may now be said to have added a new terror to the American lecturing tour, if, as has been announced to be the case, his forthcoming book on "Eccentricities of Men of Genius," announced by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, deals with the whims and oddities of his own clients. At all events, if the entrepreneur proposes to make copy of the peculiarities of the literary lecturers who accept his engagements, this additional risk ought to be considered in the fee.

Many of our readers will be glad to know that Dr. C. D. Ginsburg's monumental work on the traditional text of the Old Testament is now in a fair way of being completed. The first three volumes, which have been in the hands of scholars for some years, could only be used by the select few ; but the fourth volume, now in the press, aims at explaining all the obscure technicalities of the preceding instalments, so as to make the results of important investigations on the text of the Bible accessible to a large number of persons.

The next volume in "The Westminster Biographies" will be Wilfred Whitten's "Life of Defoe." It will appear on the 20th inst. Clara Thomson's "George Eliot" will be ready early next year, to be followed a little later by "John Henry Newman," by A. R. Waller.

Messrs. Blackwood and Sons are publishing a sacred anthology of prose and poetry entitled "Flowers of the Cave." The editors are Mr. Laurie Magnus and Mr. Cecil Headlam, whose "Prayers from the Poets," published by the same firm last year, is now in its second edition.

Messrs. Bell will shortly publish an historical study of Holbein's "Ambassadors" by Mary F. S. Hervey, giving three original documents—two of them never before published—showing the history of the picture in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and dealing with the lives of Dinteville, French Ambassador to England in the reign of Henry VIII., and Selve, and giving an account of the curious objects with which they are surrounded in the picture.

Dr. Osmund Airy's biography of Charles II., which is to be the seventh volume in Messrs. Goupil's illustrated series of lives, will be more fortunate in the matter of pictures than any of its predecessors. Van Dyck, Lely, Kneller, Cooper, and numerous other foreign and British masters will be represented. It will probably be ready next May.

Messrs. Putnam will shortly publish a volume on "The Papacy in the Nineteenth Century," a translation by the Rector of the Church of Intercession, New York (L. H. Schwab), part of the second volume of Friedrich Nippold's "History of Catholicism since the Restoration of the Papacy." Nippold's work was written in order "to rescue Catholicism from its Papal caricature and to maintain its importance as a corrective to Protestant Individualism."

The long-promised volume of Gray's Letters in Bohn's Libraries, edited by Mr. Duncan C. Tovey, will be published immediately by Messrs. Bell. The letters have been annotated with extreme minuteness.

The following new volumes of verse are announced for publication at an early date by Mr. Elliot Stock ; —"Poems and Sonnets," by John Morgan ; "Eyes in Solitude," by William Moore, author of "Nocturnes and other Poems" ; and "Poems on the War," by Montagu Lloyd. Mr. Stock also announces a new volume of Old Testament stories for children, by Mrs. E. R. Conder, entitled "In the Beginning."

"Aristotle's Psychology," by Professor William A. Hammond, of Cornell University, will shortly be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein. It consists of a lengthy introduction, and translations, with notes, of the De Anima and Parva Naturalia.

In its "Collection of Foreign Authors" the Mercure de France is bringing out this season a version of "The Island of Dr. Moreau" and "The Tales of Space and Time," by H. G. Wells; a new collection of short stories by Mr. Rudyard Kipling ; "Far from the Madding Crowd," by Thomas Hardy ; three volumes of the complete works of Friedrich Nietzsche ; "News from Nowhere," by William Morris ; a volume of stories, by Maxime Gorky, a most interesting Russian story-teller, and an illustrated edition of Rudyard Kipling's "Two Jungle Books," the illustrator being Caran d'Ache.

To the cheap "Neue Leipziger Klassiker-Ausgaben," published by M. Hesse, Leipsic, the works of Otto Ludwig (4m.), of Heinrich von Kleist (1m. 25pf.), and Nikolaus Lenau (1m. 25pf.) have just been added. These editions are well edited, often more complete than acknowledged standard editions, and each volume is supplied with a good biographical and critical introduction. But we in England are accustomed to better paper and type in our cheap reprints than the Leipsic firm can apparently afford to give.

In our account of "The Salisbury Manuscripts" last week, in the sentence "The Earl of Pembroke often mentions his servant Arthur Massingham," "Massingham" should have read "Massinger."

Books to look out for at once.

SOLUTIONS.—Problem 70, by G. A. Barth (2), B–Kt 7. No. 71, Arnell (3), 1. Q–Kt 4, P×Kt; 2. Q–B 4 ch, &c., or 1. Q–Kt 4, P×B; 2. R–K sq, &c., many variations (see notes). No. 72, by N. Maximov (2), Q–R 7. No. 73, Troitzky, White wins by Q–B 7. No. 74, Mariu (2), P–K 5. No. 75, Pradignat (3), P–B 3. No. 76, Oswald (2), P–K 4. No. 77, Troitzky, White wins by 1. B–Kt 3 ch, K–B 3; 2. R×P ch, &c. No. 78, Waring (2), B–Q 3. No. 79, Sahlberg (3), key, B–K 3, threatening Q–Q 4 ch, &c. No. 80, Troitzky, key, R–B 8 and White wins the queen by the obvious checks which follow. No. 81, Arnell (2), Kt–R 5. No. 82, Arnell (3), key, Kt–B 8, threatening 2. Kt (B 8)–Q 7 and 3. R–B 6 or Kt–K 8 mate. No. 83, Troitzky, White draws by Kt–K 6. No. 84, 1. K–Kt 8, R–Kt 7 ch; 2. K–R 8, R–Q B 7; 3. R–B 6 ch, K–R 4; 4. K–Kt 7, R–Kt 7 ch; 5. K–R 7, R–Q B 7; 6. R–B 5 ch, &c., repeating the process. No. 85, 1. B–Kt 8, R×B; 2. K–B 7, R×Q; 3. P×R and wins.

Correct Solvers are:—A. C. Waters (Bromley), 70 to 76, 78 to 85; J. D. Tucker, 70, 72 to 76, 78 to 80; A. M. Smart (Leyton), 74 to 76; J. M. W. Muston (Liverpool), 74, 80, 85; R. S. M. (Kensington), 70, 74, 80; Otto Würzburg (Grand Rapids), 63 to 76; G. J. M. and E. K. L., 70, 74, 76.

NOTES BY CORRESPONDENTS.—"In my opinion No. 71. is the most difficult 3-mover I ever met with. The difficulty consists in the great number of good 'tries' which convince one that almost any attempted first move must be the correct one." Mr. Waters gives analyses of two or three tries and adds—"When to all these tempting variations is added the fact that the second move in some of the variations is by no means easy, few people would consider this a simple problem. As a matter of fact there is enough variety in it to furnish half-a-dozen ordinary 3-move problems. I have to thank you for your courtesy in holding over the solution; the problem is well worth all the trouble it has given. No. 78 a beginner's problem. In No. 79 the sacrifices of the queen are very neat. In No. 80 the scattered position of the pieces is a feature: a pretty end-game. There is the point of various pins in No. 81. As to No. 82, happily, Arnell's problems are not all as difficult as No. 71, or life would not be long enough to solve them. But No. 82 is beautiful, though comparatively easy. No. 84 is a genuine chess study."—A. C. Waters.

"No. 74 and its follows are very striking as an example of how problemists follow one another on the same lines."—J. M. W. M.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Mr. Hall Caine's forthcoming novel, "The Eternal City," marks the fascination exercised by the Roman Church upon the masters and mistresses of contemporary fiction. What with MM. Zola and J. K. Huysmans on the other side of the Channel, and on this side Mr. Caine, Mrs. Humphry Ward, Mr. George Moore, Miss Corelli, and Mrs. Craigie it might be said that in fiction to-day all roads lead to Rome. Equally significant is the interest now beginning to show itself in France in our own "Oxford Movement." Of that movement we have already had the first volume of a history by a distinguished historian of the French Academy; and now we are promised a life of Cardinal Newman by Mlle. Lucie Faure, the daughter of the late President of the Republic.

Sir Richard Jebb, in his lecture before the London Institution on Macaulay, took pretty much the same view of the functions of the historian that is taken in the Personal View of Sir Herbert Maxwell which will be found in another column. Both critics favour the doctrine which we ourselves have always upheld, that history, if, at any rate, it is to teach and to survive, must be something more than "scientific." Science in history, as in other departments of human endeavour, is apt to become obsolete; the scientific histories are continually being superseded. But the history which is human and dramatic may endure, like a poem, long after its most picturesque details have been proved to have no foundation in fact. It has been demonstrated—though the demonstration has suffered qualification—that the father of history is also the father of lies; but the world still reads Herodotus with pleasure and profit. The writer who is interesting should of course be scientific too. Charles Darwin exhibited both merits in one branch of science, and Max Müller in another. In the case of historical science one thinks immediately of Gibbon, who was the most scientific as well as the most interesting historian of his generation. Probably, indeed, no historian is uninteresting of malice aforethought. They would all like to hold the attention of their readers as Mr. Morley does in his "Cromwell"; they recognize their limitations and deplore them.

The "Peggotty's Hut" at Great Yarmouth, which is to be offered by auction next week, is a very different thing from the original home of little Emily, but it is said to possess original portions of the boat, as well as two windows. Yarmouth and David Copperfield, of course, are closely connected, and Blundeston, David's birthplace, is not many miles away on the Yarmouth-Lowestoft line. The Blunderstone Rookery of the novel stands next to the church—a few miles to the east of the railway.

The Agamemnon of Aeschylus was first performed in 458 B.C. at Athens, in the Theatre of Dionysus, and next (so far as is known) at Oxford in 1880 A.D., when Mr. F. R. Benson appeared as Clytemnestra, and, at any rate, looked the part to perfection, and when the present editor of the Fortnightly Review made an impressive φύλαξ. Miss Gertrude Kingston, too, we believe, before she appeared in The Manœuvres of Jane, undertook a part in the Oresteian trilogy. The performance of the Agamemnon, given at Cambridge on November 16th and following nights, gave ample proof that its dramatic force has not evaporated in a modern atmosphere after twenty-three centuries. The staging, the costumes, and the elocution were admirable; one of the actors, as the mad prophetess Cassandra, rose to high dramatic excellence, and the chorus of pottering Argive elders made a good foil to the three leading characters. Not even choric odes of interminable length can mitigate the thrilling interest of this tale of Pelops' line. To those, indeed, who can read and understand them, the choral odes are really full of meaning, for in them the poet draws out the moral setting of his story—the primal curse bringing others in its train, and the inexorable course of divine Necessity. Their interest is enhanced for the musician by the skill in rhythm and accentuation shown in Sir Hubert Parry's music. But the musical accompaniment, always ingenious and interesting in itself, was at times a little out of keeping with the seriousness of the words. Clytemnestra was well but not impressively played by Mr. F. H. Lucas; Agamemnon (Mr. King) hardly looked the ἄναξ ἀνδρῶν, and was somewhat stiff; but the Cassandra of Mr. Crace was a fine piece of acting. The Chorus were cramped in their movements by too narrow a front stage, but in other respects were excellent. A few touches of realism in details might have been introduced, e.g., the herald and Agamemnon need not have looked quite so spick and span after their long and toilsome campaign, and Clytemnestra's vicious-looking axe should not be perfectly clean and bright just after the murder. But the general effect was impressive; and the performance must be reckoned as one of the most successful of Greek play revivals.

It is no easy matter to determine the source of woodcuts used in early books. In an interesting paper, entitled "Some Notes on the History of Book-Illustration in England," read before the Bibliographical Society on Monday, Mr. Alfred Pollard alluded to a few of the pitfalls. For instance, certain figures which appear in Hawkins' work on the origin of the English Drama, published in 1773, have been cited by a Transatlantic professor as giving authentic details of costumes worn at the old miracle plays. As a fact they have been traced to a book on an altogether different theme, issued by Wynkyn de Worde in 1525, and he again had copied them from the Terence published by Antoine Verard, circa 1500. Mr. Macfarlane thinks that the blocks were cut for Verard, but possibly they may be traced even further back. Woodcuts executed in England at the end of the fifteenth or the beginning of the sixteenth century were very rude, have the feeblest possible claim to be regarded as works of art—those in the second edition of the "Canterbury Tales," 1483, for instance. Hence Mr. Pollard had "gloomily" to admit that we could without misgiving accept as native only those cuts whose origin is known—like those in the Tales; whereas the cuts which bear a resemblance to those used abroad, and these include nearly all the best until we come to the time of John Day, almost certainly either passed by arrangement or were appropriated from foreign sources, and if copied deteriorated in the process. Dr. Garnett cited an amusing instance of a German scholar who discovered in a law book, published by Rastell, a frontispiece taken from an edition of Pyramus and Thisbe, issued at Worms at the time of the Diet. Possibly Shakespeare saw the Rastell book, and it suggested to him "Pyramus and Thisbe" as a comedy.

The first use of a woodcut in books occurs in Caxton's "Cathon," but the art did not reach its flowering time till the middle of the sixteenth century, when the men who cut the devices of Berthelet and Wolfe were capable of anything as wood-cut artists. The earliest known examples of copper-plate engraving occurs in the illustrations to "The Byrth of Mankynde," a book published in 1540. By the beginning of the next century this method of illustration had quite ousted the woodcut, which did not again come into general use until about 1780. At about that time the wood-engraving rose to a high standard of perfection under the fostering influence of the genius of Bewick. The question as to whether Bewick is to be credited with the invention of the wood-engraving—that is work done with a burin or graver on the edge of the wood—as distinct from the woodcut work done with a knife on the flat of the wood—is as far from solution as ever. Indeed, it is all but impossible to distinguish one result from the other, and this although the two methods differ radically.

Shakespeare, it seems, is to leave Leicester-square—for a time at all events. The water pipes of the fountain on which the statue stands need repair; and the fountain is to be re-erected on a new foundation. The statue is an exact reproduction by Signor Fontana of the Shakespeare statue, designed by Kent and executed by Scheemakers, in Westminster Abbey. Baron Grant, who presented the Leicester-square garden to the metropolis, died last year. It cost him £30,000 to convert what had been an ugly, squalid spot into the green enclosure as we know it to-day.

The work of the Canadian poet, Mr. William Wilfrid Campbell, to whom Mr. Lawrence J. Burpee devotes an appreciative article in the Sewanee Review, has been justly praised ere now by English as well as by American critics. Since the eighties Mr. Campbell has been pouring forth verse on all manner of different themes, in dramatic as well as in lyric form. A facility in his case does not seem to have been fatal. His first volume, "Lake Lyrics," published in 1889, coming from the heart of the Canadian Lakes, was full of novelty to readers accustomed to wilder and less spacious regions. The vastness of the lake country and the calm beauty of the waters stilled at even early impressed themselves on the young poet's imagination.

> Under the glimmer of stars and the purple of sunsets dying,
> Wan and waste and white stretch the great lakes away.

Our readers may remember a poem on a very different note by Mr. Campbell, which appeared in Literature in August, 1898, called "Lines on a Midwinter Night":

> While all the winter's iron night,
> Past shrouded casement, muffled white,
> Thunders at heart and door.

"The Dread Voyage," in which the treatment of human nature predominates, followed "The Lake Lyrics" in 1893, and a year ago we were informed that a new volume—"Beyond the Hills of Dreams"—was to be published by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin, and Co., of Boston. Mr. Burpee tells us that it is still in the press.

We discussed a few weeks ago the limits of the rights of an author over works in which he has sold the copyright. Mr. Kipling's action against Messrs. Putnam,-which it seems is to proceed, though no doubt a deplorable difference between parties who have both deserved well of the world of letters, may have the advantage of bringing about an authoritative discussion of the question. Messrs. Putnam finding that many of their customers were plus rois que le roi, and were not content to possess only those works of Mr. Kipling with which the author himself was satisfied, prepared a collection as complete as possible of Mr. Kipling's writings, copyright and non-copyright. To it they prefixed, still further to satisfy an American taste, the remark of an American gentleman as to what he knew and thought of Mr. Kipling and his work. In the case of the non-copyright work Messrs. Putnam had no legal restrictions to consider; and in the case of the copyright work the firm purchased the sheets from the owner of the copyright. In this way they produced a uniform edition, the appearance of which certainly ruffled the author's feelings, and is alleged to have damaged his reputation. It will be interesting to see how the facts strike a jury, not composed of literary men. No analogous case has ever, so far as we know, been tried.

Mr. Cecil Raleigh in his address to the Playgoers' Club on Sunday evening delivered himself of some views which are amazing even when one takes into account the kind of plays he produces. Not to like Shakespeare is a misfortune Mr. Raleigh shares with Mr. Bernard Shaw, George III., and other distinguished persons. That the drama ought to be made to pay is a view natural amongst those who earn their living by it. But Mr. Raleigh goes far beyond this modest declaration of opinion. For him the monetary is the only standard to be appealed to. "Nobody asked the music halls to be artistic or to teach moral lessons. What was the result? They paid like steam." It follows that the only object of the drama should be to "pay like steam." Any one who finds this a counsel of perfection should visit Drury-lane Theatre, and see its result in The Price of Peace.

The Gay Lord Quex, which has just been published by Mr. Heinemann, has aroused enthusiasm in New York. A highly-coloured picture of the decadence of English society drawn with the skill of Mr. Pinero is as welcome to the American public as it is to the mass of British playgoers. The piece does not arouse more sympathy in the breast of the cultivated reader than it drew from such playgoers as demand something more in drama than smartness of speech and rascality of conduct. The Gay Lord Quex is not an immoral play; it is non-moral, which is much the same thing as non-human. Mr. Pinero's discriminating admirers must, we fancy, hope that he will go back to his earlier manner, as exhibited at its best in The Second Mrs. Tanqueray.

Messrs. Pearson's latest catalogue of autograph letters for sale (issued from 5, Pall-mall-place), contains some interesting extracts. Shelley, writing to his bookseller in December, 1810, says :—"I have in preparation a novel ; it is principally constructed to convey metaphysical and political opinions by way of conversation. It shall be sent you as completed ; but it shall receive more correction than I trouble myself to give to wild Romance and Poetry." What was this metaphysical and political work of fiction ? Shelley's two "wild romances," "Zastrozzi" and "The Rosicrucian," had already appeared. It must have been put aside for more absorbing occupations, such as the tract on Atheism which got its author sent down from Oxford in the following year. Southey is represented by a letter about Scott's profits on "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," as contrasted with the Laureate's profits on "Madoc." Southey comforted himself with the thought that "my acorn will continue to grow when his Turkey bean shall have withered." Alas ! we still enjoy the "Lay," but who reads "Madoc"?

German literature suffered a considerable loss last week by the death of Adolf Pichler, at the age of 81. He had no superior among the poets of the Tyrol, and only one who was his equal—his contemporary, Hermann von Gilm. He is best known by the fresh and very charming "Frühlieder aus Tirol," with which, in 1846, he began his literary career, and by his two fine epics of "Die Hexenmeister" and "Marksteine." But there is not less merit in his tragedies of "Die Tarquinier" and "Rodrigo," in some of his prose stories, and in his historical treatise on "Das Drama des Mittelalters in Tirol." He was a singular example of union of the scientific and poetic habits of mind, and wrote several valuable essays on geology, of which science he was for many years professor at Innsbruck University. Not the least of his claims to the remembrance of his countrymen lies in the fact that in 1848 he took part, as a volunteer, in the defence of the Tyrolese border against Italy, and so highly distinguished himself by his bravery that the Emperor of Austria conferred upon him the much-coveted order of the Iron Crown. Another well-known German author, Ernst Eckstein, passed away at Dresden on Sunday. Born in 1845, he first won popularity through his humorous story, "Besuch im Carcer," which has been almost as much read in the Fatherland as Julius Stinde's "Familie Buchholz." But his best works were his three historical novels, "Die Claudier," "Prusias," and "Nero," although some critics think their modern style a little out of place. "Nero" might have served as a model for "The Sign of the Cross."

A correspondent points out in reference to our recent note on Patrick Walker that the historian of the Covenanters has even a stronger claim on the interest of novel-readers than that conferred by his influence on Robert Louis Stevenson and Mr. S. R. Crockett. Surely, he says, it cannot have been forgotten that Scott made great use of Walker's work in "The Heart of Midlothian." In one of the notes to that admirable story is, indeed, to be found the most accessible account of Walker's life and character ; he is strangely omitted, by the way, from the "Dictionary of National Biography." Walker—whom Scott sometimes calls Peter and sometimes Patrick—was "an itinerant merchant or pedlar," residing when stationary at the Bristo Port in Edinburgh. He composed biographies of Peden "the Prophet," Richard Cameron, who founded the Cameronian sect and so was the ancestor of Mr. Barrie's "Auld Lichts," Semple of Carsphairn, and other lights of "the killing times." Scott drew largely on these lives (which were originally published and sold by their wandering author as tiny chap-books that are now worth their weight in gold), for the character of David Deans and other of his Covenanting heroes. We may appropriately quote Scott's criticism on the style of Walker's biographies :—

> It is from such tracts as these [says Sir Walter], written in the sense, feeling, and spirit of the sect, and not from the sophisticated narratives of a later period, that the real character of the persecuted class is to be gathered. Walker writes with a simplicity which sometimes slides into the burlesque, and sometimes attains a tone of simple pathos, but always expressing the most daring confidence in his own correctness of creed and sentiments, sometimes with narrow-minded and disgusting bigotry. His turn for the marvellous was that of his time and sect, but there is little room to doubt his veracity concerning whatever he quotes on his own knowledge.

It is hardly needful to add that what the Tory and Episcopalian Scott called "disgusting bigotry" is nowadays regarded by novel-readers, in a more tolerant spirit, as a curious psychological study. Religious prejudices no longer obscure the literary interest that is likely to be taken in Mr. Fleming's reprint of "the most zealous and faithful recorder of the actions and opinions of the Cameronians."

The first important book sale of the season was that of a portion of Lord Ashburton's library sold at Sotheby's last week. The catalogues comprised only 865 lots, yet the aggregate reached as much as £6,256. Among the valuable Americana were "A Relation of Maryland ; together with a Map of the Country," &c., 1635, £165 ; "A True Relation of the late Battell fought in New England between the English and the Pequet Salvages," 1638, £84 ; "New England Plantation," 1630, £98 ; Daniel Denton's rare tract, "A Brief Description of New York, formerly called New Netherlands," 1670, £100 ; Dumont, "Mémoire contenant les Evenements qui se sont passés a la Louisiane depuis 1715," &c., a fine manuscript, £116 ; "Virginia's Cure, or an Advisive Narrative concerning Virginia," 1662, £76 ; Keymis, "A Relation of the Second Voyage to Guiana," 1596, £29 ; "The Discoveries of John Lederer in Three Several Marches from Virginia," &c., 1672, £102 ; Smith, "Advertisements for the unexperienced Planters of New England, or anywhere," &c., 1631, £160 ; Gabriel Thomas, "An Historical and Geographical Account of the Province and County of Pensilvania," &c., 1698, £62 ; E. Winslow, "Good Newes from New England," &c., 1624, £240. The library also boasted some splendidly "extra illustrated" books, such as Boaden's "Memoirs of the Life of John Philip Kemble," &c., 1825, £65 ; Byron's "Poetical Works," &c., extended to 25 vols., a fine collection, £185 ; "A Chronological Detail of Events in which Oliver Cromwell was engaged from the year 1642 to his Death, 1658," London, 1810, £50 ; Howell, "Lustra Ludovici, or the Life of the late Victorious King of France, Lewis the XIIIth," 1646, £38 ; Rogers, "Poems" and "Italy," extended to 4 vols., 1834, £25 10s. ; Scott's, "Novels, Tales, Poetical Works, and Romances," 1821-1833, extended to 52 vols., £63 ; Wraxall, "Historical Memoirs of my Own Time," 1772, &c., £151 ; Rapin and Tindal, "History of England and Medallic History," 1732-47, extended to 7 vols., £80. Other rare books of a more or less miscellaneous character ought not to be passed over. Coryat's "Crudities," 1611, a fine copy, £37 ; Dibdin's "Bibliographical, Antiquarian, and Picturesque Tour in France and Germany," 1821, large paper, £24 ; "Abailard et Héloise," "Lettres," by Bastien, with original drawings by Moitte, 1782, 5 vols., on vellum, £68 10s. ; Pellicer, "Don Quixote," 1797-8, 5 vols. in 7, on vellum, £46 ; The Original MS. Inventory of the Effects of La Marquise de Pompadour, 1761, 2 vols., £133 ; R. Scot's "The Discourse of Witchcraft," 1584, a good copy of the first edition, £16 ; Vadé, "Œuvres Poissardes suivies de celles de l'Ecluse," 1796, large paper with plates and drawings in colours, £190. In the long and fine series of county histories were :—Blomfield, "An Essay Towards a Topographical History of the County of Norfolk," 1739-75, extended to 5 vols., £46 ; Chauncy, "Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire," 1720, £13 ; Dallaway and Cartwright, "History of the Western Division of Sussex," &c., 1815-30, £23 ; Dugdale, "Warwickshire," 1750, second edition, £17 ; Hasted, "Kent," &c., 1778-99, £29 ; Hoare, "History of Modern Wiltshire," 1822-43, £29 ; Hodgson, "Northumberland," 1820-58, £20 ; Hutchings, "Dorset," 1796, £11 10s. ; Shaw, "Staffordshire," 1801, £18 ; Surtees, "Durham," 1816-40, £19 15s. ; Whitaker, "Richmondshire," 1823, £11 15s. ; Nichols, "Leicester," 1795-1811, £100.

Empire and Education.

Before the learned members of the Scottish History Society Lord Rosebery was cheerful and jocular. Before an undergraduate audience, on the other hand, he was a little pessimistic and very serious. But the Empire and its demands is a subject on which Lord Rosebery is always serious. Yet one may admire the grave tone of his exhortations to the Edinburgh undergraduates without sharing his apprehensions that they will imperil the Empire by learning too much Greek. For that, in effect, is what his speech amounts to. "The first need of our country," he premises, "is a want of men"—a sentiment which was shared by Empire builders of old, and which may be found embodied in the pages of a wise Greek writer named Thucydides. "Are we," he then asks, "setting ourselves sufficiently to train such men?" And the answer is that we are not, because Eton "has no modern side," and because Oxford and Cambridge "still exact their dole of Latin and Greek," and because the Greek grammar seems to him "a heavy burden for our Empire," and because those who are able to bear that burden get most of the plums in the Civil Service. It was a somewhat similar speech by a statesman hardly less famous that drew from Matthew Arnold his ironical exhortation to his young countrymen to prepare themselves, by the study of modern languages, to fight the battle of life with the waiters in foreign hotels. The comments which it suggests are various. One is that, as a matter of hard historical fact, the periods during which England has been great and glorious have often been periods in which great Englishmen have been few. In the period which followed the death of Pitt and Fox, the whole business of the country was transacted by mediocre men whose mediocrity has been lashed by no one more scathingly than by Lord Rosebery himself. Yet in that period England saved Europe. Granting, however, that modern conditions are different from those that prevailed at the beginning of the century, and that to rely on mediocrity nowadays might be to lean on a broken reed, it is by no means clear that any particular modification of the curricula of Universities would increase the efficiency of their alumni for the purposes of statesmanship, diplomacy, and Empire building generally,—arts which obviously cannot be specifically taught. Do great services to the Empire necessarily depend on an assiduous attendance at Oxford Lecture Rooms? Lord Rosebery will, we trust, pardon us for reminding him that there are living examples to disprove such a statement. As well might it be argued that all young men who aspire to render valuable service to the Empire ought to go to the diamond fields like Mr. Cecil Rhodes, or be early immersed in business like Mr. Chamberlain. No mode of education is so definitely superior to all others that the Empire can afford to ignore men who have not been "made to pattern" according to its rules. Yet it is also a fact that, other things being equal, the man with the academic training comes to the front more often than the man without it, and, being at the front, does better work there. One finds not only that such men are proportionately more numerous in the House of Commons than in the country—a fact which proves nothing; but also that they are more numerous in the Cabinet than in the House of Commons—a fact that proves a good deal. Nor can we easily believe that they would be more efficient administrators if, at Oxford or Cambridge, they had learnt French instead of Latin and German instead of Greek. So long as a scholar of the calibre of Sir Alfred Milner can govern a colony as he has governed South Africa, one will not readily be persuaded that scholarship is an impediment to Imperial expansion; but will rather take the view of the Etonian who got lost on the veldt, and declared that he would never have found his way home if he had not learnt, by the practice of writing Latin verses, that, if one way out of a difficulty was not available, patience and perseverance would always enable him to find another. Perhaps, however, Lord Rosebery merely meant to argue that those who learn modern languages should learn them as earnestly and thoroughly as the scholars learn Latin and Greek. In that case all scholars will agree with him, but he need not, in order to make that point, have denounced the Hellenists.

ET APRÈS ——?

We gave them welcome yesterday,
The streets once more their greyness don,
The last wild cheer has died away,
The flags—the noisy crowds—have gone.
Now it were well, with rigorous eyes,
To search our hearts for secret foes
More fatal to our peace than those
We fought beneath the Southern skies.

For honour, here, oft bought and sold,
Is cheapened by a huckstering throng;
And compromise obscures with gold
The boundary marks of Right and Wrong;
Here craft and greed, for flight prepared,
Escape, what time the reckoning comes,
And grasping Dives claws the crumbs
That once for Lazarus had been spared.

Ah, in such consort scarce can dwell
Unselfish thoughts and righteous deeds!
These faults go not with empire well—
Are not the sins that greatness breeds.
And for them England, as she bears
Down through the years her giant load,
Must tread the lone imperial road
To greater labours, heavier cares.

Yet since Fate claims such recompense,
And all unsought her office came,
What profit, lest it give offence,
To wear her glory as a shame?
Hers rather, scorning chance of fall,
Towards her unknown goal to press,
Remembering in all humbleness,
What may be lost in gaining all.

Personal Views.

THE HISTORIAN'S DILEMMA.

Most people, if asked to pronounce which task required the higher intellectual gifts, the novelist's or the historian's, would probably pronounce in favour of the novelist's. Diligence in research and collation of records, the critical faculty which, though not born of, is largely strengthened by study, added to the power of consecutive narrative—these might be judged adequate equipment for the chronicler of any period; whereas the novelist, while he cannot dispense with these qualities, must also be gifted with imagination and keen observation. He has not only to record events and describe character, but he must create them; apparently there is all the difference between the two industries that exists between manufacture and invention. Perhaps it may be shown wherein such a parallel is faulty, and that the very abundance of authentic material which is at command of the modern historian, so far from simplifying his undertaking, is an actual hazard to its consummation.

History is quite a different thing from chronicle—its very etymology bears that it is a learning or teaching. Nobody has ever defined its object better than Thucydides—"a true view of what has happened, and of the like or similar things which, in accordance with human nature, will probably happen hereafter." Is there not here something calling for the highest degree of imagination, the liveliest sense of observation? Yet it is a melancholy reflection how many intellects of the highest order must have been deterred from the work of history by the drudgery of research. This, even though exhilarated by occasional spasms of pursuit more stirring than any fox-hunt, is apt to clog the nimblest imagination; yet, if the imagination nods, how shall apprehension be had of the springs and course of action under the infinite phases of human occasion?

Lord Rosebery, always a fascinating writer, has given us a little masterpiece in his narrative of the last dark years of Napoleon. Nothing could be more vivid—nothing, one feels, more true to life—than the picture of hapless impotence; the resistless energy which had shrivelled the map of Europe like the breath of a furnace, applied to dibbling beans and casting terraces in a garden plot: the accents, which had once rolled forth over a cowering hemisphere, addressed to snubbing Gourgaud and defying Hudson Lowe. All that is past bettering; once and for all time we have a presentment of the life on St. Helena to which any further touches would be superfluous.

But, once beyond the narrow bounds of the island, the wings of Lord Rosebery's imagination begin to droop. The task of collating a stupendous mass of conflicting testimony seems to have crippled his sense of proportion. When he pours the vials of his contempt upon the Liverpools, the Castlereaghs, the Bathursts, who decreed the captivity, and prescribed its details, he forfeits as a historian the confidence which he had won without reserve as a biographer. When he girds at the English Cabinet for want of "magnanimity" in the custody of a fallen foe, he blinks the magnitude of the qualities which had sustained these men in almost single-handed contest against the Powers of Europe; the agony of strain through which they had led the nation; the depth of their resolution that, come what might, no loophole should be left ajar for its recurrence. England had saved Europe; England had undertaken custody of the man condemned as a culprit by Europe; her Ministers fulfilled the undertaking. Compared with that unflinching performance, all the discomforts—the indignities, if you will—of a single individual, the squabbles whether he were to be styled Emperor or General, whether the rats in his dwelling might not have been more regularly trapped, whether a more tactful guardian than Hudson Lowe might not have been found—all these things, even the destiny of a Napoleon, sink into pettiness in presence of the actual accomplishment—the deliverance of Europe. It is partly owing to the limitations of his narrative, and partly out of intense commiseration for the fate of "an intelligence and a force too gigantic for the welfare and security of the world," that Lord Rosebery has inverted the true perspective.

On the other hand, Lord Rosebery has not suffered by the debilitating atmosphere which gathers round the student of history when he suffers his study to become a cell. He has studied closely, laboriously, for without close application nobody can hold a clue to the ever-increasing labyrinth of Napoleonic literature; but he has never lost touch with τό ἀνθρώπειον; he understands the sources of human energy, the channels of human conduct. A measure of detachment is essential to the historian, but it must not sever him from the soil in which history has its roots. He must remain in the world and be—or, at least, have been—of the world; for it is only a man of the world who can describe how the world wags. No secluded Whig could have prepared Lord Rosebery's admirable monograph of Pitt.

It is no paradox to insist on imagination as a vital part of the historian's equipment, even in these days, when such vast stores of original material have been unlocked. Fielding frankly preferred fiction to history, because, while he recognized nothing that was true in history but the names and dates, in fiction these were the only things that were not true. What he insisted upon was τό ἀνθρώπειον. Scrupulous accuracy, anxious weighing of evidence, watchful repression of prejudice and refining of predilection—these are cardinal virtues, but without the saving grace of imagination the historian becomes but as sounding brass or as a tinkling cymbal.

There is no country of its size which has afforded so much and such complex material for history as Scotland. Hector Boece described events in that country as he considered they ought to have happened, George Buchanan as he wished people to believe they had happened. In striking contrast to such unscrupulous writers come such conscientious scribes as Mr. Hume Brown, who gave us last year the first part of a history of Scotland on the modern plan. It is a blameless performance, and one of undoubted usefulness, yet one rises from its perusal with a feeling of chill dismay—with the disheartening conviction that henceforth history and literature are two separate things. Fidelity! every statement rests upon unimpeachable testimony; accuracy! you may lay a thousand guineas against a back number of the Daily Mail upon the correctness of every date; lucidity! there is not an ambiguous phrase or faulty construction in the whole volume. But the sap! where is it? Where are the colour, the movement, the jar of jealousy, the consuming fires of avarice and passion, the unavailing regrets, the fierceness of despair?

Of all the scenes of Scottish history there is none more dimmed with pathos than the end of the fifth James. He had begun to reign with more than the precocious energy of the Stuarts; his aim had been loftier, his intentions better, than any of them; he had manfully striven to set his unruly realm in the paths of peace; but before he reached middle age all had come to naught and worse than naught. The disgraceful rout of Solway Moss, the consciousness of his own unknightly conduct in hanging back while his army went forward to destruction, broke the heart of him. Childless, save for the ill-starred babe Mary, he beheld the clouds descending upon the kingdom which he truly loved and had tried so hard to save, and with his dying breath he murmured the homely prophecy "It came wi' a lass and it will gang wi' a lass."

How is all this treated by our modern historian? There is no documentary evidence of James' pusillanimity before his last battle; we must beware, therefore, of precipitate opinion upon his conduct. The disaffection and suspected fidelity of his nobles, the inexperience of his new commander-in-chief—the "mere gentleman of cloak and sword"—were circumstances which may or may not have influenced the King's behaviour: but we feel that we cannot with propriety say more than that "for reasons unexplained James had not accompanied his army, but had remained at Lochmaben to await the result of the invasion." As for the dying words, there, again, we have only hearsay to go upon. It is most unusual for Kings to talk in broad Scots, which gives an unbecoming air of levity to the occasion. Still, it was an important utterance, and we shall not commit ourselves if we refer to it thus. "In words that are variously reported he exclaimed that the Crown had come to his house by a woman, and would pass from it by a woman."

Another risk to which abundance of minute information exposes the historian, and especially the biographer, is the destruction or mutilation of ideals. The radiance of a great luminary blinds us to a few great spots on its surface. The annals of the Regency contain no act equal in turpitude to David's betrayal of Uriah; it is not glozed in the chronicles of Israel, yet David remains for all time the ideal patriotic King.

But no fame could shine through the cloud of petty frailties and imperfections which research might exhume from private papers where a sufficient quantity of these have been preserved. There is an insatiable appetite among readers for tittle-tattle about the departed great; the temptation to pander to it is sometimes considerable; it is to the credit of English historians that none of them has hitherto yielded to it to the same extent as did Brantôme and Tallemant-des-Réaux, although one cannot but be thankful that these dear gossips were hampered by no shackles of respect for persons. Not that it is unimportant for the historian to be in possession of evidence of shortcomings or specific weaknesses on the part of characters in his narrative; such knowledge is essential to understanding τό ἀνθρώπινον; the right use of such knowledge is what distinguishes the biographer from the mere showman. His critical faculty enables him to keep the dark traits in their balanced proportion; his literary sense will save him from the nauseous vice of undue eulogy.

Perhaps an example of true portraiture by a contemporary of one of the least honoured of English Kings may be cited, though it is from the hand of a very unpretending writer. Sir Thomas Gray, of Heton, beguiled his captivity in Edinburgh Castle by composing during 1355 and following years a history of his country, which he fantastically named "Scalacronica," in allusion to the cognisance of his family which was, and remains to this day, a scaling ladder. The narrative has never been translated from the original quaint Norman French, in which he probably dictated it to some cleric. It was printed by the Maitland Club, one hundred and twenty copies only been pulled, but it is so full of fresh observation by an experienced soldier that it is worth far more in many respects than many more elaborate monkish compilations. Here is his sketch from life of Edward II., whom he had no great cause to judge leniently.

> He was neither industrious nor beloved by the great men of his realm, although he was liberal-handed and amiable beyond measure to those whom he loved, and very sociable with his intimates. Also he was in person one of the strongest men in his realm.

When the Bishop of Hertford made known to him at Kenilworth his deposition—

> He accepted the whole thing patiently, gave his son the blessing of God and his own, and prayed God to make him wise and to grant him more grace and favour with the people than he himself had ever obtained. . . . In discourse he was wise, gentle and amiable, although indolent in action. He was very skilful in things he set his hand to; too free with his intimates, reserved with strangers, and indiscreet in his attachment to a particular person.

STUDIES IN RECENT FICTION.

I.—THE LONG NOVEL.

We have been told of late that what the British public loves is "a good long read"; and as our average novelists produce thicker, heavier, and more closely-printed volumes every day, there seems no reason to doubt the statement. Perhaps something that I overheard at Mudie's may throw a light on the preference. It was at the time, so critical for the publishers, when the ancient "three-decker" died the death, and the six-shilling novel rose from its ashes. "Only one volume?" said the lady I overheard. "I want something that lasts." "You will find as much in that one, I assure you," said the assistant within the circle, "as there is in the ordinary three. Look at the print alone, madam!" The idea in this case was plainly that by being offered one book when she expected three the subscriber was not getting her money's worth. True, she could have taken out two other six-shilling novels as fat as the first; but the first was by one of her idols, and she had looked forward to a lingering enjoyment of the two opening volumes, with visions of the third still to come.

For my part I sympathize—not in the longing for three volumes; they tumbled about and necessitated straps or a string-bag (that emblem of British matronhood)—but I, too, when a set of characters has gained my affection, feel it a wrench and an outrage when I am untimely taken from them, even in the interests of art. The author may be perfectly right from a literary point of view. The effective situation may have been reached, after which all is anti-climax. The particular phase he wished to treat, and had made sure of by study, may have been treated and done with. He has earned his "Finis." But none the less do we grudge him his rest. There is always a feeling left after reading a short, exquisitely complete book, into which no unnecessary phrase has been admitted, that the author had his literary self-consciousness too much to the fore; that he loved his style and his effectiveness and cared little for his characters. I have seen such a book read with the keenest appreciation by people who look at literature from the inside. "Listen to this sentence!" they will exclaim, "could any one but Smithson put it just like that?" And Smithson will be in their envious minds from the first cover to the last. As for Smithson's characters, they do not gain such a hold upon us that we are loth to leave them. They are Smithson's characters—no more. There is, on the other hand, a feature in some long novels which has a special attraction for those numerous persons whose ambition it is to be literary. They will settle down with a sigh of real enjoyment to a good long tautological, introspective production. They will not be obliged to concentrate their tired brains for an hour; but they can be made to feel that they are using them for five hours, with the minimum of exertion. There will be no doubt as to "the story." And the characters of the leading people in the book will probably not only explain themselves but be explained at immense length by the conscientious author.

Of course, all long novels are not spun-out or tautological. Some would be difficult to prune. But there are one or two recognized ways of making the "good long read" which is desired. Let me, with the help of an instance or two, ask what these methods are, premising that I do not propose to criticize the books referred to; that has been done elsewhere. Nor do I cavil at them. They have given me hours of solid enjoyment. The laying bare of their machinery is the sole discourtesy I shall use.

Take Tolstoy's method, to begin with. He is not an English novelist, but to me his influence on the long novel is very clear. What makes his books so long is not only their wealth of incident and their enormous number of characters. It is the extraordinary amount of detail that he admits into his descriptions. It is not all irrelevant; there may be character in the way a man brushes his hair, or asks for the mustard; and Tolstoy fears lest we should miss the minutest characteristic. Take his last book, "Resurrection." The hero takes a cab; the driver is described. He is a man with a fresh, open countenance; his chin is such and such a shape; his hair, &c. And he leads to nothing. His chin might have been quite another shape without detriment to the hero, to Tolstoy, or to us. Nekhludoff goes to pay a call. A "very handsome footman, with whiskers, in a swallow-tail coat," admits him. The family are at dinner. After their names and positions at the table have been given, and the difficulty felt by the host in masticating with false teeth has been touched upon, there is a great deal more "business" before Nekhludoff is allowed to sit down and begin dining. "Stephen," says the host, with his mouth full. "Immediately, your Excellency," says Stephen. And he "made a sign with his head to the handsome footman, who began at once to arrange the untouched knives and forks, and the napkin, elaborately folded with the family crest uppermost," &c. It gives the necessary idea of ostentation, certainly; but we are not spared the way in which the diners push back their chairs and rinse their mouths. With so little use of the power of selection, it is difficult to see why Tolstoy ever leaves anything out (to what dishes did Nekhludoff help himself?); and it is easy to see how "Resurrection" covers 555 pages of small print. English writers of the same school are Mr. Keary and (in a lesser degree) Mr. George Moore.

There is a second way of building an immense novel. That is by beginning in really good time. A week or two before the birth of the central figure is a good starting-point. It will take you a good thirty pages to get to the first pair of shoes; and an inspiring vista, stretching through measles on page 200 to matrimony in the far distance, opens before the eager reader. Madame Sarah Grand's "Beth Book" is a glorious example. Beth is interesting from her cradle to her first crib, and from that to a four-poster. There is, therefore, really no reason why we should be excused any of it; though I did experience an irrelevant wish to smile when, after reading for an hour or so, I arrived at the place where Beth first became aware of light, like a blinking puppy. I sobered down, of course, into becoming seriousness to consider her "short-coating." Dr. Margaret Todd, who writes under the name of "Graham Travers," and is the author of "Mona Maclean," a novel of thirteen editions, has the same method in her "Windyhaugh." We do not begin quite so early in her case. The heroine is seven, and religious questions are agitating her soul. She is a fascinating, much misunderstood little person, and we do not grudge her our attention during the two hundred pages or so which lead her up to girlhood. "Windyhaugh" has 446 pages in all.

Yet another method is one that only a master should attempt, for when clumsily practised it exasperates. Mr. Henry James uses it to perfection. He takes one single situation or problem and dances round it to exquisite music till he is tired. He draws near it, "drags away" a little bit, plays with it like a conjurer, dances away again—in short, to drop a tiresome metaphor, he talks about the thing, and makes his characters talk about it and think about it and feel about it and fulfil their salvation by it (or the very reverse), until the thing looms absolutely gigantic, and excuses any smallness of print. Somebody covets the furniture of a house; somebody wonders what an unfortunate little girl thinks of her parents' marital relations; and that is more than enough. Not many authors dare this method. They are afraid of the bluff English public requesting them to "cut the cackle and come to the 'osses." Mr. Joseph Conrad ventures something very like it, however. In his "Nigger of the Narcissus" my attention was strained to the breaking-point over the one ghastly question as to whether the wonderful "nigger" was dying or shamming. And now, in his "Lord Jim," much the same thing happens. The hero, Jim, has done one cowardly act. What it is we are only allowed to guess through chapter after chapter. At last it comes out. He has deserted his ship because he felt that she was sinking; and she was crowded with helpless emigrants. It certainly is an interesting case. Jim is heroism itself when he is prepared for a danger. If it takes him unawares, he is as likely as not to be dreaming romantic dreams of his own bravery and to be startled by an interruption into some fatal, instinctive act of cowardice as actually happens. Mr. Joseph Conrad gives us Jim's own words upon the matter, the thoughts of his hearer upon the matter, his hearer's impressions of Jim himself, Jim's impressions of his hearer, and so on. It is subtle, psychological, interesting. I did not weary of it. But who shall say that it is not a method, however inevitable, of lengthening out a novel?

The type of long novel which I should call the most legitimate of all is the type favoured by writers like Miss Sydney Grier. She thinks out her characters, their difficulties, their romances, their places in the politics of her imaginary Thracias, and other fascinating regions, so thoroughly, and takes us with them through it all with so few digressions and so little comment that it is difficult to see where the books would gain by being shorter. Some may find "A Crowned Queen" over-long; but it is hard to say which of Ernestine's adventures could have been left out. In fact, if an author has a really good story to tell and tells it without padding, letting the people in it describe themselves, he can hardly be too long-winded, however many pages he may fill. Meanwhile, the less critical of the public will like him if he draws all their conclusions for them, gives them photographs as well as pictures, enlarges on every detail, and, above all, does a little moralizing by the way. So that, good or bad, the path of the lengthy writer seems the shortest way to success.

THE DRAMA.

"THE LIKENESS OF THE NIGHT"—"THE SWASHBUCKLER."

In Mrs. Clifford's serious, not to say sombre, drama The Likeness of the Night you have another of the "problem plays" so irritating to the numerous class of playgoers who prefer to give their brains a rest in the playhouse. For my part I should plead for catholicity of taste; let us get what fun we can out of problem plays, as we get what fun we can out of ballet or a patter-song by Mr. Dan Leno. The mistake is to take any of these amusements too seriously. We are apt to forget that problem plays solve nothing. It is as absurd to ask the question "What does it prove?" about any one of them as it is to ask it about the Moonlight Sonata. And the reason is simple. The theatre never tells the whole truth. You cannot tell the whole truth about anything to a miscellaneous crowd; you would shock the public conscience. Socrates tried it (not in the theatre, but my argument, as the French say, "subsists"), and the representatives of the compact majority made him drink the hemlock. More particularly the theatre can never tell the whole truth about the relations between men and women. There are some truths here which are better ignored. Nor is the whole truth known save to the interested parties. "Il y a tant de choses," said George Sand to an indiscreet person who questioned her about her connexion with Musset, "il y a tant de choses entre deux amants dont eux seuls au monde peuvent être juges!" Truths so elusive, so secret must not be blurted out before a gaping crowd of amusement-seekers.

In no wise can the stage tell the truth about cases of "two establishments." These cases, as we know, arise from the survival of the bigamous instincts in a society outwardly based on strict monogamy. Now the ways of nature are very curious, far too curious for satisfactory investigation by the unscientific methods for the stage, even if the stage came to the subject with an open mind instead of holding, as it is bound to hold, a brief for the prosecution—namely, the current social system. I have in my recollection a case of "two establishments" which would have seemed monstrous on the stage and yet in reality was not. The man was not a fickle man, not in the least a sensualist; he simply had a double dose of the domestic virtues. He was not satisfied with less than two homes. Some time ago there was a report in the papers of a man who had two wives at opposite ends of the King's-road, Brighton—one at Kemp Town, the other at Hove. This was tempting Providence, and one fine day both wives found they had come to meet the same gentleman at the railway station. There was another notorious case in which a sporting journalist was killed in a cab accident. Two widows turned up to identify the body and to quarrel over the "estate." They lived in neighbouring London streets, and neither had so much as suspected the other's existence. I should be sorry to deliver a final judgment on any one of these cases; I have not the materials. Nor has any one else.

Now the stage, more especially of late, asks us to form a judgment on cases of this kind. Or, rather, the playwright implies a judgment and invites our approbation. And we agree (or disagree) with the playwright, but "get no forrarder." For the playwright first invents his characters and events to fit in with his predetermined judgment. But nature does not go to work in that way. Let us be careful, then, to take these problem plays for what they are—mere exercises in the amusement to be found in conclusions drawn from purely arbitrary premisses; a picture of what the world would be like if there were not another side to the cognizable and presentable side of the truth. From that point of view it is possible to find a rational, if somewhat gloomy, pleasure in The Likeness of the Night. The wife is a precisian and a prude, with a warm heart which she is constitutionally incapable of wearing on her sleeve, even before her husband. She is neglected, and we pity her. The mistress is a more or less innocent woman, innocent enough not to alienate our sympathies. Mrs. Clifford evidently tries her best to hold the balance fairly. But she has her thesis to maintain. She has to see that the institution of monogamy is vindicated by events, and we are not convinced. The wife commits suicide upon discovering the existence of the mistress. Well, that furnishes a dramatic catastrophe, which is an indispensable requisite in any serious play: but away goes the problem. For we want to know how these things "pan out" in ordinary life, not how they affect people with suicidal tendencies. After the wife's death, the husband and mistress marry. Then they discover (what in reality they would have guessed all along) that it was they who drove the wife to her death. Thereupon, they say, is an end of their love and happiness; "between them flows the sea," bearing the wife's corpse. Thus conscience comes in to reinforce and vindicate the law of the land. It is a properly moral conclusion, but is it true? Is it true in the special case in which the dramatist has been able to arrange all the incidents à volonté? Perhaps; though even that is arguable. I think that (after the last act, say in a year or two) oblivion would scatter her poppy, and the second best bed room in the new household would be turned into a nursery. But, granting Mrs. Clifford's conclusion, I find no solution of the general problem of two households. There can be no solution where the facts are "cooked." Nature does not cook her facts. The real point of the play is not in any "problem"; it is in the little truthful touches of womanly passion and grief, in the picture of timid, inarticulate love, fighting helplessly against a more blithe, unfettered affection. Mrs. Kendal plays the wife superbly—I will use no meaner word. She can move even the men in her audience to furtive tears; and tears in the playhouse are worth all the problem-solving in the world. Mr. Kendal, too, has become a very capable actor, in a quiet, unobtrusive way. I do not think his way is precisely that of the man typified in this play, the man of bigamous temperament; nor, for that matter, do I think that Mrs. Clifford has precisely hit upon the right type. But the actor, and the type, pass muster; and the play being written by a woman of letters is on the whole a "distinguished" bit of work. And now that playgoers have seen it, and taken their pleasure in it, and gone home, and (perhaps) sincerely believed that the relations of men and women are just like that, why, let us have done with this particular theme for a time. The drama assigns more importance to it than it possesses in actual life. If I am to be perpetually spending my evenings at the playhouse with these triangular domesticities I shall be driven in sheer weariness to sigh for a social revolution which shall recognize Mormonism or the Oriental harem or Plato's community of women. That would be a most uncomfortable revolution no doubt, and terribly expensive to the already overburdened householder; but it would at least rid us of these sexual problem plays.

In Mr. Louis Parker's romantic comedy The Swashbuckler Miss Evelyn Millard, in doublet and hose, shows us how she will some day play Rosalind. Mr. Waring is her Orlando, an Orlando with a difference, an Orlando-Cyrano or Orlando-D'Artagnan; a gallant hero but an indifferent lover, without a note of tenderness in his voice. Neither actor nor actress is at ease, because they evidently do not know whether they are engaged in a game of sincere or of mock romance. How should they, when Mr. Parker does not seem to know himself? By its uncertainty of mood—now poetically romantic, with moonlight effects, now extravagantly comic with sly Gilbertian touches—the play leaves the audience completely puzzled. I do not profess to be wiser than the rest of the public; Mr. Parker really ought to tell us what he meant, for he is a clever man, and I daresay he will have no difficulty in proving that we have been perversely dense. Let him then make haste to shame us in another Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes.

ANTHOLOGIES.

The Oxford Book of English Verse (1250-1900). Chosen and Edited by A. T. Quiller Couch. (Oxford: The Clarendon Press. 7s. 6d.)

A new anthology is almost as difficult to criticize as to make: for, however sincerely the critic may attempt to put himself into the anthologist's place and assume his point of view, he is sure to find his judgment intruded upon at every turn by personal predilections and preconceptions. And this is particularly the case when the collection, as in Mr. Quiller Couch's handsome volume, is brought "down to date," and includes poems by those living writers concerning whom criticism has yet to make up its mind. It is impossible that there should be agreement here, and Mr. Couch is sure to be assailed during the next few weeks with innumerable suggestions from "irresponsible reviewers" anxious to prove to him how much better they could have done the work than he. For our own part, we have no taste for any such easy and inconclusive controversy. Mr. Quiller Couch is a critic of trained and sensitive judgment. He has undertaken a most difficult task, which he has performed with evident care and tact, and he deserves sincere congratulation upon the completion of a rich and (on the whole) successful enterprise. That his judgment should prove infallible no one could expect; and, where the object was to include so much, it was inevitable that some things should be omitted which might have been retained, and some retained which an exclusive taste might wish away. But wherever we have cause to differ from him, we must be understood to do so with deference, recognizing that Mr. Couch can probably defend his judgment in every instance as readily as we ourselves can impugn it. So much at least is due to the spirit and labour of his selection.

There have been many anthologies published during the last few years, but no competent critic would be prepared to question that the standard by which they must all be compared at the outset is still that of Palgrave's "Golden Treasury." You may enlarge upon that classic collection, or you may reduce from it, but in all essentials it remains the unit of taste. Mr. Couch, for his part, has enlarged upon it, and that in no niggardly spirit. His 1,050 pages contain 883 separate poems as against 327 in "The Golden Treasury"; his list of authors comprises 269 names, while Palgrave's has no more than 81. This considerable increase is, of course, to some extent attributable to the fact that Palgrave expressly excluded all writers then living, while Mr. Couch sets no such restriction upon himself, and is therefore able to include selections, not only from Tennyson, the Brownings, the Rossettis, and William Morris, but from Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Robert Bridges, Mr. Meredith, and the other masters of Victorian verse. But the later poets by no means exhaust the list of Mr. Couch's additions; he has drawn from the whole field of English poetry in his amplification of Palgrave, and in some cases he has very sensibly reinforced his predecessor. The revived interest in Donne, for example, stimulated by Mr. Edmund Gosse's fruitful labours, has suggested a rich selection from his work; and Donne makes no appearance at all in "The Golden Treasury." The ballad poetry, again, has been largely drawn upon by Mr. Couch, somewhat too largely, indeed, for the maintenance of a very high poetic standard, but not without a sense of breezy virility which gives life and vigour to the volume. The lyrical poems of Beaumont and Fletcher are also given due space, and songs such as "Now the lusty spring is seen" and the "Hymn to Pan" would add lustre to any collection. Several less familiar poets, moreover, are restored to their fitting company; such as Sir Robert Ayton, Thomas Flatman, and Charles Webbe—singers, indeed, of the second magnitude, but of distinct and memorable brilliancy. In all these additions Mr. Couch has done real service to the study of English poetry, preserving proportion, and suggesting the links that connect period with period.

There is a further respect in which Palgrave's editing was open to criticism. After stating in his preface that his choice had always been dictated by the excellence of a poem as a whole rather than in parts, he would yet give himself the license of selecting verses or passages, and would then print them without confessing the mutilation. Thus in "The Golden Treasury" Crashaw's "Whoe'er she be, that not impossible She," is reduced to half its proper length, while three verses are selected from Smart's "Song of David" and rearranged in a different order. In this respect Mr. Couch is rightly more restrained. It is true that he has not the confidence to print Crashaw's poem in full, but it is lopped of but four verses, and those of questionable merit, while of the eighty-six verses of Smart's extraordinary medley of inspiration and obscurity eighteen are here printed, and those the best. A less familiar amplification is that of Mrs. Barbauld's "Life," though here the advantage is less determined, the lines which Palgrave omitted being otiose and rather out of tune with the studious simplicity of the beginning and end of that melodious nocturne. These are, indeed, very difficult questions for the editor to decide; but, on the whole, we incline to the printing of a poem as nearly as possible in the form in which the author left it. Where a writer cannot be worthily represented by his shorter poems, he is, perhaps, best omitted altogether.

This difficulty is emphasized when it happens that a poet of great national and poetic significance owes his supremacy almost entirely to long and sustained pieces, such as the narrative and the epic. The anthologist is naturally anxious to give him space commensurate with his importance, but it is clearly impossible to include slices from an epic in a lyrical anthology. Milton and Byron, for example, must always appear at a disadvantage in this respect; and it will, perhaps, shock the enthusiasts of the Byron revival to find that Mr. Couch gives Tennyson nearly five times as much space as the author of "Don Juan." But the five lyrics by which Byron is represented are unquestionably his best, and we are glad, for our part, that his latest editor has had the courage to exclude the popular "Fare thee well, and if for ever," which, with its false protestation and exclamatory insincerity, had for so long a while a truly vicious effect on contemporary sentiment. With Tennyson, however, we come to the perilous part of Mr. Couch's enterprise—the portion of the volume devoted to contemporaries. Here so many interests and predilections are brought into play that complete success is impossible, and we cannot say that this portion of the volume is marked by so sound a judgment as the earlier. In the case of Tennyson himself, the selections are in the main good, but we are not quite satisfied that Mr. Couch has chosen either the most characteristic or the most beautiful passages from "In Memoriam." To select here was peculiarly difficult; but we should certainly have expected to find the movement which begins

> If one should bring me this report, > and that other,
> When Lazarus left his charnel-cave, which, taken either apart or together, contain two of Tennyson's most striking and original reflections upon different aspects of death. Turning to Browning, we miss "Evelyn Hope," which should certainly have been chosen for its simplicity, and for its direct expression of Browning's particular theory of immortality and of the perpetuity of human energy. Nor can we reconcile ourselves to the omission either of "Rabbi ben Ezra" or "Abt Vogler." Neither of these, it is true, is lyrical in the sense that pure song is lyrical, but Mr. George Meredith's "Love in the Valley" is equally removed from absolutely lyric utterance, and is, nevertheless, given eight pages. These, however, are almost questions of definition, concerning which it is vain to argue. On the other hand, there can be no question of the lyric quality of Hood's "I remember, I remember," which Mr. Couch has passed over in favour of the rather artificial "Death-bed." Homeliness of sentiment can hardly have been the excluding blemish upon "I remember," for Peacock's pretty and touching "Love and Age" is essentially homely, and Mr. Couch has rightly included that. It is hard to see the exercise of consistent criticism here.

William Morris also comes off very badly. A single verse, and that by no means the strongest, is all we get from "Love is Enough," and "The Haystack in the Floods" was surely more worth a place than James Hogg's "Kilmeny." Both these poems have narrative qualities, and are thus open to objections in a volume of lyrics, but Morris' has more of the ballad lilt, and is, in addition, one of his most characteristic word-tapestries. Patmore is well represented, though we should have liked to find the celebration of "Winter" side by side with "Departure." Rossetti, on the contrary, is hardly used, and it is, perhaps, fair to conclude, taking this in connexion with the poverty of quotation from Morris, that Mr. Couch is no friend to the Pre-Raphaelites. Still, it is difficult to see why "The Song of the Bower" should be omitted; since its musical fervour and intensity renders it an admirable companion to O'Shaughnessy's "Fountain of Tears," which rightly gets its due. On the other hand, a good many later poets receive a more generous welcome than this austere treatment of the early Victorians would seem to justify. Mr. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt has seven pages to Mr. Austin Dobson's two; and he would be a bold advocate who should pretend that the workmanship of the two poets stands in any just relationship to this division of favour. Mr. Robert Buchanan, Madame Darmesteter, Mr. Theophile Marzials, the late Lord De Tabley, Professor Courthope, Mr. Arthur Symons, and Mr. A. E. Housman have not a line given them, and in their place are some modern writers of verse of whom we are unwilling to speak ungenerously, but of whom it may at least be said that their work, as exhibited in Mr. Couch's pages, makes no very insistent claims for such conspicuous recognition.

Still, as we said at the outset, there may be much disputing over taste, and very little finality in the dispute. We have ventured to indicate points at which we differ from Mr. Couch, both in the matter of exclusion and of inclusion; but for the general impartiality and judgment of his choice we have nothing but admiration. In the case of contemporaries it is almost impossible to hold the balance evenly; a dozen different critics might make a dozen different anthologies, and it would probably be found that all serious divergences of their taste were confined to the contemporary field. That Mr. Couch has shown some inconsistencies of judgment is, we believe, indisputable; it would have been a miracle had he done otherwise. But it is equally indisputable that he has produced an anthology ampler than any existing in single-volume form, full of imperishable poetry, and marred by very little that falls below a dignified standard. In doing this he has done much; and his work invites our cordial appreciation and respect.

British Anthologies. Edited by Professor Edward Arber, F.S.A. (Frowde. 2s. 6d.) The Surrey and Wyatt Anthology (1509-1547 A.D.). The Goldsmith Anthology (1745-1774 A.D.).

There is a singular interest about both these books. In the first, thought seems to be struggling for expression. Poetry is there, the feeling is true, but the form is often uncouth. It is clear that this is due more to lack of skill in the lighter touch than to any difference of accentuation between English of the sixteenth and of the nineteenth centuries, for Chaucer is more musical, easier to read and to enjoy than some of the writers here represented, and particularly than the anonymous verse writers. On the other hand, the Goldsmith volume shows great accuracy and range of expression with a narrower range of thought.

With Sir Thomas Wyatt, English Literature first makes acquaintance with two foreign forms: the sonnet and the terza rima. Wyatt succeeds best with the latter, yet this it is which has not taken root in English. On the whole, both he and Surrey manage the terza rima with some skill. Wyatt's "Town Mouse and Country Mouse" is a quaint thing: one sees the Mouse take her sister "by the hand," and hears her swear "by the rood." Surrey, too, tries his hand at fable, or rather allegory; and there is a prevailing taste for that form which needs a Bunyan or a Spenser to make it really pleasing. From Gavin Douglas, whose strong manly verse should be oftener read than it is, we have a long allegory, "King Heart," which seems to foreshadow the City of Mansoul and the "Purple Island." Skelton's burlesque elegy on "Philip Sparrow" is quite amusing, though too much spun out. The editor draws attention to a curious list of birds (pp. 144-150) and of the books which a young lady was supposed to read (151-7). Amongst these, Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" come first, then "Gawen" and "Sir Guy," the Arthurian cycle, romances, classical histories. One is amused to read, of Chaucer, that—

> Now men would have amended
> His English: whereat they bark,
> And mar all they work.

The historian will be interested in two satires against Wolsey. Skelton, "Why Come ye not to Court?" gives a picture of the masterful prelate in the Star Chamber,

> Clapping his rod on the board,
> No man dare speak a word.

The two Friars, Roy and Barlow ("Read me and Be not Wroth") describe the magnificence of his progress. Each poem speaks of him as a butcher or butcher's son. Hunting and seafaring are already passions with English folk. William Gray contributes a stirring song, "The Hunt is Up," and that Royal huntsman Henry VIII. sums up his philosophy in another.

> Pastime with good company
> I love, and shall until I die.
> Grudge who lust, let none deny!
> So God be pleased, thus live will I.
> For my pastance,
> Hunt, sing, and dance:
> All goodly sport
> For my comfort:
> Who shall me let?

Who, indeed? Let Cranmer and Wolsey answer; he was "a prince of a right royal courage." Moreover—a sure sign of popular feeling—the anonymous verse sings of the same theme. Here, too, we have the stirring sea-ballads of "John Dory" and "Sir Andrew Barton." The anonymous pieces are many and of high quality: we need only add "The Three Ravens," the "Boar's Head Carols," and a dirge—"O Death, rock me on sleep." Although there is more gloom than is usual with popular poems, love ditties are not wanting. One quaint one deserves mention; it is not often a lover sings of his rival—

> He is worthy,
> Much better than I,
> To have the love of her:
> Therefore, sweet heart,
> Farewell, my part:
> Adieu, sometime my dear.

Henry VIII. himself contributes a doleful love-ditty: by which of his loves inspired, we wonder?

There are several points to criticize in this volume. Some of the words in the glossary are not explained; and, as we have before urged, spelling should not be altered when metre or rime demands the old form. Thus we should read sweetëly (p. 2), wordës (116), piggësnye (286), than for then (77). We would also suggest arrearage for a rerage (161), amended for amendeth (244), and perhaps Common Pleas for Place (170). Goldsmith is always pleasing, and who will ever tire of the "Deserted Village," or (in another vein) the humorous "Epitaphs on Distinguished Wits"? But why insert Samuel Boyce's clumsy pleasantries, or Arthur Bradley, or the Rev. Alexander Webster, D.D.? Nymphs and swains, Corydons and Phillises abound of course; and the writers cannot shake off their affectations. Shenstone follows up one fine stanza—"Here in cool grot and mossy dell"—with three that smell of the lamp. In minor poetry the Scotch, perhaps, come best out of the trial: "Auld Robin Gray" is not alone. The anonymous pieces number among them some good songs. When they deal with pastoral themes they are as stilted as the rest, with one or two exceptions, such as "When Molly Smiles." But best of this class are convivial songs, or those which echo the sound of war: "The Girl I left behind me," "The Jolly Brisk Tar," "The Jolly Toper," and "True Blue" can hold their own well enough. Other old favourites are "The Friar of Orders Grey," Garrick's "Heart of Oak," and Dibdin's "Thames Waterman."

BOOK PRICES.

The fourteenth volume of Mr. J. H. Slater's Book Prices Current (Elliot Stock, 27s. 6d.), is a chronicle based upon the catalogues of the principal London book sales between October, 1899, and July, 1900, and, like the former volumes, is annotated with valuable bibliographical notes. The lots catalogued reached a total of 38,151, and brought an aggregate of £87,929 2s. 6d., or an average of £2 6s. 2d. per lot. This average is lower than those of the three preceding years, chiefly, we think, because not one library of first-class importance has come upon the market. But Mr. Slater assigns the decrease to the war and the disinclination of people in general to indulge in such luxuries as fine books. The war would have had such an effect had the trade rested solely with England, but in reality it does not, and a glance through "Book Prices Current" discloses the fact that a large proportion of the best books were purchased by agents acting for persons living abroad who were in no way influenced by the operations at the Cape. Really good books, such as fine examples of the works of early printers, the quartos of the older dramatists, and the first editions of the great poets, are always in demand, and nothing seems to check the upward tendency of their prices.

Though the comparative value of the collections dispersed this year is less than those of former years, this volume is quite as bulky as its predecessors. It is indeed too bulky. The interest of the volume is a commercial one, and such entries as "4295, Levy, A., Private Life of Napoleon, 2 vols., 1891—De Maupas, Story of the Coup d'Etat, 2 vols., 1884, together 6 (sic) vols. 8vo., £1 1s.," are superfluous. The labour expended upon such entries would have been better devoted to indicating, by some special mark in the Index, which among many entries of one particular work gives its highest price during the sale year.

At the present moment the strongest general demand is for copies of limited editions. As an evidence of this Mr. Slater quotes the prices realized by the Kelmscott and Vale Press publications, but we think the association is hardly a happy one. The Vale books will never reach a similarly high level; they are wanting in many of the essential qualities which mark the Kelmscott volumes as exceptional examples of the printer's art, and they lack the glamour of the personality of the founder which still affects the productions of the Kelmscott Press. This influence, however, will necessarily wane as we get further from Morris' own generation, and even now there are signs that the vogue of the Kelmscott books has reached its limit. Three hundred copies of the "Keats" were published in 1894 at 30s. each. In December, 1895, they were selling at auction for £3 14s., which by March, 1896, had increased to £4 10s. By June, 1898, nearly two years after the death of William Morris, the price had gone up to £11 10s., and by April, 1899, this had grown to £26; but the last price quoted for 1900 by Mr. Slater does not go beyond £27 5s. The other Kelmscott books have more or less shared the fortunes of the "Keats."

As a contrast to this Mr. Slater draws attention to the rapid decline in value of the early Stevensons and Kiplings. On this subject Mr. Slater fails in being the sure guide that we have usually found him. Many of these trifles, he says, "after a period of artificial inflation, have had a most disastrous collapse"—e.g., Kipling's "Schoolboy Lyrics" fell from £135 to £3 5s., while Stevenson's "The Marguerite," Davos Platz, 1882, fell from £4 to £2. But the record price of £135 given for Kipling's book in April, 1899, was for a spotless copy in perfect condition with a MS. title and design on the cover done by the author's father, whereas the copy which sold for £3 5s. in July last was, as we pointed out at the time, a poor soiled copy which was further disfigured by having a former owner's name written on the title. These blemishes are the things which underent prices. Mr. Slater's remarks on the Stevenson booklet are scarcely more to the point. Early in 1899 a copy of "The Marguerite" was sold for over £5, while other copies went at the same time for much less, one going for as little as 38s., the reason being that a buyer who will have a copy at all costs gives the highest price, while the other copies, as the reckless competition slackens, subside to prices which more nearly approach their true value. Such matters cannot be left unconsidered by collectors who very properly turn for information and guidance to the pages of Mr. Slater's useful compilation.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

Daniel O'Connell. By Robert Dunlop. (Heroes of the Nations Series.) (Putnam's Sons. 5s.)

Almost every one is a hero to his biographer, or perhaps it would be more correct to say that almost all biographers make their subjects into heroes. Mr. Dunlop is so far exempt from this common failing that, though he writes with hearty appreciation of O'Connell's character, he does not by any means leave the reader under the impression that it had no defects. It is an estimate, no doubt, more generous than O'Connell's enemies would accept, but biographies, if they lean at all to either side, ought rather to be generous than unsympathetic. In his present work, Mr. Dunlop has, as he says, allowed himself to write more freely than was possible in his article in the Dictionary of National Biography; but we do not know that he has thereby sacrificed his impartiality. He says, with truth, that the ashes of controversy are still hot in the path of O'Connell's biographer. For instance, the religious question is not yet entirely at rest, though for the present it takes the form of academic discussions on a Catholic University. And as for the larger question of Home Rule, or Repeal, who can say whether it is finally at rest or not? If we are to judge O'Connell fairly, we must put aside recent agitations, with all the prejudices they excite, and must endeavour to look at Ireland as he and others of his time saw it. No candid man will say that it is a pleasant spectacle, or that our government of Ireland since the Union has left us nothing to regret.

Emancipation, of course, had been in the air long before O'Connell rose to influence. In 1792 and 1793 relief measures had been passed both for Irish and Scotch Catholics, though the line was drawn at Unitarians and Quakers, whom Lord Stowell stigmatized as "unworthy of legislative indulgence." A little later, but before the Union, Pitt himself had said that the admission of Roman Catholics to Parliament might "be agitated in a United Imperial Parliament with much greater safety than it would be in a separate Legislature." It was the King who held out so obstinately against the liberal policy of his Ministers. For a long time what Sir Francis Burdett called "the annual farce" of trifling with the question went on till the famous Clare election, which sent O'Connell to Parliament, frightened Wellington and Peel, and brought about the long-delayed concession. O'Connell had done more than agitate; he had organized the Catholic Association and the Catholic Rent. To quote Mr. Dunlop:—

> As the effects of the Association became apparent, hope was rekindled in the breasts of the peasantry. They felt that something, to use their own words, was being done for them also. It awoke a new life in them. It was their first step out of servitude into nationality. Their gratitude to the author of it was unbounded. To O'Connell, notwithstanding his modest disclaimer to be the originator of the scheme, they ascribed, and rightly ascribed, their regeneration. O'Connell, indeed, was the life and soul, the creator and sustainer, of the whole movement.

These earlier pages are, to our mind, the best part of Mr. Dunlop's work. The Repeal agitation, which was the work of O'Connell's later years, brought him less glory, notwithstanding monster meetings at Tara and elsewhere, and collapsed with surprising suddenness. Perhaps, after all, he left a reputation greater than his actual achievements.

Agitators, however, are always interesting, if only because they make so many enemies, and arouse so much enthusiasm, that it is difficult to ascertain their real characters. For the most part, they have been unduly maligned and extravagantly praised. In any case, O'Connell must remain the greatest agitator in our recent history. His countrymen had undeniable grievances, and were as impressionable as any people in the world, but they never responded as fervently to any one as to O'Connell. Others have piped to them, but never before, or since, have they danced so unanimously. O'Connell's natural gifts, his wit, his shrewdness, his eloquence, and his untiring physical energy, qualified him perfectly for the part he played. Gifts he had, but not accomplishments. Mr. Dunlop notes that, outside legal literature, he was neither learned nor widely read. He was not thoroughly versed in ecclesiastical history, nor even in the history of his own country. He loved poetry, but had no good taste. His manners were unrefined, and his language coarse and aggressive. His gross servility towards George IV. was enough in itself to have driven any other popular favourite from public life. Mr. Dunlop unsparingly describes his absurd compliments and flatteries and grovellings, and quotes the fierce lines written by Byron on the occasion of the Royal visit to Dublin. But, whatever defects he may have had, Mr. Dunlop holds that it was his honesty, an unaccustomed virtue in an Irish leader, which chiefly endeared him to the people.

> Herein lay the secret of his power. No one who knew him ever doubted his integrity. His enemies sneered at his patriotism, and caricatured him as battening on the poverty of the nation he deluded; but his countrymen believed in him, and he never did anything to forfeit their confidence. But, if his integrity was the main cause of the influence he wielded, hardly less important in maintaining it was his sensitiveness to public opinion, and the dexterity with which he was able to extricate himself from any awkward position into which his sometimes too precipitate judgment drove him. Unbending in anything affecting principle, he knew the value of yielding on matters open to discussion, and the frankness with which he admitted his error, while it conciliated public opinion, served to strengthen his claim as leader.

It should be added that the book contains several good portraits and political caricatures, and views of places associated with O'Connell's career.

THEOLOGY.

A Faith for To-day: Suggestions Towards a System of Christian Belief. By R. J. Campbell, B.A. (J. Clarke. 6s.)

The Ascent Through Christ: A Study of the Doctrine of Redemption in the Light of the Theory of Evolution. By E. Griffith-Jones, B.A. (J. Bowden. 7s. 6d.)

The destructive criticism which threatened to crush the Christian faith in the middle of the century has had a curiously stimulating effect upon it; indeed, one may safely say that, so far as thinking men are concerned, Christianity is twice as much alive to-day as it was in the year 1800. The superstitious exaltation of the Old Testament, which weighed so heavily upon Christian thought that whole tracts of old-fashioned theology are to modern eyes merely childish, has disappeared through the efforts of Christian students themselves. The doctrine of evolution, on the other hand, has freed Christianity from the unsound position into which it had drifted through a too ready acceptance of the first blundering theories of scientific men. Christianity, instead of being in opposition to "free thought," has become a freed system of thought itself; with the result that its old central doctrines are now claiming the allegiance of religious men with a freshness and force unknown a century ago.

The two books before us are good illustrations of this revival. Neither is a great book, nor indeed claims to be more than a modest contribution to Christian thought. There must be plenty of theologians in Great Britain who could turn out as good, and a few who could turn out better works; indeed, every year sees the appearance of one or two essays in theology of the same rank. Yet compare them with what was offered to the religious public by far more famous men a hundred, nay, fifty years ago, and the improvement they illustrate is marvellous. Mr. Campbell is the more interesting writer of the two, both because he is more of an original thinker, and because "A Faith for To-day" shows how much can be done with the sermon. He is quite a young minister—a Nonconformist, for all that he characteristically dedicates his book to a High Church Dean—and he acquired a reputation as a preacher almost as soon as he left college. Here he gives us a collection of his popular sermons. They are real sermons, taken down by a reporter—not essays written for recitation; yet how unlike they are to the popular sermon of tradition! Mr. Campbell not only has the gift of thinking as he speaks, but he has the further power of expressing himself with straightforward lucidity; there is no oratory about these sermons and no fine writing: the preacher just says what he thinks, and what he thinks is worth saying. And the sermons lead on in one connected series from the idea of religion, through the problems of free-will, of evil, of pain, to the Incarnation, prayer, and immortality. Mr. Campbell holds no brief for the old doctrines—he will have nothing to do with the Fall, about which, he remarks, "Jesus never says a word"—but in the main he arrives at orthodox conclusions.

Mr. Griffith-Jones' book is more occupied with natural science and less with philosophy. To him the Incarnation appeals not on the ground of Hegelianism but on that of evolution. He is more popular than Mr. Campbell because he is more concrete; but both make the best sort of religious appeal, and nowadays it seems possible to appeal to thoughtful men and yet be popular. Mr. Griffith-Jones is above all things an apologist, though he tells us that in his younger days he left the traditional faith only to find himself in the end close to the point from which he started, though on higher ground. He deals at length with the modern objections to Christianity, holding that "the nadir of agnostic indifference and negation has been passed," and that the task now before us is to satisfy the longings for a more positive faith. This he attempts to do by a careful analysis in 450 pages of the leading tenets of Christianity, or rather of those elements in it which are not specifically ecclesiastical, for these he is not concerned to defend. Of those doctrines which orthodox Christians hold in common he is a strenuous advocate; he cannot, for instance, bring himself like Mr. Campbell to give up the Fall, but goes even to Grant Allen for materials in its defence. In this apologetic temper he sometimes falls into the errors of the late Professor Drummond; but, on the whole, he raises his defence to a higher level, for he has read widely and makes good use of the thought of writers like Le Conte, Martineau, Gore, Fairbairn, Illingworth, and Milligan. The book is, indeed, an excellent piece of apologetics; and its three sections, "Evolution and the Fall," "Evolution and the Incarnation," "Evolution and the Resurrection," are each full of interesting matter.

International Handbooks to the New Testament.

The appearance of THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS, by George L. Cary (Putnam, 7s. 6d.), marks a somewhat new departure in English New Testament literature. The chief feature of the series of "International Handbooks" is the free discussion of doctrinal and practical matters, rather than minute attention to points of criticism and scholarship. The volume on the "Synoptic Gospels" follows in the main the arrangement of Holtzmann's "Hand-Commentar" and Huck's "Synopse." It takes, in a series of sections, successive points in the synoptic narrative, and presents the chief results of modern interpretation. The book is accordingly much more adapted to the general reader than a commentary of the conventional type. What strikes a reviewer is the comparative slightness of the various discussions. The opinions at present current in regard to special points (e.g., the synoptic problem or the Resurrection narrative) are stated briefly and clearly, but the author rather collects the views of others than makes any serious attempt to guide the student. Yet, in spite of his impartiality, Mr. Cary scarcely conceals his own standpoint. He frankly admits that there is a mythical element in the Gospels (see, for instance, his remarks on the Birth at Bethlehem). The various miracles, especially those in which the dead are raised, are treated in the ordinary rationalizing fashion. The following is a fairly typical remark (§ 85 on "The Daughter of Jairus"):—

> The Christian faith of later times is here attributed to one who gives no evidence of being in any sense a disciple of Jesus. Notwithstanding the evident belief of the Evangelists that the maiden was really dead, they have preserved in the words of Jesus Himself evidence that He believed her to be still alive; for all three of the accounts report Him as distinctly saying that she was not dead but asleep.

Or, again, in regard to the feeding of the five thousand:—

> We may either rest in the simple conviction that nothing which happened can have been at variance either with the laws of matter or of mind, or we may seek . . . some hypothesis which shall make the circumstances described by the synoptists more intelligible.

In reference to the declaration "This is My Body," the author observes that the word "is" here, as often, "indicates a typical resemblance and not identity." In his remarks on the Resurrection Mr. Cary appears to countenance more decidedly than we should have expected the "resuscitation theory." He says "it may be said to be the fashion to speak of [this theory] slightingly rather than to inquire carefully into its merits." These few references will make the author's standpoint evident. There are useful appendices added to the volume, containing much compressed information. The book will be found serviceable even by those who dislike its Unitarian and anti-supernaturalist standpoint. In any case the series of "International Handbooks" promises to be of unusual interest.

The Kaye Prize Essay.

THE RELATION OF ST. PAUL TO CONTEMPORARY JEWISH THOUGHT (Kaye Prize Essay, 1899), by H. St. J. Thackeray (Macmillan, 6s.), deals with a subject which needs a good deal of exploration. How far St. Paul's theology was influenced by the doctrines and beliefs prevalent among the Jews of his own day could scarcely be determined while the data were comparatively scanty. Forty or fifty years ago there was a scarcity of Jewish documents, and such as were known were not supposed to represent the "main current" of Jewish opinion. "The number," however, "of these apocryphal writings has now been considerably increased by discoveries made within the last half-century, and their value as evidences of Jewish thought is becoming generally recognized. It is also recognized that the Rabbinic theology, although not committed to writing till the second century, or later, very often represents traditions which were orally handed down from an earlier age." There are many traces of careful research and independent thought in this essay. Mr. Thackeray successfully impugns the view that St. Paul's description of Christ as "the second Adam" is a Rabbinical title for the Messiah. He is inclined, with some recent writers, to look for the source of St. Paul's doctrine in the teaching of Philo, respecting "the Heavenly" and "the Earthly Man." He shows the frequent connexion between expressions in the Epistles and Jewish legends. The chapter on "St. Paul the Haggadist" is full of interest. In concluding his review of St. Paul's use of the Old Testament, Mr. Thackeray points out wherein lay the Apostle's superiority to the Rabbis. It lay, he says, "in his spiritual insight into the general meaning of the Old Testament . . . in his grasping the correct spirit of the Old Testament, and, in particular, of those Hebrew prophets to whom he felt himself akin. . . . He believed that there was a mystical meaning in the Old Testament, and we cannot doubt that he was divinely guided to grasp that meaning." We congratulate Mr. Thackeray on a very thoughtful and suggestive book. His conclusion is rather abrupt, but this is the only defect of form that we have noticed. We have detected one slight misprint—on p. 52, margin, 2 Cor. 11, 23, should be 2 Cor. 11, 2, 3.

A Handbook of Textual Criticism.

We have had occasion on previous occasions to praise the "Oxford Church Text Books." The latest of them, THE TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, by the Rev. K. Lake (Rivingtons, 1s.), is an excellent illustration of the aim of the series of useful little volumes. It is a concise and lucid exposition of a most intricate subject. Textual criticism has now reached a stage at which a popular exposition of its principles is possible, and we have seldom seen this better done than it is in Mr. Lake's first chapter. In just over a hundred pages he puts the reader au fait with the data for, and the present position of, the textual criticism of the New Testament; the vexed question of the Western Text is dealt with in a long final chapter, in which Mr. Lake states fully and fairly the views of different authorities at the present moment.

The Teaching of the Apostles.

Mr. R. J. Drummond's THE RELATION OF THE APOSTOLIC TEACHING TO THE TEACHING OF CHRIST (Kerr Lectures for 1900, T. and T. Clark, 10s. 6d.) can hardly be described as an important contribution to theology; but it is the work of a conscientious writer, whose aim is to vindicate the New Testament writers as true interpreters of the mind of Christ. He truly says that the cry "Back to Christ" may be not merely hackneyed but misleading. "To set the Apostolic teaching aside is to reflect on the wisdom of the Master, who selected its writers as His disciples, and who guided them by His Spirit to adopt the method of writing their Gospels and Epistles, in order to preserve and transmit to the coming ages the message which He had left heaven to bring."

Two points in Mr. Drummond's argument are worth noting. He protests against an "excessive unification" of separate elements in the New Testament. This was characteristic of the "scholastic" theologians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Modern criticism has dealt with the New Testament writings as organic parts of a living whole, each portion needing to be interpreted in the light of its author's personality, and of the occasion which elicited it. The light of the New Testament revelation has, in fact, reached us "through a prism," though the several rays "depend on a common pencil of light." On the other hand, the writer evidently thinks that further criticism can only endorse traditional views of the date and authorship of the Apostolic writings. He thinks the evidence points to the Pauline authorship of Ephesians and of the Pastoral Epistles. He agrees with Professor J. B. Mayor in assigning a very early date to the Epistle of James; he places the Apocalypse within the fifteen years following 65 A.D., and he supports the Johannine authorship of the fourth gospel. Mr. Drummond is a trifle colloquial and patronising in discussing the character of the different Apostles, but he shows, nevertheless, much real insight, especially in his estimate of the career of St. Paul. Perhaps, however, the most useful lecture is on "The Features of Christ's Teaching," though it is inevitably coloured by the writer's subjective impressions. Nor is he always consistent in his acceptance of critical theories. Thus he points out that Christ accepted, without criticism, current beliefs which "could not have been corrected without leading Him far from the main purpose of His mission"; but elsewhere he declines to apply this principle of accommodation to Christ's references to the personality of evil spirits.

In spite of some few defects of style and form (such slips as "restoral," "confidentialness," "crave" used as a substantive, and a reference to "Liddle and Scott"), Mr. Drummond has produced a creditable piece of work. His book, in fact, shows how diligently the study of scientific theology is cultivated in the Church to which he belongs.

The Gospel of the Twelve Apostles.

The four tracts edited and translated by Mr. J. Rendel Harris in THE GOSPEL OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES (Cambridge University Press, 5s.) are taken from a Syriac MS. belonging to Mr. Harris' private collection. The title "Gospel of the Twelve Apostles" raises the question whether the Syriac document reproduces any fragment of the Gospel which, under the same name, is said to have been current in the second century. Unfortunately the Syriac MS. does not supply data for determining the point. There are indications that the present "Gospel," like the three "Apocalypses" connected with it, was produced in the neighbourhood of Edessa about the middle of the eighth century. It perhaps derives its title from the prominence given in it to the Twelve Apostles, each of whom is connected with one of the twelve tribes. Mr. Harris points out that the "Gospel" has certain points of contact with the Syriac "Doctrine of the Apostles," just as the "Apocalypses" show traces of connexion with the Syriac "Testament of our Lord." The three "Apocalypses," attributed respectively to Simeon Kepha, James, and John, seem to belong to the eighth century. The last of the series contains clear allusions to the history of Chosroes the Great, and the decline of the Persian kingdom, while there seems to be an express reference to Mohammed and "twelve princes" descended from Ishmael, presumably twelve caliphs. We have, in these tracts, so Mr. Harris thinks, specimens of original Syriac work, which are of value as bearing on the decline of Christianity in the East. They certainly presuppose a wide diffusion of Nestorian tenets. The editor's work has been executed, as usual, with scrupulous care and accuracy.

The Ascension of Isaiah.

That curious "apocryph" THE ASCENSION OF ISAIAH has come down to us entire in an Ethiopic version here printed in full. The Bodleian MS. of the "Ascensio Isaiæ" was published in 1819 by Laurence. A more complete edition by Dillmann appeared in 1877. An amended text, based on a careful collation of the MSS., is now published by Dr. Charles with full introduction, notes, and apparatus criticus (A. & C. Black, 7s. 6d.). Dr. Charles is known as perhaps the first of living authorities on "Apocalyptic Literature." His editions of the "Book of Enoch" and other pseudepigraphic writings are well known, and he shows here the patient skill and careful investigation which characterize his other works, and which it would be presumptuous to praise. The "Ascension of Isaiah" is a composite work. The oldest and most interesting portion contains an account of Isaiah's martyrdom, probably founded upon some ancient and continuous Jewish tradition. The Apocalyptic portion, based on the vision described in Isaiah vi., is evidently of Christian origin. This section, says Mr. Charles, "is important for the knowledge it affords us of first-century beliefs in certain (heretical) circles as to the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Resurrection, the Seven Heavens, &c." The book also contains a passage which Dr. Charles is inclined to identify with the so-called "Testament of Hezekiah," and which gives a depressing Apocalyptic picture of the condition of the Church in the sub-Apostolic age. The different writings were apparently put together by an unknown editor in the third, or possibly second, century. "The Ascension of Isaiah" is of great interest to the historian of doctrine. Two sections of the introduction deal with the religious conceptions of the book, the second of these containing an important discussion of the Antichrist legend in relation to the Beliar and Neronic myths with which it was gradually fused. The edition lacks no element of completeness. Dr. Charles incorporates the Greek fragment recently recovered by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt. This fragment contains two complete chapters, and its text, according to Dr. Charles, "was used by Jerome when writing his commentary on Isaiah lxiv. 4."

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. PETER, with Introduction and notes, by J. Howard B. Masterman (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. nett), is intended to serve as "a useful introduction to fuller commentaries," of which at present there is a scarcity. Mr. Masterman gives a brief but scholarly introduction, a paraphrase, and the Greek text with exegetical notes. A few additional notes discuss passages of notorious difficulty. The form of the book is unusually attractive, and we commend it to students who lack the opportunity for reading more elaborate commentaries.

Mr. H. F. Stewart's careful and accurate translation of the THIRTEEN HOMILIES OF ST. AUGUSTINE ON ST. JOHN XIV. (Cambridge University Press) is adapted to the requirements of ordination candidates. He says truly enough that a translation is often "the most convenient and compendious form of commentary." Some good introductory notes are prefixed. The sections on "The Sermon in the Early Church" and "Augustine as Preacher" are brief but excellent. The conspectus of Biblical quotations contained in the thirteen homilies is likely to be useful. Augustine's habit of indulging in constant alliteration and assonance, the epigrammatic structure of his short clauses, and his love of forced antitheses, render the work of a translator exceptionally difficult. It would no doubt be easy here and there to suggest slight improvements, but we think that Mr. Stewart has, on the whole, done his work with great taste and skill. The notes show signs of wide reading and culture. We hope that Mr. Stewart will do, equally well, further work of the same kind.

THE CELESTIAL COUNTRY (Seeley, 12s. 6d.) contains "Hymns and Poems on the Joys and Glories of Paradise," partly mediæval—the Rhythm of Bernard of Morlaix, the well-known hymn of F. B. P., "My Happy Home," and others, mostly in Neale's translations—and partly modern, from Milton, Watts, H. Vaughan, Cardinal Newman, &c., together with ten aptly selected photographic reproductions of mediæval sacred pictures. A handsome and well-conceived volume.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Some Emotions.

We have not for a long time seen anything as pathetic as AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE-LETTERS (Murray, 5s.). Their authorship is not stated, and must remain unknown; but the prefatory explanation, itself anonymous, tells us, with an air of well-bred reticence, that "a request, conveyed under circumstances which the writer herself would have regarded as all-commanding, urges that they should now be given to the world." From this point of view, we have a tragedy—for it is nothing less—recorded in the faultless letters of the woman who was its victim; a tragedy and a record far too sacred and too piteous for publication. The reader will prefer to console himself with the idea that these letters, deeply as they will move him, are but a work of art, after all; and if he is critical he will derive some sort of comfort from noting their dramatic completeness and their artistic blending of light and shade. And yet, so great is their charm, he may read them a second time, and be inconsistent enough not to know what to think or to wish. It is a tragedy, without plot, story, action, or incident, but it needs none of them. Simply, a girl of twenty-two, cultivated and well-born, is deserted by a man who has loved her well and honestly for a year. Something happens that parts them for ever; she does not know, and cannot be told, what it is. She can only treasure up his declaration, "there is no fault in you; the fault is elsewhere; I can no longer love you as I did. All that was between us must be at an end; for your good and mine the only right thing is to say good-bye without meeting. . . . To me you remain, what I always found you, the best and most true-hearted woman a man could pray to meet." But no clear answer ever comes to her. The rest is silence on his part, and on hers unbroken love and a broken heart. "Most dear, most beloved, you were to me and are. Now I can no longer hold together; but it is my body, not my love, that has failed." But this is not a book to quote, or to review, but to read. It will leave the reader almost equally balanced between condolence and congratulation.

Rectorial Addresses.

In 1858 an Act was passed providing for the triennial election of a Lord Rector of Edinburgh University, and giving to the undergraduates for the first time a voice in the election. Since then the Rectorial Addresses, of which thirteen have been delivered, have always attracted attention as the considered utterances by the most distinguished men of the day on subjects connected with culture and education. They well deserve to be collected in such a volume as Mr. Stodart Walker now gives us, under the title RECTORIAL ADDRESSES (Grant Richards 7s. 6d. n.), with an interesting Introduction tracing the history of the Lord Rectorship and the circumstances which give special interest to each address. Lord Rosebery, in his stirring Glasgow Rectorial address, delivered on November 10, and just published by Mr. A. L. Humphreys, under the title QUESTIONS OF EMPIRE (1s.), notes how seldom literary men are chosen for Lord Rectors. Among the Edinburgh Lord Rectors only two are men of thought as distinguished from men of action—Sir W. Stirling Maxwell and Carlyle. The chief attraction of the latter's rather vague and discursive address is to find its author speaking for once in the style of ordinary men. What is unique about the Rectorial Address is the opportunity it gives of presenting to us the practical statesman's view of academic subjects, tendencies of thought, and different sides of the intellectual life. Lord Rosebery, however—though perhaps, except Mr. Gladstone, the most literary of the political Lord Rectors—chooses at Edinburgh, as he does at Glasgow, a question which touches citizenship rather than culture. At Glasgow last week he took a wide scope—the requirements, the hopes, and the defects of the Imperial system. Much of what he said centres round one utterance, a weighty if rather a startling one—that the supply of good men for the public service has not kept pace with the growth of Empire. At Edinburgh it is Scotch patriotism of which he treats in an address no less full of fine thoughts than of happy epigrams such as "Vanity is a centipede with corns on every foot." But all the addresses in Mr. Stodart Walker's book are of the greatest interest. As a matter of editing we should have liked more indication (apart from the introduction) of the subjects dealt with in the Addresses, and an Index.

South Africa.

BOER POLITICS, by Yves Guyot (Murray, 2s.), is the reply of the editor of the Siècle to a certain article by the Dutch journalist, Dr. Kuyper, in the Revue des Deux Mondes. It was M. Guyot's desire that Dr. Kuyper's article and his retort should be published together in a single pamphlet. If this might be allowed he was willing to take all the risks on a profit-sharing agreement. But the copyright in Dr. Kuyper's contribution belonged to M. Brunetière, who has no penchant for free discussion. He would not have any dealings with M. Guyot, who is therefore sole author of the little book before us. It is a model of lucidity, and we are much obliged to M. Guyot for writing it. There are those on this side of the Channel, as well as on the other, who might profit from its perusal.

TWO LECTURES ON SOUTH AFRICA, delivered by J. A. Froude about twenty years ago, are reprinted, with an introduction by Miss Margaret Froude (Longmans, 2s. 6d. n.). How much water has flowed under the bridge in the meantime may be seen from a quotation picked almost at random:—

> Of all the curious enterprises on which British genius has embarked, the acquisition of Natal has been the costliest and the most worthless to us. If we had the courage to allow it to be independent, the Dutch would occupy it again and save us further trouble. If the colonists remain in the same mind in which I left them and wish to attach themselves to the Free State, I hope the Imperial Government may see its way towards gratifying their wishes.

There could hardly be a more eloquent warning to political prophets not to prophecy unless they know; and many similar warnings are contained between the covers of the book. Miss Froude's introduction is pious in the Virgilian sense, but hardly adequate.

History "Source Books."

American teachers were the first, we fancy, to set the example of bringing the sources and original documents of history out of the student's library and showing them to the general reader. The precedent is bearing rich fruit. Four books lie before us in all of which the plan is carried out with scholarly care. Two are volumes in the series of "Scottish History from Contemporary Writers," uniform with the "English History from Contemporary Writers," edited by Professor York Powell. THE RISING OF 1745 (Nutt, 3s.) is a new volume by Mr. C. S. Terry. Brief notes connect the extracts so as to make the narrative continuous; there are maps and facsimiles; and there is—what no source book should be without—an invaluable and exhaustive bibliography (with an index to it). Mr. R. S. Rait issues a second edition of his MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS (Nutt, 3s.) in the same series, adding an introduction judicially weighing the evidence for and against Queen Mary; several letters written by her; and the text of all the contemporary English versions of the Casket Letters. A full bibliography is here impossible, but some materials for it are given. We do not, by the way, find a reference to the Lovely MS., written by Robert Winkfield, describing the execution of Queen Mary, which was first printed in 1887. It is somewhat fuller than the letter in the Lansdowne MS., which Mr. Rait gives, and which is endorsed only as written "by Ro. Wy." Dr. E. F. Henderson's SIDE LIGHTS ON ENGLISH HISTORY (Bell, 21s. n.) is rather different in aim. It is intended mainly to give colour and life to the personal side of history, and it ranges over the period from Elizabeth to George III. There are no notes or connecting links; but the extracts are well selected for the object in view, and the history as illustrated by them is sketched in the introduction. There are illustrations reproducing portraits of all the most conspicuous figures in the history, and also a few caricatures of a later period. The book is a sumptuous and well-printed volume, for the library rather than the schoolroom, and makes a most attractive and, indeed, indispensable possession for any one who is making a study of English history. The SOURCE BOOK OF ENGLISH HISTORY, by Elizabeth Kimball Kendall (Macmillans, 3s. 6d. n.), is, since it ranges over 1900 years, and includes in its authors quoted both Tacitus and the late G. W. Steevens, much slighter, and the task of selection (to make a book of handy size for school use) is more difficult. The line followed is not so much to show what is the evidence for facts as to illustrate them, giving different contemporary points of view, quotations from poets, and laying great stress on aspects of social life. Explanatory notes on the extracts are given in the margin at the side. The editing of the book deserves commendation. Side by side with a continuous history it should be of great value in schools.

The Jew in London.

An important contribution to the study of London is THE JEW IN LONDON (Unwin, 6s.), containing two essays prepared for the Toynbee trustees. That does not necessarily mean that the essays express the views of the supporters of Toynbee-hall, for the trust and the hall were distinct in origin. The trust is, however, now administered by the council of Toynbee-hall; and the essays are by men closely connected with the hall—Mr. C. Russell and Mr. H. S. Lewis. They represent, however, perfectly independent investigations, and they arrive on many points at conflicting results. The facts they collect as to the life and character of the East-end Jew, his relation to the English working man, the parting between the orthodox Jew and the latitudinarian, and similar points are of great interest. There is a general agreement as to inadvisability of arresting immigration—the immigration of alien Jews being if anything beneficial to commerce. As to absorption into the English race, Mr. Russell is, we think, too sanguine, and much more sanguine than Mr. Lewis, who writes as a Jew himself, and lays much stress on the resistance of the racial sentiment. There is an introduction by Canon Barnett and a preface by Mr. Bryce.

A Book about Books.

There is something almost Emersonian in the manner wherewith Mr. Ainsworth Rand Spofford, in A BOOK FOR ALL READERS (Putnams, 7s. 6d.), offers elementary information about a host of bibliographical matters to "gentle readers" in general, and to American bookbuyers in particular. Throughout the five hundred pages of his text, which is followed by an index deserving of honourable mention, Mr. Spofford retains all the dignity of an experienced librarian, without becoming obtrusively didactic or even occasionally dull. Perhaps the only fair animadversion that can be made upon the book as a whole is that it obviously lacks quotation marks, or specific admissions of its author's indebtedness to certain English writers. At least one of the most valuable passages in a chapter upon "Library Buildings and Furnishings" should have been coupled with the name of Mr. Burgoyne, the chief librarian of the Lambeth Public Libraries. Among the more "general" sections, none is better than that which deals with "The Art of Reading." The writer reveals an old-fashioned (and we think righteous) dislike of "browsing" and "skipping" which is not too common a feeling among modern librarians, while his remarks upon the abuse of newspaper-reading ought to win him at least the sincere regard of those editors who strive to uphold the high traditions of the English Press. Mr. Spofford is equally to be commended for the way in which he treats of more technical matters; his statement of "The Qualifications of a Librarian" will make it excellent reading for any one who may have to exercise the right of voting for the appointment of a librarian. Even in the chapter headed "Bibliography," although the matter deals too much with American books to merit such a comprehensive title, and contains one or two mistakes of a curiously amateurish kind, there are many noteworthy practical hints and some sound verdicts upon various bibliographical compilations.

Middles.

"Middles" is the word that describes the essays brought together in WORLDLY WAYS AND BYWAYS, by Eliot Gregory (Lane, 6s.). They are American "middles," having made their first appearance in the New York Evening Post—the least Yellow and, some would say, the least American of the daily papers of the United States. They do not "amount to much," for the style is casual and undistinguished, and the subjects are only treated superficially. But they are bright and chatty, and they give the cultivated American view of American social life, at home and abroad. For that reason they are worth reading. As a rule Mr. Gregory writes English, but when he speaks of people walking "on Bond-street" he relapses into his native tongue. As a rule, too, he seems to know his England, but when he writes of theatrical supper parties "after the play," and says that "the 'Prince' often presides, smoking cigar after cigar, until the tardy London daylight appears to break up the entertainment," he is liable to mislead his countrymen.

It is to be feared that the reader will derive no very clear impression from the elegant little book, a collection of eight or nine essays, which Mr. Edward McCurdy has called ROSES OF PAESTUM (George Allen, 2s. 6d.). The author says that his "purpose was to trace the mediæval spirit in deed and dream by considering some of its imaginative activities—its questings of the ideal in art, in faith, in love, and in fantasies of things more visionary than these." That is well enough, but we cannot understand why a writer on Italy and the mediæval spirit should clothe his ideas in the affected language that Mr. McCurdy frequently employs. The best of these essays, perhaps, is a description of Capri; but here, as elsewhere, there is such an excess of verbal ornament as to provoke a suspicion that the author has cared more for the form than for substance of his book.

THE NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS (Macmillan, 1s.) is an indispensable book of accurate reference on the personnel of the Parliament which is to meet next month. The biographies are extracted from The Times and there is a chapter on "Election Statistics."

THE WAR OFFICE, THE ARMY, AND THE EMPIRE, by Mr. Arnold-Forster, the new Secretary to the Admiralty (Cassell, 1s.), contains proposals for military reform, of which the most urgent seem to be the retirement of Lord Lansdowne (who has already kindly obliged), Sir Ralph Knox, and Sir Evelyn Wood. Whether the proposals are better or worse than the average of similar proposals or not the book will no doubt be read with interest now that so energetic a critic of the ruling powers is to be tested by official responsibility.

In HOW TO CHOOSE YOUR BANKER (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.) Mr. Henry Warren goes over some of the ground already covered in his "How to Deal with your Banker," though he does not make such sweeping charges as in that rather angry work. There is also some fresh information about banks, together with some ingenious hints to speculators who feel tempted to buy bank shares for the rise.

ART.

LUCA DELLA ROBBIA. By the MARCHESA BURLAMACCHI. (Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.) (Bell and Sons. 5s. n.)

Twenty years ago there was nothing which charmed the traveller more on a first visit to Florence than the terra-cotta bas-reliefs of Luca della Robbia's invention. These shining medallions and lunettes, set in the old brown walls of churches and hospitals, looked, as Pater said, "as if a piece of the blue sky had fallen down into the streets of Florence." And nothing has been sadder than to see how one by one those lovely decorations have vanished from the quaint nooks and dark corners which they brightened with their presence. "Never pass the market of Florence," wrote Ruskin, "without looking at Luca della Robbia's Madonna in the circle above the church and glance from the vegetables underneath to Luca's leaves and lilies, to see how honestly he was trying to make his clay like the garden-stuff." But Luca's Madonna is gone, and the church of which Pucci sang—San Pierino, is gone, too, with the picturesque buildings of the old Moreto; and we must seek the galleries on the upper storey of the National Museum in the Bargello to find this and many other of our old favourites. Fortunately a few Della Robbias still remain in their original places in Florence—the charming swaddled babies of the Hospital of the Innocents and the royal-looking Virgin of the old Scuola of the Via Agnolo—and many more are to be seen in the churches and convents of Tuscany and Umbria. All of these, together with those which have found their way to the Museums of Berlin and New York, to the Louvre or South Kensington, are duly catalogued in the new work on Luca della Robbia which we owe to the Marchesa Burlamacchi.

This list, indeed, which has been carefully compiled with the help of the excellent writings of MM. Cavallucci and Molinier and M. Reymond, is the most valuable part of the Marchesa's book, and will prove of great use to the student, while the admirable reproductions of Luca's famous children from the singing-gallery of the Duomo, as well as of many of the well-known terra-cottas, will delight the eyes of every reader. But the biographical sketch of the artist is meagre and the critical account does scant justice to the rare charm and distinction of Luca's art. "The master," Signora Burlamacchi writes, "was pious," but she fails to show how, in an age of growing paganism, he held fast to the Christian ideals of earlier times and earned the title of the Fra Angelico of sculptors. She does not tell us of his love for the old Franciscan poets and of that precious volume of Jacopone da Todi's hymns, inscribed with Luca's name, which is preserved in the Laurentian Library. Neither are we told of his strong friendship for Donatello and of the veneration for this illustrious rival with which he inspired his own nephew Andrea, who, in his old age, was proud to tell young Giorgio Vasari that he had been present at the great sculptor's funeral. Of Andrea himself, who learnt his uncle's secrets and carried on his work with ceaseless activity during a life of ninety years, we hear still less. Yet he was a master of exquisite taste and feeling, and his art is marked by distinctive features and qualities of its own, which it is interesting to compare with his uncle's simpler and severer style. At one period of his career he was, it is plain, strongly influenced by Perugino, as we see, for instance, in the grand Crucifixion at La Verna, where the yearning heads of the saints and wild gestures of the flying angels remind us vividly of the Umbrian master, whose portrait Andrea introduces in a bas-relief now at South Kensington. Very interesting, too, is the close connexion of Andrea and all his family with the Dominican order and the convent of San Marco, where two of his sons took the vows and became devoted followers of Savonarola. Long after the Frate's death we find Andrea working for Dominican convents in all parts of Italy, and we learn from Vasari that he and his sons remained faithful Piagnoni to the end and commemorated their master's name in medals which bore his head and the words of his prophecy. Similar omissions strike us in the Marchesa Burlamacchi's account of the works of the school. The remarkable series of bas-reliefs by Andrea's hand at the convent of La Verna in the Casentino deserved a fuller description, while her catalogue contains no mention of the richly-coloured and highly dramatic frieze of the seven works of Mercy, on the hospital of the Ceppo, at Pistoia, which, although completed after Giovanni della Robbia's death, were, as M. Cavallucci has abundantly proved, designed and partly executed by his hand.

The mezzotint engravings by David Lucas, after the works of Constable, which have been shown at the Leighton-house, serve two purposes. The most ardent admirer of the East Anglian master cannot suppress a half thought that Constable is at times slightly artificial, and may in a measure become old-fashioned. That he had learnt some remarkable secrets of picture-making the mezzotints, relying for their effects on black and white, most clearly show. His rugged grandeur is preserved by these masterly interpretations, but so is, also, much of the convention which in Constable's time was an innovation. To see how far we have progressed since then one has only to look at "Flatford Mill" and some of the many "bits" in the Stour Valley. The magnificent "Dedham Vale" rises superior, it is true, to all considerations of time and manner; but some of Constable's work, as seen through the interpretations of his life-long friend, David Lucas, is not for all time. The collection at the Leighton-house comprises a very large proportion of the engraved works of Constable's pictures, and we are grateful for it, even if it has raised an uneasy feeling that the glory of the master is at times the glory of other days.

Undeniably modern in subject, if not so unquestionably modern in treatment, are the majority of the pictures which are now shown by the Portrait Painters at the New Gallery. We wish we could say that the majority of them were successful. So many men paint portraits that it is surprising that so few succeed. There is too little thought, too little insight, and too little effort to read and portray character. The chance of an artist's manner may sometimes, as in the case of Whistler, persuade us to forget all else; but where portraits are painted, as they so often are, without distinction, and rely for their success merely upon the painter's limited capacity to produce a likeness, dulness, if not actual failure, is the result. In the Whistler, at the New Gallery, for example, not only is the dexterity of the artist so alluring, the richness and yet the delicacy of the colour so attractive, but "The Lady of the Black Heart," in a white jacket, is so well placed in the picture, the pose of the head so characteristic and well understood, that it is difficult to avoid the impression that it is quite as much a picture as a portrait—a picture, that is, which will never rely for its interest upon the narrow limitations of personal association. In direct contrast to this is the "Max Beerbohm" of Mr. Rothenstein, and the "Arthur Symonds" of M. Blanche. Both of these seem to be more or less faithful portraits, but neither fulfils the requirements of a picture; both are clever, with the cleverness of the Paris studio; neither is likely to attract attention thirty years hence. Mr. Sauter is a painter of different kind, and his "Professor Max Müller" should live for the insight into character which is shown, and because Mr. Sauter has, apparently, attempted to paint an interesting man as if he were really interested. Mr. Guthrie, also, has something to teach us in his portrait of "The Late Alexander Osborne, D.L.," and what he chiefly proves is that the commonplace can be glorified if only the painter has the insight to appreciate tones and harmonious colour. The quiet colours are beautiful in their simplicity. Neither Mr. Watts nor Mr. Orchardson are quite at their best; but a very characteristic group of drawings by Mr. Strang, Professor Legros, and Mr. Shannon will well repay attention.

Art is to have an important place in next year's Glasgow Exhibition. The show is to open next May and works will be collected from February 1st next. The new Fine Art Gallery will be a very suitable store house, and the promoters of the exhibition have undertaken to collect, forward, return, and insure all pictures sent, without any expense to the artists or owners. Glasgow and Liverpool have always set an excellent example in matters where works of art are concerned.

FICTION.

Mr. Hewlett's Romance.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett has already, to use a metaphor from the time he loves, won his spurs in the literary tourney. He has done so by a strong, virile, originality, an alert imagination, a subtle and carefully-trained gift of phrase, and a direct, forceful attempt to get at the heart of medieval romance, to make it breathe and live. Nothing of all this is wanting in his new book, RICHARD YEA AND NAY (Macmillan, 6s.). It has not the irresponsible charm of the "Little Novels of Italy"; it has none of the magic of the "Forest Lovers"; as a work of art it seems to us inferior to both these books. But it is an inferiority which admits of the highest merit. The new book has an individuality as potent and as picturesque as either of the others. Once more Mr. Hewlett braces our minds by giving us a new type of fiction. Now as it is, he is not feeling his way to it; his conception is clear cut and compact; it comes to us buoyant, unhesitating, complete. This new kind of historical novel—for to that class the book belongs—takes as its hero the hero of "Ivanhoe" and "The Talisman," Richard Cœur de Lion. But the writer boldly cuts himself adrift from all the conventional moorings of the historical romancer. Let not the historical student fancy that he will find here a "picture of the times." There is no "study of the social life of the period"; Mr. Hewlett has no time for that. It is not the outer accoutrements but the inner soul that he is after; individuals, not social types; and in the lives of individuals the inner spiritual truth rather than external surroundings. We have the main events of Richard's life, his warrings in France and in Palestine, his wanderings on the Continent, his dealings with John, with Philip, with Alice, and with Berengaria; but the secret of his life, the secret of the waywardness which made him say now "Yea," now "Nay," as his head or his heart swayed him—that is found in his love for Jehane St. Pol, who sacrificed herself to save him. Into the intricacies of the story, told throughout with the most vivid directness, we need not enter. Mr. Hewlett keeps close to his task with a tireless insistence which, despite the brilliance of his style, rather girds than charms the reader onwards. He never deviates from the narrative; but he does not wholly master that crux of the historical novelist—how to extract a closely-knit plot from uncompromising facts not made expressly to serve his purpose. In one other point, too, as it seems to us, is the novelist at issue with the historian. Vital and convincing as are the characters as depicted by a nineteenth century master of description, the moods and tempers of twelfth century knights and ladies were, we fancy, not quite so subtle as he would wish us to believe. Behind the artificial lovemaking of troubadour song (which Mr. Hewlett does not touch), the passions of men worked on broader, less scrupulous, lines. Yet Richard is a magnificent figure, and every chapter in the book contains some incident or some character-study which is a marvel of terse description. This of King Henry II. is a picture which at least fastens the attention:—

> The King looked his best on a throne, for his upper part was the best. It was, at least, the mannish part. With scanty red hair much rubbed into disorder, a seamed red face, blotched and shining, with a square jaw awry, the neck and shoulders of a bull, with gnarled gross hands at the end of arms long out of measure, a cruel mouth and a nose like a bird's beak—his features seemed to have been hacked coarsely out of wood and as coarsely painted; but what might have passed by such means for a man was transformed by his burning eyes, with their fuel of pain, into the similitude of a fallen angel. The devil of Anjou sat eating King Henry's eyes, and you saw him at his meal. It gave the man the look of a wild boar easing his tusk against a tree—horrible, yet content to be abhorred; splendid, because so strong and lonely.

Mr. Hewlett's style is full of individuality, like his matter; it is a weapon no one wields in the same way. Yet it is fashioned after a well-known model—that of the graphic, rushing manner of the daily Press. It is Stevens, Kipling, turned on to mediæval romance. It marks the revolt against the old, quiet, simple, fluent English prose. And for those to whom the "Forest Lovers" was a revelation, the intense development of this manner in "Richard" is a little disquieting. As they press on to its close, they will feel, we fancy, some longing for the old Richard of their childhood, and seek repose in the leisurely, graceful periods of Scott. These strong, closely-knit sentences, statements clipped of every excrescence, with the colour dashed in with a brush of the impressionist, and the phrases hammered at all costs into newness and unconventionality—they are an intellectual delight, but it is a heavy price that we pay for them. We feel the cleverness of it all too much to feel anything else. We are too conscious of the skilful artist moving his puppets. One plain, straightforward utterance which puts nothing between the reader and the passion which is appealing to him for sympathy, the natural and simple eloquence of sincerity never consciously aiming at effect—it is that which at once unlocks our hearts, and it is that surely which may be called in the truest sense fine writing. Many readers will, we believe, feel the want of this in reading "Richard Yea and Nay"; but we perforce take a high standard in our criticism, and we should invite all who are interested in good literature to read the book, if only because it raises such interesting questions of treatment and of style. We have read it with the greatest admiration, and we believe thousands will do the same. For the book is good literature; and to be able to say that is, as one looks abroad on the fiction of the day, surely almost as high praise as one can give it.

Mrs. Cambridge.

Arthur Hugh Clough, the once chosen poet of his Oxford friends and the laughing stock of Mr. Swinburne, is not often quoted in our time, but Mrs. Cambridge in her new book PATH AND GOAL (Methuen, 6s.) makes use of him. "Was it ordered that two should make four simply for the intent that boys and girls should be cut to the heart that they do not make five? Be content; when the veil is raised, perhaps, they will make five." Who knows, indeed! It is in this undogmatic spirit that Mrs. Cambridge approaches the issues of life. "Submit, submit," the old refrain runs through her agreeable composition. The period is of the Dundreary whisker and the nine-gored skirt over the crinoline. In the city of Wakeminster are many attractive young ladies; Victoria Long, a wonderful and tragic beauty; Miss Adair, a marble lady; Ruth Strange, a charming woman, over borne with pride; Miss Etta Starr, a little like our old friend Miss Amory, but without that young lady's literary interests. To these ladies, more or less in waiting, enters Dr. Adrian Black. "His hobby, his fad," as his friends called it, "was akin to that of Sir Austin Feverel—he believed that the salvation of the human race was a matter of scientific breeding—a view of the case less common then than now, even in his profession." Dr. Black first thinks of Victoria, then of Etta, and then of Ruth, and so on, but the story forces other duties upon him. Ruth is the best of the ladies, and after many years she and Adrian drink "their belated cup of bliss." Mrs. Cambridge has written an amazingly clever book; she interests us at once in her characters and creates a world in which there is true humanity and real emotion. The story is told with vigour and simplicity, but occasionally the phraseology of the sixties is a little doubtful. Did educated men in the days of the crinoline speak of getting "the sack"? But Mrs. Cambridge knows her men and women and she knows the life of a country doctor—a rather favourite figure in fiction just now—and she knows how to make us know and be interested in them.

From the Racing World.

There is so much humour, sense, and observation in THE MONK WINS (Duckworth, 6s.) that it ought to consolidate the reputation of Mr. E. H. Cooper as a writer of sporting stories. The world of Epsom and Doncaster and Newmarket (in particular Newmarket), is familiar to him, and he has an eye for the picturesque setting of the race as well as for the race itself. "The Monk Wins" only just misses being in the first rank of its class for no other reason than want of care. The author had not fixed his characters firmly enough in his mind before he began to write, and we find, in one or two instances, that his conception of them alters as the story proceeds. Miss Margaret Branksome, the heiress and owner of a racing stable, loses towards the middle of the book all claims upon our sympathy, and we do not feel ourselves wholly satisfied with the conduct of Miss Helen Broadley. It is possible, of course, that the lady who owns racehorses may be more than commonly subject to sudden changes of disposition. Anyhow, this is the best book of its kind since the days of Hawley Smart.

The Case of George Dedlow.

Both the tales in Dr. Weir Mitchell's AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A QUACK (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.) are fiction pure and simple, but by the second of them hangs a tale which affords an amusing proof of the reality with which their author has invested them. "The Case of George Dedlow" was first anonymously printed, without Dr. Mitchell's knowledge, as a leading article in the Atlantic Monthly. It was accepted as the description of a real case, and so much interest was felt in the quite imaginary victim who has lost every limb in the War of Secession that not only was a subscription list started, but many people went in search of him to the Stump Hospital in Philadelphia. Certainly, for grave detail and circumstances the narration is hard to beat, and even the daring flight of fancy which prompted the account of a spiritual séance, in the course of which the maimed veteran temporarily received back his vanished legs, is weighted with staid verisimilitude, and we are not surprised to learn that "the incident was received with joy by the spiritualists as a valuable proof of the truth of their beliefs." The title-tale, too, is a finely imagined piece of cynical autobiography.

Mrs. C. N. Williamson.

Stories told, in the first person, by young and beautiful girls have always a certain charm. The male reader likes to hear that side of the question—to learn what was the precise course of action that commended to their favourable notice the successful suitor. In MY LADY CINDERELLA (Routledge, 6s.) that experienced writer, Mrs. C. N. Williamson, presents us with an engagingly modern version of the ancient Cinderella myth. The heroine, Miss Consuelo Brand, is a nursery governess to a family at Peckham (the nearest equivalent, perhaps, in these days to the parlour kitchen-maid of the fairy tale), and her miracle-working godmother is a benevolent lady of fashion, who eke out her income by "bringing out" American heiresses. The ingenuity of the plot is less remarkable than the number and utility of the coincidences. We come once more to the secret drawer in the old bureau, which proves our Cinderella, if not a princess, at any rate a lady of noble birth. We have the inevitably unnecessary misunderstanding, which puts off the wedding for a chapter or two of desperate endeavour on the part of the villain. "When in doubt play chloroform and a false wig" appears to be the motto of this gentleman. "My Lady Cinderella" is a pleasantly exciting melodrama.

Methodism.

"Dare: never grudge the throe" is the motto which "Dora Cromarty" has chosen for the title-page of THE HEART OF BABYLON (Horace Marshall and Co., 3s. 6d.). As provincial Methodism and the inner life of a large London drapery establishment are the chief ingredients of the story, it is not out of place to remind the authoress that deftness as well as daring are requisite to blend them into a readable mixture, and to warn her readers that her deftness is not equal to her courage in choice of subject. Hugh Challoner, the chief character, is a vague and tenuous figure in spite of Dora Cromarty's obviously earnest efforts to interest us in the struggles of his soul. He is a "Methody" from the Welsh border who conceives that he has a mission to reform the modern Babylon. He is ticketed with various strong qualities, but he shows himself weak and stupid. From "the drapery" he passes to a shadowy connexion with a religious newspaper, and finally finds his call at the death-bed of a lady. A foolish compromising match seems to be meant for strenuous moralizing clogs the narrative, and there is an aggravating unreality about the pictures drawn of advanced society in London.

Mr. Max Pemberton.

THE FOOTSTEPS OF A THRONE (Methuen, 6s.), by Mr. Max Pemberton, illustrates the lack of body, as they say of vintages, which marks so much current fiction. But it will, no doubt, achieve the measure of popularity usually accorded to his books, and yet it is astonishingly thin and weak, the merest simulacrum of a novel. It is written with a sort of smartness in the dialogue, even with some pretence to style; but the characters are poor puppets. The author seems to be conscious of their woodenness. Here and there he loyally does his very best to make the thunder rattle and the lightning flash. He feels that his readers deserve a thrilling moment, and out come all the tricks that should blanch their cheeks and draw tears of pity from their eyes—only that Lord Dane and Fékla Dolgorouki and the rest are so obviously men and women of straw that no reader can take their troubles seriously. The book is just a passable example of the modern school of cabinet-making, with a tolerable plot, plenty of that verbal fencing which Russian statesmen, generals, and subordinate officers seem to demand from any one who deals with them, and a fair knowledge of the country described. Mr. Pemberton has got the trick of it, and there is no adequate reason why he should not turn out similar novels from his workshop till the crack of doom.

America's Second-Best.

An unexpected result of international amity is to be found in the surprises of American diction encountered by the novel-reader in books apparently English. He takes up a volume published by a London house and bearing the name of a writer with whom he is perhaps slightly familiar, and gradually becomes aware that he is reading an American book. No countryman of Howell and James and Mark Twain and a hundred others can doubt that we welcome American authors published here, but at the moment we appear to be suffering from an influx of the second-rate among American novels. The United States have, we know, borne the infliction of poor English work for many a year, and they are, perhaps, taking their revenge. A SUGAR PRINCESS (Chatto, 3s. 6d.), by Mr. Albert Ross, comes to us with the commercial announcement that "1,615,000 copies of Albert Ross' novels have been sold in America." Such an announcement, when we remember that each book is said to have twelve readers, makes us glow with expectation. But "A Sugar Princess" is a highly ingenuous performance, and if its few million American readers have enjoyed it they must be blessed with a wonderful simplicity. The story is of a young man, Carl Meyer, who suffers great and totally unnecessary trials because what the author calls his "adopted uncle" listens to the suspicions of a disagreeable friend, Mr. Lindes, and decides to test the qualities of Carl by pretending to be dead. With this tedious plan the novel opens. Then we are transported from St. Louis to Honolulu. This is the quaint, old-fashioned way the successful modern American author does it:—"And now, if the reader has no objection (and who was ever known to object to a trip of that kind?), we will ask him (or her) to accompany us for a little while to Honolulu. . . ." Here lives the Sugar Princess, and hither 'come Carl and other principals of the caste. Mr. Ross is here much taken up with "the marvellously pretty result," on the feminine side, of the mixture of European races with native Hawaiians. Amy Van Steuben, the heroine, is called Wild Goose. A bit of a goose she certainly is, and quite a fit mate for Carl, who, after a deal of travelling about the world and many convenient and conventional happenings, claims her, or rather is claimed by her for her own. We see Japan through keen Yankee eyes and get a little guide-book information about Hawaii. Mr. Ross' book is not what is called "a little novel," and yet it is uncommonly like the form of literature we name a novelette.

Mr. Robert Herrick's THE WEB OF LIFE (Macmillan Company, 6s.) is hardly first rate, but it is still a clear and clever book on American life. What Mrs. Atherton has recently done for a corner of Washington Mr. Herrick does for a certain side of life in Chicago. He shows us the workings of the Chicagoan mind and makes a conscientious but rather dull novel. "The Web" opens with what seems to an unknowing eye to be an excellent, if painfully realistic, description of an American hospital. Here Dr. Sommers operates on a case of great interest and eventually becomes devoted to the case's wife. A daughter of the successful family of Hitchcock, wealthy, beautiful, and clever, is suited by all the laws of fiction to become a hero's bride, and after much discussion as to the wickedness of making money and many complications with the case's wife, Dr. Sommers is happy with Louise and all goes well. The "local note" is likely to be rather too marked for English readers, although there are hundreds of touches of observation that are of catholic value. In the Hitchcock family the younger and older generations held to different rules of life. "A mist of undiscussed views hung about the house, out of which flashed now and then a sharp speech, a bitter sigh"—a good picture of the armed neutrality of the home as is this of the mansion of a "risen family." "Decoratively it might be described as a museum of survivals from various stages of family history. At each advance in prosperity, in social ideals, some of the former possessions had been swept out of the lower rooms to the upper stories. . . ." Many such touches give us the life of Chicago of to-day. The people are not quite so directly depicted for us. Sommers is hardly a man of flesh and blood. But his type is little known in England. "The Web of Life" should be carefully read, for it is at least sincere.

Mrs. or Miss Joanna E. Wood calls her book A DAUGHTER OF WITCHES (Hurst, 6s.) "a romance," but it does not fulfil the requirements of that form of fiction. Vashti and Mabella had no doubt, like most of us, the elements of romance in their natures, but unfortunately they do not arrange to interest us. Miss Wood is, however, a sincere writer and appears to know the rather dull monde of which she writes. A reader with spare time might do worse than try her quality.

The plot of THE BELLE OF TOORAK (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), by E. W. Hornung, is fairly interesting, but the heroine not quite convincing. It does not strike us as probable that a spoiled society belle would consent to marry a bushman, and at the end of the book we feel sure that one day or another the girl will miss her balls and parties. Her pursuit of an old criminal in the back-blocks is still more unlikely. The novel is written in a cultivated manner, but it lacks distinction.

IN MALE ATTIRE (Hutchinson, 6s.), by Joseph Hatton, is the story of an American typewriter who disguises herself in order to kill the man who has murdered one of her lovers. Such a young woman does not seem to us so charming and womanly a personality as she does to Mr. Hatton. As the story goes on it becomes mere police-court farce; the young lady who parades the streets of London dressed as a man is merely eccentric. Despite her passion for revenge she consoles herself very quickly with another lover, which makes one wonder what all the trouble was about. The book reads singularly like a newspaper report.

There is power and a few striking situations in A TRAGEDY OF THREE (Hurst, 6s.), by Mr. T. T. Dahle, but it seems rather an essay in novel writing than an accomplished piece of work. The tragedians, Alleyne, Esma, and Harold Arthington, are, like Lady Sophia and Canon Paton (evidently a pet of the author), unconvincing. The love affairs are ingenious and the development a complete joy to the lovers of a happy ending. For our part we hope Mr. Dahle will try his hand at the art of fiction again, and permit himself a wider originality and a freer use of observation of life as it is.

CLARE MONRO (Milne, 2s. 6d.), by Miss Hannah Lynch, has not the vivid power of "The Autobiography of a Child," which is generally attributed to her pen, but it is a highly-interesting story which may be said to give distinction to the "Express Series" in which it appears. Miss Lynch's pictures of English country life and of the charm of Venice are true and beautiful; there is a literary charm about the style which one would be glad to welcome more often. Although sombre in subject and tragic in issue the story is a very delightful one to read.

Dramatic, stirring, effective, are the epithets suggested by Mr. Frank Norris' new book, with the excellent title, A MAN'S WOMAN (Grant Richards, 6s.). The spirit that informs that last scene in which Lloyd, the powerfully-conceived heroine of the story, sees her hero Bennett start once more for those Arctic regions which have already taken so much from their lives is of a character rarely met with. If the men and women of the story seem occasionally overdrawn, underlined, and inhuman, we can well forgive Mr. Norris his inclination towards exaggeration when he makes so effective a use of it. "A Man's Woman" will, we think, help the reputation of the author of "Blix" and "McTeague."

Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim introduces us to a mining camp at the base of the Sierras in THE WORLD'S GREAT SNARE (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.). What the great snare of the world may be is not very clear from Mr. Oppenheim's spiritedstory, but the title is as good as another. Wealth, pride of race, Parliamentary ambition, the stage—they all come in, to say nothing of that old device, the pretended wedding which turns out to have been a real one after all, conveniently providing the hero with the succession to an earldom. In fact, the story is the same old story, but it is told well enough to give it another lease of life, and some of the trimmings, at any rate, are fresh.

Without being startlingly clever or engrossing A WOMAN'S SOUL (Marshall, 6s.), should not be missed by those interested in fiction. Miss Beatrice Heron-Maxwell and Miss Florence Eastwick—we trust we have the titles correctly—have set themselves a highly difficult task if they intended to analyse for our entertainment the soul of a woman. They have not quite achieved it; but with the aid of "Daphne's Book" and "Extracts from Laurence Hale's Diary" they bring before us a delightful number of rather clever ladies and aristocratic gentlemen, plenty of rather artificial tragedy, and a fine general feeling of society as it is. We shall be glad to see the next book these two ladies write, it should be better.

Mrs. Aylmer Gowing's A SPIDER'S WEB (Burleigh, 2s. 6d.), tells, among other things, of strange affairs in the Russia of the novels and of a lady of Russian birth, "built like the model of a Greek statue," who begins life as a companion in an English family. Her name is Sonia, and she is very, very horrid. Indeed, one of the characters, a perfectly nice person, does not hesitate to sum her up as a "very terrible woman; a liar and a murderess." But then, "as a woman," she was "pure as unfallen snow"; in love, she was strong; in revenge, fiendlike. She is, at least, a very good sort of person to have in a novel, and brings about some pretty complications. We have read less homogeneous and interesting novels, but we would warn Mrs. Gowing against the use of conventional types in place of flesh and blood characters.

Jezebel, as every one now knows, thanks to the "higher critics," was a beautiful and highly cultured royal lady, fond of having her own way, and with a strong penchant for the latest fashions, but withal a most inoffensive creature. Her modern English representative in JEZEBEL (Hutchinson and Co., 6s.), as depicted by Mr. Price, is a handsome young girl composed of a mixture of "snow, blood, and ivory," wilful, widely eccentric, but with no more real harm in her than a new-born babe. She was allowed to grow up wild—"she shall be allowed room for growth," said Lord Dormoral when engaging her governess. Her luckless mother had deserted her in her infancy. Her governess, forty and seasoned, was a necessity. That Miss Jezebel, chaperoned too as she was by flighty Mrs. Baskerville, should have kept more or less within les convenances speaks volumes for her character. Some of the dialogue is smart and entertaining, and parts of the story show considerable dramatic power.

Alan St. Aubyn in THE PRICK OF CONSCIENCE (Digby, Long, and Co., 6s.) tells the story of a wife who is in love with another man and finds in the end that her affections have been bestowed in vain. The story is not without clever points; but one feels little sympathy with Sir Richard Gardiner, who spies upon his wife, or with Carry herself, a shallow, empty-headed, little creature, unreasonable, impulsively and childishly petulant. She soon loses her lover, for even a gallant officer expects a modicum of brains in the object of his love. That she should develop a conscience is the surprise of the story, for its existence is most skilfully concealed. The lover, Captain Darrell, has his full share of the general weakness which marks the other characters. He falls, of course, in love with the governess, who, though she has considerable facility in transferring her affections, is a fine specimen of English girlhood. The whole is mildly exciting.

Mother-Sister (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.) is a tale of mean streets and meaner lives, but for the redeeming presence of Maddie Marmory, who, though only a girl of fifteen and a slum child herself, acts as guardian angel to the family. They are a troublesome lot these brothers and sisters of hers, and the father gets himself "lagged." Maddie, of course, always steps in at the nick of time and effects the necessary rescue and deliverance. The story, as a whole, is an interesting character-sketch. Mr. Pugh has happily reproduced the patois of his characters, and has given us an insight into their idiosyncrasies. Rough and uncouth, ground down by the stern realities of existence, those children of the people cultivate a grim humour of their own, and often reveal kindly and sympathetic hearts.

A tell-tale title is a somewhat superfluous, if harmless, introduction to a childishly transparent plot; but R. H. Heppenstall, in spite of this double disadvantage, manages to show some merit in the story of The Malice of Grace Wentworth (John Long, 6s.). This vulgar, if high-born, young person chooses to be in love with a Captain Derring; and because he does not return the passion arranges to attach to him the suspicion of murdering a woman falsely supposed to have been his wife. Her devices are ancient beyond the dreams of the most hoary-headed writer of novelettes, and the characters might have walked off the stage of any provincial theatre. The Captain is condemned to death and only reprieved at the last moment by the grateful exertions of an erring woman whom his true wife had befriended. But the long-drawn agony of the closing scenes might have been all avoided by the sending of a sixpenny telegram. In spite of these self-imposed handicaps the author writes good clear English; and with a more intelligent choice of materials might turn out a readable volume. For some inexplicable reason the book is dedicated to the officers and men who fell at Magersfontein. Surely their memory deserves a worthier tribute.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Now that the "Talbot Baines Reed Collection" has been added to the famous Blades Library, the St. Bride Foundation has the finest collection in the kingdom of books on printing and allied crafts. Talbot Reed could not have wished for a better home for his library. From St. Bride's parish, as Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins remarked at the opening ceremony on Tuesday, more printed matter was sent forth than from any other parish in London; and whether it was good or bad in matter, it was, as a rule, excellent in form. Talbot Reed, too, was a friend of William Blades, whose unfinished book on "The Pentateuch of Printing" he edited. The great work of his life—though he is probably best remembered as a writer of books for boys—was his monumental "History of the Old English Letter Foundries" (Elliot Stock, 1887). There is an interleaved copy of this work in the library, full of additional matter and illustrations, which Mr. Reed had evidently prepared with the idea of bringing out another edition. In its way the collection is unique, differing from the Blades library in type-founding and type-specimen books, as well as in examples from the most celebrated English and Continental presses of the last five centuries. There was a possibility that the collection would be sold, and perhaps dispersed, by Sotheby, who valued it "under auction conditions" at £700. Mrs. Reed, however, agreed to hand it over to the St. Bride Foundation for a considerably reduced sum, and it is due to the generosity of Mr. Passmore Edwards that the books are now preserved to the public. Among the 3,000 volumes are Fust and Schœffer's Bible of 1462—the first dated Bible—Caxton's "Golden Legend"; 41 black-letter examples of sixteenth-century presses, and 331 specimens of seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth century presses. There are specimen books from the famous office of the Propaganda at Rome, the Royal and Imperial printing offices at Berlin, Vienna, St. Petersburg, and Madrid; practically every other celebrated foundry, past or present, is represented.

A letter to the Daily Chronicle of November 15 complains of apathy on the part of the British Museum Library in filling up gaps in British publications issued before the Copyright Act came into force, and, further, of laxity in obtaining copies of present day books which the library is entitled to receive. Attention was called to this latter point by a correspondent in our columns some time ago. We can only hope that the keeper of the printed books is making every effort to remedy the numerous omissions which have been pointed out. A suggestion worth considering is made by the correspondent of the Daily Chronicle that the titles of all books known to have been published in the United Kingdom should be entered in the catalogue, the press mark being, of course, omitted when the book is not in the library. Mr. Herbert Haes makes the suggestion that the deposit of a book at the British Museum should be the condition of granting copyright, so that not only would it be the interest of authors as well as publishers to see that the law was complied with, but a neglect of the regulation might conceivably be productive of great pecuniary loss, quite apart from the penalty at present entailed. Another frequent grievance of readers at the British Museum is the long period which elapses between the day of publication of a book and its inclusion in the catalogue. Three to four months is not unusual, while at the Bodleian at Oxford readers can usually count on being able to consult a work within a month or six weeks of publication.

The November number of the Library World gives the first place in its pages to a review of Dr. Schultze's recent work on German libraries. In spite of their generally admirable system of education, it is plain, as we have before pointed out, that German people are far behind the English and Americans in library matters. The so-called "People's Libraries" are little more than names. An article—the third—on the grievances of a free library reader is apparently written by one who thinks that the library should be entirely devoted to supplying the unintellectual wants of the ignorant reader. But can catalogues be compiled for those who do not know what they want?

An excellent example to all private collectors is set by Councillor Hodson, who has lent the public library at Wolverhampton a special collection in commemoration of the Chaucer quincentenary. There are several valuable manuscripts, two fragments of Caxton's first edition of the "Canterbury Tales," as well as a series of the poet's works in later editions, fittingly concluded by that of the Kelmscott Press.

This month Mr. R. D. M. Littler, Q.C., has opened a new recreation ground at Tottenham, in which a private house has been converted into a branch library, possessing a goodly number of books. It would be an excellent thing if London could be girdled with these park libraries, with the opportunity they afford for both physical and mental exercise.

At a meeting of the Richmond Town Council, the chairman of the Library Committee, being asked whether a branch library could be provided at Kew, said the experiment had been tried but had failed. It would have been cheaper to present copies of papers to each person who went into the room than to keep it open.

Mr. Thomas Greenwood, whose book on Public Libraries has been a great aid to all who encourage the movement, is about to issue a revised edition. He has addressed a series of questions to librarians, the answers to which ought to make the volume an ultimate reference on every point.

Correspondence.

LORD ROSEBERY'S "NAPOLEON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—From Mr. H. F. Hall's description of the two phrases in my review which he criticizes as allegations, I infer either that he did not read that review very carefully, or that he uses the word "allegation" without considering exactly what it means. At any rate, the reply, on both the points raised by Mr. Hall, is very simple.

1. I did not say that Napoleon was "not a gentleman," in the Johnson's dictionary sense. What I did say was:—

> The first grievance is that the gaoler was not a gentleman. But was the prisoner a judge?
> The man who wrote letters to his divorced wife begging her to take lessons in domestic economy from the wife who had supplanted her had surely no right to be exceptionally sensitive about minor breaches of good manners.

This is not an allegation but an expression of opinion. Mr. Hall is perfectly entitled to hold the opposite opinion—that such conduct is a mark of perfect breeding; but I am surprised that he should think it worth his while to write about it. The primary question raised is not whether Napoleon, but whether Hudson Lowe, was or was not a "gentleman," and I fail to see that my remark was either "trite" or "inconsequent."

2. As to the statement that "we firmly believe that Sir Hudson Lowe was the better man of the two," it was surely hardly necessary for Mr. Hall to discuss the question whether he was intellectually greater. What was meant of course was that his conduct had not diverged so widely from the standards of honour and morality which are supposed to be common to civilized men in all stations of life. To urge against this view the opinion of Sir Walter Scott is, in effect, to plead ignorance of the evidence on which the view is founded. Sir Walter Scott had not read the "suppressed letters." I have read them, and Mr. Hall would be well advised to read them too.

Yours faithfully,

THE REVIEWER.

LONDON LITERARY LANDMARKS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your article last Saturday you speak of Mr. Frank Stone, R.A., having occupied Tavistock House before Charles Dickens. This was not the fact. There are really three houses in the enclosure, Tavistock House, Bedford House, and a third with no special name. In the forties this last was occupied by the Revd. W. Webster, an uncle of the present Chief Justice, and when he gave it up, Frank Stone took it. Bedford House, in the middle, was occupied by Mr. Cardale, a solicitor of Bedford Row, and Charles Dickens took Tavistock House in 1851. As I have often played cricket in the enclosure with the present Marcus Stone, I think I am correct in the matter.

Yours obediently, F.R.C.S.

THE GERMAN SCHOOLBOY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Referring to Mr. Jerome K. Jerome's article on "The German Schoolboy," may I be allowed to say that there are two classes of public schools in Germany—the Gymnasium for those who are likely to enter one of the professions, and the Realschule for those who intend to engage in commercial pursuits? In the former studies are chiefly confined to Latin and Greek, and in the latter much prominence is given to French and English. It is astonishing how very early in life the German schoolboy has decided for himself or has had the matter settled for him by his parents as to his future calling in life. "Was willst du werden?" is a question continually being put by one boy to another. Having myself as a youth attended the Realschule and the Gymnasium in Berlin, I can bear witness from intimate knowledge of the German schoolboy as to his preference for study rather than for sport. During the two years I came into daily contact with them I never saw one of the thousand boys belonging to the two schools ever play a single game of any kind. Wednesday and Saturday afternoons were wholly devoted to gymnastic exercises in one of the suburbs of Berlin, and attendance was compulsory; but there were no sports.

Yours faithfully,

T. W. STOUGHTON.

THE "GRASS WIDOW."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the part "Gradely-Greement" of Vol. IV. of the Oxford "New English Dictionary," recently issued, Dr. Murray assigns the first appearance of the word "grass widow" in its Anglo-Indian sense of "a married woman whose husband is absent from her" (p. 367) to the year 1859, and gives his earliest quotation from John Laing's "Wanderings in India" published in that year. But I have been able to trace this word fifteen years earlier in Anglo-Indian literature in the sense so familiar in India. That brilliant historian and essayist the late Sir John Kaye used it in the very first volume of the famous Calcutta Review founded by him in 1844. The passage occurs in his second article on the "English in India," called "Our Social Morality," and, as it clearly explains the meaning of "grass widow" among Anglo-Indians, it may be interesting to quote it here:—

> Let the English reader who may have heard some vague stories of the immorality of our northern hill stations picture to himself a number of young married women—whose husbands are absent perhaps among the mountains of Afghanistan, perhaps on the sandy plains of Sindh—gathered together in a cool, invigorating climate, with nothing in the world to do but to enjoy themselves. Then imagine a number of idle bachelors, let loose "between musters," or perhaps on leave for several months at a stretch, from Ludhianah, Kurnaul, Meerut, &c.—gay young military men with no more urgent and certainly no more pleasant occupation than to dangle after the young married women—"grass widows" as they are called—in the absence of their husbands, to amuse the fair creatures, to assist them in the great work of killing time, and finally to win their affections. Is it possible to conceive a state of things more surely calculated to result in guilt, in misery? High moral principle has ere now fallen before temptation and opportunity, and many is the fair frail creature, possessing no high principle, who would, but for these temptations, these opportunities, have retained her character as a faithful and affectionate wife, and in after years been a bright example to her children.—Calcutta Review, Vol. I., No. 2, pp. 334-5, 1844.

It may be mentioned in passing that in Yule and Burnell's "Hobson-Jobson," or "glossary of Anglo-Indian words," the earliest quotation given for this word is from a book published in 1878, which confirmed the general impression that this word was introduced in the time of Lord Lytton's Viceroyalty, 1876 to 1880. It will now be seen that it was introduced at least 36 years ago, if not earlier, in literature.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

There is to be another crop of South African war books during the next week or so. Mr. Murray will be one of the first in the field with "The South African War, 1899-1900: A Military Retrospect up to the Relief of Ladysmith," by Major S. L. Norris, Royal Engineers, with maps. This is the first attempt to give a critical account of the operations from a military point of view. "I venture to think," writes Major Norris, "that they"—the officers in command—"would prefer criticism to come from the pen of a brother officer earnestly seeking the truth, rather than from that of a literary or journalistic genius." Major Norris dedicates his volume "To the memory of Andrew Gilbert Wauchope, who, whether in thirty years with the colours or in ten devoted partly to public affairs, as a gentleman, a soldier, and a patriot, has for ever deserved well of his countrymen." "Campaign Pictures" (Cassell), by Mr. A. G. Hales, who accompanied one of the Australian contingents and was correspondent to the Daily News; and Mr. Prevost Battersby's "In the Web of War" (Methuen), a narrative of the advance of Lord Roberts from the Orange River to Pretoria, are also on the way.

The other war books about to appear have already been announced—"In the Ranks of the C. I. V." (Smith, Elder), by Mr. Erskine Childers, a clerk in the House of Commons, who was a driver in the corps; and Mr. W. Sanford Evans' story of the part played by the Canadian contingent (Fisher Unwin), which comes aptly with the visit of the Canadian Regiment to London. On Wednesday, too, the first volume of "The Times History of the War" will be published, price 15s., and the subscription list at £2 12s. 6d. for the complete set will be closed, to be reopened at £3 3s. net the set.

The Scottish History Society, which Lord Rosebery so amusingly addressed on Saturday, is now issuing the long-looked-for collection of despatches from the Vatican archives, edited by the Rev. J. Hungerford Pollen, S.J., under the title of "Papal Negotiations with Mary Queen of Scots." Among other publications promised by the Society is the third volume of papers relating to the Scots Brigade in the Netherlands, which will contain the regimental registers of Births, Deaths, and Marriages still preserved at Rotterdam. A considerable part of the volume, however, will be taken up by a remarkable narrative, in verse, of the war in Flanders, written by a private soldier belonging to the Brigade. There will also be issued the Diary, or a fragment of the Diary, of Andrew Hay, of Stone (1659-1690), a zealous Covenanter and an intimate friend of the famous Archibald Johnston, Lord Warriston. Later, the Society will publish a volume of papers dealing with the negotiations for the Union of England and Scotland in 1651-1653, edited by Mr. C. Sandford Terry, who has also in preparation a volume of records relating to the Scottish armies from 1638 to 1650. The other publications in preparation include a volume of foreign contemporary narratives, partly inedited and partly translations of rare tracts which have not hitherto appeared in English, relating to the life and death of Mary Queen of Scots; the Topographical portion of the famous Macfarlane Collection (which will probably extend to three volumes); and the Registers of the Commissions of the General Assembly for the years 1650-1653.

There is an interesting "Note by the Publisher" in "The Life of Abdur Rahman, Amir of Afghanistan," which Mr. Murray is issuing in two volumes. He explains that the work was entrusted by the Amir to his private secretary (or Mir Munshi), Sultan Mahomed Khan, who brought it to England. The first eleven chapters, containing the record of his life up to his accession to the Afghan throne, are written by Abdur Rahman himself and translated from the Persian by his private secretary. The remaining chapters, dealing, among other things, with his domestic and foreign policy, personal life, and advice to his successors, were taken down by Sultan Mahomed Khan from the Amir's own words. "Sultan Mahomed Khan," continues Mr. Murray, "was recalled to Kabul by the Amir before the MS. of this book could be placed in the printer's hands, and the responsibility of revising the proofs and seeing the whole work through the press has devolved upon me. I am, of course, in no way responsible for any statement contained in the book, as I have no direct knowledge of the facts. My work has been confined to the task of verifying names and places, which has been an exceedingly difficult one, and in the circumstances I must ask for the kind indulgence of readers and critics. To attain to complete and systematic uniformity in the spelling of Oriental names is practically impossible; my aim has been to leave as little doubt as may be concerning the identity of the persons and places referred to in the text."

The Cambridge University Press will shortly publish, in two volumes, "The French Monarchy, 1483-1789," by A. J. Grant, M.A., Professor of History in the Yorkshire College, Leeds, in the Cambridge Historical Series. It will be quickly followed by Sir J. G. Bourinot's history of "Canada under British Rule, 1760-1900." From the same house is to come shortly the second volume of Lord Rayleigh's "Scientific Papers." Several of the papers here reprinted were written conjointly by Professor Schuster and Mr. Sidgwick. It is expected that two more volumes will complete the work.

In our history of the Cambridge University Press, published on October 13, it should have been stated that most of the illustrations were courteously lent to us by Mr. Bowes, of Macmillan and Bowes, Cambridge, to whom the original blocks belong. They served to illustrate an interesting account by Mr. Bowes of printed books at Cambridge, which appeared in one of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's papers.

Next week Mr. Lane will publish the first two volumes of a new edition of Sir Arthur Helps' history of "The Spanish Conquest in America," edited by M. Oppenheim. It is more than forty years since Sir Arthur Helps published the first instalments of his history, which was popular for a time. Sir Arthur was more successful, however, when he reissued portions of this work, as well as of his earlier historical book on "Conquerors of the New World," as separate biographies, such as the Lives of Columbus, Pizarro, and Las Casas, the Apostle of the Indians. The author's notes have all been retained, and those which were printed in the language of the writer quoted have been translated.

Mr. Max Beerbohm is about to appear as a dramatic author as well as dramatic critic. He has made a one-act play out of his book "The Happy Hypocrite," and this is to be acted before Mr. and Mrs. Daventry. The idea of giving a place in the evening bill to The Fantasticks, George Fleming's version of Rostand's Les Romanesques, has been abandoned for some time to come.

"The Life of the Emperor Frederick," edited from the German of Margaretha von Poschinger, with an introduction by Sidney Whitman, will be issued on Wednesday next by Messrs. Harper—simultaneously with the publication of the last part of the German original in Berlin. The single volume of the English edition contains the portions most interesting to English readers.

Messrs. Smith, Elder hope to publish Dr. Fitchett's new book, "Wellington's Men," before Christmas. It is based on four other volumes, by Rifleman Harris, Sergeant Anton, and others—all depicting war as seen by the rank and file.

A set of handbooks, now being published by the American Book Company (in the Scientific Memoir Series, edited by Prof. Ames, of Johns Hopkins University), reprints at reasonable prices important articles on scientific subjects now out of print, or originally published in foreign journals and not hitherto translated, or contained in rare volumes, with notes, explanations, and corrections. It is an original attempt to bring first-hand sources of information before the general reader. Ten volumes have already been issued, and there are now ready or in the press "The Laws of Gravitation," "The Wave Theory of Light," and "Radiation and Absorption." The volumes have had a large general sale.

With its next issue the New Century Review will pass into the hands of new proprietors and will be conducted by a new editor, Mr. Douglas Story. It will be published at 1s. by Mr. John Long.

In last week's Literature we gave 5s. as the price of Mr. W. H. Hutton's book on "Constantinople," published by Messrs. Dent. We should have said 3s. 6d. net.

In our reviews of some children's books on November 10 we said that "Ten Little Boer Boys," with pictures by Mr. A. S. Forrest and verses by "Norman," "is produced as a companion book to 'Little Englanders' and 'The Baby Patriot's A.B.C.,' by Mrs. Ernest Ames." In case any misunderstanding should possibly arise, Mr. Ames wishes us to state that neither he nor Mrs. Ames is the author of "Little Englanders."

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. XCIII.
By B. KEBRANSKI, Berlin.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. XCIV.
By J. A. MILES.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 95, by A. Troitzky. White (3 pieces)—K at Q Kt 4; R at Q B 3; pawn at Q B 2. Black (3 pieces)—K at K 5; B at Q R 7; pawn at Q Kt 7. White to play and draw.

MORE ABOUT THE ORIGIN OF CHESS.—Mr. J. Séguin, Times Democrat, New Orleans, is entitled to speak with some authority, and he has recently stated that the origin of chess, like the origin of pretty much everything of the same sort, is a much-mooted point. Until recent years, chess writers were almost unanimous in ascribing its origin to India; but, 1891, Don José Brunet y Bellet, in his work "El Ajedrez, Investigaciones Sobre su Origen," strongly controverts that theory and maintains that Egypt was the true original source of the game. We can hardly venture to express an opinion on such a matter, but are inclined to believe that Don Brunet's case is scarcely made out with legal certainty.

BLACK. MARSHALL.

WHITE. ROTHING.
Black to play.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week an Illustrated Supplement dealing with Christmas illustrated books and books for the young.

* * * *

The late Sir Arthur Sullivan's musical record is full of evidence of his love of the poets. He wrote incidental music to five of Shakespeare's plays, and it was his music to The Tempest, written when still in his teens, that first won him his laurels as a composer and gave occasion to Dickens' warm-hearted congratulations—"I don't pretend to know much about music; but I do know that I have been listening to a remarkable work." His setting of "Sigh no more, ladies" was highly successful, and "Orpheus with his lute," despite a misreading of the words in the last verse, may be ranked with Schubert's "Who is Sylvia?"

* * * *

Tennyson was scarcely less a favourite, though the music written for The Foresters seems to have shared the fate of the play itself, and Sir Arthur's dainty renderings of several of the late Laureate's songs have never been so popular as they should have been. The composer gave a good example of his sympathetic appreciation of Scott in his setting of "A weary lot is thine." But the most ambitious attempts made by Sullivan to adapt the subjects of literature to the purposes of his own art were, of course, The Golden Legend and Ivanhoe; and both of these—whatever may have been the fate of the latter—are highly picturesque and imaginative works, full of the sheer cleverness which, above all other qualities, distinguished the composer.

* * * *

Burns is a poet beloved of literary Boers—for there are such persons—and that both for his matter and his language. Dr. James Colville lately read a paper to the Philosophical Society of Glasgow on "A Boer Admirer of Robert Burns," the admirer being ex-Secretary Reitz, whose translation of the poems was made in 1888, when Reitz was Chief Justice of the Orange Free State. It is, however, less a translation, perhaps, than a suggestion; and in that way it throws the more light on the inner life of the Boers, for Reitz selected the poems which pictured the homely, rural life of the people. As to the question of language Dr. Colville condemned those persons who assert that the "Taal" is a barbarous and unnatural "lingo." He holds that the "Taal" has a closer connexion with lowland Scots than with any European tongue except the Dutch.

* * * *

The number of visitors, by the way, to the Burns' Birthplace at Alloway show that there is no decline in the popularity of the Scottish national poet. During the year ending 20th September last no fewer than 43,827 persons visited the cottage and 56,941 the monument—an increase over last year of 1,328 in the one case and 3,113 in the other. On American Independence Day a large party of Americans visited the shrine, and made this entry in the visitors' book:—"Independence Day. Where could it be better celebrated than under the shadow of the genius of Burns?" Some interesting portraits, and a large picture representing the "Holy Fair" at Mauchline, have been added to the Museum.

Professor Courthope, in the last of his lectures from the Chair of Poetry, noted and deplored "a certain effeminacy of taste in the rising academic generation," exemplified in the writings of competitors for prizes, who show "a tendency to cultivate style as a thing desirable in itself," and "a passion for making points and epigrams without regard to perspective and proportion." Are the tendency and the passion either new or specially characteristic of the University of Oxford? The tendency has been discernible in many prize essays—there is an admirable example of it in the excerpt from the Arnold prize essay of 1859, which is printed in Professor Conington's edition of the works of Virgil. The passion has been observed alike in the dramas of John Oliver Hobbes and the novels of Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler. Consequently it is hardly fair to maintain that these characteristics of the prose style of Oxford essayists result from the diminution of "the interchange of intellectual influence between the Universities and the world." The cultivation of manner without sufficient regard to matter is rather the characteristic of writers whom no academic training has chastened. We see it in the case of other popular writers, such as Mr. W. E. Henley, Mr. Arthur Symons, Mr. Richard Le Gallienne. Young Oxford has, on the whole, learnt more literary airs and graces from them than they have had the opportunity of learning from Oxford.

A new Professor of Poetry to succeed Professor Courthope will have to be elected very soon. An influential section of the electors is, we understand, anxious to put forward the name of Dr. Robert Bridges. No choice would give more general satisfaction, but it is not certain that Dr. Bridges will agree to be a candidate.

* * * *

Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, in her introduction to her new series of papers in Cornhill, tells of a character of Thackeray conceived but never brought to the birth. There was originally, she says, in the manuscript of "The Rose and the Ring" a rival fairy to the Fairy Blackstick, called Fairy Hopstick. She used to wheedle and flatter and tell lies, and she hated the Fairy Blackstick, under whose sincere and searching glances she seemed to shrivel up and disappear altogether. There is a picture of Hopstick dwindling and dwindling under the gaze of Blackstick. Mrs. Ritchie can still remember seeing the gold pen emphasizing and darkening the lines of the shadows that brought out old Hopstick's pale and malevolent glare as she vanished in bilious spite. She had a great hook nose and hands like claws. Whether this wicked old fairy voluntarily retired from "The Rose and the Ring" or whether Thackeray found no pleasure in following her career Mrs. Ritchie does not know; but it is certain there is no mention of her left in the book.

A hundred years will have passed on January 16 since the founding of the first Dundee newspaper, properly so-called—the Dundee Advertiser; and on December 4 will appear a centenary number with a supplement giving a full and interesting illustrated history of the paper, of which an advance copy is now before us. The Dundee Advertiser was founded in the days of William Cobbett and in sympathy with his views, and it has always been a Liberal organ. It has had many famous contributors, and Thomas Hood made his début in its columns. Robert Stephen Rintoul, the first editor of the Spectator, conducted the Advertiser for sixteen years, but it was the present editor (who took the post fifty years ago)—Sir John Leng, also the founder of the People's Friend, the People's Journal, and the Evening Telegraph—who raised the fortunes of the paper to their present flourishing condition. The use of illustrations in a newspaper was first developed by the Dundee Advertiser, though a single attempt in this direction had been previously made by The Times, which published a sketch of Nelson's coffin in its account of his funeral.

* * * *

Another instalment, in the December Cornhill, of Mr. George Smith's reminiscences contains many most interesting reminiscences of Charlotte Brontë. The impression made on him by the first reading of "Jane Eyre" in manuscript reminds one of a story in that diverting, but not always convincing, book "The Brontës in Ireland," by the late Dr. William Wright, of the Bible Society. Dr. Wright's story was that Charlotte's Irish uncle, Hugh Brontë, decided to submit his niece's book to the judgment of a clerical neighbour, Mr. McKee. Hugh Brontë took tea, while Mr. McKee began on the book and was soon galloping over the pages oblivious of everything but the story. The afternoon wore on and Brontë sat still at the table watching the features of the reader as they changed from sombre to gay, from flinty fierceness to melting pathos. When the servant came in to remove the tea things and light the candles the two men were sitting silent in the gloaming. But Mr. Smith's authentic and first-hand account beats the tale of Dr. Wright's informant. He began immediately after breakfast on a Sunday morning. Presently his horse came round—he had an appointment with a friend; but he could not put the book down. He scribbled a line of excuse to his friend and went on. The servant came to tell him luncheon was ready; he asked to have a sandwich and glass of wine brought in, and still went on with "Jane Eyre." Dinner came; but for him the meal was a hasty one, and before he went to bed he had finished the manuscript. This story should encourage the most dispirited correspondent of the Author.

* * * *

Despite Samuel Richardson's close associations with the parish of St. Bride, no tablet to his memory has been erected therein. Mr. Passmore Edwards' offer to place a monument to the printer-novelist in St. Bride's Foundation Institute will, then, be welcomed. From Richardson's printing office in Salisbury-court there was issued the 1739 edition of Maitland's "London," and eighteen years later, before he became an usher at Peckham, Goldsmith worked as press-corrector here. Printers nowadays are not induced to go punctually to work in order to discover a half-crown hidden among the type—a reward frequently held out by Richardson. Another peculiarity of his dealings with his employés was that, in order not to speak in undue heat, he made it a rule to admonish his workmen in writing. Richardson died in 1761.

* * * *

The late Mrs. Emma Marshall was the author of nearly two hundred books. We read in the Globe that Mr. Percy Fitzgerald is the author of more than two hundred books. Is the latter author's figure a record? And if not, what is the largest number of books ever written by a single author? The answer to that question should have its place among the curiosities of literature. Can any of our readers supply it?

* * * *

Another writer in a morning paper, commenting upon the suggestion made in Literature that the new Holborn-Strand thoroughfare should be christened after Dickens, mentions the existence of a "Manette-street" in the neighbourhood of Soho-square, and wonders if that street was so named after the publication of "A Tale of Two Cities," where (it will be remembered) the Dr. Manette of the story is stated to have lived "in a quiet street corner not far from Soho-square." It is fair to assume that Manette-street thus derived its designation, which must have been quite recently bestowed upon it, as it does not appear in the "Streets" section of the London Directory of five years ago. Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, in his "Bozland," alludes to the existence of "a couple of mean alleys, scanty streets," in the Borough, named respectively "Dorrit-street" and "Quilp-street," but, curiously enough, neither figures in the current Directory.

* * * *

The collector of book-plates may have one of two objects in view—either to collect rarities, which may or may not be of intrinsic beauty, or simply to bring together a selection of plates that suit his taste and fancy. The "Ex Libris" Society has sometimes been criticized on the grounds that its members confine themselves too exclusively to rarities and things of the past. The current number of "The Book of Book Plates" announces the formation of a new society, which is definitely to consist of "artists, collectors, and others interested in book-plates from an artistic standpoint—who value a plate according to the merits of its design and execution." The subscription will be 10s. 6d. annually, and the editor of "The Book of Book Plates" (Williams and Norgate), which is to be the organ of the new society, is prepared to receive the names of those who wish to become members.

* * * *

Many medical men have drifted into journalism, but few journalists have left Fleet-street for Harley-street. Dr. J. Mortimer Granville, however, whose death is announced, was one of the few. He was the editor of the Globe in the old days before Sir George Armstrong took the paper over, and he lived to be an eminent physician and a great authority on gout. As assistant editor of the Lancet he stood, as it were, on the bridge that linked his two occupations.

* * * *

The "light-fingered antiquary" is abroad again. Nobody else would surely think it worth while to steal the brass plate recently affixed on the wall of Waterlow-park, Highgate, to mark the site of Marvell's cottage. There was an inscription on the plate beginning as follows :—

> Four feet below this spot is the stone step, formerly the entrance to the cottage in which lived
> ANDREW MARVELL,
> Poet, Wit, and Satirist ;
> Colleague with John Milton in the Foreign or Latin Secretaryship during the Commonwealth, and for about 20 years M.P. for Hull.

* * * *

The cottage adjoined the grounds of Lauderdale-house—built as a residence for the Earls of Lauderdale—where Nell Gwynne stayed, much to the annoyance of the neighbouring poet. It was Marvell who called poor Nell "that wench of orange and oyster," and who described Charles, as he saw him walking in the Lauderdale gardens, as

> Of a tall stature and of sable hue,
> Much like the son of Kish, that lofty grew.

Lauderdale-house, as is well known, now plays the more useful, if less distinguished, part of a refreshment house in Waterlow-park. The poet's cottage was pulled down many years ago; practically all that was left being the stone step leading up to the door. This step Sir Sydney Waterlow had built into the boundary wall, and the London County Council marked the spot with the tablet which has just been stolen. Cromwell-house, which was faced by Marvell's cottage, is still standing. Here lived General Ireton and his wife, the eldest daughter of the Protector, who is believed to have built the house. It still bears Cromwell's name, and is now very profitably employed as the convalescent branch of the Hospital for Sick Children.

* * * *

"The King of Borva," whom lovers of William Black's "A Princess of Thule" will remember, has just died. The King, whose real name was John Hunter, had a small inn at Garrynahine, seventeen miles from Stornoway, when he and his daughter, the Princess, were "discovered" by the novelist, and he subsequently had an hotel in Stornoway. He has died at Bonar Bridge in his sixty-eighth year.

The special feature of the library formed by Mr. Henry Newnham Davis, which came under the hammer at Sotheby's on Monday and Tuesday, was the long series of books representing the work of the older printers. Most of these were in exceptionally good condition, especially the Machlinia. Fine copies of books printed by Letton and Machlinia are so rare that to possess one confers distinction on any library, but the gem of the whole collection was the superb Jenson folio, "Pliny." This book has never been surpassed as an example of the printer's art at its best. There were many books in Mr. Davis' library more scarce, but none finer, and its four and a quarter centuries of age had only mellowed, not deteriorated it. The most notable books were the following :—Printed by de Worde, "Dictes and Sayings," 1528—£35 ; Glanville "Bartholomeus de Proprietatibus Rerum," 1496, a fine copy, though much repaired—£212 ; printed by Pynson, "Breviarium Secundum usum Sarum," 1507, on vellum—£175 ; Carmelianus, "Carmen," 1514, on vellum—£160 ; "Dives and Pauper," 1493, a very imperfect copy—£16 10s. ; Brant, "The Ship of Fooles," 1570, printed by Cawood—£24 10s. ; Eliot, "The Image of Governance," 1544, printed by Berthelette, fine copy in a binding by Roger Payne—£8 10s. ; More, "The Apologye of Syr Thomas More," 1533, printed by Rastell—£15 ; Barnes, "The Booke of Haukyng," &c., printed by W. Copland—£39 ; Littleton, "Tenures," 1482, printed by Letton and Machlinia—£400 ; "Horae," 1514, printed on vellum, with the woodcuts coloured, for G. Eustace—£25 ; "Le Jardin de Santé," 1501, first edition, printed by Verard—£49 ; Meschinot, "Les Lunettes des Princes" (Paris, 1493), printed by du Pré—£30 ; "Manuel des Dames," printed by Verard, fine copy—£100 ; Columna, "Hypnerotomachia Poliphili," 1499, printed by Aldus, a perfect copy—£78 ; Pliny, "Historiarum," &c., 1472, printed by Jenson—£21 10s. Among the other books the most important were :—Bidpay, "Directorium Humanæ Vitæ," 1484-85—£21 ; Breydenbach, "Peregrinationem," first Latin edition, 1486—£60 ; Decker, "Satiro-Mastix," 1602, first edition—£95 ; Hakluyt, "The Principal Navigations," &c., 1598-1600—£22 5s. ; Heywood, "The Spider and the Flie," 1556—£25 10s. ; Massinger, "A New Playe, called Beleeve as you List," MS., 1631—£60 ; Prynne, "Histrio Mastix," 1633—£6 5s. ; Whetstone, "A Mirror for Magestrates of Cyties," 1584—£22 ; "Officium Beatæ Mariæ Virginis," a beautiful fifteenth century MS. on 250 ll. of white vellum, with fine illuminations—£130 ; "Horæ," a fifteenth century MS. on 274 ll. of vellum, with eighteen miniatures—£115; and "Horæ," a superb MS. on 162 ll. of vellum, the work of a fifteenth century French scribe, with eighteen clear and finely-painted miniatures and numerous other illuminations—£270. The whole realized £4,168, or an average of over £12 per lot.

Fruits of the War.

The English language is growing at a rather alarming pace. The process of growth as regarded through the spectacles of the purist is a subject which was dealt with in these columns some little time ago. We cannot, of course, as some would seem to think, hold fast to the canons of the Augustan age, and accept for current use no coinage of a later date than that of Addison and Pope. The race is naturally expansive, and, as we stretch our limbs abroad, we pick up, Autolycus wise, various unconsidered trifles in the way of speech. Campaigns yesterday on the Indian frontier and in the Sudan, to-day in South Africa, to-morrow in China—we go through them all, and each adds a little to the labours of the dictionary maker. It does not take long for a new expression to become part of the language. The newspapers give currency to any word that strikes their fancy. First, it appears in italics or with inverted commas, but in a surprisingly short time it stands firmly in ordinary type among its fellows. The Army is one great pioneer in the discovery of synonyms. It hails them upon us in a generous profusion from afar, and at home we assay them one by one, and issue a proportion of survivals with the stamp of approval upon them. A little batch of new terms has come over from South Africa, and the discriminating process is sifting them for common use. Many words have become familiar to all which were before known only to the few. Natural features of the land are already overloaded with synonyms, as any one will agree who thinks of a "copse" or a "bosk." "Spruit" and "kopje" may pass into occasional use as synonyms. We have no true veldt in England, and the word is hardly likely to forego its original signification. Synonyms, unless they express a shade of meaning hitherto difficult of expression, are unlikely to take firm root in the language. The older synonyms as bosk, brook, &c., have come down from the days when there was no free communication between county and county. "Commandeer" belongs to a class of words which take their place by right of convenience ; we have no word at hand which gives just the same idea. The life of "slim" depends on the question whether it is differentiated—to signify, that is, the particular sort of wiliness characteristic of the Boer—or not. At present it hovers upon the borders of slang—but then the slang of to-day is apt to become the classic phrase of to-morrow. To trek has always had a limited vogue, and it does not seem to be increasing it. The pom-pom—a soldier's onomatopoeic name for the quick-firing Vickers-Maxim gun—will last, no doubt, as long as the weapon it so adequately describes ; it very soon gained the honour of being mentioned in despatches. So, too, did the Long Tom, but that was merely the fancy of a moment. We do not hear much of Long Toms nowadays. Indirectly, the Boer war may lay claim to the paternity of the verb to "mafficK," though, unless some poet chances to want a rhyme to "traffic," we doubt whether it will pass into English literature. There is something about its appearance to say nothing of its etymology which prevents us from taking it seriously. We wish we could add that a campaign which adds so many flowers to our language had eradicated mosile, but we fear the controversy that arose over this nondescript substantive has not killed though it has, we fancy, somewhat disabled it.

THE CLOUDLET.

O white-wing'd one, that wearest
The sunbeam for thy crown,
And on thy bosom bearest
A snow-bloom freshly blown,
What wonders these thou weavest
All in the sight of men?
What world-old truths retrievest,
And makest new again?

"O human heart, that errest,
No sweetness can be thine,
Until, like me, thou sharest
A something more divine;
Until thou cease to fashion
False meteors in thy night,
And only spend thy passion
In leaning toward thy Light.

"O human heart, that sighest
For beauty and delight,
And still obscurely liest
Where dust deceives thy sight,
In vain thy zeal thou pourest
On things all cold and dead,
Until, like me, thou soarest
Above thy earthy bed.

"O human heart, that mournest
For sin no tears undo,
Think not thy fate forlornest—
I cast a shadow too.
'Tis well thou hast endeavoured:
No good can wholly waste.
If Sin had ne'er dissevered,
Then Love had ne'er embraced.

"Bright soul of man, that burnest
Within the darkened clay;
That feel'st thy bounds, and yearnest
To reach the ampler day;
At last, at last, embosomed
High up in heaven, like me,
White-wing'd, sun-crown'd, snow-blossom'd,
Thy radiant doom shall be."

Personal Views.

CONCERNING ANTHOLOGIES.

It is small wonder that the number of anthologies should be increased with every season, since the passion for making them, so far from being a merely literary "fad," has its roots at the very heart of human nature. In one way or another, we are all collectors; and the desire to group together in a single volume our favourite passages of poetry and prose is at least as old as the illuminated manuscripts of the monasteries. Moreover, in the generation immediately preceding our own this taste was particularly luxuriant; and the first anthologies of the current fashion may be found in those albums of our grandmothers, of which every family preserves a few, where the melodies of Moore and the lyrical fervours of Mrs. Hemans are engrossed in the neatest and most angular of calligraphy. And nowadays, when everything that is written and collected seems to find its way sooner or later into print, nothing is more natural than that every man or woman of letters should be represented by his or her own particular anthology, as a sort of sign-manual of taste and erudition. The custom has also conspicuous advantages, for even the most capricious collection must needs contain many indisputable jewels, and for these there can never be too many, nor too frequent readers. Nothing maintains the standard of taste so effectually as the currency of a sound and comprehensive corpus poetarum, which indeed corrects the judgment by the fruitful use of example, a method which proverbially excels a whole library of precept. Speaking generally, therefore, it may be said with justice that there can scarcely be too many of these aids to culture, and that the more deeply they penetrate into the leisure reading of the student the more thoroughly will his appreciation for what is best in literature be fostered and developed.

All this is true enough, but at the same time there are risks and responsibilities. "The anthologist's," says Mr. Quiller Couch in the latest of these collections, "is not quite the dilettante business for which it is too often and ignorantly derided"; and if (though that is difficult to believe) this sensitive art has ever been treated with derision at all, it can only have been so by the pens of the most casual and unintelligent scribblers. For the art of anthology demands, in fact, the most susceptible exercise of the critical faculty; and, if there is anything to be said against its multiplication, the blame must lie rather with the easy and confident manner in which it is sometimes assumed, than in any lack of difficulty in its performance. Ease and self-confidence are, indeed, the very worst qualifications for the task, for the labour both of selection and of arrangement demands continual application and readjustment of judgment. Nor is it probable that any single anthology was ever prepared which would altogether satisfy a jury of twelve experienced critics; personal predilection and association play so large a part in judgment that there must always be omissions and inclusions which will arouse question. And the chief danger of the anthologist is this, that, feeling the impossibility of satisfying every one, he should be too easily content with merely satisfying himself, without testing those predilections and discounting those associations which are always menacing sound criticism. For it must be remembered that there is a real responsibility in giving to the second-rate the popular currency of association with the first-rate, and that the general injustice which is done to the public taste by obscuring the distinctions of first and second-rate is even more to be considered than the individual injustice which may be done to a doubtful writer by excluding what might possibly have passed muster under a rather generous latitude of choice. Caprice, whether of choice or of rejection, is the cardinal sin of the anthologist; and it can only be avoided by the persistent application of a high and undeviating standard.

Palgrave's standard for instance—the measuring rod of "The Golden Treasury"—could scarcely be improved upon. "That a poem," he writes, "shall be worthy of the writer's genius—that it shall reach a perfection commensurate with its aim—that we should require finish in proportion to brevity—that passion, colour, and originality cannot atone for serious imperfections in clearness, unity, or truth, that a few good lines do not make a good poem, that popular estimate is serviceable as a guide-post more than as a compass—above all that Excellence should be looked for rather in the whole than in the Parts—such and other such canons have always been steadily regarded." How excellent this is! How comprehensive and how clearly correct in judgment! Indeed, its correctness is so clear that at first sight it may appear to be almost obvious; the anthologist, we may argue, who sets out with any less appreciation of his task is scarcely to be reckoned with at all. But it is one thing to appreciate a principle and another to sustain it; and any one who is at the pains to follow the vagaries of current criticism, in the periodicals and reviews, will soon discover that even the best judgment is hourly disfigured by caprices which would scarcely be possible if a sound standard of excellence were inculcated in anthologies and maintained by the tradition which they subserve.

In the task of selection, it may be noticed, an author may reckon either historically or absolutely; and this is what Palgrave meant when he insisted that a poem must be considered in its relation to its writer's genius. There may be, for example, a poem of Milton which would serve as the highest standard of selection; but it is not, therefore, to be argued that every poem by every other writer which falls short of that standard is to be excluded. This, indeed, is sufficiently clear; there is but one Milton, and, in his own peculiar excellence, he is unsurpassed. But there are results of this principle which lie less upon the surface. It follows that there may be, and are, poems of Milton excellent in relation to the great body of English poetry, but less excellent as measured by Milton's own high-water mark, which are less worthy of inclusion than other poems by writers of inferior capacity, who count historically in their relation to the development of English verse. And it is here that the exercise of the anthologist's judgment becomes most sensitive; it is here that the dangers of caprice are most insistent.

Take Gray, for example; he is, indeed, a typical difficulty. Gray lies midway between the artificial magnificence of the Augustan poets and the radiant simplicity of the Lake School; he echoes the one and heralds the other, and he is not free from the defects of both. But the "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" counts for an immense influence historically, and in its relation to Gray's genius it counts for everything. To exclude such a poem from a representative anthology, on grounds of homeliness of sentiment, would be as grave a caprice as to write off the "Rape of the Lock" from the records of poetry because of its over-decoration and mythological artificiality. Each poem is unsurpassed of its class and period, and in both cases class and period alike were fruitful of poetic progress. And yet a good deal has been said by a certain school of æsthetic refinement for resigning the "Elegy" to the ranks of mediocrity.

This, then, is what one means by the caprice of the anthologist; and it is even more harmful for what it includes than for what it excludes. For the public taste is, or ought to be, largely influenced by the imprimatur of a popular collection; and every inferior piece, which such a collection preserves, tends to debase that taste. It must be remembered, too, that the general taste is naturally vicious, and that in these days of rampant journalism it is vitiated more and more every morning by the perpetuation of false standards. The inferior piece, once admitted, is by the persistency of natural selection fastened upon at once for favouritism; and half the influence of the good is dissipated by the bad. There is an admirable collection of the love-poetry of the language, edited by a living poet of distinction and judgment, which, nevertheless, contains one piece of unquestionable inferiority, both technical and spiritual. This is, in fact, but a single blot upon a brilliant page; and, yet, such is the persistency with which poetry avenges herself upon false selection, that one frequent student of that little volume can regretfully declare that he never opens the book without lighting upon the one inferiority, and never closes it without its recollection remaining. So may one pitted speck in the garnered fruit rot inwardly and corrupt the taste!

But the art of the anthologist does not end with selection. There remains the important matter of arrangement; and this is, perhaps, the most generally neglected. The easy method is that of historical succession; but it is by no means the best. Indeed, to see its abuse in full swing we have only to turn to Professor Arber's laborious series now appearing from the press, in which each volume is supposed to represent the era of a single poet, with the result that the whole series overlaps and intersects with bewildering intricacy. Here, again, Palgrave set a rich example, but one beset with difficulty to a less abundant capacity. The poems in "The Golden Treasury" are arranged with a sense of continuity and interrelation so delicate that the taste passes from poem to poem with perpetual refreshment and stimulation. Palgrave's critical faculty and sympathy are here shown at work upon a method which many critics would pass over as unimportant, but which in effect lends to the best anthology in the language a harmony of note and sentiment unapproached for charm and significance. And as the field for selection widens, it is to be hoped that his method may be revived and perpetuated. For by this juxtaposition of interests one poet is made to illustrate another, one poem to strike fire from its neighbour, and the splendid continuity of English verse is displayed in its perfection.

Here, indeed, is the peculiar merit of the anthology; it shows us that the poet stands, not alone, but as one of a goodly company, separated, it may be, by circumstances of time and event, but united in the maintenance of literary tradition and national character. And there are many poets who show to greater advantage as members of a band than as disconnected units, many whose value and influence are best appreciated in relation to their universal brotherhood. To indicate that value and influence, and to trace the harmony of poetic development, are the principal tasks of the conscientious anthologist. Then, when his work preserves that harmony, what a rich and inspiriting companion it makes. The day of the literary worker should, if it is well arranged, include, in its modest way, an hour for most things that have the literary interest at heart; and there should always be an hour for the companionship of the anthology. And, if a "personal view" may be held to justify a personal confession, it may, perhaps, be added that one eager reader of every new anthology has found for himself an hour when its charm is never-failing. For the crowded hours of the day's work we need, perhaps, more actual interests; literary history, literary criticism, the great creations of fiction and the drama, move with us through the period of busy activity, suggesting, instructing, enlarging the active and practical sympathies. But when the stir of the working day is over, what calmer and more penetrating pleasure has literature to offer her children than the silent hour, by a dying fire, with some treasure-house of English poetry open upon the knees? Old influences begin to stir in the broken light; old ideals awaken from the fluttering pages—

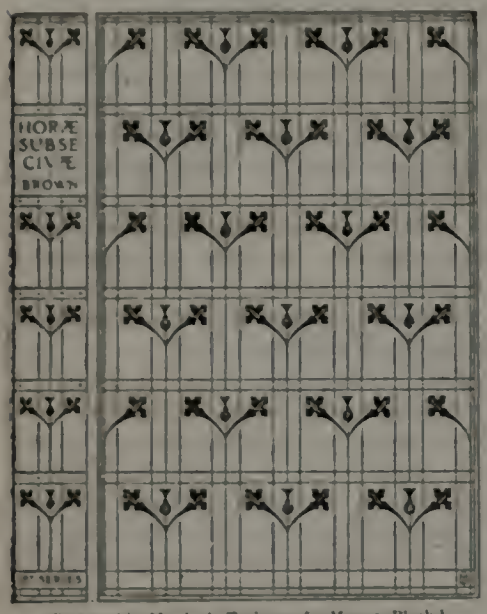
> The old world rings with names that cannot die;
> The old clouds come to colour in the sky.

Spenser, Drayton, Drummond, Carew, Herrick, Crashaw, Vaughan, Collins, and Gray—the Golden Pomp of English Poetry passes before the tired eyes. Here is the majestic form of Shakespeare, at ease in the shadows of Arden; blind Milton touches once more the organ-stops of eternal music; Dryden's "twin-coursers" sweep by in a panoply of triumph. And so to the open fields with Wordsworth, to the glimmering waves with Coleridge, to the dizzy height of the lark with Shelley: we taste in an hour all the joys of Nature, and are made one with her illimitable voice. There is no night there, and no room for weariness. Visions and voices like these make pilgrimage with us through the darkness, and call us to fresh hope and energy with the expected morning.

ARTHUR WAUGH.

BOOK COVERS.

The interest of the educated public in book decoration, and book production generally, has increased remarkably in recent years. The average reader understands more about the mysteries of type and the "get-up" of a volume than he used to do, and he more often takes a proper pride in a well-bound book. This is certainly the experience of Mr. Turbayne, the well-known designer of book covers, who has recently received a medal for his work in connexion with the Oxford University Press exhibit at the Paris Exhibition. Most of the bindings in that exhibit were of his design — many of them valued at £60 or £70 a piece —and he supervised the minutest detail of every exhibit. Publishers are broader-minded in respect of book covers than they were in days gone by. "It is curious how much latitude they will give us now," said Mr. A. A. Turbayne, in the course of conversation on the subject. Even the cookery book comes gracefully dressed from the binders, discarding the old-fashioned view of the kitchen range or the realistic sketch of the family joint for a design which is at least pleasant to look upon. But it is in the more expensive bindings—the tooled and inlaid work such as the Oxford University Press displayed at Paris—that the most interesting developments are taking place. That is a subject with which we hope to deal in a subsequent article; at present we are only concerned with the covers which are turned out by the dozen or so a day—what is technically known as "edition binding."



(Designed by Mr. A. A. Turbayne for Messrs. Black.)

Present Tendencies.

The present tendency in "edition bindings" is towards a more severe and chaste design—as illustrated by the above drawing which Mr. Turbayne has made for the cover of a new edition of "Horæ Subsecivæ," Dr. John Brown's series of essays, which Messrs. Black are preparing in three volumes. These volumes, by the way, will be printed on thin Bible paper, uniform in size with Nelson's New Century Library. Cover designs are becoming so elaborate, and the bewildering [illegible] of lines are often so meaningless, that the reaction in favour of the simpler style can be [illegible] bound, to [illegible]. It must be remembered, too, that cloth is only intended as a temporary binding, and that people who possess fine libraries remove whatever cover, however ornate, a book may be in, and bind it in leather—if it be worth keeping. Consequently Mr. Turbayne considers that the simpler the design the better it will answer its purpose; lettering alone, for preference, if well done. But lettering, unfortunately, is too often scamped by book decorators, and its artistic possibilities overlooked. It makes all the difference in the world if, for instance, the lettering of a cover for a new edition of "Don Quixote" is chosen from an old Spanish model or a modern English pattern. These are little technicalities which would have passed unnoticed at one time, but book-lovers are quick to discover and appreciate them to-day. The most artistic bindings at the present time are produced in England and the United States, and Mr. Turbayne would place England first. Mr. Joseph Shaylor, however, in a timely article "On the Manufacture of Books" in the Publishers' Circular, gives the lead to the United States, not only in the matter of bindings, but in printing, paper, and illustrations. "Many of the books recently produced in this country," he writes, "are lacking in style and originality; the page is wanting in that finish for which American books are justly celebrated; the binding lacks design, and, indeed, is frequently quite out of harmony with the nature of the contents, while the illustrations have little or no artistic merit, and are devoid of both force and power." The Americans have advanced more rapidly of recent years because they had more to learn than English publishers, and now, perhaps, they can in return give us one or two ideas on the manufacture of books; but things are not quite so bad as Mr. Shaylor would have us believe. It may be true that many of the illustrations of our higher class books come from France or Germany; but Germany now sends to England for designs for her best covers, while French experts gave the highest praise to the English bindings at the Paris Exhibition.

Novels and Other Books of the Season.

In English novels the tendency of the day is too self-evident to need much notice. The great idea, of course, is to provide a cover which will catch the eye at once, no matter how grotesque the design or glaring the colour; for a striking cover helps considerably to send such a book into a second edition. The two American covers which figure among our illustrations are, in the originals, excellent examples of landscape work in book decoration. In "Camping in the Canadian Rockies" (of which Messrs. Putnam are bringing out a third edition under a slightly altered title), the rich effect of the sky, printed, like the letters, in gold, is necessarily lost in the black and white reduction. The rest of the cover is printed in blue, black, and white. The "Romance of the Feudal Châteaux" is also published by Putnam, but it only appears in America. We understand that too much copyright matter has been included to make it possible to bring out an English edition of the work.

(Published by Messrs. Putnam.)

Messrs. Bell have produced some of the most artistic designs of the season on this side of the Atlantic, two of their best being Mr. Christopher Dean's cover for Count Plunkett's "Botticelli and his School" and Mr. Walter Crane's "Line and Form." In the Botticelli design the lettering and crown are in gold on a dark green ground, the rest of the design being printed in a lighter shade of green. The new Walter Crane cover is very similar to that of his companion work on "Bases of Design"—gold on a blue ground—the "Crane blue," which is one of the artist's favourite colours.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM LIBRARY.

Although Dr. Garnett has taken up the cudgels on behalf of [his] old colleagues of the British Museum Library in the subject-index controversy, no official notice has apparently been taken of the various criticisms which have been passed upon the national reading room by the correspondents of The Times and Daily Chronicle. We have succeeded, however, in the course of a conversation on the subject with the present Senior Assistant Keeper of Printed Books, Mr. Arthur Miller—whose services in editing the general catalogue since 1890 were generously acknowledged by Dr. Garnett in The Times of October 30—in clearing up one or two points which seemed to need elucidating. It may be said at once that a subject-index of the whole library, which we spoke of in our article of September 29 as a possibility, is not actually under consideration at all. At present the authorities are only concerned with the continuation of the subject-index of modern works (1881-1895), compiled by Mr. Fortescue, Dr. Garnett's successor as Keeper of Printed Books—a further instalment of which will carry on the list until the beginning of 1900. This instalment has now reached to about the middle of the letter B. As the Trustees were not at present considering the question of a subject-index on a larger scale the matter could not very well be discussed; but in any case the estimate of £50,000 as the cost of such a catalogue, and of ten "wasted" years in compiling it, was stated to be quite imaginary.

With regard to the complaint that the period which elapsed between the day of publication of a book and its inclusion in the catalogue was unnecessarily long, it was pointed out that publishers were by no means absolutely regular in sending their new books promptly. Some delivered at once; others at lengthy intervals, and this delay necessarily means delay in cataloguing. The list of accessions—containing about twelve or fifteen hundred entries, sometimes more—is printed every fortnight, and includes, as far as possible, all works received up to the time of going to press. It takes a fortnight to receive the list from the printers ready for the catalogue, but a proof is available within a week, and—though the fact may not be generally known—any reader can examine it upon application to the reading room officials. Even if new books are not in the list every effort is made to find them for those who ask for them. At the end of a fortnight copies of the list are placed on stands conspicuously situated in the reading room, and are cut up and inserted in the general catalogue with as little delay as possible. Another complaint is that the officials fail to get all the books which ought to be in the collection. To keep an eye on every publication throughout the kingdom is difficult, if not impossible. The "English Catalogue" and advertisements are the only means the officials have of ascertaining what books are published, and as many provincial publications are not announced in either form certain books are bound to escape them. Publishers, as a whole, however, give them little trouble—most of the leading firms sending their books promptly, without waiting to be asked. The suggestion made by one correspondent that a catalogue should be compiled of all books known to have been published before the Copyright Act, and not in the Museum Library, is regarded as impracticable. It would be impossible to compile such a list with any pretension to completeness, and in any case it is considered probable that the labour involved would be out of all proportion to the value of the work.

THE DRAMA.

Reviewers have every temptation to speak well of The Wisdom of the Wise. It is the work of a very nimble-minded, witty woman, and who likes to admit that his intelligence lags behind or that he cannot seize a sly joke as quickly as his fellows? It has an air of high fashion, and we can all do our best to be fashionable on paper, though in real life we may find the expense prohibitive and our dress trousers too baggy at the knees. It has the "note of modernity," and do we not all make desperate efforts to be modern? Not to be amused by a play of this sort is almost to write oneself down a Philistine or at least a fogey. And yet the truth will out. Though I have the weakness, in my vainer moments, to think myself not very much more stupid than my neighbours, I cannot pretend to be enraptured by Mrs. Craigie's play. It has been hinted here and there, I see, that those ought to revel in The Wisdom of the Wise who admire Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie. Why? Because both, it seems, are comedies of wit and character rather than of plot. I reply, let us distinguish. It is true that the plot is the least important element in M. Pailleron's play, but such plot as it does offer is a plot—that is to say, a story that arouses expectation and leaves the spectator properly curious as to what is going to happen next. And it is a good theatrical plot, too, so far as it goes, with bustling action and one really good game of blind man's buff which comes straight from Le Mariage de Figaro—not generally reckoned a plotless play. In Mrs. Craigie's comedy all the plot consists in the business of bringing the Duchess of St. Asaph close upon the heels of her husband to Miss East's room at the Continental Hotel. But long before she gets there we know precisely what is going to happen; Mrs. Craigie never condescends to arouse our curiosity. Then, again, M. Pailleron's wit is good theatrical wit, wit of the obvious emphatic sort, that "carries" over the footlights. His characters, too, are broadly, not subtly, drawn—the "precious" hostess, the "larky" sous-préfet, the "serious" young man intent on his career, the "sénateur inamovible," the gushing ladies of fashion: familiar types all. Some of them, the "Bellac des dames" and the grey-haired "young poet of promise," are fiercely satiric caricatures of actual, well-known people. Others, like Suzanne and, above all, the Duchess, are deliberate embodiments of average humanity and the commonsense point of view. All this makes M. Pailleron's play robust, strongly outlined, easily comprehensible to the man in the pit. For M. Pailleron, though a brilliant writer, had an essentially commonplace mind.

Now Mrs. Craigie is also a brilliant writer, but beneath the brilliance there is not that substratum of workaday thought, thought of the kind for all to share in, which is an indispensable foundation for a play. She is super-subtle, elusive, paradoxical; her personages are always saying the unexpected thing—when it is not the wholly irrelevant thing or the wholly puzzling thing. Examples. Lord Appleford and Miss East have met and loved in Florence or Venice. Each says (out of the other's hearing) they might have been "like the Brownings." I see (or flatter myself I see) the point; it is just the literary analogy which suggests itself to any one contemplating this pair of hyperæsthetized sentimentalists. But would the pair themselves give expression to it—before strangers—in a wholly unliterary, merely mundane, London drawing room? I think not. That is an instance of the unexpected thing. So is the little passage in which a gentleman whom we have scarcely seen and about whom we know nothing falls into rhapsody of pseudo-æsthetic jargon over a lady's dress. That is both an unexpected and an irrelevant thing. We were not prepared for it, and it "has nothing to do with the case." The man seems quite sincere in his foolishness; but presently he lets out that it was merely assumed, because he thought the lady liked it. And we were not prepared for that, either. Again, the Duke of St. Asaph is reported to be dining with the "Cut of Mutton" club. At the word "club" Lord Appleford at once starts off at a tangent to remark that "the Carlton was a club, and is a crowd; the Athenæum was a stronghold, and is a waiting-room." That is an instance of the wholly irrelevant thing. Somebody declares sententiously that woman (or man, I forget which) is "uncertain like the quail." That is (to me at least) an instance of the wholly puzzling thing. Why are quails uncertain? Perhaps they are not; perhaps it is only Mrs. Craigie's fun, a satire on the fatuous things people will say when they are resolved at all costs on making an epigram? If so, I can only say that what is fun to Mrs. Craigie is irritation to the audience.

Further—and this is more serious—her characters lack humanity. And this I would maintain, even though she were to tell me that they are all faithful portraits of actual persons. For the humanity proper to the stage is the humanity that we all know and recognize at sight. There are, I hasten to admit, two exceptions: the Duke and his Duchess are both recognizably human—simple, straightforward people whom the merest commoner, though he may never have even bowed to a ducal couple in his life, can understand. But Mrs. Wuthering, who makes mischief out of sheer wantonness, and "hates" the Duchess without the slightest reason? I do not recognize this lady. And Mr. Bradgers, M.P., the man who has superseded the Press by the penny pamphlet? I do not recognize Bradgers. And Lord Appleford and Miss East, and the two aunts, and the two nondescript husbands? They are, to be sure, all characters—or rather they are "characters" in the colloquial sense—oddities, exceptions, not members of the easily recognizable humanity I have spoken of. It may be that I lack social experience (at any rate, I will make a present of that suggestion to any one who wants a retort), but I feel at the St. James's that I have been spending the evening with a queer, almost uncanny, set of people. Perhaps they are (to borrow a piece of Mrs. Craigie's own slang), the dernier cri of London drawing-rooms; perhaps they are all talking and behaving like that just now in the ducal mansions of Mayfair. I venture, however, to conjecture that they are not.

I can only hope this play will be printed. With time to familiarize myself with its people and to turn their "good things" over and over in my mind, I anticipate an enjoyment from reading, which I did not feel in seeing, The Wisdom of the Wise. For, one must say it again, Mrs. Craigie is a very nimble-minded, witty woman; she always has something to say, though it may not always be just the thing to say in the play-house. Meanwhile, at the St. James's, there is the excellent acting of Miss Fay Davis and Mr. Alexander (the St. Asaph couple), Mr. H. B. Irving and Miss Julie Opp (hyperæsthetized sentimentalists aforesaid), Miss Granville (mischief-maker), and the rest of the St. James's company.

UTILITARIANISM.

THE ENGLISH UTILITARIANS. By LESLIE STEPHEN. Three vols. (Duckworth. 30s. n.)

We are never more grateful to Mr. Leslie Stephen for his gift of adorning what he touches than when he exercises it upon the history of philosophy. It is the subject which sets the hardest task to literary art. Of course it is easy to write pleasingly about philosophic opinion, or anything else, if one is content to be superficial. The difficulty is to be thorough without being dull. Philosophy in all ages has been concerned with the same circle of facts, with God, Man, and Nature, their leading characteristics and mutual relations. The problems which Plato and Aristotle worked at we are busy with still. We have made good progress with them, but have not yet reached a final solution. And thus any history of philosophy has the disadvantage that it is history written before the record is closed. To exhibit human thought adequately as a continuously developing effort to solve the world-problems we must have reached a point of finality, as Hegel thought he had done. From such a point we could see the whole plan of successive solutions lying below us, and could exhibit them as gradual approximations to the truth. Without such a point the procession of systems has the air of a number of more or less unsatisfactory guesses at a riddle whose answer is unknown; and in reading their chronicle we feel a certain suggestion of futility. There is only one way in which this more or less inevitable impression can be corrected, and that is by increasing the human interest of the story. The thought of each several thinker must be shown not only in its articulation with the abstract scheme of human thought, but in its living connexion with his character and times, his fortunes and adventures, his personal affections and antipathies. But this enormously increases the difficulty of the task. It is not enough to resolve to put life into a story. One needs not only sympathy and imagination but minute and comprehensive learning. Such are the arduous conditions of success, and it is Mr. Stephen's achievement to have met them. It is true that in choosing the history of a definite movement the difficulties are proportionately lessened. They are lessened too when, as in the present case, the movement is one which has risen, culminated, and, practically, closed its career.

That the Utilitarian theory is obsolescent is really implied by the present publication. Mr. Stephen, himself a disciple of the theory, does not make that implication plain, but it must occur to every one who sees these three stately volumes. No one in the thick of a great controversy can sit down to write a long history of it. By a pathetic coincidence the work appears almost contemporaneously with the death of nearly the last great Utilitarian, Henry Sidgwick. Now that he is gone there are none left but Mr. Stephen and one or two veterans like Professor Bain. And it is fitting that the former with the sympathy of a last disciple should sum up the movement, and say what it has done for the practical improvement of life and the better understanding of human nature.

In its effect on practice there can be but one opinion. The English Utilitarians did a great and most beneficent work. Armed with their principle that the promotion of general happiness is the touchstone of laws and institutions, and fired with an enthusiasm for that general happiness which their philosophic principles could never explain, they attacked obscurantism, stupidity, sentimentalism, and sinister interests in their ancient strongholds in Church and State. They were indeed one of the main causes which make the nineteenth century better to live in than the eighteenth. In the sphere of theory their services to political, economic, and legal doctrine were epoch-making. Moral philosophy, with which their name is specially connected, really owes less to them—to the older Utilitarians—next to nothing. But for the later members of the school, who have modified the rigid hedonism of their predecessors, it may be claimed that they have vindicated man's claim to happiness in a new and striking way; and by discrediting a sour asceticism have indirectly contributed once more to our practical welfare.

Not only were the Utilitarians highly serviceable men but they were men of English qualities. This is a characteristic which Mr. Stephen brings out clearly. It is true that they were for the most part unpopular in their lives; but popularity-hunting is not an English failing. Now that they are gone we can see that the peculiarities which their contemporaries disliked were superficial, and that the basis of their thought and work was decidedly agreeable to the English genius. In any case a great deal of their thought has entered permanently into our stock of national ideas. This is more than may be expected of that prevalent form of idealism which we have borrowed from Germany. At present, no doubt, it is current in our schools; but in its distinctively German features, its pantheism, its depreciation of personality, its illusionism, its tendency to dissipate fact into category, we may question if it really suits the national character. Certainly it puts itself at a hopeless disadvantage by its obscurity of phrase. This is a fault the Utilitarians were never guilty of. Bentham was admirably clear and pithy before he forced himself to write like a Parliamentary draftsman; James Mill was the most lucid of expositors and most forcibly direct of controversialists; J. S. Mill was a careful student of the skilful French methods of expression. Suited to their style was an unwearied effort towards clearness of thought. They did not want to be clear because they feared to be profound (the French weakness), but because they loved truth. Above all, their aims were practical. Philosophizing to them was not a sort of fine intoxication or dim uplifting of the spirit somehow akin to tobacco-smoke and beer (the German weakness), but a means of doing solid benefit to their native country. In the pursuit of this noble end they were staunch in facing much abuse and misunderstanding, and won their way to general respect through calumny.

Altogether they were a noble line of men and deserved to have a stately memorial raised to their memory. The only doubt is whether the monument is not too stately—we had nearly said too ponderous. A thinker's best monument is surely his own published works. If they are not obscurely written their content may surely be left as he left it. A disciple and commentator should not try to say it all over again in his own way. Mr. Stephen might have been content with less summarizing. He has made abstracts of most of the writings of Bentham and the Mills. Apart from this excess of zeal we cannot help feeling, especially in the later volumes, that he often lets his pen run away with him. We do not find this fault in his "History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century," written a quarter of a century ago. There the sections are concise, a page or half a page long, and the careful section-analysis helps the attention. Now the sections are twenty times as long, and the paragraphs run into pages. Mr. Stephen has not escaped the snare of facility. But, though he has told us much that is superfluous, he has told us yet more that is indispensable and cannot be had elsewhere. The genesis of Utilitarianism, its political and social environment during its hundred years of vigour, its opponents and friends, the attacks upon it and its ramifications into other fields are told with admirable learning, accuracy, and literary skill. And the personal interest is not forgotten. Mr. Stephen can make the dry bones live. He fulfils the second condition of philosophic history and shows that the Utilitarians were not only theorists but men.

Of the three volumes the first is much the best reading. There is less summarizing of Bentham's books and more proportionately of Bentham's life and environment. The introductory survey of his times is masterly. Moreover, Mr. Stephen's style is here better suited to his subject. In manner, at least, he is always the reverse of ponderous. His writing has the light touch of the literary causeur, the after-dinner speaker, the unobtrusive humourist who understands mankind. This just suits Bentham with his odd, childish, fanciful character, deep in thought and shallow in feeling, a man of no vices and a philanthropist half by accident. With James Mill and his son, men of deeper natures, it is obviously less successful.

As we get into the last volume we begin to feel the disadvantage of a history written by a disciple. For Bentham, Mr. Stephen has a perfect perspective; he knows exactly how far Bentham was right and where he was wrong. From the vantage ground of time Mr. Stephen can see right over his head. Not so with J. S. Mill. In some points, it is true, Mr. Stephen has got clear beyond his master. He has quite emancipated himself from the political and psychological atomism which mars so much of J. S. Mill's work; but he ought to have put the difficulties of it in a sharper and more scientific way. He has mostly thrown his criticism into the form of a running commentary of dissent, which is not concise or conducive to understanding. However, Mr. Stephen has a perfect grasp of the conception of organism which in his "Science of Ethics" he has applied so brilliantly to explain man and society. He can, therefore, appreciate J. S. Mill's uneasy struggles under the incubus of the individualism which he inherited from his teachers. He points out what Mill was really groping after, and puts in a clear light that excessive docility which made Mill prodigious as a pupil, but half-hearted as an innovator. It is on J. S. Mill's attitude to the traditional hedonism of his school that Mr. Stephen's guidance rather fails us. Mill began, of course, with the doctrine that each man's conduct is determined by the pursuit of his own pleasure, and assumed, like his father and Bentham, that the greatest pleasure of the individual would be sure to coincide somehow with the greatest pleasure of the community. This is egoistic Utilitarianism. From this he travelled to the quite different position that a man ought to pursue the pleasures of others just as much as his own; which is universalistic Utilitarianism. Now, though near akin in name these two Utilitarianisms are, as Sidgwick points out, two totally different kinds of ethical theory; so that you cannot get by any logical transition from one to the other. Some sort of transition Mill does, indeed, attempt, but the reasoning is so lame that no one takes it seriously. The best plan for the Utilitarian is to admit, as the more clear-sighted and candid do, that we are here confronted by a "final inexplicability"; in other words, that there is an incurable leak in the system. Much as this explicit change of theory means, the real change in Mill's mind was greater still. He never got rid of his social atomism because the conception of organic evolution had not dawned upon him. But, under cover of a sort of legal fiction, he really got out of the old narrow profit-and-loss ethics into the standpoint of unselfish devotion. To so docile and conscientious a nature the wrench from the old idols gave grievous pain. The crisis in Mill's life came as soon as he reached intellectual maturity, and the story of it, in his "Autobiography," forms one of the most interesting pieces of self-revelation in literature. The experience is parallel to that which happens in a religious conversion of the kind we know from Bunyan. But it is unique to see it happening to a freethinker. Professor Bain, an old-school Utilitarian, who describes this event in his "Personal Recollections" of J. S. Mill, is quite unable to understand it, and puts it down to "overworking the brain." Mr. Stephen, less dogmatically, follows him. It was really Mill's Slough of Despond. His renewal of interest and activity was his victorious resumption of his pilgrim's progress with the burden rolled away; or, as Carlyle phrases it, rejection of the Everlasting No and passage through the centre of Indifference to the Everlasting Yea. Mr. Stephen, in essential points, is behind Mill as a moralist and does not feel the bond that nearly choked his master.

Still, with all shortcomings, this is a book we must be profoundly thankful for. The work will never be done again with equal thoroughness and appreciation. Mr. Stephen has made a permanent addition to English philosophical literature; one that will be not only quoted in the future, but read.

BOOKS ON THE WAR.

The Times History of the War in South Africa. Edited by L. S. Amery. Vol. I. (Sampson Low. 15s.)

A history of the South African war, published at a time when our mounted troops are still engaged in hunting down the last of the bush-whackers, and ex-President Kruger is touring in Europe with the lingering hope of foreign intervention, must necessarily appear to some extent a journalistic enterprise. Many passions are still excited; many facts are still obscure; many motives are still doubtful; about much that has happened it is still difficult to speak with candour; posterity will, no doubt, review and revise many judgments now passed with confidence by those who seem most competent to judge. But this is the moment at which the public prepared to welcome a careful study alike of the military operations and of the political events which paved the way to them is at its largest; and this is an age in which journalism habitually bursts the bounds assigned to it by past conventions, and overflows into books. The need for such a work existed, and it is not easy to see how that need could have been better met than by the volume which Mr. Amery has edited and written with the assistance of Miss Flora Shaw, Mr. W. F. Monypenny, and another contributor who has preferred to remain anonymous. It does not aspire to be a work of art in the sense in which Kinglake's History of the Crimean Campaign is a work of art. The great protagonists, Paul Kruger and Cecil Rhodes, do not stand out with dramatic distinctness like the figures of Napoleon III. and the great Elchi in that memorable book. But that was inevitable in the circumstances. In attempting nothing of the kind, the writers were properly recognising the limitations imposed upon them by the conditions under which they worked. What they have done is to give, first of all, a concise but adequate synopsis of the events in South African history which led up to and "conditioned" the more striking events which they had undertaken to narrate in detail, and then an admirably full and admirably lucid presentation of the case for Great Britain and the two Republics. Until the day comes, perhaps in the very distant future, when some man of genius shall survey the story of the struggle not as living politics but as human drama, there will be no room for any other history of the same events on the same scale.

The volume now issued carries the history only a little further than the publication of the Ultimatum. It is difficult to analyse the contents of so large a volume covering ground with which every reader of this review is sure to be tolerably familiar. When one has said that it is clear, readable, complete, and written from the imperialistic point of view, one has said nearly all that it is strictly necessary to say in order to characterize and recommend it—though it should be added that the editor has discharged his task so well that the composite character of the work would be detected by few readers, if it were not announced in the preface. But there are a few points—there could not in the nature of the case be many—on which, in spite of the great mass of literature on the subject, new light of some importance seems to be thrown. It is light that will be particularly welcomed by those of us who wish to be able, without doubt or hesitation, to allocate the responsibilities for the war. In a sense, of course, Mr. Gladstone is responsible for it. If the fight had been fought out in 1881, there would have been no need to fight it out in 1899 and 1900. In a sense, again, Lord Salisbury is responsible. If he had prevented Mr. Kruger from enacting his stringent franchise laws in 1890, he would not have had to quarrel with Mr Kruger about them nine years afterwards. By permitting the enactment of those laws, he was, in effect, letting slide guarantees for the well-being of British subjects which the great Liberal statesman, for all his misplaced magnanimity, had secured. But these are old responsibilities. It is the recent responsibilities that interest the average man. Those who have been accustomed to believe that Mr. Chamberlain was determined to force a quarrel, and deliberately shaped the course of the negotiations to that end, should read carefully the account of his attitude towards the pseudo-concession of the seven years' franchise offered on July 18, 1899:—

> The real advance made on July 18 was but a trifling one, as Sir Alfred rightly judged. But to Mr. Chamberlain at a distance, and less closely in touch with Boer chicanery, the news of a seven years' franchise, retrospective and prospective, seemed at first sight welcome tidings indeed. The Boers, so defiant and unconciliatory a week ago, had suddenly conceded what, after all, was not so very different from Sir Alfred's Bloemfontein suggestion!

"While still in the first flush of elation," Mr. Chamberlain met the Lobby Correspondent of The Times and told him, as it would appear from the "Political Notes" of The Times of July 19, that the crisis might be regarded as at an end, and that he had achieved the object he had in view. He had, as a matter of fact, not achieved it; but a High Commissioner who desired above all things to keep the peace might easily have let him think he had. Instead of doing so, Sir Alfred Milner promptly sent home a despatch to the effect that "the Bill as it stands leaves it practically in the hands of the Government to enfranchise or not to enfranchise the Uitlanders as it chooses." He was the man who could not be hoodwinked, and would not let his Government be hoodwinked. But for him, illusory compromise might have been possible, and the outbreak of hostilities might have been postponed.

Both the Bloemfontein Conference and the negotiations which succeeded it are admirably described and summarized. It is a long story with many intricacies. There is no attempt to simplify it by omissions; but the narrative is a model of lucidity. Certain prevalent impressions regarding the Ultimatum are rudely brushed aside. It is often represented as "an act of despair provoked by the steady refusal of the British Government to formulate their demands while they were assembling a large force to crush the Boers." As a matter of fact, as Mr. Amery points out, the document was drafted within a few hours of the receipt of the British despatch, and only held over for reasons that had nothing to do with a desire to preserve peace. And the draft then drawn was far more arrogant than the amended Ultimatum ultimately presented. The following, Mr. Amery assures us, "was its substance":—

> Sir,—In the name of the Government of the South African Republic I have the honour to bring to your information that this Government, with an eye to the breaking off of friendly relations by her Majesty's Government, as shown by the constant bringing up of troops to the borders of this Republic, and the sending of War reinforcements from all parts of the British Empire, herewith informs you that unless they receive within forty-eight hours an assurance (1) that the troops on the borders of this Republic shall be instantly withdrawn; (2) that all reinforcements which have arrived in South Africa since June 1, 1899, shall be removed within a reasonable time; (3) that her Majesty's troops which are now on the high seas shall not be landed in any port of South Africa—my Government will consider such action of her Majesty's Government as a formal declaration of war, and will not hold itself responsible for the consequences thereof.

We have no space to dwell further on particular points dealt with in the course of the history. Its chief merit is, perhaps, its thoroughness; and in virtue of this merit, which it exhibits in an eminent degree, it stands alone, not, of course, in the history of literature, but certainly in the history of journalistic enterprise. Since the Franco-Prussian War, if not from an earlier period, histories of wars and other events of public interest have been issued, often enough, from newspaper offices. But they have generally been slight and scrappy—mere collections of articles or letters, scissored and pinned together. Here we have, for the first time, the attempt to do the thing on a really grand scale, with a full use of all the resources which a great daily newspaper commands, and to say, so far as the information accessible at the moment permits, the last word upon the subject taken in hand. At a season when the public interest in the subject is intense, the story can be told better by the journalist in his office than by the historian in his study; for though the journalist may know less than the historian about the past, he is apt to know more about the present. The new departure, therefore, is one of great importance. It deserves success, and we cannot doubt that it will win it.

The History of the Boer War, by F. H. E. Cunliffe (Methuen), was issued in fortnightly parts, some of which we noticed at the time of their publication. Now appears Vol. I. (15s.) in plenty of time to be given away as a Christmas present. It is a stately, and should be a welcome, gift-book. The illustrations are good, numerous, and various. So are the maps and plans. The narrative carries the Orange River campaign down to the battle of Magersfontein, and the Natal campaign down to the relief of Ladysmith; and we are assured that the history will be completed in a second volume of the same size as the present one, but that, owing to the difficulty of obtaining exact information, the serial issue will be abandoned. Mr. Cunliffe writes well, though he does not attempt the rhetoric of Dr. Conan Doyle. He is lucid, and careful not to commit himself to criticism which it may be necessary to revise in the light of fuller knowledge, or to reproduce the more hysterical outpourings of special correspondents. Among other things he shows that there were sound reasons for Sir Redvers Buller's decision to divide his forces instead of concentrating either in the colony or in Natal. Pietermaritzburg was in danger on the one side and the De Aar line of communications on the other. It was important that both should be saved.

It looks as though one of the results of the war would be to make the reputation of Australian war correspondents. We have mentioned Mr. Hales in the past, and we shall probably have to mention him again very soon. To-day it is the turn of Mr. Donald Macdonald, of the Melbourne Argus. His How We Kept the Flag Flying (Ward, Lock, 6s.) is the most "live" by far of all the many books on the siege of Ladysmith that have come before us. He has none of the conventional diction or loud mouthed rhetoric of the war correspondents of the old school, but writes just as a good talker talks. His fund of anecdote would make the fortune of a score of after-dinner speeches. His reflections are shrewd, and he can rise to a great occasion. The account of the great assault on Ladysmith is far the most graphic and convincing that has appeared. It is even better—because more realistic and more sustained—than Steevens' description of the charge at Elandslaagte. It will stand comparison with some of Zola's pictures in La Débâcle. No one, save an unfortunate reviewer condemned to specialize, can be expected to read all the books by all the correspondents; but this is a book that no reader, whose nerves are strong enough for horrors, ought to miss.

International Law in South Africa, by T. Baty (Stevens and Haynes, 5s. n.), is a reprint of a course of lectures recently delivered at Oxford. The precedents that bear upon points that have lately assumed prominence, such as the seizure of the Herzog and the passage of the bushmen through Portuguese territory, are cited and examined. Seeing that international law is not much more international than the Holy Roman Empire was holy, discussions of its application to particular cases are necessarily tentative and hypothetical, and the lecturer who presumes to decide whether, in a given instance, pillage or the destruction of private property was internationally legal is very much in the position of the judge who declared that his policy was to let commonsense guide him in his decisions and to cast about for legal reasons for them afterwards. This Mr. Baty does, and on the whole he does it well, though he sometimes uses a principle to cover a case in which, in practice, it is likely to be almost invariably ignored. Few soldiers, for instance, will agree with him that "the refusal of quarter is a worse offence against modern warfare than is pillage," even in the case of a sharpshooter who kills nine men from behind a rock and then steps out to surrender to the tenth. "Sharpshooters cannot make war with limited liability," would be the soldier's reply to that suggestion, in spite of all the remonstrances of Heffter, Phillimore, and Vattel. It should be added that Mr. Baty's book differs from the average law book in being readable. There is a delightfully sardonic humour in his criticism of Napier's proposal to minimize the horrors of capture by storm by detailing a select body of troops to shoot any of the stormers who engaged in excesses:—

> Whether a general would like to employ his best troops in policing his storming party and whether the knowledge that a pistol was at their heads would stimulate the ardour of the latter is a question for military experts.

EDUCATIONAL.

EDUCATIONAL THEORY.

Comenius.

Already a whole literature has grown up around Comenius, the genial Moravian who did so much to infuse sympathy and kindliness into the Spartan severity of seventeenth-century education. It may be doubted whether English readers will feel the need of any further acquaintance with Comenius than can be obtained from Mr. Keatinge's translation of the Great Didactic and Professor Laurie's exhaustive monograph. Comenius was not a thinker of the calibre of an Aristotle, a Bacon, or an Aquinas. In Comenius (Helnemann, 5s.) by Prof. Will. S. Monroe, his various works are analysed carefully, and the results presented in accurate and painful summaries. In America, where education is a subject of academic study to an extent that seems strange in England, the book will probably be in demand among University students. We must confess that we think America has carried the study of educational methods to excess. The American teacher threatens to become a person who is deeply learned in all the technique of teaching, and insufficiently instructed in the matter to be taught. As Comenius has been so much written about, it seems to us that Professor Monroe would have done well to exercise a nicer discrimination. What alone remained to be done was to give a clear and effective sketch of the conditions of education when Comenius undertook to reform it, and to mark out distinctly where he made an advance. What useful end can be served by such analysis as that which tells us that Comenius undertook to answer the following questions:—(1) How can a single teacher instruct a large number of children at the same time? (2) How far is it possible for pupils to be taught from the same book? (3) How far is it possible for all the pupils in a school to do the same thing at one time? (4) How is it possible to teach everything according to one and the same method? (5) How can many things be explained in a few words? (6) How is it possible to do two or three things by a single operation? No doubt satisfactory answers to the two last questions would be priceless, but what are we given as Comenius' solutions? "The purpose of education is not to fill the mind with a dreary waste of words from books." "It may be laid down as a general rule that each subject should be taught in combination with those which are correlative to it."

Professor Monroe has some acute remarks on the Jesuit education, and the substitution of rhetoric and dialectic for studies which, by a wider outlook and more searching examination, might have endangered theological authority. We are reminded of M. Dupanloup and his sytem of education as it is described to us by Renan. Still, it is possible to slight, as well as to magnify, the importance of rhetorical training, and there is little doubt on which side the danger lies in English education. Like most of the educationists whom he quotes, Professor Monroe wrests the anti-Aristotelian movement into a reaction against classical culture. The classical studies of the Renaissance were as revolutionary in their effects as the physical inquiries of Gilbert and Galileo. The re-appearance of Platonic ideas and of the Greek worship of Beauty gave a far ruder shock to mediævalism than did the Baconian theory of Induction. In adopting Oscar Browning's distinctions of humanism, realism, and naturalism, Professor Monroe has been guilty of reading into the thoughts of the Renaissance and Reformation the polemics of the Normal School. We have the authority of one of the ablest of English educationists for our view that Comenius is only interesting as a personality. It is amusing to see prefigured in this pedagogic Odysseus of the seventeenth century the ideal of the modern Board School teacher. To pour into a receptive memory a quantity of information on every topic—that is a modern ideal; it was also the ideal of Comenius' Pansophia, but it is as old as the Encyclopædic Sophists of the time of Socrates.

Mr. Horatio Dresser has in many former books shown a power of preaching in a popular and suggestive way the gospel of a free, intelligent, and spiritual life. A great number of stimulating thoughts on the subject are thrown together in his latest work, EDUCATION AND THE PHILOSOPHICAL IDEAL (Putnams, 5s.). The philosophical critic will hardly find in it a carefully-reasoned system. He will perhaps question Mr. Dresser's "necessary presuppositions"; he will detect possible fallacies in the remarks about "pre-natal influences"; he will wonder at the author's unhesitating belief in "warnings" conveyed by the subconscious mind. But the book is an able plea for a high social ideal, and the two chapters directly concerned with education emphasize the protest, which Professor Blackie did so much to bring home to the minds of his generation, against pedantic and material methods of training the young.

It would be so easy to find fault with the manner of Mr. W. H. Winch's PROBLEMS IN EDUCATION (Sonnenschein, 4s. 6d.) that the value of its matter runs the risk of being over-estimated by careful critics and under-estimated by careless readers. The title-page alone, disfigured by what comes little short of appearing to be a condensed biographical note on the author, is enough to prejudice other University graduates against the book; and Mr. Winch revels in the abuse of modern philosophical terminology to an extent which is (happily) rare even in educational literature. Yet much that Mr. Winch has to say is well worth uttering in any fashion rather than leaving unsaid, for the writer's experience as an Inspector of Schools for the London School Board has taught him the difference between paper theories of education and plans that will work. Headmasters of elementary schools would do well to give careful attention to at least one chapter in Mr. Winch's book, that "On Following Nature"; and they should especially notice the author's admission of the failure of "sociological instruction of a generalized character" in the Evening Schools of the London School Board. If Mr. Winch would take the business of book-making more seriously, correct his proof-sheets carefully, and realize the need of an index to a work which quotes many specific authorities, he could give us an excellent treatise upon practical elementary education.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

Two College Histories.

Of the two Oxford colleges last issued in the Oxford University Series (F. E. Robinson, 5s. n.) ORIEL, owing to the share it took in the "Oxford Movement," probably "bulks the larger" in the view of the outside world. During the reigns of Copleston and Hawkins (at any rate during the earlier years of the latter's long term as Provost) Oriel Common room could boast of a larger array of distinguished names than any other college in the University. Copleston's appointment, in 1814, as Provost was followed by the election, in the year after, of such Fellows as Hampden (afterwards Bishop of Hereford) and Thomas Arnold, of Rugby. Later on came, for a short and not too well-spent period, Hartley Coleridge, whose Bohemian manners did not consort at all with the habits of his rather punctilious colleagues. Whately, as Dean, signed the entry that vacated his Fellowship, after a year's probation. Keble came back to his college in 1818 as tutor, and within five years more R. W. Jelf and John Henry Newman had also entered the fold. Hurrell Froude and that curious figure Joseph Blanco White came later. It was Froude who says of himself in his "Remains":—"Do you know the story of the murderer who had done one good thing in his life? Well, if I was ever asked what good deed I had ever done I should say that I had brought Keble and Newman to understand each other." While Mr. Walrond Rannie's history of his college is naturally filled with the names of these later lights—it is impossible to do more here than mention such men as Pusey and J. A. Froude and Mark Pattison—the most interesting figures in Mr. Stride's volume on EXETER College are chiefly of the distant past. Founded by Walter de Stapeldon in 1314 and known for some time under the name of Stapeldon Hall, Exeter preserves its founder's memory by bearing the name of the Bishopric to which he was appointed. West country men have gravitated naturally to the Devonian Bishop's college. Indeed, even at the present day, after the Universities' Commission has done its worst, nearly half the college scholarships and exhibitions are restricted to natives of Stapeldon's old diocese. It is to the credit of Exeter that many of her famous sons have made use of the opportunities thus afforded to raise themselves from lowly estates to the highest positions in the University. Of such was Dr. John Prideaux, fourth son of a yeoman of Stowford, in South Devon, who set out from his native village in the autumn of 1596 "in habit very poor and sordid (no better than leathern breeches)" and presented himself thus clad at the gate of Exeter. Beginning his academical career in the humble position of subpromus or "scouts-boy," in 1612 he was made Rector of the college, a post which he held for thirty years, and subsequently, just before the outbreak of the Civil War, was raised to the Bishopric of Worcester. Dr. Benjamin Kennicott, the famous Hebrew scholar, who flourished about the middle of the eighteenth century, was of no less lowly extraction—being, in fact, son of the parish clerk at Totnes. Until his twenty-fifth year he supported himself as a village schoolmaster, and it was the merest stroke of luck that enabled him to proceed to the University at that rather advanced age. Of later names perhaps that of William Sewell stands as high as any—Sewell who was accused of always lecturing upon himself, whether his subject was Plato or Bishop Butler, and whose fanciful derivations drove etymological students to despair. It was at Exeter, too (history does not scorn to repeat it), that "Parson Jack" Russell became possessed of Trump—"such a terrier as he had as yet seen only in his dreams"—who became the ancestress of the famous "Jack Russell" breed. We have done little in this short notice but mention a few outstanding names. Indeed, these histories make such fascinating reading that it would be easy enough to write at length on the architecture, the statutes, or even the athletic records of the two societies, or on any of the subjects so exhaustively handled by the compilers of these volumes. But we have said enough to show that the books are not without interest even to those who may not have had the fortune to matriculate either at Oriel or at Exeter.

Eton.

ETON, by Mr. A. Clutton-Brock (Bell, 3s. 6d. n.), is one of the series of "Handbooks to Great Public Schools." The author labours under the disadvantages of having had many predecessors in the same field, and of having to compress much matter within a small compass. About one-half of the book is historical, twenty-six pages are devoted to an account of the buildings, and the remaining seventy, out of a total of two hundred and forty, to Eton as it now is. It will not be obvious to the non-Etonian reader that "sense and nonsense" were the names of Divisions of Lower School, so called from different stages in the construction of Latin verse; and the process of "shirking" also requires explanation. Amongst omissions we notice that there is no mention of Boveney Weir, the sixth form bathing place, nor, except obscurely, of "pepper-box," the most distinctive feature of an Eton fives-court; nor of Catechism in Chapel; nor again of private tutors, who, more frequently in old days than now, accompanied to Eton younger members of noble families. It is a much worse blemish that the author should have thought it necessary to quote once more Kinglake's amusing but one-sided, not to say ill-natured, description of Keate. A more generous appreciation of the famous Head Master will be found in "Eton of Old," the author of which spent under him all the eleven years of his school life. "Eton" appears to have been somewhat hurriedly put together; there are several unnecessary repetitions and the arrangement of matter leaves something to be desired; the index, too, is meagre—a serious fault. The illustrations are numerous and good. We should like, by the way, to know how the author explains the irregularity in the arch of the east window, about which there used to be a legend; the defect is obvious enough in the illustration facing p. 144. On the whole, the book is readable and will no doubt serve its purpose. A list of works on Eton would be a valuable addition to it.

SCHOOL BOOKS.

Chemistry.

Three books on chemistry lie before us. The first, CHEMISTRY FOR EXAMINATIONS (Allman and Son, 2s. 6d.), is by Mr. H. W. Hill. It should serve its purpose, for without being a "cram-book" in a bad sense, it contains a large number of facts expressed in the briefest manner possible. Special attention is bestowed on points which experience shows examinees are particularly liable to forget or to misunderstand. The other two books belong to different types. Mr. Joseph Torrey, jun., the author of ELEMENTARY STUDIES IN CHEMISTRY (Constable, 6s. net) well remarks that from some proposed courses of chemistry one might suppose there is something weird and uncanny about the subject, at which the student should only be allowed "to peek through a very small crack." He also animadverts with some sense on the "mechanical and demoralizing" system of note-books. This leads us to expect Mr. Torrey to be of opinion that his readers can grasp a simple fact even though it has not been repeated half-a-dozen times, and may occasionally be trusted to draw a correct inference that is not explicitly drawn for them in their book. This is surely the right method. Mr. Telford Varley in his PROGRESSIVE COURSE OF CHEMISTRY (Black, 2s. net) writes for a lower order of intelligence, which, it seems to be assumed, will of a certainty stray from the right road of reason if the smallest loophole of escape is left. Doubtless books of both sorts are useful, though one would fain hope that the former are the more frequently required of the two.

Zoology.

Mr. Gilbert C. Bourne's COMPARATIVE ANATOMY OF ANIMALS (Bell, Vol. I, 4s. 6d.) forms a most clear and interesting introduction to the study of animal organization. It has a distinct individuality of its own, both in matter and arrangement. Mr. Bourne does not agree with the common assumption that the best way in every case to explain a given object is to begin with the simplest elements to which it can be reduced. Instead of burdening the beginner at the start with the intricacies of the cell theory, he leads him up gradually to them by way of first the anatomy and then the histology of the common frog, afterwards reviewing various typical members of the Protozoa and Coelentera. We have one fault to find, and that is the deliberate omission of all references to original authorities. This is to be deprecated, if only on the ground that Mr. Bourne does not always adhere to the generally accepted accounts of certain phenomena; but, to regard the matter from a wider standpoint, it seems a pity that a student, who if he knew the way might be inclined to go to the fountain head, should be discouraged from his laudable intention merely because no signposts have been provided.

Dynamics.

In THE STUDENT'S DYNAMICS (Bell, 3s. 6d.) Professor Minchin has produced an elementary text-book which may be most cordially recommended. He presents the subject in a delightfully real and fresh manner, and has been eminently successful not merely in expounding general principles but in applying them to concrete examples, or rather in using concrete examples as helps towards grasping the general principles. We were perhaps most struck with the chapters on Impulse and Momentum, Work and Energy, Blows and Collisions. Many men who have taken good Mathematical Honours at Cambridge would here find much that is helpful. Professor Minchin is adopting the right educational method in attaching great importance, from the very first, to arithmetical illustration and calculation; and teachers who follow his guidance will find that their pupils make much more intelligent and rapid progress than those who adopt the traditional method of learning the formulæ first and applying them afterwards. The book contains an index and a useful series of examination questions at the end of each chapter, but for class use the number of examples for the student to solve should be increased.

Mechanics.

Mr. F. Rosenberg in FIRST STAGE MECHANICS OF SOLIDS (W. B. Clive, 2s.) deals with so much of the subject as is necessary for the Science and Art Department Examination in the Theoretical Mechanics of Solids (Elementary Stage). He takes dynamics first, and uses the second law of motion to establish the parallelogram of forces in statics; we have the usual discussion of uniform and uniformly accelerated velocity, and a chapter on Energy, which, though short, is sufficient for the purpose. A good chapter on Properties of Matter prepares the way for the statical part, which is very ably dealt with. It is much to be wished that examining bodies would either confine their syllabus to rectilinear motion or else require a slight knowledge of trigonometry—very little would suffice; as it is, the writer of an elementary text-book is continually hampered by being debarred from using a notation which is really essential to a right understanding of the mechanics of two dimensions. We must congratulate Mr. Rosenberg on the skill with which he has evaded this vexatious difficulty and the aids to the memory which he has devised. His warnings against common errors will be very useful. His illustrative examples are excellent, and so are the summaries which are given at the ends of the chapters; there are plenty of exercises well-chosen and well-graduated, and any one who has mastered this book will be able to sit for the examination with considerable confidence.

Geometry.

The continuation of Mr. Blythe's book on GEOMETRICAL DRAWING, PART II., SOLID GEOMETRY (Cambridge University Press, 2s. 6d.), is of equal merit with the first part. His directions are clear, and are reinforced by well-drawn diagrams, and he supplies just the right amount of explanation. It is almost impossible for the student to get a grasp of solid geometry without actual models, and the next best thing is to have perspective pictures accompanying and exactly corresponding to the projections under discussion; this help is here provided and greatly enhances the usefulness of the book. A collection of examination questions is added, with notes and hints for solution. The book seems to us to provide an excellent preparation for the South Kensington, Cambridge Local, and similar examinations.

Geography.

A GEOGRAPHY OF ASIA (1s. n.) completes a series of School Geographies, written by Mr. L. W. Lyde, and published by Messrs. Black. In expounding his plan Mr. Lyde announces the discovery that "an excessive variety of type and other mechanical devices for classification are apt to confuse the average pupil." The thing has certainly been overdone of late, and Mr. Lyde's return to simplicity is a move in the right direction. Another feature of his method is that he gives no maps, believing that the presence of maps in text books "has led to a regrettable neglect of the atlas." On the whole we think his geographies good, though we question whether the parents will like the necessity of paying for a separate geography for each continent, for the British Isles, and for the British Empire.

In THE SPHERE ATLAS (Sphere Atlas Co., 1s. 6d.) Mr. Reginald Gill, the editor, devotes a great deal of space to the British Empire and to England in various aspects—its industries and railways, &c., and there is a good map of the new County of London. Mr. Gill has tried a new experiment in doing away with the framework which shuts in the ordinary map, giving it an artificial boundary. PHILIP'S LONDON SCHOOL BOARD ATLAS (1s. n.), which adopts the same method of colouring for high and low land as the "Sphere Atlas," is well adapted to its purpose. Here also is a map of the County of London, as well as plans of different parts of the metropolis, and there is a good deal of explanatory reading matter. Both atlases err in making too little colour distinction between sea and land.

Greek Exercises.

Advanced Greek prose composition is usually taught by setting before the pupil—occasionally with some hints—a piece of English prose which he is required to turn into Greek. Such pieces will present, on the average, eight or ten of those special difficulties, due to differences of syntax and idiom, which make translation from one language into another so valuable a means of education; and the editors of EXERCISES IN THE SYNTAX AND IDIOMS OF ATTIC GREEK (Rivingtons, 3s. 6d.)—Messrs. W. H. D. Rouse and J. M. Sing—are of opinion that boys might be taught to deal with such difficulties more readily and rapidly by means of short single sentences, each of which has been selected because it illustrates one or two special points. They have therefore collected, and arranged in groups, a large number of such sentences, also adding several short Appendices, of which the second (on the "uses of some Greek verbs") and the fourth (on "Metaphors") are especially good, while a brief, but very skilful, vocabulary completes the book. Such a work will naturally not be welcome to the boy who wishes to meet as few difficulties and at as great intervals as possible, but to a good teacher it should be really useful. He can take, almost at random, any one of the 108 exercises it contains and test, in a short time, the ingenuity of his form. Occasionally he may find something which is too hard—e.g., "The policy of the open door"—but on the whole the sentences are singularly well chosen, and, with the aid of the vocabulary and appendices, no boy in a fairly high form should find any insurmountable difficulty in them, while, after going through them, he would be in a fair way to become a really good writer of Greek prose.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SPEAKER, compiled by Mr. Warre Cornish, of Eton (Murray, 7s. 6d.), gives selections for recitation. It is very comprehensive, including Greek, Latin, English, French, German, Italian, and contains an immense number of well selected passages. The book is bulky and the print small, but we suppose it is meant as much for the teacher as for the pupil. We are surprised that the Greek orators find no place, but we are glad to notice considerable space given to English oratory.

Mr. Pelman's little pamphlet THE NATURAL WAY OF LEARNING A LANGUAGE (Pelman's School of Memory Training, Berners-street, 1s.) has some useful hints on picking up languages when the acquisition of them is an end, not, as it is largely in the case of the classical languages, a means. Listen, imitate, converse—that is the main secret; and the last process must be undertaken with all the persistency of the German schoolboy recently described by Mr. Jerome in these columns. It is interesting to hear, by the way, that professors of modern languages in Germany are too often defective in their knowledge, and quite incapable of teaching pronunciation. We are afraid this is sometimes the case in England also; and some further study of the "natural" method—the method of the child acquiring its native tongue—is certainly needed.

THE LAW RELATING TO SCHOOLS AND TEACHERS, by T. A. Organ, B.A. (Arnold, 8s. 6d. n.), is a manual intended for the guidance of members of School Boards, school teachers, &c. It collates, for their benefit, all the Acts, Minutes, and Regulations, and quotes with references many illustrative cases and decisions of the Courts. The ground is satisfactorily covered, and the book should be widely useful.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Romeo and Juliet.

Professor Dowden's edition of ROMEO AND JULIET (Methuen, 3s. 6d.), though rich in comment and allusions, is marked by a studious respect for accepted readings. He abstains from rushing in between the Montagues and Capulets of criticism, and hides his suggestiveness in appendices. The only alterations in the text are two—the use in one disputed passage of a helpful comma, and the insertion of two judicious hyphens in the line—

Jul.—Art thou gone so? love-lord, ay, husband-friend.

This is generally read "love, lord, ay husband, friend" (First Quarto—My lord, my love, my friend)—which is not without a touch of bathos. But the Professor suggests in an appendix a drastic alteration in the curious passage about "runaway's eyes"—

> Spread thy close curtain, love-performing night,
> That runaway's eyes may wink, and Romeo
> Leap to these arms, untalk'd of and unseen.
> Lovers can see to do their amorous rites
> By their own beauties:

For want of a better interpretation the "runaway" to whom Juliet alludes may be taken to mean the sun, though swiftness is the last attribute one would expect a lady, anxious for the fall of night, to assign to the light of day. This is Professor Dowden's suggested reading:—

> Spread thy close curtain, love-performing night!
> That [—yonder] runaway's eyes may wink—and Romeo,
> Leap to these arms! Untalk'd of and unseen
> Lovers can see to do their amorous rites
> By their own beauties;

As Juliet has already referred to the sun in the same speech, the above punctuation which makes "that" demonstrative, e.g., "that runaway (of whom I have spoken)" would be more natural than that of the universal text; but the term "runaway" still remains inappropriate to the sun. Moreover, the words "untalk'd of and unseen," as applied to lovers in general, are less dramatic than when they refer, as in the ordinary reading, to Romeo in particular.

Romeo and Juliet is, of course, rich in allusions (i.e., Mercutio's references to the "five wits"), etymological puzzles (e.g., the derivation of cock-a-hoop), technical terms (e.g., "lanthorn," used by Romeo in the architectural sense), and fabulous, as in the lines, "Then the death-darting eye of cockatrice," and "some say the lark and loathed toad change eyes," or in the Queen Mab speech. On all these matters Professor Dowden is an admirable guide; his notes are, indeed, if anything, too full. Romeo says that the moon "is already sick and pale with grief"

> That thou her maid art far more fair than she.

The comment, "'her maid'—a votary of Diana," is superfluous. The explanations of "dwell on form" (adhere to conventional manners), and of "garish" (excessively bright, glaring) are equally unnecessary. The introduction provides a good example of Professor Dowden's power of imparting sound information in a lucid style. The extract from Garrick's version of the play is very aptly introduced, and the points in which Shakespeare improved upon Brooke's poem—"Romeus and Juliet"—as in the development of the humour of the Nurse, and the creation of Mercutio from a passing hint of Brooke's, are well brought out. In the history of the legend there is no allusion made to the story in the Decameron (II., 7), and it would have been interesting to note that Lope de Vega adapted the tale in "Castelvines y Monteses," although this, of course, cannot have had any influence upon Shakespeare.

The Oxford Movement.

THE STORY OF DR. PUSEY'S LIFE, by the author of "Charles Lowder" (Longmans, 7s. 6d.), does not claim to take the place of Dr. Liddon's voluminous "Life of Edward Bouverie Pusey." That work may be rather regarded as an exhaustive history of the Oxford Movement, with Pusey for its central figure, than as an attempt to portray his life. In handing over the papers to his biographer, Dr. Pusey's daughter expressed the wish that the Life should take the form of a history of Pusey's times; she also shrank from permitting the more personal letters of her father to be published while his death was still recent. With the lapse of years, however, Mrs. Brine seems to have felt an increasing desire to let the home-life of Dr. Pusey be known. The task was entrusted to the lady whose life of Father Lowder has been so deservedly popular, and the new work is in every respect worthy of her. From a mass of materials she has chosen exactly those which best contribute to the portraiture of a character noble and lovable in the highest degree. In dealing with Dr. Pusey's domestic sorrows her fine discrimination is most clearly apparent. It is hard to lift the veil from a great human sorrow without vulgarizing it, but here there is nothing that could offend the most sensitive taste. With the controversies in which Dr. Pusey was engaged, so far as they come within her scope, she deals clearly and ably. The chapter on the foundation of Sisterhoods in the English Church—the cherished scheme of Pusey's life—owes its interest to the writer's intimate acquaintance with the community at Ascot, under whose roof Dr. Pusey passed away. There is a human interest in the "Story" before us which gives it a peculiar charm. As regards method, the writer deals with the life of Dr. Pusey day by day, omitting anything like a detailed account of his literary work. Various letters of a personal kind are printed for the first time. We may draw special attention to the letter to his son in which Dr. Pusey describes the death of his child Lucy (printed in an appendix to chapter 12). Another most interesting document is the touching account of the closing scene at Ascot, given here for the first time by Dr. Pusey's daughter, who was present to the last. This book is sure to be popular, and if the writer's aim has been to enhance the impression which Pusey's life made upon his contemporaries she has succeeded in a remarkable degree.

We mentioned last week the curious attention now being given in France to the Oxford Movement. The book of Mlle. Lucie Félix Faure, daughter of M. Loubet's predecessor, having run its course by successive chapters in the Quinzaine, the organ of Liberal Catholicism in France, now appears in accessible form from the house of Perrin—NEWMAN, SA VIE ET SES ŒUVRES, embellished by a photogravure of the beautiful head in the drawing belonging to Mr. H. E. Wilberforce. This study of Newman was begun before the publication of M. Thureau-Dangin's "Renaissance du Catholicisme en Angleterre" which we reviewed last February; but there need be no comparison between the two books, the one dealing with the external aspects of the Oxford Movement, the other—that of Mlle. Félix Faure—being mainly an endeavour to reveal the inwardness of that movement by tracing the soul-life of Newman. Mlle. Félix Faure regards Newman's life as "one of the finest works of apologetics bequeathed to future times" by the present century.

Topography.

Sussex, by F. G. Brabant (Methuen, 3s.), is the latest addition to Messrs. Methuen's series of "Little Guides." The alphabetical arrangement of the places gives the book more or less the character of a gazetteer, but it is the sort of gazetteer, as regards alike the format and the contents, that the tourist will be glad to have. Now and again, as was inevitable, one notices omissions. The omission of the names of William Black and George Augustus Sala (not to mention Florence Marryat) from the list of literary luminaries associated with Brighton is one case in point; the failure to warn the wayfarer to keep his weather-eye open for Mr. Rudyard Kipling at Rottingdean is another; the neglect to mention the passenger service from Newhaven to Caen is a third. On the whole, however, the book is accurate, complete, and agreeably written. Old memoirs have been ransacked, where necessary, for historical and literary associations. In the case of Brighton, for instance, we are reminded not only that Charles II. slept there on his way from Worcester to exile, but also that Clive and Ethel Newcome (whose name, by the way, Mr. Brabant spells Newcombe) were "falsely suspected of kissing in the tunnel." Similar suspicions have no doubt sometimes been better founded. The architectural notes, which are numerous, are very carefully done, and Mr. New's pictures are as pleasing as usual. The notes on climate would have been more useful if there had been some indication of the period of the year at which the Sussex watering places are most salubrious and "Dr. Brighton's" practice shows the best results.

Readers who open Kent, Past and Present (2s.), by Mr. G. F. Bosworth, in Messrs. Philip's County Readers' Series, at the passage where he describes "Charles II., on the very night our ships were burned in the Medway, keeping bad company and idling his time by hunting a poor moth," may be misled as to the character of the book. It is not really in the least sentimental. As we should expect in a book by Mr. Bosworth, the maps are a very good feature. The interesting topography of the Kent marshes is especially well treated. But Mr. Bosworth can adapt himself from the atmosphere of the Geographical Society to that of the school-room. The past history of Kent is clearly told with the aid of illustrations of its old abbeys and castles, and is enlivened with a good account of Chaucer and the Canterbury Pilgrims. Other features, such as an explanation of the dialects and proverbs of the county and a chapter on the homes of Kent, not forgetting Dickens' home at Gad's-hill-place, remove the volume from the conventional paths of the school-book.

The Shakespeare Country, illustrated by photographs, by John Leyland (Newnes, 10s. 6d. n.), is not the first book of its class, but it deserves high commendation for the abundance and excellence of its photographic views, while the descriptive letter-press is throughout readably, sensibly, and carefully put together.

Mr. Norman Heathcote in St. Kilda (Longmans, 10s. 6d. n.) gives a good account of that strange island, the home of the Fulmar petrel, which knows neither tree nor shrub nor dairy, which conducts its business by barter, and despatches its letters by letting them drift across the ocean. He supplements Mr. Kearton's account of St. Kildan ornithology (in "With Nature and a Camera"), and gives some interesting matter about Lady Grange, whose husband imprisoned her in this lonely island. The photographs and drawings are excellent.

Whether the attractions of Devon need to be brought more conspicuously before the public may be doubtful. That is, however, the opinion of the United Devon Association, which exists "for the purpose of improving the accommodation and facilities of the county of Devon as a place of residence and as a touring ground." With this view they have issued a book, which we have received from Messrs. Hutchinson, Sons, and Stuttaford, called The Book of Fair Devon (2s.), which as a zealous and popular guide to the county will be acceptable. There are plenty of photographs and fine illustrations, and the information is well put together. If we must criticize we would suggest that some tourists might be attracted by a rather fuller account of what Devon boasts in the way of antiquities.

Indians of the West.

There is, perhaps, no sadder history in the world than that of the tribes who once held what are now the United States, and Mr. George Bird Grinnell in The North American Indians of To-Day (C. Arthur Pearson, 21s.) certainly does not dispel the melancholy which surrounds them. But this author, at any rate, knows his subject, even if he is rather apt to ignore the brutal and vindictive side of some of the Indians, such as the Apaches. He has worked and travelled, hunted and camped with them, as we know from other works of his, and has sought patiently to understand them. It is a pity that the United States Government can hardly be said to have even tried to do its best with the children of the soil. Without attributing to the authorities all the dishonour with which a fervent advocate of the Indian might be pleased to plaster them, the whole history of the agency system has been one of brutal and greedy exploitation—with only a few honourable exceptions. Even now the agricultural and pastoral populations of the West have their eyes fixed on the last remaining reservations, and in a very little time there will be no earthly happy hunting ground for any tribe. To those who have met and camped with Blackfeet and Crows, with Arapahoes and Chickasaws, the excellent photographs, mostly of chiefs, in Mr. Grinnell's book will be of exceedingly great interest. It is a pity indeed that he did not see his way to giving fewer of one tribe. Among the sixty photographs seven are Arapahoes, and thirteen Sioux. And some of them are certainly not of pure Indian blood. A wider selection which included a few of the more purely Canadian and British Columbia tribes would have increased the value of Mr. Grinnell's work. There is, for instance, no portrait of a Ptwan, from which tribe all the belles of the Pacific Coast once came. The author's choice of the most striking subjects for his camera has one danger for the incautious reader who is not acquainted personally with the Indian. The average intelligence of the Indian is not to be gauged from the pictures of White Buffalo, Sleeping Bear, or even Kicking Horse Charley. There are many tribes, especially among the fish-eating Indians, of a very low type of intellectuality.

How to be Well.

The modern medical officer of health must be an expert bacteriologist, microscopist, and chemist; he must also be able to manipulate mathematical formulæ and statistics. The wide range of his work is admirably described in Hygiene, by W. C. C. Pakes (Methuen, 15s.), a laboratory text-book intended for candidates for the Diploma of Public Health. Clear and concise directions for the various methods of analysis and investigation are given, and explanations of the chemistry involved or technique adopted are added where necessary. The book is well up to date, especially in the Bacteriological section; but it seems curious that in discussing the examination of the air for microbes only the antiquated "ballon barboteur" of Miquel should be mentioned, and that no room should be found for any of the more recent and accurate filtration methods.

Food and the Principles of Dietetics, by R. Hutchison, M.D. Edin. (E. Arnold, 16s. n.), is a well-written and complete treatise on that most important of all daily questions, what to eat and drink, and can be heartily recommended to all those for whom it has been written—medical men and the general public alike. Every kind of diet is discussed, from that of the Esquimaux, who consumes his twenty pounds of flesh and blubber, down to the daily pint or so of milk that satisfies the month-old baby. Dr. Hutchison is no believer in the food value of the soups, beef-tea, or jellies usually given to "strengthen" invalids; at most, such preparations can only serve to rouse the appetite. He condemns alcohol as an unnecessary article of diet in complete health, though it is certainly of use for the old and the overworked; and discredits a theory that many people must have blessed unawares in their youth, that bread-and-jam is a cheaper and a better food for children than bread-and-butter. Several chapters are devoted to the diet of infants and children, and also to the principles of feeding in disease; the book ends with a very good index.

In Essays on Consumption (The Sanitary Publishing Co., 10s. 6d. n.), Dr. J. E. Squire, M.D., discusses the causation, prevention, and treatment of consumption in a simple but very adequate manner. The book opens with an introduction by Sir William Broadbent, who points out that Dr. Squire was one of the first English physicians to show how completely the observance of a few hygienic precautions would prevent the spread of tubercular disease, and to urge the necessity for preventive legislation directed towards its diminution. The Londoner of the fourth generation is said not to exist, so wide-spread and fatal is the malady. It is satisfactory to learn, in view of the diversity of the cures and treatments advocated, that "recoveries can take place under a great variety of remedies, the underlying element of success in all being mainly attention to the general health." The book can be recommended to the general reader.

Mr. Fisher Unwin publishes a translation by Dr. Michael G. Foster of Dr. Oscar Bernhard's First-Aid to the Injured, with Special Reference to Accidents Occurring in the Mountains (2s. 6d.). The subjects treated are various, ranging from "contusions" to "heat apoplexy," and from "snow blindness" to "drunkenness." It may seem singular to some to find this last condition classed among "accidents occurring in the mountains," but there is no doubt that it sometimes "occurs" there whether by accident or otherwise. We ourselves know a case in which it occurred to a guide on the Dent Blanche, and was treated with a dose of stick as soon as the party descended to a position in which their equilibrium was sufficiently stable for the purpose. But this is not the treatment advised by Dr. Bernhard, who proposes the gentler alternative of tickling the throat with a feather. We do not agree with Dr. Bernhard that when a climber has mountain sickness very badly "it is useless to urge him forward." As other writers have pointed out, there are cases when this course, as the lesser of two evils, must be adopted. This is a small objection, however, and by no means hinders us from warmly recommending the pamphlet to the study of mountaineers.

Mr. R. E. Dudgeon, M.D., who writes on The Prolongation of Life (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.), refers, still without a touch of irony, to another "prominent writer on the subject . . . who insisted that the normal duration of life was a hundred years," and who, unfortunately, "died a short while ago at the age of sixty-seven." Mr. Dudgeon, who is himself an octogenarian, is forearmed against such a severe test of his opinions on the best means to attain old age. His advice, which is for the most part sound, is a little startling at times. Swimming in the open air is among the forms of exercise that the author says should be kept up by old men. The statements that "the wholesomeness of flannel as an underwear is a popular delusion," and that all food is wholesome in moderation may also meet with some incredulity. The book is not without some touches of old-fashioned humour, and is adorned with quotations from the classics such as thrilled the Houses of Commons in the writer's youth.

Early Methodism.

We have nothing but commendation for Mr. Frank Banfield's short life of John Wesley (Westminster Biographies, Kegan Paul, 2s.). In about 120 pages he has presented the reader with all the principal facts of Wesley's life and work, duly emphasizing the points of difference between Wesley and Whitefield, and showing clearly enough how the Wesleyan body inevitably separated itself from the Church after the death and in spite of the wishes of its founder, who was not a Wesleyan. A sketch of the condition of the Church in Wesley's time seems almost a necessary adjunct and complement to a life of Wesley, but we presume that Mr. Banfield has not had the space requisite for so difficult a chapter. He has done his work of condensation with judgment and impartiality, and would have done it better still but for one or two lapses into slang phrases. These ought to be corrected when the book reaches, as we hope it will, a new edition.

There is not much that is new to be said about the leaders of the early Methodists. It was therefore not to be expected that anything very novel would be found in George Whitefield, M.A., Field Preacher, by James Paterson Gledstone (Hodder and Stoughton). The subject was, indeed, practically exhausted by Mr. Gledstone himself in his comprehensive "Life and Travels of George Whitefield," published nearly thirty years ago. The present volume, which is on a smaller and handier scale, gives a sufficient and well-written account of this remarkable, if not very attractive, personality. There was much that was oddly contradictory in Whitefield, who, despite his burning zeal for souls, never realized, or even recognized, that there could be anything other than perfectly right and proper in slavery. He was himself, indeed, a slave-owner in Georgia, for he spent much of his time in America, whither he journeyed something like a dozen times. Alternately the friend and the hammer of the Wesleys, Whitefield is a curious study in psychology as well as in religious enthusiasm, and Mr. Gledstone's capital sketch forms a very useful and, on the whole, judicial account of a man whose influence still counts for more than is generally supposed.

Naval History.

A sea-book by a man who not only knows it, but is also competent to speak of its literature and history as well as its remarkable manners and customs, is so rare that one might well greet Mr. Walter Jeffery's book A Century of our Sea-Story (Murray, 6s.) with some effusion. As a general rule books about the sea and seamen are written by men who know nothing of anything else, or by those who know remarkably little of a seaman's character. Mr. Jeffery, however, has evidently been soaked by the spray of many seas, and yet knows the inside of a library as well, let us say, as how to make a Matthew Walker on a four-stranded rope. Hardly anything comes amiss to him, from the origin of press-gangs to the early history of the "she-oak net" of Sandridge Pier, and he writes as lightly and as fluently of one as of the other. Indeed, the only fault to be found with the book is its shortness, considering the astonishing way Mr. Jeffery ranges over the whole sea history of this century, including the Navy as well as the merchant service, during his investigations. We venture to suggest that a writer has at length been found to do a really popular and inclusive history of the English seaman, even if it runs into several volumes the length of the present one.

A Subject Index.

A Contents-Subject Index to General and Periodical Literature (Stock, 7s. 6d.) is a work which deserves a welcome if only for the excellence of its intention and the circumstances under which it has been produced. It is the result of the labour, freely given in his leisure hours, of Mr. Cotgreave, the well-known Librarian of the West Ham Public Libraries, and of the enterprise of the Public Library authorities of West Ham, who, having decided to publish the Index for their own libraries agreed to print extra copies for the use of the public. As it is, we presume, founded on the contents of the West Ham Libraries, it is not surprising that it is incomplete, sometimes curiously so—under St. Paul's, for instance, we do not find Milman's "Annals of St. Paul's," and under Gypsies there is no reference to Borrow. Moreover, it attempts to combine a subject index to periodicals and a subject index to books, and more space is devoted to the former than the latter. Still the arrangement is good, and particularly the way in which the reader is guided to references on different aspects of a subject. As a cheap attempt at a general subject index it is likely to be useful to general readers and journalists, and Mr. Cotgreave's labours certainly deserve recognition.

Not every one will have time to read the long official life of Huxley which we reviewed the other day. Those who desire a shorter account of the man and his work will find exactly what they want in THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY, by P. Chalmers Mitchell, in Putnam's Sons' "Leaders of Science" Series, 5s. The book is as well written as Grant Allen's somewhat similar manual on Darwin; one could hardly give it higher praise. Not only is there a clear and adequate account of Huxley's contributions to natural science, but the "gladiatorial" incidents in his career, for which he is more widely renowned, are also depicted with eloquence and humour.

GORDON'S CAMPAIGN IN CHINA (Chapman and Hall, 1s.) is a reprint of some notes written by General Gordon for the information of his brother officers, and contributed in 1871 to "The Professional Papers of the Corps of Royal Engineers." The style is severely professional and technical—much less emotional, in fact, than Lord Roberts' despatches—and the book, in spite of the interest which current events give to the subject, will hardly attract a wider public than that originally addressed. There is nothing in it, for instance, about the famous quarrel with Li Hung Chang, whom Gordon is generally believed to have desired to "shoot on sight." An introduction by Colonel R. H. Vetch gives a short account of the origin and history of the Taiping rebellion, from which the thread of Gordon's own narrative may be picked up and followed by the reader.

A very few years ago AFTER WILD SHEEP IN THE ALTAI AND MONGOLIA by E. Demidoff, Prince San Donato (R. Ward, 21s. net) would have appeared as one or two articles in some such paper as the Field, and every one, including the author, would have been thoroughly satisfied that the Ovis Ammon had not been treated disrespectfully. We frankly confess to having no sympathy whatever with sportsmen who kill a dozen or so every day for the mere sake of the heads, even when a record pair of horns at last comes into the bag by the process rather of exhaustion than that of intelligent choice and selection. The latter is the true sportsman's real claim to consideration, and we cannot say that Prince Demidoff has earned more than some respect for his steady perseverance in trying to extinguish the wild sheep of the Altai.

Mrs. Donaldson in LEPCHA LAND, OR SIX WEEKS IN THE SIKKIM HIMALAYAS (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d.) gives another rather flagrant example of the expanded article. Although her book certainly contains some minor matters of interest, it is hardly worth while exploring for them among eighty thousand words describing the common incidents of travel in the foothills of the Himalayas.

As a popular description of a scramble through some of the highlands of North-West Africa, AMONG THE BERBERS OF ALGERIA, by Anthony Wilkin (Unwin, 16s.) may serve its turn. Mr. Wilkin, indeed, is here so determinedly popular that he omits all mention of the history of the Berber clans described. The general reader, indeed, might almost close the book with the impression that the Showirs and Kabyles were two tribes of prehistoric Anglo-Saxons who had been forced to embrace Islâm and were now "writhing" under French dominion. In spite of a few such unnecessary and absurd words as "musculature" the book is lively and humorous.

ENGLAND EXPECTS—BUT! (Macqueen, 2s. 6d.) is a collection of anonymous tirades on a great variety of subjects, ranging from the diplomacy of Lord Salisbury to the romances of Mr. Silas Hocking. We should imagine that the authors are very young men. At all events they have yet to learn to distinguish the accidental from the essential and to recognize the obvious when they see it. Some of the essays are better than others, but we are afraid that it is no high praise.

ART.

VAN DYCK.

1. ANTHONY VAN DYCK: AN HISTORICAL STUDY OF HIS LIFE AND WORKS. By LIONEL CUST, F.S.A., Director of the National Portrait Gallery. With 61 Photogravure Plates and 20 Collotypes from Drawings and Etchings. (Bell and Son. £5 5s. n.)
2. FIFTY MASTERPIECES OF ANTHONY VAN DYCK IN PHOTOGRAVURE. Selected from the Pictures Exhibited at Antwerp in 1899. Described and Historically Explained, with a Sketch of the Life of the Artist, by MAX ROOSES. Translated by FANNY KNOWLES. (S. Low and Co. £3 13s. 6d. n.)

It was natural that the celebration of the third centenary of Van Dyck's birth at Antwerp last year, followed as it was by representative exhibitions of the great Flemish master's works both in his native city and in London, should be marked by the publication of a memorial volume. But it was hardly to be expected that the double event should produce two books as sumptuous as those which have been published almost simultaneously by Messrs. Bell and Messrs. Sampson Low. The one is the work of Mr. Lionel Cust, the well-known Director of the National Portrait Gallery and the author of an able monograph on Dürer. The other is edited by M. Max Rooses, the distinguished Curator of the Plantin-Moretus Museum at Antwerp, a great authority on Flemish art, and has been translated into English by Miss Fanny Knowles. Both are costly and richly illustrated volumes, adorned with a profusion of admirable plates; but we have no hesitation in saying that the palm must in this case be given to the English work, both for the beauty of the photogravures and the excellence of the letterpress. Seldom, indeed, has the process of reproducing pictures from the originals been carried to so high a degree of perfection as in the plates which decorate Mr. Cust's study of the life and works of Charles I.'s gifted Court painter. Not only has the texture of the stuffs, the gloss of the silks and satins, and pattern of the lace collar been accurately reproduced, but the effects of atmosphere, the delicate gradations of light and shade, the golden haze which floats over sky and landscape, and floods the scene with radiance are all given with wonderful reality in the photogravures of such masterpieces as the Althorp group of George Digby, Lord Bristol, and William Russell, Duke of Bedford, or the Tsar's half-length of Philip Lord Wharton. Again, while M. Max Rooses' sketch of the painter's life is barely twenty pages in length, and he is naturally unable to discuss many questions on which his opinion would be of value, Mr. Cust gives us a full and exhaustive biography of Sir Anthony in which the latest discoveries of French and Flemish scholars are embodied together with many interesting particulars as to the date and production of the master's works. Each of the fifty plates of M. Rooses' volume is an admirable example of its kind, but the scope of his work, which is limited to those paintings exhibited at Antwerp in 1899, excludes many of Van Dyck's masterpieces, and, in consequence, gives a less complete idea of his art. Mr. Cust, whose choice was bound by no such limitations, has wisely included several of the finest portraits in foreign galleries among his selection. We are grateful to him for giving us not only the superb Charles I. of the Louvre and the most charming of all Van Dyck's different groups of the Royal Children, from the Turin Gallery, but also the fascinating Maria Luigia de Tassis in Prince Liechtenstein's collection, the sight of which is in itself worth the journey to Vienna, and the portrait of the romantic Marquis Antonio Brignole-Sala, who may still be seen, in the picture which hangs on the walls of his ancestral palace, mounted on his white horse and lifting his cap with courtly gesture to the spectator. On the other hand, M. Max Rooses' work contains one or two less known and very interesting portraits, such as the noble bust of Ambrogio Spinola in M. Rudolphe Kann's collection in Paris, or the full-length of Lord Wharton's father-in-law, Arthur Goodwin, which in its rich golden-brown tones and soft harmony of colour rivals the Hermitage portrait. Although a Chatsworth picture, it was not among the Duke of Devonshire's contributions to the Exhibition at Burlington House. Another important and well-preserved picture which was at Antwerp and is finely reproduced in M. Max Rooses' volume is the full-length of Lady Rich, which formerly belonged to Lord Hardwicke, and which, after changing hands for a large sum at the Sieurdan sale in Paris, has now become the property of M. Ferdinand Bischoffsheim. Mr. Cust, strange to say, does not even include this portrait in his Catalogue of Van Dyck's works, although a spirited sketch by the master's hand is in Mr. Heseltine's collection. The portrait in question, we may remark, has always borne the name of Anne Cavendish, Lady Rich, but it differs in many respects from the Petworth picture of this winsome lady, whose early death inspired some of Waller's most graceful verses.

Critics are not yet agreed, it appears, as to Van Dyck's early training. M. Max Rooses holds to the old idea, that after receiving his first instruction from Hendrik Van Balen, whose pupil he became at the age of ten, the precocious boy worked under Rubens until February, 1618, when he was admitted as a master-painter to the Guild of St. Luke. Mr. Cust, on the other hand, is "quite clear that Van Dyck was never in any way a pupil or apprentice of Rubens." It is true that we have no positive proof that this was ever the case, but the fact that in 1518 Rubens himself speaks of young Van Dyck as his "best pupil," while a contemporary writer, Bellori, mentions him as having worked in the Rubens school, seems to lend colour to this theory. Whether Van Dyck was the actual pupil of Rubens or not, it is certain that during several years he was his best assistant, and that his style was entirely modelled on that of the great Flemish master, at whose feet he worshipped. He painted copies or replicas of his master's works, carried out his designs, and, no doubt, executed a considerable portion of the colossal compositions which Rubens turned out in such amazing quantity at this period of his career. Many well-known pictures, formerly ascribed to Rubens, such as the St. Martin at Windsor, the Dead Christ in the Liechtenstein Gallery at Vienna, and the portraits of Susanne Fourment and Isabella Brant, the sister-in-law and first wife of Rubens, at St. Petersburg, are now recognized to be the work of his "best pupil." It was the example of Rubens and the sight of the Italian paintings which the master had copied at Venice and Mantua which prompted Van Dyck to undertake that journey to Italy which exerted so marked an influence on his future career. In the autumn of 1621 he started for Genoa, and, after visiting Milan, Venice, Florence, Rome, and Palermo, returned to that city, where he spent the next five years, and painted the magnificent series of portraits which rank not only among his finest works but among the noblest pictures in the world. The fame of Rubens and his own talent speedily procured him employment from the merchant princes and patricians of "Genova la Superba." In Rome he had already executed portraits of Cardinal Bentivoglio and Cardinal Barberini, afterwards Urban VIII. Now the princes of Savoy, and the members of the proud houses of Doria, Spinola, of Lomellini, and Brignole-Sala all vied for the honour of being painted by his hand. Many of these portraits, mostly full-length, seated or standing figures, still adorn the palaces of illustrious families at Genoa, but some of the finest have found their way to this country—amongst others, the charmingly vivacious Marchesa Balbi, in green velvet robes, at Dorchester-house, the lovely group of Balbi children at Panshanger, the fair Paola Adorno in the Duke of Abercorn's collection, and the Brignole-Salas at Warwick Castle. In these noble and refined works we feel at once how strong and enduring an effect the sight of the great Italian masters had produced on the impressionable young Northern painter. A sketch-book in which he put down notes and made drawings of famous pictures is still preserved at Chatsworth, and bears witness to the immense admiration which Titian's masterpieces in Rome and Venice excited in his heart. Paolo Veronese, Giorgione, Leonardo, and Albert Dürer occasionally arrest his attention, but to Titian to them he returns with increasing delight.

We see the influence of the painter of Cadore not only in the portraits which Van Dyck painted in Italy, but in many of the religious subjects which he executed after his return to Antwerp towards the end of 1626. During the next five or six years he painted the great majority of the altar pieces which are still to be seen in the churches and galleries of Belgium, and which were so fully represented at the Antwerp Exhibition. M. Guiffrey, indeed, gives a list of no less than 235 of these sacred subjects, most of which belong to this period, and were called forth by the sudden revival of religious fervour which swept over the Netherlands under the rule of the Infanta Isabella. In his frequent representations of the Crucifixion or of the Holy Women weeping over the Dead Christ—in the great altar piece at Mechlin, which Sir Joshua called the finest religious picture in the world, or in that other Calvary with St. Francis kneeling at the foot of the Cross in the Notre Dame of Dendermonde—Van Dyck impresses us by the intensity of grief and ecstatic expression which he imparts to his kneeling saints, as well as by the strong human interest that is always present in his compositions. If he lacks the creative powers and brilliant colouring of Rubens, he surpasses him in tenderness of feeling and solemn devotion.

"In the dramatic momentariness," Mr. Cust writes, "and in that which Mr. Claude Phillips has rightly called the rhetorical quality of the Passion, Van Dyck shows strongly the influence of Italian art and Italian religion. Sometimes he suggests a reminiscence of such dramatic works in sculpture as the groups by Mazzoni at Modena, or those on the Sacro Monte at Varallo. His paintings of the Passion and Agony of the Saviour are rather direct, poignant appeals to the feelings of the spectator than great decorative compositions, such as those of Tintoretto or Rubens." Unfortunately, in his anxiety to give these large compositions that sense of all pervading light and colour which was the glory of Rubens' art, Van Dyck employed a drier kind of paint, and made great use of certain pale tones of blue and silver grey, and it is just these colours which have suffered the most seriously from damp and neglect, or have been ruined by clumsy restoration. In his Holy Families, again, it is chiefly the influence of Titian that prevails, while in the Mystic Marriage of St. Katherine, which was presented to Charles I. by his envoy at Brussels, and is now at Grosvenor-house, the gentle smile and downcast eyes of the youthful Virgin, as well as the golden glow pervading the atmosphere, recalls Correggio's art. During the spare intervals that elapsed between these large religious compositions, this prolific master found time to paint some of his most graceful mythological inventions, the Rinaldo and Armida, which was bought by Endymion Porter in 1629, and is now at Clumber, and the allegory of Time clipping the Wings of Love, which charmed our English artist Millais by its delicate poetic fancy. Many excellent portraits also belong to this period (1627-1632), amongst others, that of Ambrogio Spinola, Lord High Admiral of the Netherlands fleet, of Maria Luigia de Tassis, and the full-length of Abbé Scaglia that is the pride of Dorchester-house.

In April, 1632, Van Dyck came to London and was appointed Court painter to Charles I. He was given a salary of £200 a year, a house in Blackfriars, and a country residence in the Royal palace of Eltham. Three months later he received the honour of knighthood from his Kingly patron. As a further token of favour, in the following spring Charles presented him with the gold chain which he wears round his neck in his portrait at Grosvenor-house. During the remainder of his short life Van Dyck painted the King and Queen, their children and courtiers, and all the chief personages who after his death were to play a leading part in the tragic history of the Civil War. That he idealized his sitters to a certain extent must, we think, be admitted. The King, who appears in Mytens' portraits as short of stature, with something of the clumsiness and Scottish bonhomie of his father, is invested by Van Dyck with Royal grace and majesty, and bears in his face that indefinable look of sadness which is as it were a foreboding of the dark fate that was awaiting for him. The Queen, who was petite and graceful, with no special beauty, but a fine pair of dark eyes and a clear complexion, is transformed into a stately and elegant woman, with the same distinguished and romantic air as her Royal lord. We can hardly wonder that her niece, Princess Sophia, confessed to a sense of bitter disappointment when she met Queen Henrietta Maria at the Hague in 1641 and wrote :—

> Les beaux portraits de Van Dyck m'avaient donné une si belle idée de toutes les dames d'Angleterre, que j'estois surprise de voir la reine que j'avois vue si belle en peinture, estre petite femme, les bras longs et secs, les épaules dissemblables, et les dens comme des défenses lui sortant de la bouche ; pourtant, après que je l'eus considerée, je lui trouvais les yeux très beaux, le nez bien fait, le teint admirable.

During the first few years of his residence in London the popular and fashionable master painted many of his finest pictures—the charming double portrait of the Queen giving a spray of myrtle to the King, in the Duke of Grafton's collection ; the great Louvre picture of Charles, the striking group of Strafford and his secretary, as well as many portraits of noble families—the Villiers and Sidneys, Herberts and Whartons—who were closely connected with the Court. Lord Wharton's portrait bears the date of 1632, as also does the full-length picture of Lord Leicester at Penshurst. A brother-in-law of the last-named nobleman, James Hay, Earl of Carlisle, had known Van Dyck at Antwerp in 1628, and his illustrious relatives, the Percies and Sidneys, were among the master's earliest friends and patrons in England. A remarkably fine collection of family portraits is still preserved at Petworth, the ancient seat of the Earls of Northumberland. There we see Algernon, Lord Northumberland, High Admiral of England, with his wife and child ; the sprightly face and form of Lucy, Lady Carlisle ; her more sedate sister, Dorothy, Countess of Leicester, with her fair daughter, Dorothy Sidney, the Sacharissa of Waller's adoration ; and a group of youthful beauties closely connected by marriage and friendship. M. Max Rooses remarks that Van Dyck never succeeded as well with women as he did with men, but these comparatively little-known Petworth portraits are among his most attractive works. The delightful half-length of Sacharissa, in deep red satin and black lace scarf, far excels the later portraits of the young Countess at Althorp and Devonshire-house, and may well have inspired Waller's famous lines ; while those of Anne Carr, Duchess of Bedford, drawing on her tan gloves, and of Elizabeth Cecil, in white silk and blue ribbons, are equally captivating.

In later years the execution of Van Dyck's portraits betrays great inequalities, and a distinct falling-off is perceptible in the hands and other accessories, which are too often mere lifeless and mechanical repetitions. No doubt many of these pictures were partly painted by assistants, of whom Van Dyck always employed a large number and respecting whom Mr. Cust gives us some interesting particulars. Chief among them was William Dobson, who probably painted the likeness of Endymion Porter, in the National Portrait Gallery, and of Sacharissa in the costume of a shepherdess, at Penshurst, as well as countless replicas of his master's well-known portraits ; and the Dutchman Adriaen Hannemann, to whom the fine Lord Falkland and Charles Cavendish at Devonshire-house are ascribed. Unfortunately, Van Dyck's love of pleasure and luxury not only interfered with the practice of his art, but seriously injured his health. "Sir Anthony," writes a contemporary, "always went magnificently dressed, had a numerous and gallant equipage, and kept so noble a table in his apartment that few princes were more visited or better served." His mornings were spent in hard work, the rest of his days in banquets and merry-making with gay courtiers and fair ladies. Women above all proved a fatal attraction to him, and encouraged him to waste both his money and his health. In vain the King, in his anxiety to restrain his favourite painter from injurious dissipation, found him a wife in Mary Ruthven, whose sweet and gentle face lives in the portrait painted by her husband, now in the Pinacothek at Munich. Little more than a year after his marriage, however, the great painter, who was only forty-two, came home ill from Paris and died in his house at Blackfriars on the 9th of December, 1641. It is, as Mr. Cust remarks, natural to compare Van Dyck with his contemporary Velasquez, who was born in the same year, and enjoyed the patronage of another art-loving King and of his Court. In some ways, no doubt, the Spanish and Flemish masters are alike. They had the same accuracy of eye and hand and the same cultivated tastes. They both studied in the work of their forerunners with the same close attention, and showed the same marvellous command of the resources of their art. But the difference between the two men remains very great, and on the whole Mr. Cust may be right when he says that of all famous masters the one with whom Van Dyck may most fitly be compared is Raphael. Both painters had the same feminine temperament, as shown in their personal aspect, their character, and the general spirit of their art. They both early attained wide renown, and led a life of luxury and splendour at a Court where they were surrounded by friends and admirers of high rank and position, and they both died in the flower of their age, worn out by art and love before their time.

For the first time in its history the Royal Cambrian Academy of Art has deserted its sixteenth century "great mansion" at Conway for a very modern building. A special exhibition is now being held in the Lord Leighton Memorial Art Gallery in South London. The Academy contributes about 150 pictures to the exhibition, and the show is a very creditable one. Mr. Clarence Whaite, the President, Mr. Anderson Hague, and Mr. S. J. Hodson are well represented.

No one looking at the etchings of Rembrandt can fail to appreciate the saying of Sir F. Burton that Van Rhyn was "in the mystery that underlies the surface of things." It hardly needs a small and choice collection such as that which has been gathered together by Mr. Gutekunst in his cabinet gallery in King-street, St. James's, to emphasize this truth ; but it does need such a collection to show that the finest of the Rembrandt etchings are not all of necessity in the national museums. Most of these etchings have their counterparts at the British Museum, but in nearly all cases the impressions here are as good as those at Bloomsbury, and in two instances at least—the "Jan Six" and "The Old Haaring"—much better. Mr. Gutekunst also exhibits an impression of "The Phœnix," of which, we believe, only six other prints are known ; and the second state of the "Landscape, with a Milkman" is so fine that nothing better could be wished for. Rembrandt etchings are the first and last word to be said of the art, and this small collection has been collected with enthusiasm and is shown with reverence.

Mr. Moffat Lindner occupies the recesses of Mr. Robert Dunthorne's small gallery just now with a series of water-colour drawings of the Harbours of Bergen and the Rivers of Dordrecht. From some of the drawings of Bergen it would seem that Mr. Lindner had been fortunate during the past year in visiting the Norwegian harbours during all of the fine days—popularly estimated at three—which fall to its lot during the course of a single year. If there is a fault to be found with Mr. Lindner's water-colours it is that they are too optimistic ; that they seem too frequently to present Nature on her best behaviour. Any artist less gifted than he would degenerate, in this pleasant tolerance, into the merely amiable. As it is the pleasant little collection would be the better for an occasional effort to do something more direct and broad and less pleasing and scholastic. Mr. Lindner seems to lack courage to make those "mistakes" which are the salt of the artistic life.

The possessors of early Italian masters, for example, whose Messrs. Lawrie have laid under contribution for the nucleus of their exhibition, will confess that the little masters they love made mistakes in plenty. Nevertheless, the portraits by Moroni, Bellini, de Predis, and the somewhat rare Girolamo now—in the fulness of incongruity—being exhibited in Old Bond-street cannot fail to interest. Their freshness, weight, and vigour lift them above all considerations of technical defects and leave them as worthy examples of fine portraiture.

The Company of the Butterfly has given up its rooms for the present to an exhibition of the work of Mr. William Nicholson. It is a comprehensive collection and shows Mr. Nicholson in the fulness of his talent. His "Characters of Romance" are here, and, although they are much superior to the reproductions, they confirm us in our opinion that they are yet themselves reproductions which have not gained greatly by Mr. Nicholson's interpretation.

FICTION.

London Jews.

We should describe Mr. Samuel Gordon's Sons of the Covenant (Sands, 6s.) as an agreeable, but not particularly exciting, story of modern Jewish life in London. The author evidently knows his subject, and writes with confidence of the best type of Hebrew character, justly crediting it with energy and honesty; but his plot is so slender that from the first few pages one is able to anticipate the rather ordinary conclusion. In this the reader will be a little disappointed; and in another respect also, for the author, omitting the poverty and pathos of the Ghetto, turns a steady stream of prosperity upon a poor family, and finally leaves them, after no very moving adventures, in commonplace affluence. It is a readable book, all the same. The characters are strongly marked, and at least two of them are humorous, which is something to be thankful for in a modern novel. The heroes are two very dissimilar brothers, one of whom is adopted by a rich widow and helped in every possible way, while the other has to work for himself and support his mother as best he can. Both succeed, the one as a brilliant scholar, whom we leave on the threshold of a good practice at the Bar, and the other as an extremely shrewd money-maker, who begins with a tray of penny toys and ends with a large house of business in the City. As they are not tried or tempted in any way, it is a little difficult to sympathize with them in their blameless careers and their invariable good luck. They are, however, well drawn, though perhaps some of the minor characters are still better, especially an old Scotchman, who is the only Gentile among the comfortable and unromantic people to whom Mr. Gordon has introduced us.

Miss Geraldine Hodgson.

Miss Geraldine Hodgson is a lady who possesses distinct merit as a novelist, but two novels in one year is rather a dangerously large output. In Anthony Delaval, LL.D. (John Macqueen, 6s.), there is much good work, but the slightness of the plot hardly justifies its three hundred and fifty pages. Apart from the plot, Miss Hodgson shows much power of character-drawing, and she gives us what is not common in fiction, an interesting background in her picture—a little exaggerated perhaps—of the scandal-loving society of a country village. The heroine has a distinct and interesting individuality, and her martinet of a father is excellently drawn; but Anthony Delaval himself is, we are afraid—unconsciously both to himself and to Miss Hodgson—an unmistakable prig. There is also a delightful, though rather impossible, child of the excessively mature kind, who brightens up the story considerably. A Tragedy of Errors (London, George Allen, 6s.), by the same author, is a not unattractive study of another little child with a stern father, brought up by a hard and uncongenial aunt. She also is rather too sharp and elfish for real life, but yet succeeds in winning our affections. We regret that Miss Hodgson felt bound to terminate the small tragedies of her childhood by causing her to be drowned at an age when love and life—and a lover—were opening their arms to her.

One of the first books of the new firm of publishers, Messrs. Hood, Douglas, and Howard, is His Only Son, by Cyril Darrah. Those who care for a rapid succession of incident will find it here. The scene is laid in very modern London, in the offices and the luxurious home of a City financier, and the incidents deal mainly with the struggles of a very wealthy man to keep safe from Boer bullets a brainless son who has been reluctantly compelled to go with his regiment to the front. The story is full of stirring incidents somewhat loosely strung together, and its chief fault is that there is no character in whom the reader can take a sympathetic interest. Otherwise, as railway fiction goes, it is by no means a bad specimen of its class.

The White Battalions, by Fred M. White (Pearsons, 6s.), is an ingenious variation on the overworked theme of an imaginary war between ourselves and our friends across the Channel. A wonderful inventor with a new explosive blows up enough of Central America to let the Pacific Ocean into the Atlantic by way of Nicaragua. The result is to suppress the Gulf stream, and plunge both France and England into the horrors of an Arctic winter. The English are ready for it, and have a "good time," skating and tobogganing. The French are not ready, and their army retires on Paris in circumstances more horrible than those of the retreat from Moscow. One can imagine that such a story would be very effective if handled by Victor Hugo or by Jules Verne; the one would have given it human, the other scientific, interest. It is not so effective when handled by Mr. Fred M. White, who, nevertheless, deserves some credit for having hit upon an idea that would not have occurred to every one. There is a certain vigour about Mr. White's prose, though it is not always constructed in accordance with the rules prescribed by the grammarians.

Paul Bourget.

The third volume, published by the house of MM. Plon, Nourrit, et Cie., of the definitive edition of the works of M. Paul Bourget (a book of extracts from whose writings has just appeared) will be studied with interest. A painstaking collation of texts will be necessary in order to see how M. Bourget, whom the Catholic journals have been congratulating on his complete conversion to Catholicism, reconciles his past with his new found faith. He has undertaken the expurgation of his work in order to bring it into harmony with the dogma and moral ideals of Romanism. We gathered the other day from a story published in the Revue des deux Mondes, "L'Échéance," and now reprinted by Plon in an admirable book, "Drames de Famille," the proof that henceforth M. Bourget's first idea will be to teach and to edify. With M. Brunetière and President Magnaud he has become a martyr to the notion of the writer's responsibility as a member of a specially organized social world. This attitude may be easy enough for M. Bourget in the future, but how can he introduce an odour of sanctity into the old pages of "Cruelle Enigme," "André Cornélis," "Mensonges," and the rest? M. Bourget, converted, counts, no doubt, on the assistance of a superhuman grace. Literature was the first to point out how in the "Essais" the internal economy of these pages had been entirely upset. The revelation created some surprise and even evoked contradiction at the time in France. Lately the Cri de Paris wrote:—"Les 'Essais' demeureront intacts. Là il y aurait eu pas mal à reprendre. Pas de chance, Monsieur l'Abbé; c'est imprimé ne varietur." This is an utter mistake. The "Essais" have been so bowdlerized as to wear an entirely different complexion. Since Racine no such sensational evolution, implying so Quixotic a courage in self-humiliation, has taken place in any French writer of the first rank. To those, however, who read his preface to this new edition too hastily his sacrifice may seem not so complete. "Why do you not take morphine to ease your pain?" a friend said to him the other day. "Because it will prevent me from suffering," he replied. "But why suffer?" was his interlocutor's inquiry. "Because we must expiate." These startling little retorts sum up all M. Bourget's new philosophy. They are the motive of the tale "L'Échéance" in his "Drames de Famille," and they explain why he is now offering us a revised text of his old novels. The excuse which M. Bourget offers to his new clientèle of the Church is that his novels illustrate the diagnosis of social evils; that diagnosis must precede therapeutics; and that it is necessary for a moralist to collect a large number of cases before generalization. This, says M. Bourget, permits the writer to paint the seamy side of life, des tableaux coupables, and no one need accuse him of complaisance. M. Bourget fancies himself in the past to have been engaged in an occupation which he calls "experimental apologetics." This belated discovery is amusing. He tells us that "Madame Bovary" or "Pierre et Jean" are works of "experimental apologetics." On this principle life itself is "experimental apologetics." Since M. Bourget began using the idiom of M. Homais he is losing his grip. His new attitude is distressing, and his attempt to account for it is an essay in apologetic experimentation.

Correspondence.

JOHN DONNE AND THE ANTHOLOGIST.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be allowed to correct a small inaccuracy which appears in your issue of Saturday last in your review of Mr. Quiller Couch's anthology? Your reviewer states that "Donne makes no appearance at all in 'The Golden Treasury.'" As a matter of fact, if he will only turn over the first nine pages of "The Golden Treasury" he will find Donne's most nearly perfect poem, that on "Absence." Taking into consideration the great though brilliant unevenness of the best of Donne's poetic work this little poem is the just proportion of representation which should be allotted to Donne in such a miniature Treasure House, where every corner is so precious and so many singers must find a place. It is not a little unfortunate, however, that the authenticity of this particular poem is open to suspicion, and Mr. E. K. Chambers places it in the appendix to his edition of Donne's poems amongst the doubtful ones. Mr. Palgrave's extract from this poem affords another instance of the offence of which your reviewer accuses him, for, although the whole of the poem only consists of four verses, only three are quoted. On the other hand, if there is choice of two renderings the anthologist, if he is worthy of his hire, is bound to choose the daintier, and the concluding line in Mr. Palgrave's version is certainly more pleasing and effective than the ending chosen by Mr. Quiller Couch. The omitted verse in Mr. Palgrave's version is the weakest of the four; the poem gains by its omission and the diamond sparkles all the more for the cutting. The success of Mr. Palgrave's innovation almost would be its own justification, but the first quality which readers of anthologies have a right to demand from their guides is fidelity, and the compilers are not justified in trimming any poem where the effect of such a course is to give an impression of uniformity of excellence out of proportion to the real merit of the whole.

The writer of the article makes a somewhat sweeping proposition when he suggests that "where a writer cannot be worthily represented by his shorter poems, he is, perhaps, best omitted altogether." There is no reason why the perfect anthologist, when such a being is evolved, should not be able to detach suitable pictures from the canvasses of the Memlings and Titians of poetry which will be an index to the characters of the masterpieces from which they are taken. Mr. Saintsbury, in a burst of enthusiasm, declares, for instance, that no short extracts will show Donne, but that he must be read (presumably in his entirety). While Mr. Quiller Couch in my humble opinion deals too liberally with Donne, if he had acted in accordance with your reviewer's suggestion and Mr. Saintsbury's statement "The Oxford Book of English Verse" would have been the poorer for the exclusion of one of the most remarkable figures in English poetry and some of the most striking passages in Elizabethan verse.

Yours, &c.,

LONG NOVELS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your article on this subject is very interesting; but does it go to the root of the matter?

It is easy enough to take a long novel, whether by Tolstoy or another, discover how a sub-editor with a blue pencil could have cut it down, and then say that it has been made long by such and such devices. But this is not proof that its length was an artistic blunder, or that the instinct of the leisurely person who desires a "good long read" is not a true instinct after all.

So far as I can make out, the objection to long novels is only entertained by readers who regard them from one of two points of view:—

(1) The point of view of the reviewer, who reads, not for pleasure, but for profit (in the narrow sense of the word), and prefers short novels for the same reasons for which people in all walks of life prefer "soft jobs."

(2) The point of view of the academic mind which is trained to admire and aim at conciseness of statement, and is apt to forget that a novel is at once something more and something less than a series of statements.

As a matter of fact, the issue between short novels and long novels can only be decided by raising the question, Are the novels which have won a permanent place in literature short or long? The answer is that they have been long almost without exception. The most memorable novels of Dickens, Thackeray, and George Eliot are all long. So are those of Flaubert, of Dumas, of Victor Hugo. So are those of Tolstoy and Turgueneff. The writers seem to feel that, if their characters are to become the friends of their readers, readers and characters must see a great deal of each other. It is not enough merely to introduce the characters, put them through their tricks, and then hustle them off the stage. To do this is to confuse the art of fiction with the art of drama. Would the world remember and be interested in d'Artagnan, or Jean Valjean, or Colonel Newcome if it had only had 80,000 words of them? It would no more do so than one remembers and is interested in the casual acquaintance of the railway journey or the seaside hotel.

Short stories, it is true, have sometimes taken their place in literature. One thinks at once of the short stories of Poe, Maupassant, and Kipling. But this is work of another genre. Its success proves nothing on behalf of the short novel.

If a novel is bad, then, of course, the shorter it is the better. Most long novels are bad, because most novels of whatever length are bad. But the facts remain, not only that the great novel is always a long novel, but also that even ephemeral success—other than the success of books of the "Mystery of a Hansom Cab" class—is hardly ever attained by short novels. The case of "Ships that Pass in the Night" is almost the only exception that occurs to me. One has plenty of cases to set against it in illustration of the rule. Those of "Robert Elsmere," "The Christian," and "The Heavenly Twins" are only a few among many.

I conclude that the long novel will continue, and ought to continue, to flourish among us.

Yours obediently, CRITICUS.

LORD ROSEBERY'S "NAPOLEON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A propos of the question whether Sir Hudson Lowe was or was not a gentleman.

He had, in 1808, while at Capri, to sustain a bitter defeat at the hands of General Lamarque. Had his Blücher, in the form of the Anglo-Sicilian fleet, arrived some forty-eight hours earlier there is every reason to believe that the tables would have been turned. But that he showed gentlemanly instincts can scarcely be denied by any reader of his letter to General Lamarque, dated October 21, 1808, from her Majesty's frigate Ambuscade. In that letter he thanks General Lamarque for various courtesies accorded after the capitulation. He at least could recognize an honourable foe. And yet his position was a very humiliating one. Had English troops been there to resist the landing at Orico, on the western side of the island, the French and Neapolitan forces could never have scaled the heights of Anacapri. But the craven Maltese placed there to oppose them turned tail in the most cowardly manner and gave General Lamarque the advantage. Sir Hudson Lowe held out against him in the town of Capri for several days, and did not capitulate till his ammunition was well-nigh spent. He showed gentlemanly instincts, surely, when he refused to treat for a capitulation on the terms first proposed—namely, that a safe conduct should be given to himself and to a few of his officers, and that there should be an unconditional surrender of the rest of his forces. He intimated that he would rather be shot than accept such terms. Does not this considerate conduct compare favourably with that of Napoleon in the retreat from Moscow, when he left troops behind him to suffer all manner of hardships and die by thousands?

Yours faithfully, ALGERNON WARREN.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—"The Reviewer" considers his views on Napoleon and on Sir Hudson Lowe to be expressions of opinion rather than allegations. This is a point that would require a knowledge of the fineness of language which Napoleon would not allow to his brother Lucien, and I fall back gratefully on my supports—the chief definitions of "allegation" in Murray's Dictionary, viz., "an assertion without proof, a mere assertion"; or (3) "affirmation, averment."

The suggestion that the non-perusal of the "Suppressed Letters" seriously blunted Scott's judgment of Napoleon is most unlikely. For Scott enjoyed what our new historian, Conan Doyle, calls the "most liable advantage" of visiting the scene of the drama once, twice, and again: he had feasted with Marmont and Macdonald, had received MSS. from Wellington, and was almost "called out" by Gourgaud. Yet Scott was not one of those "many intellects of the highest order" who, as Sir Herbert Maxwell points out, "have been deterred from the work of history by the drudgery of research"; but we have in him, as Goethe has declared, "the richest, the easiest, the most celebrated narrator of the century" undertaking "to write the history of his own time . . . . clearly, truly, and with all the skill of a great artist."

It is difficult to see again the allusion to the Josephine correspondence without stating a conviction that Napoleon's dealings with his first wife are much more easily defended than those whereby Providence and King Harry brought about the English Reformation, although the history and amours of the hot-blooded but kind-hearted Creole are not savoury reading. A world in arms instinctively rushes to the aid of a female in distress, even when, like so many others, from Helen of Troy to Josephine, she has been "a wrong 'un" from her early years. Still, the mistress of Theseus seems to have been, like the chaste-doomed daughter of Austria, a good housewife, while the colossal extravagance of Josephine was, for nearly eighteen years, the bane-canker of the thrifty Corsican.

Finally, I have, in deference to "The Reviewer," sent for the "Suppressed Letters" (both originals and Lady Loyd's), but fear that they will only have, in relation to the first edition (32 vols.) of "Official Correspondence," the somewhat doubtful value of those risqué excisions from Suetonius, Apuleius, &c., that are grouped together at the end of the old French translations. Bacteriology threatens to become a craze, and Napoleon is the only great man who has lived under the modern microscope; but, nevertheless, literary scatomancy is hardly a science worthy of the twentieth century.

Yours faithfully,

Sheffield, Nov. 25. H. F. HALL.

P.S.—Lady Loyd's translation of the "New Letters" to hand. Surely "The Reviewer" does not form his opinions or allegations respecting Josephine's ill-treatment on the very temperate letter (No. 380) sent by Napoleon to the Minister of the Public Exchequer in November, 1811, from the banks of the Rhine, in the midst of worries anent the resurrection of Germany and preparations for the Russian campaign; £10,000 a year was surely ample, even for an ex-Empress!

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In relation to the discussion raised by Lord Rosebery's review of Napoleon in your correspondence column as to whether Napoleon deserved the name of gentleman, I wish to bring before you an opinion on the subject which is not originally my own, but which was expressed by one great man, Wellington, and endorsed by quotation by another, Tennyson. I quote the following anecdote from Tennyson's Memoirs by his son:—"Tom A. spoke of Napoleon coming in hot and dusty from battle, and seeing the Duchess of Weimar, and saying, 'Êtes-vous la Duchesse de Weimar?' of her simple answer 'Oui, Sieur'; and of his thereupon shouting savagely, 'J'écraserai votre mari.' 'Wellington said of Napoleon,' A. added, 'that he was "emphatically not a gentleman."'" I personally agree with this view on the ground that though ancestry be one qualification to the right to such an epithet, chivalry towards women is just as much so; and that this anecdote, though only a single incident in Napoleon's life, is an indication of the man's disposition. I send these remarks to you inasmuch as I think that such men as Wellington and Tennyson have a right to a voice in a discussion of this kind.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

WALTER W. SETON.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

After the rush of books during the last few weeks the autumn tide is on the turn. But the season is by no means over. Of late years the autumn book season has shown a tendency to spread itself over Christmas, and join hands with spring—another sign, perhaps, that the publishing seasons are beginning to distribute themselves more evenly over the year. Certainly in the last few years January and February have been far busier than used to be the case.

Many obituary notices of Sir Arthur Sullivan seem to have overlooked the biography by Mr. Arthur Lawrence, which was written under the supervision of the composer, who gave the author material and information for the work. The volume was published before the war by Mr. James Bowden, and was afterwards taken over, we believe, by Messrs. Chappell. Sir Arthur also gave his biographer some assistance in preparing the life of Mr. Sims Reeves, upon which Mr. Lawrence is now engaged.

The City of London, by a melancholy coincidence, lost two of its most popular clergymen last week by the death of the Rev. Samuel John Stone, rector of All Hallows-on-the-Wall, and of Prebendary Whittington, who had been chaplain to more Lord Mayors and sheriffs than any man living. Mr. Stone belonged to the band of famous hymn-writers which has been steadily dwindling for years past. One hymn alone, "The Church's One Foundation," will prevent his name from being forgotten; "Weary of earth and laden with my sins" is almost as famous; and both have found their way into the hymnals used by members of nearly every denomination. They were written at Windsor nearly forty years ago—on two successive evenings. A few years later, while still a curate, Mr. Stone published his first volume, "Lyra Fidelium," to be followed in 1872 by "The Knight of Intercession," which includes the original version of "The Church's One Foundation." "The Knight of Intercession" (published by Longmans) was his most successful volume, reaching its seventh edition in 1892. His charming little poem, "Deare Childe: A Village Idyll" (Wells Gardner), is now in its fourth edition. His other publications include "Sonnets of the Sacred Year" (1875) and a more ambitious volume of "Lays of Iona," which Messrs. Longman published in 1897. His hymn beginning "Lord of our soul's salvation" was the Thanksgiving Hymn written by command of the Queen for the service held at St. Paul's in 1872 for the recovery of the Prince of Wales.

Two useful additions to their "Illustrated Guides to the Art Treasures of England" are promised by Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode—a guide to the British and Modern Schools at the National Gallery, with an introduction by Mr. Lionel Cust, and another to the permanent collection of the Walker Art Gallery at Liverpool, under Mr. Charles Dyall's editorship.

Mr. Henry Frowde is about to publish an "Anthology of French Poetry," tenth to nineteenth centuries, translated by Henry Carrington, M.A., Dean of Bocking, and a tale of Rugby in the forties, entitled "The Three Friends," by A. G. Butler. The Dean of Bocking is the author of a volume of translations from Victor Hugo (Scott) now in its third edition. Mr. Butler's "The Choice of Achilles and other Poems" and his "Harold and other Poems" (now out of print) were also published by Mr. Frowde.

"Egypt under the Saracens,' by Prof. Stanley Lane-Poole—Volume VI. in "The History of Egypt," which Professor Flinders Petrie is editing—will shortly be published by Messrs. Methuen. The third volume, written by Professor Flinders Petrie, and profiting by the results of his latest researches, will complete the history next year. There is a steady demand for the earlier volumes in the series, Vol. I. being now in its fourth edition and Vol. II. in its third.

(a) Several opening moves may often be varied, in this Sicilian defence, without any real disadvantage to either side. Here possibly, before advancing P-Q 4, Kt-Q B 3 might well be played.

(b) Afraid, perhaps, that if K-Kt 5, the queen would not get free afterwards. However, the text move seems a little timid, and the possibility of a king's side attack were promising for white (see diagram). White is soon put on the defensive, as will be seen.

(c) This leaves the white centre pawns strong, but Black must prevent the threatened P-K Kt 4.

(d) The same move comes if Black P-B 5 earlier.

(e) There is no immediate danger, and therefore K-R 3 seems better than shutting up the square. He has now no opening for attack on the king, and the point of the very well-played ending is the way in which Black gets a successful opening in the Queen's side. We do not care for long games generally, but this is worth following in all its details.

To-day is the sixty-eighth birthday of Björnstjerne Björnson; and it is perhaps the occasion to recall to mind how considerable a literature has been produced, as Mr. Gosse has before now reminded us, by a people whose population is less than that of London; and to remember that before the star of Ibsen rose upon Europe to attract and to repel, the exquisite country tales of Björnson, so simple, so fresh, so enchanting, attracted the foreign reader to Norwegian literature. Björnson has since played many parts, literary and political, but for most foreign readers at all events they remain of all his works the most fragrant in the memory.

* * * *

Nearly every one has a sentimental corner in his heart for Joan of Arc, and this makes it the more difficult to write a book or a play on her that will satisfy. Southey's epic on Joan of Arc, written with Coleridge's assistance, has few readers nowadays. More people, we think, have recently refreshed their school memories of Joan's life in Mark Twain's well-known book; but her newest literary champion is, we understand, Mr. Louis N. Parker, who is said to be at work on a play with Joan as the central figure. We wonder how Mr. Parker will treat the final scene in the story. "Booing"—the bogey of the St. James's—was the greeting offered to Tom Taylor's realistic rendering of it years ago. One difficulty in representing Joan of Arc on the stage is the impossibility of introducing the element of poetic justice. A play in which an immaculate heroine is disgraced and burnt is not likely to appeal to a British audience. We doubt if they will ever like to see on the stage more than a glimpse of Joan's story, such as Shakespeare gives us. The French seem to have scarcely attempted any literary treatment of Jeanne—their most conspicuous effort being the scandalous production of Voltaire.

* * * *

M. Edmond Rostand—from his poem on Mr. Kruger in the Figaro—would appear not to belong to the new school of French poets lauded by Mr. Fullerton in our columns. Rhetoric—the old Adam of French poetry—is the besetting sin of M. Rostand's muse. The author of "Cyrano" and "l'Aiglon" is a hero-worshipper, and in his sympathy for his hero—in the present instance Mr. Kruger—he is apt to run a little wild:—

> Pardon pour cette Europe effroyable qui laisse
> Opprimer les faibles toujours,
> Tuer les Arméniens, assassiner la Grèce,
> Et massacrer les pauvres Boers!

Without stopping to quarrel with the last line, one cannot help observing that "faibles" is the last epithet we, for our part, are likely to apply to our determined antagonists. But there is a fine satirical touch in the following lines, which Mr. Kruger will be the first to appreciate:—

> J'espère à ton retour, qu'après ce long martyre
> Tu déclineras les clameurs:
> Tu ne permettras pas que l'Europe s'en tire
> Avec quelques gerbes de fleurs!
> Tu diras, en rendant aux fillettes, je pense,
> Les gros bouquets aux nœuds flambants:
> "Je n'étais pas venu demander à la France > Des mots écrits sur des rubans."

* * * *

Mr. Newbolt's pièce de resistance in the Monthly Review for this month is Lord Rosebery's article on William Pitt's love-story. The letters which passed between Pitt and Lord Auckland present a fine specimen of the old style of correspondence, with its polished circumlocutions, which Lord Rosebery attributes partly to eighteenth century ideas of dignity, and partly to "the apprehension that letters might be opened and so should not be too explicit."

* * * *

Those who read Mr. Jerome's "Personal View" on German Schoolboys will be interested to see the same subject treated by Miss Catharine Dodd in the National Review. Miss Dodd "cannot help respecting the German boy," but, on the whole, she thinks less highly of him than Mr. Jerome does:—

> He is a person of character, of aspirations, and dreams. His love for his Fatherland is as sincere as his devotion to scholarship. The English boy is far below him in aspiration, yet in the matter of forming a healthy judgment the English boy is immeasurably his superior. German boys live too much in the schoolroom among their books. They create for themselves airy worlds of theories and ideas, and they never gain a practical knowledge of the real world which English boys get in jostling their minds and bodies together on the playground. The German boy does not play; he has no playground. He becomes introspective and argumentative at an early age. While the English boy is a healthy young barbarian, the German boy is rapidly becoming a mature thinker. The English boy passes out of his stage of barbarism and becomes almost civilized in time, but the German boy never civilizes. At best the German man is still half-child, half-philosopher, and often, whole pedant.

* * * *

One also learns from Miss Dodd that, while English boys have no definite opinions about the Germans, German boys are, almost without exception, rampant young Anglophobes. In a recent examination a number of them were asked the question: "Which man or woman of whom you have ever heard or read would you most wish to be—and why?"

As these papers were given to the German boys during a time of intense feeling concerning affairs in South Africa, we get many allusions to the political situation.

"I wish to be Kruger," writes a boy of twelve, "because he has made war on the greedy English." "I wish to be President Kruger," writes another, "because he is brave enough to fight the impudent and avaricious English. I hope he may gain a victory."

"I should like to be Kruger," says a third, "because he has won three battles over the English and taken a lot of prisoners. It is a glorious thing to beat the English."

One wonders if they are still of the same opinion now that their Kaiser's telegrams to the ex-President have changed their tone.

* * * *

When actors agree it may seem carping to find fault with their arguments. But we must confess that the speeches at the Playgoers' Club the other night in favour of stage representation of Scriptural stories will hardly convince any but a postprandial audience. Mr. Martin Harvey was indignant because a play by the Rev. George Walters, of Sydney, dealing with Joseph of Canaan was not allowed on the English stage. "If one might represent the Jew of Malta, why not the Jew in 'Joseph?'" And Mr. Osman Edwardes called it the climax of absurdity that whilst Salomé was refused because it was adapted from a Scriptural source, Herod was allowed. But the vengeance of Barabas the Jew of Malta on the Christians, his enemies—the motif of Marlowe's play—has no connexion with the Bible, and there is, therefore, no parallel between the Jew of Malta and the "Jew in 'Joseph'"; and whilst in the Bible Herod is first of all a King, in Mr. Phillips' play he is first of all a lover—the lover of Marianne, a quite unscriptural person. The censor is hardly to be won over by these illogicalities. Moreover, we can hardly trust the stage to deal with such subjects. Supposing—and the case is a possible one—a manager's only aim is to make money by providing drama more sensational than any other manager, nothing would stop him from outraging our feelings by parodies, suited to his own idiosyncrasies, of anything that we hold sacred or beautiful.

* * * *

The Elizabethan Stage Society having recently, at any rate, given up the Elizabethan drama, their work is now taken up by Mr. Charles Fry, and taken up to very good effect. Mr. Fry follows Mr. Poel in dispensing with scenery, though he does not attempt to copy the Elizabethan form of theatre. His series of performances which ended last Saturday at St. George's-hall included Henry VIII., Twelfth Night, As You Like It, and, finally, Love's Labour Lost. The last was naturally the most interesting since the play is so very seldom acted nowadays. It provided a delightful afternoon's entertainment as a comedy full of charm and refined fun, and throwing light upon the youth of Shakespeare. We can see how the world struck the poet when he came to London, what his ideas of construction were, what his power of writing verse and drawing character. Mr. Benson, by the way, might find in Mr. Fry's company some promising recruits. With enthusiasm such as Mr. Fry's and Mr. Benson's actors show, and with constant practice, a school of Shakespearean actors could speedily be trained.

* * * *

The first of the new series of "Dolly Dialogues" will not, we think, disappoint any of those who long since fell under the fascination of Dolly, Lady Micklehan. The charm of the dialogues was that the speakers did not, as in most dialogues, sit down and fire off epigrams at one another, but were perfectly natural, and yet humorous withal. And this may be said of the new dialogue, called "Ancient History." Here is a brilliant idea of Mr. Carter's which finds special favour in Dolly's eyes:—

"I always tell the truth now, except to the Dowager," said Dolly presently.

"It doesn't do to be Quixotic," I agreed. "Telling the truth to people who misunderstand you is really promoting falsehood, isn't it?"

"That's rather a good idea," said Dolly.

* * * *

In imitation of Mr. Sheldon, of Kansas, Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, is about to take charge, for a week, of our contemporary the Sun. The experiment will at least be interesting, and may revive discussions as to the possibility of a "Christian" daily paper. Some advocates of Christian journalism go a little far, it must be admitted, in desiring to suppress the sporting and dramatic intelligence because they disapprove of sport and the drama. By parity of reasoning they might conceive it to be their duty to suppress all accounts of the fighting in South Africa because they disapprove of the war; and the analogy indicates that a flaw lurks somewhere in their argument. We believe, however, that Dr. Parker's conception of Christian journalism is that it should ignore no topics, but treat them all in a Christian spirit, and make the teaching which may be extracted from them palatable by lightness of touch. We wish Dr. Parker every success in his enterprise.

* * * *

Monsieur Valfrey, who has just died, was one of the most deservedly distinguished members of the French Press, and obtained throughout Europe, under the nom de guerre of "Whist," a reputation for probity and moderation in his comments on foreign affairs. M. Valfrey was a Conservative and entered early upon the diplomatic career. If his party had remained in office, he might no doubt have died in harness as a representative of France at the Courts of Europe. But when the Conservatives were banished from power in 1878 he followed his friends into retirement, and, although he remained a member of the Commission of Archives at the Quai d'Orsay, his practical connexion with the French Foreign Office was thus for ever severed. In the old Conservative organ, the Moniteur Universel, he became one of the best known figures of the contemporary European Press. Afterwards he became the head of the Foreign department of the Figaro, and obtained for his signature "Whist" a renown which was the more noticeable as he had so few rivals in the Press of Paris. He was not a man of rancour, nor was he capable of venality. His knowledge of affairs preserved him from those rash appreciations which disfigure so often the comments of his colleagues. Honesty and reasonableness were his merits rather than any great perspicacity or insight. His death is, therefore, a real loss to French journalism, because they are few in the Paris Press who judge questions of foreign politics on their merits, without attempting to subserve some cause to which they or their journals are bound.

* * * *

A sad chapter in literary history closes with the death in Paris of Oscar Wilde. The "æsthetic movement" which he represented has—in so far as its less wholesome developments which were pilloried by Du Maurier, and of which we are now hearing

The echo in Patience, are concerned—passed away. For him it began at Oxford, and the undergraduates who "scotched" it were wiser than they knew. The Oxford Union refused a presentation copy of his poems for the library, and defeated a proposal to discontinue the society's subscription to Punch on account of Du Maurier's caricatures of the æsthetes. At Magdalen—the headquarters of æstheticism—the undergraduates put one of its disciples under the pump, and "ragged" the rooms of others, and pitched their blue china out of window. Next day all the æsthetes in Oxford had their hair cut, and put on stand-up collars.

* * * *

Evanescent also was the vogue for caustic paradox, in which, however, its chief exponent sometimes combined shrewdness with wit. When they enshrined literary judgments, as in the following instances, they at least arrested attention:—

The ancient historian gave us delightful fiction in the form of fact; the modern novelist presents us with dull facts under the guise of fiction.

M. Zola is determined to show that, if he has not got genius, he can at least be dull.

As one knows the poet by his fine music, so one can tell the liar by his rich rhythmic utterance.

The horses of Mr. William Black do not soar towards the sun. They merely frighten the sky at evening into violent chromolithographic effects. On seeing them approach the peasants take refuge in dialect.

Ah, Meredith! Who can define him? His style is chaos illumined by flashes of lightning. As a writer he has mastered everything except language; as a novelist he can do everything except tell a story; as an artist he is everything except articulate.

* * * *

These things have passed away; and yet, despite the black shadow which justice drew across the career of Oscar Wilde, it is difficult not to recall regretfully the high promise, in younger days, of the man who succeeded alike in poetry and in drama, in fairy tale and in novel; or the fine classical taste which could produce such a poem as the villanelle on Theocritus:—

O Singer of Persephone,
In the dim meadows desolate
Dost thou remember Sicily?

Still through the ivy flits the bee
Where Amaryllis lies in state,
O Singer of Persephone.

Simætha calls to Hecate,
And hears the wild dogs at the gate;
Dost thou remember Sicily?

Still by the light and laughing sea
Poor Polypheme bemoans his fate,
O Singer of Persephone.

And still in joyous rivalry
Young Daphnis challenges his mate,
Dost thou remember Sicily?

Slim Lacon keeps a goat for thee,
For thee the jocund shepherds wait;
O Singer of Persephone
Dost thou remember Sicily?

* * * *

The late Herr Tycho Mommsen, the brother of the historian, and from 1861 to 1885 the director of the gymnasium at Frankfort, made a reputation as a philologist by his translation of Pindar. But he was more widely known as one of the long list of German scholars who have helped us in our study of Shakespeare. Besides writing critical essays on the poet he did most useful work in publishing a reprint of the first quarto of Romeo and Juliet which differs so remarkably from the second quarto, the basis of our modern readings.

What may fairly be considered a new departure in illustrated journalism is to be found in the Christmas number of the Royal Magazine—viz., an article entitled "In the Footsteps of Barnaby Rudge," the pictures in which are editorially described as forming "the most remarkable series of photographs ever taken." The scenes are laid in Chigwell, the most prominent being the old "King's Head" Inn—the original of the "Maypole" in the story. Certain incidents relating to the "Maypole" are here pictorially rendered in realistic fashion, the personages being represented by Mr. Bransby Williams, who, attired in the correct costumes of the period, posed before the camera in the characters of "Maypole" Hugh, Sir John Chester, Joe Willett, Solomon Daisy, Lord George Gordon, Rudge, John Willett, and poor Barnaby himself. These illustrations, which are very successfully carried out, are by Mr. Frank Foulsham, who is also responsible for the letterpress.

* * * *

Dickens is also to the front in Harmsworth's Christmas number in an article by Mr. Walter Maclaren on "First Lines of Famous Books," illustrated by facsimiles of the manuscripts of some well-known authors. The few lines given from "Martin Chuzzlewit" and "Barnaby Rudge" are full of the corrections which are so numerous in some of Dickens' manuscripts. The specimen taken from Macaulay's early essay on Gladstone's "Church and State" is also black with revision. In contrast to these the opening lines given from "Adam Bede," "Childe Harold," "Lorna Doone," the extracts from "Kenilworth," "The Idylls of the King," and Charlotte Brontë's unpublished novel, "The Spell," are neatly written and with little alteration.

* * * *

Right-minded people will applaud Mrs. Severn's action in buying in Ruskin's juvenile work, "The Puppet Show," which it had been announced would be sold by auction by Messrs. Sotheby. Mrs. Severn, who, of course, is well-acquainted with Ruskin's private feelings and scruples in matters of this kind, is sure that in thus anticipating the public sale and rescuing this early work for preservation with other Juvenilia at Brantwood she is acting in accordance with what would have been Ruskin's own wishes.

* * * *

With the end of the year Mr. G. S. Street ends his causeries in the Pall Mall Magazine. Many readers will miss them, for they have been bright and entertaining. His last shaft, àpropos of Mr. Gilbert Parker's election to Parliament, is an expression of opinion that the political is more pleasant than the literary life. Mr. Street would rather sit in the Cabinet than have his books consistently praised by those who sit in judgment upon novelists. Many popular literary men have felt the same thing, just as many popular politicians, from Fox downwards, have wished that they could withdraw from public life and live in their libraries. But it is doubtful whether the man of action and the man of letters would really be so happy if they changed places as they sometimes fancy. Gladstone was always retiring to a library, but he never stayed there long, and when he returned to public life he was as exuberant as a child let out to play. And, on the other hand—if one may invert the application of a well-known saying—while Gray may at certain moments have thought that he would rather storm the heights of Abraham than write elegies in country churchyards, one can also picture the consternation that would have overtaken him had he actually been ordered to burn his elegies and go and take Quebec.

* * * *

Mr. Francis Griffiths, of 135, Strand, is bringing out a new "progressive" monthly to be called the Twentieth Century. What will Mr. Knowles do, we wonder? After all, titles do not mean much. As one morning paper points out, we already have a Fortnightly published monthly; and we might put up with a Nineteenth Century published in the twentieth. It would in time become a mark, at any rate, of venerable age.

Purchasers of the original and more expensive edition of Stevenson's Letters may be somewhat chagrined by Messrs. Methuen's announcement that the new cheaper edition is to contain additional letters, including letters addressed to Mr. Meredith and Mr. Kipling. Do the additions include the letter from Alan Breck to Terence Mulvaney which Mr. Cope Cornford printed in his little book on Stevenson? Perhaps the publishers might see their way to print off an appendix of the hitherto unpublished letters to be procurable by possessors of the earlier edition. The publishers of Mr. J. H. Bridges' "Opus Majus" of Roger Bacon—Messrs. Williams and Norgate—recently issued a supplementary volume which may be had free of cost by purchasers of the original work.

* * * *

In the article, "An Academy of the Dead," in the current Monthly Review, Mr. William Archer allows himself to fall into one noticeable little blunder (apart from the inevitable little "g" in FitzGerald). He is enumerating the names of those eminent writers and artists who within the past half-century have not been buried in Westminster Abbey, and coming to George Eliot he observes:—

> It may almost be called a scandal that her resting-place should be hidden in the crowded purlieus of Kensal-green, even though she have Thackeray to keep her company.

By any one not acquainted with Mr. Archer this conjunction of the two names might almost be taken to imply that he did not know that George Eliot lies in the less crowded and far less dismal cemetery at Highgate.

* * * *

A writer in the Standard under the name of "Bill Sikes" complains of the irreverent use of his patronym, and one cannot help feeling some sympathy with him. The ancient family of Sykes, or Sikes, is, as he says, "a large and most respectable one." It was probably, however, not mere chance which made Dickens light on the name, for there was an historical housebreaker who bore it, and was a contemporary of the immortal Jack Sheppard.

* * * *

D'Annunzio, it is understood, has nearly completed his tragedy Francesca da Rimini; the title-rôle of which he has written especially for Signora Duse. His next novel "Trionfa dell' Nomo" is to be devoted to an exposition of the points of antagonism between the Latin and the Teutonic character. It has been arranged between D'Annunzio and Karl Skraup, late manager of the Zurich Stadt-Theater, that a German company shall tour for three years with Città Morta, Gloria, and Francesca da Rimini, playing these three plays only. At the same time this indefatigable author is writing two other dramas with a view to exploiting the histrionic talent of the Italian baritone opera singer, Leone Fumagalli, who has made his farewell appearance at the age of 35 as a singer at Strasburg, and has resolved, under D'Annunzio's encouragement, to adopt the career of an actor. D'Annunzio's last novel has made him more popular than ever in German literary circles, owing to the long eulogies in it of Wagner and Lenbach; and his professed discipleship of Nietzsche has won him many admirers in Germany, where his earlier novels appeared in translations long before they were known here. Some German critics doubt his good taste, but what can be said of the Munich publishers, who advertise Il Fuoco as "the stirring love-tragedy of the two most eminent living Italians, 'Gabriele d'Annunzio and Eleanora Duse'"?

Rome has now a theatre worthy to rank with those of other European capitals. All the élite of Roman society were present recently at the opening of the "Casa di Goldoni," which owes its existence entirely to the efforts of the great actor Ermet Novelli. Carrera's Last Days of Goldoni and the Venetian dramatist's own Barbero Benefico were the pieces chosen to inaugurate the new theatre. Novelli appeared before the curtain at the close and made a speech in which he said Goldoni, "the immortal father of Italian comedy," had died abroad in penury without a roof to cover his head. It had been his ambition, now fulfilled, to give him at least a home after his death befitting his genius.

The experiment of introducing on the stage at Munich the figure of Schopenhauer as the young firebrand of the Weimar society of his day appears to have been an interesting failure. The play in which he appeared was by Helene Böhlau, the German novelist whose book "Halbthier" created a sensation last year. She is a native of Weimar, who has lately married Ali Raschid Bey, a Mahomedan Turk, and resides in Constantinople.

During the last thirty years Mexico has been in possession of a flourishing national literature. The period of peace that followed the fall of the Empire produced a "pleiades of poets"—for it is almost easier to write verse than prose in Spanish, the rhythm of the idiom and the construction of sentences lending themselves so happily to poetic handling. Love of nature, woman, and fatherland is the eternal theme of Mexican poetry. Lyrics both patriotic and amatory abound, but the conte and the novel have also a vogue. Justo Sierra and Pedro Castera are the present favourite writers of fiction. Absolute freedom of the Press and innumerable newspapers help to circulate in Mexico all that is freshest and most modern in European thought.

Women have taken to artistic book-binding with remarkable aptitude. Although their aspirations in this direction did not take much definite shape until the Hampstead Bindery and the Guild of Women Binders were founded, two and a-half years ago, they have already made their influence felt. Flushed with their success at the Paris Exhibition, where they won the silver medal, they have sent a hundred volumes to Sotheby's for sale on Monday next. The Hampstead Bindery and the Women's Guild are for all practical purposes one establishment, the distinction being that the work of the Hampstead Bindery is done by men—who also give lessons to pupils of the Guild—while the work of the Guild is done exclusively by women, from the stitching of the book to the preparation and decoration of the cover. The advantage which the girls and women have over the men (apart from the fact that they belong to a higher social grade) is that they have all passed through schools of art and can work from their own designs. Their headquarters are pleasantly situated at Hampstead, their studio almost overlooking Keats' garden. The Endymion edition of Keats' poems, by the way, is among the books now offered for sale, bound in dark green morocco, covered with a gold-tooled design containing sixty-eight inlaid blind-tooled roses, in two shades of crimson, and fawn-coloured morocco doublure, tooled with the "Hampstead" lily. A special design is made for every volume, the only instance of duplication in the collection at Sotheby's being a replica of the visitors' book bought by the Prince of Wales. The Queen, we understand, is also numbered among the purchasers of bindings executed by the Guild. Some of the most interesting work is seen in the "mediæval morocco bindings"—a revival of the monastic bindings of four hundred years ago, the difference being that instead of being stamped after the manner of the monks, the undressed leather is worked by the members of the Guild entirely by hand. The African bindings form another feature of the collection. The leather, a new morocco from the Niger territories, is dyed by the natives with the bark of trees, a very beautiful Venetian-red colour being obtained without the destructive aid of sulphuric acid. The gilt tooling is also particularly fine, the process having been acquired by the Guild from certain French binders, who alone, so it is said, possessed the secret of doing work of this kind.

The Teaching of Journalism.

At irregular, but not infrequent, intervals the question is raised—"Can the art of literature and the business of journalism be taught?" It is a question which derives a certain topical interest from the death of Mr. David Anderson, the founder of the "School of Journalism," to which we referred the other day; but it can hardly be said that the fortunes of that academy finally solved the problem. The School closed its doors not because it had failed—for it could show results—but because the journalist who had originated it found it more profitable to retire from the enterprise and resume a lucrative position on a daily paper; and no successor of equal rank in the newspaper world has attempted the task which he abandoned. The question, therefore, remains whether it is not possible and desirable to discover some means of offering adequate practical training to young men who aspire to earn their livings with their pens. So far as the art of literature is concerned it certainly seems strange that literature should be the only art for the teaching of which no proper machinery is provided. A professor of painting teaches his pupils to paint, and a professor of music teaches his pupils to perform specific tunes upon specific instruments. On the other hand, a professor of poetry does not teach poetical composition, but gives critical addresses on English classics; and a professor of English literature is satisfied if those who follow his courses can read Beowulf with their feet in the fender, and descant upon Tennyson's indebtedness to Virgil and Apollonius Rhodius. Yet one knows that more than that is possible, seeing that Flaubert notoriously trained Guy de Maupassant, and that the elder Dumas directed the profitable labours of a whole army of feuilletonists. Possibly, however, the practice of literature as an art calls for such special aptitudes that these notable examples cannot be regarded as proving any general rule. Let us allow that it does. Yet why is there not some proper machinery for providing instruction in the business of journalism? It can by no means be said that the journalist is born not made. Journalism is successfully practised by hundreds of men who are very far from being men of genius. In the main it is not a matter of doing anything particularly difficult, but of knowing what is the right thing to do, and what is the proper way of doing it. To the practised writer, for instance, it is much easier to write a "par" than it would be to pack up half a dozen books of different shapes and sizes in a neat brown-paper parcel. His "par" serves its purpose; but it is not a work of genius, it is a work of journalism. Any reasonably smart young man might write it if he knew how, and get paid for it if he grasped the fact that it was the sort of note that suited the journal he was writing for; if, for instance, he did not write for Literature what would be more suitable for the Sporting Times. It seems to follow that the trick of journalism is a thing that a journalist can teach to another man who wants to be a journalist. In fact it often is so taught in an informal way, not for money, but from motives of private friendship. On this subject an ounce of fact is worth a pound of theory. We ourselves have known a case of private training in which without using any influence with editors, or giving any introductions, a journalist showed an old college friend who had failed in another walk in life how it would be possible for him to make money by writing for the papers; and that college friend, who was not particularly brilliant, and who, left to himself, would never have known how to begin, quickly proceeded to earn a modest and irregular income which averaged about £2 a week. Now £2 a week would have been about that young man's market value if he had paid a premium and articled himself, for three years, to a firm of solicitors. And this word "articled" brings us to the root of the matter, and perhaps to the solution of the difficulty. A school of journalism will always be hard to find, because all the men who are capable of presiding over such a school are already profitably occupied, and hesitate to abandon a certain for a speculative income. On the other hand, there must be many journalists who would be able and willing to take articled pupils who would pay them fees and to whom in return they would give the benefits of their guidance for an agreed period. It seems as well worth while to pay a premium for learning journalism as for learning, say, the tea trade, and more worth while to pay that fee to an unattached journalist of eminence than to one of those editors of obscure provincial papers who alone, so far as we know, take articled pupils at the present time. This, at all events, is a suggestion which seems worth making.

Personal Views.

THE STEVENSON SPIRIT TO-DAY.

The fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Robert Louis Stevenson has just gone by. To Stevenson himself, wrapped in the indifference of death these five years, the circumstance is of no account; but in his short life he bequeathed so much of himself to his fellows that for many of them the event is one of almost personal significance.

Stevenson's appeal was made to a generation which can hardly yet be said to have "risen." There was, doubtless, much that was immature about the work he left us. He was still a young man when he died; and it cannot be expected of young men, particularly of one whose later life was passed in circumstances so fantastically out of the common, that they should exert any powerful influence over men of mature years and experience. Stevenson was essentially the young men's prophet. He not only spoke their thoughts and realized their ideals, but he lived the life they would have lived had they been free from the chafing restrictions of modern times. He wandered in his person over seas and into lands where they could only wander in their dreams; but, though a common temperament identified his readers with himself, he possessed that loftiness of soul that exalts a man from the familiar level of a comrade to the status of a leader. A comparison with Byron is impossible in many respects; but the hold he obtained upon his following was due to a remarkably similar picturesqueness of personality. Both men attained to a rare intimacy of communion with nature, into which their readers, through their work, were enabled to struggle for a few brief moments at a time; although, of course, the manner in which each man attained to that height, and the point of view to which each introduced his readers, differed most materially.

In one very important respect the generation to which Stevenson addressed himself differed from all preceding generations of Englishmen. It was the first—of a great many to come, as it seems to me—that framed its religion upon its contemporary Press rather than upon its contemporary pulpit. We are a religious people, and the time is yet far distant when our main inspiration as a nation will cease to be derived primarily from religion. France is suckled upon art, and has a pretty talent for caricaturing us as a nation of hypocrites—a gibe at which, it seems to me, we wince too much, for we should know that what appears to our neighbours as hypocrisy is but the assertion of a higher ideal than we have managed to realize. But the pulpit has lost touch with the nation to an appalling extent; it has lagged far in the rear of our intellectual advance, and we have been driven for our spiritual food chiefly to the novel and the drama. The descendants of the followers of Wesley, Calvin, Knox, Spurgeon, and other Church leaders, have become Meredithians, Ibsenites, Emersonians, Hardyites, Kailyarders, Stevensonians—yes, and Corellians! The responsibility thrust upon our novelists—leaving the dramatists out of the question—who find themselves face to face with a demand to stand and deliver their souls to the publishers that they may be ransacked for their opinions and philosophies, is grave indeed; but, fortunately, they are men in whom we may see such responsibilities vested without undue trepidation—even with hope.

It is interesting, then, to speculate how far Stevenson's message—if a word that has fallen into considerable disrepute of late may be thus applied—has been received into the character and philosophy of the nation. As I have suggested, the generation that listened to Stevenson has not yet "risen," but we are at least on the eve of its day, and what deductions this article may help us to draw will speedily be put to the test. Frankly, it appears to me incredible that such a message should miss its mark. The fact that it appealed to a (comparatively) few is rather in its favour than otherwise, for, by eluding the encumbrance of a vulgar popularity, it went straight to the hearts of its chosen recipients, unembarrassed by any cloud of popular misconception. It was easy to be enamoured of the romance and humour with which Stevenson clothed it, but it needed an eye of peculiar clearness to penetrate beneath the exquisite trappings, and recognize the beautiful soul which illumined the mere form, and which, once recognized, added significance to the whole.

What, then, is the Stevensonian's profit of his Stevensonianism? I should define it pre-eminently as a brave heart. He may bring away from the study of Stevenson many other things; but if its primary effect be not to make him show a braver front to the world, to bear a sturdy part in the battle of life, and to face whatever lot may be his with zest, he has read Stevenson in vain. The cheery optimist of the ordinary type, is a somewhat irritating personage whose optimism comes of a mind too superficial to comprehend the gravities of life. Blind men don't fear ghosts. But the man whose outlook upon life is clear, and who can see black as well as white, has a title to preach hope and courage if his convictions so instruct him; and your Stevensonian is precisely that type of optimist. How can he help it, having learnt it from a man who preached faith and courage, and the joy of life, while constantly tethered to a sick bed? "The true conclusion of this paper," said he, in the second part of his "Virginibus Puerisque" (and we might justly add—the true conclusion of all Stevenson's work), "is to turn our back on apprehensions, and embrace that shining and courageous virtue, Faith. Hope is the boy, a blind, headlong, pleasant fellow, good to chase swallows with the salt; Faith is the grave, experienced, yet smiling man. Hope lives on ignorance; open-eyed Faith is built upon a knowledge of our life, of the tyranny of circumstance and the frailty of human resolution. . . . In the one temper, a man is indignant that he cannot spring up in a clap to heights of elegance and virtue; in the other, out of a sense of his infirmities, he is filled with confidence because a year has come and gone, and he has still preserved some rags of honour."

That is a noble philosophy, finely stated; and it is, moreover, a valuable pronouncement, because it typifies, with absolute justice, the whole spirit of his work. It is so obviously his personal ideal; and not only gives us the key to his own heroic bearing towards a tragically adverse fate, but explains the warm-hearted charity with which he viewed the whole compass of human nature. He had a supreme faith not only in himself, but in his fellow men, and desired you to learn that "you yourself are composed of infirmities . . . yet you have a something in you lovable and worth preserving; and that while the mass of mankind lies under this scurvy condemnation, you will scarce find one but, by some generous reading, will become to you a lesson, a model. . . . So thinking, you will constantly support your own imperfections, and easily forgive the failings of your friend."

The disciple of Stevenson is thus bidden to look upon a lovable world, and, while not blind to its drawbacks, to regard them as of little account in proportion to its excellencies. Stevenson's fiction abounds with rogues, yet, by virtue of his "generous reading" of their poor rogueries, we "can scarce find one but becomes to us a lesson, a model," though all the time their portrayal carries with it no sense of special pleading on the part of their creator, so skilfully does he beguile us to his own indulgent standpoint. We view Long John Silver, the Cockney Clerk of "The Ebb-Tide," Herrick, Captain Nares, Harry D. Bellairs, the men who fought the duel with the scissors in "St. Ives," Jim Pinkerton, and the rest, not so much as men who played an evil part in a history, as men with our own faults and vices driven to extremes by stress of circumstances. We are not called upon to sit in judgment on so many criminals whom the author has dumped in the dock; we are, rather, by the recognition of so much of ourselves in them, brought to a sense that we all stand in the dock before God's justice together, in which position of humility Stevenson heartens us to believe that the mercy of God will cover even such a row of world-stained reprobates as we find ourselves in line with.

HORACE THOROGOOD.

SCANDINAVIAN EPIC.—THE STORY OF BURNT NJAL.

When Gunnar of Lithend disregarded the doom foretold by Njal of Bergthorsknoll and turned back from the voyage that should have ensured to him long life and an old age of honour, it is told in the saga how Gunnar's brother Kolskegg took ship and fared away, knowing that he should never return to Iceland; how a dream came to him in Denmark telling him he must become God's knight; how he was baptised, fared thence out to Micklegarth, and then took service with the Emperor; and the last that was heard of him was that he wedded a wife there and was captain over the Varangians.

It is only by such slight links as this, which connect the outlying Scandinavian islands with the main course of European history that we realize our time-distance from the events of the Njals Saga. But the true distance is not one of time; Njal and Gunnar, Flosi and Skarphedinn are contemporaries with Ajax and Ulysses, or with the sheikhs who to-day defy the rule of Morocco in the country of Sus, or cut off French detachments in the Sahara. The Tuaregs have their saga singers, according to M. Hourst; in Abyssinia there exists a system of atonement by blood fine for slaying not unlike that which provides half the matter for the Icelandic stories. And it is pretty clear that we should be no more likely to look to Abyssinia or to Timbuctoo for our literature than to Iceland, were it not that the Scandinavian genius compelled a hearing. Mr. Ker in his work on Epic and Romance has praised the prose epics of the North as they deserve, and there are few books for which one should be more grateful than for the admirable reprint of Sir George Dasent's version of "Burnt Njal" (Grant Richards, 6s.). The work has hitherto only been accessible in the two-volume edition; here it is conveniently packed in one, only so much being preserved of the introduction as is necessary to explain the Icelandic customs. But indeed the saga explains these to any reader of intelligence. You have a people, turbulent indeed, yet theoretically law-abiding, and at all events passionately concerned about the forms of law. Moreover, Gunnar, the Achilles of Iceland in his day, is no Achilles in temper, but a man slow to wrath and no delighter in bloodshed; terrible in defence rather than in attack; while Njal, the man of good counsel, loses no honour because he takes no life, and has power enough to be potent in the bringing in of Christianity. The friendship between Gunnar and Njal is one of the finest things in literature; women's spite may breed bloodshed between the houses, women's tongues may be bitterly at work, but the men never for an instant impair the dignity of that deep and loyal trust. These two main figures stand out, unaccented in the drawing, real, yet presented in somewhat ideal outline as two standards of manly perfection—the fighter and the counsellor. But beside these a whole throng is suggested, each with a few masterful touches—even to bodily details. Who that has read it can forget the picture of Skarphedinn as he comes for the last time to the Althing, and each who sees him asks the name of that sharp-featured, fierce, unlucky-looking man. Throughout the whole you have an art not less matured than the art of Homer—an art that always concentrates on the telling trait. Never was dialogue more terse, more poignant, than the few words exchanged when Njal and Bergthora are summoned to parley with the burners at the door of the blazing house, and leave is offered them to depart.

"I will not go out," said Njal, "for I am an old man and little fitted to avenge my sons, but I will not live in shame."

Then Flosi said to Bergthora:—

"Come thou out, housewife, for I will for no sake burn thee indoors."

"I was given away to Njal young," said Bergthora, "and I have promised him that we would both share the same fate."

After that they both went back into the house.

"What counsel shall we now take?" said Bergthora.

"We will go to our bed," says Njal, "and lay us down; I have long been eager for rest."

Again, in the other great scene of Gunnar's death-fight, when we have forgotten all but the struggle, the fighter turns to his wife Hallgerda, and bids her take two locks of her long hair and twist them—his mother helping—into a bowstring.

"Does aught lie on it?" she says—and instantly other thoughts than those of the combat rise up—we see, not Gunnar only, but the menacing sinister face of the long-minded woman, cause of so many manslayings.

"My life lies on it," he said, "for they will never come to close quarters with me if I can keep them off with my bow."

"Well," she says, "now I will call to thy mind that slap on the face which thou gavest me, and I care never a whit whether thou holdest out a long while or a short."

The trait is true yet unexpected, dramatic in the highest kind. And Gunnar's answer when he has sung his stave is not less terse and pregnant. "Every one has something to boast of," says Gunnar, "and I will ask thee no more for this."

It is extraordinary what a contrast presents itself between the naked directness of the Scandinavian prose and the extravagant though truculent imagery of the verse; where nothing is said plainly, nothing is called by its own name; where gold is "Frodi's flour," or "the sea's bright sunbeams," ships are "skates that skim the sea-belt," and a woman is "Snakeland's stem." That is the difference between the Scandinavian and the Celtic work of that same period; the Celt was everywhere redundant, the Scandinavian only in song. And yet if you take both at their best, and set the burning of Njal's house against the fight in the House of the Red Branch, where the three sons of Usna defended themselves and Deirdre against the host of Concobar, it is hard to know where to assign superiority. But neither should be unknown to any one who professes to study literature.

FRENCH COURT COOKERY.

Long ago, soon after the Revolution, some exiles of an old and noble family returned to France, and were able to recover part of their property. They were not rich: the old château needed serious repairs; and they set up their household in a quiet and simple style far from former grandeurs. The Marquise was inquiring for a cook. One day an old man presented himself, shabby in appearance, but his dignified manner suggested a chef of the most distinguished. Quite impossible, the lady at once declared. In such times she could afford nothing better than an humble woman cook. But the old man was not to be discouraged. He had been cook to Madame du Barry, perhaps 30 years before; his brain had devised suppers for Louis Quinze. He offered himself to Madame la Marquise, and would rather serve her without wages than resign himself to an ordinary situation.

This is a true story, told to me many years ago, and I was reminded of it the other day, when chance brought into my hands four volumes in the most charming old French binding, published by Guillyn of Paris in the year 1755, avec approbation et privilege du Roi:—

"Les Soupers de la Cour, ou l'Art de Travailler toutes sortes d'Alimens, pour servir les meilleures Tables, suivant les quatre Saisons."

The author or compiler of this wonderful cookery book remains in the dark; it may have been Monsieur Pierre Guillyn himself, at the sign of the Lys d'Or on the Quai des Augustins. In the privilège, which gives him six years' copyright and commands that the MS. of the book shall be copied and placed in several public libraries, no name but his own appears; and the preface, evidently written by himself, seems to indicate that he was first an artist in cookery, then in bookselling. The book is meant, he says, for those officiers de cuisine who are amateurs de leur art. Not for those ignoramuses of narrow mind and mediocre knowledge who scorn to be taught, and who even carry absurdity to such a point that they blush to be seen reading a cookery book. Imagine, he says, a doctor, a lawyer, an architect, who is ashamed to read works on the special subject of his profession.

Theory and Practice—the Art of Cookery, says M. Guillyn, like other arts, includes both. Even a cook with genius and imagination cannot do without study. The work of the hands, manipulation—if M. Guillyn may be permitted to use the term—is of course most necessary in le laboratoire d'un officier de cuisine; and he confesses that this cannot be learnt from books; but yet practice and theory are inseparable. A good artist should understand chemistry; he will then make wiser and happier combinations, and will add harmony and delicacy to his dishes. Health and taste will profit alike by his studies in salts and savours, by the fine touch and finish of his works of art.

With such a solemn grace does M. Guillyn introduce his subject. He then proceeds to the four seasons, and becomes a little sad and poetical. From the point of view of an officier de cuisine, spring is not very satisfactory. She is deceptive. She gives us hopes and promises, but does not fulfil them. She is poor in poultry, in game, in fruit, in vegetables. All meat, except beef, is less good than usual. However—he seems to shrug his shoulders and smile—there is always bread, and of seven or eight different kinds; there is always wine, l'âme du repas, la source de la joie quand on en use avec modération; and he gives a list of the best wines of the day. Then he goes on to encourage his readers; and after all, when he has finished his spring lists of meat, poultry, ducks, pigeons, river and sea fish, early vegetables, late apples and pears, possible early strawberries and raspberries—for he includes May in spring—we feel that under the care of such officers of the kitchen Louis Quinze and his Court had no need to dread the early months of the year. Neither was summer a quite ideal season to the soul of the Parisian cook. Poultry of course and some small game; not much fish; the impossibility, in hot weather, of bringing the best mutton to Paris—a touch which makes one realize a good deal—fruits and vegetables of course in perfection. Autumn is the favourite time of the year. Then all sorts of provisions flow into Paris from the most distant provinces; game of every kind abounds; the fruits and vegetables of summer linger on, and there are various cheeses, a great delicacy, especially those of Brie. In winter the provinces send a variety of pies, hams, tongues, and sausages; there is plenty of meat and game; there are preserved vegetables and sweetmeats and confitures of every description.

M. Guillyn proceeds to give about fifty pages of menus, both gras and maigres. A maigre supper must have been a comfortable repast, making the best of both worlds. Louis Quinze and Madame de Pompadour, who was actually reigning when this book came out, no doubt kept maigre religiously; and certainly the rest of the Court did. One of these menus for twenty-seven people includes five courses and seventy dishes. And we may trust the genius of M. Guillyn to see that these dishes had variety. For curious combinations of fish, eggs, and vegetables, such a menu is worth study.

Greater oddities still are to be found when the artist-cook devotes himself to a supper all of the same material. One may, he says—supplies being capricious and uncertain, even at Court in 1755—find one's self with a good deal of the same thing on hand. In this case the great thing is to please the eye; it is easy to arrange a variety of seasonings. So we have five courses and twenty-two dishes of beef; the same of veal, of mutton, of pork. More difficult, perhaps, a supper entirely of eggs, of which he gives twenty-nine varieties. It is the joy of the painter with his harmony in red or blue, of the poet with his perfectly constructed sonnet.

The rest of the four volumes is full of minute directions how to cook the many wonderful dishes to be found in the menus. From broths and soups to ratafias and chocolate and preserved fruits, nothing is left out. The very names of the dishes have a certain romance and originality. You may have potage à la Mousquetaire, à la Marquise, à la Rhinocéros, sauce au Pontife, au Révérend; veal cutlets à la mariée, mutton cutlets sans malice, and so on. One suspects that of some of the many dishes the name is the best part, and now and then one comes across something really horrible, such as a pie in which young pigeons lie side by side with alouettes, rouges-gorges, toutes sortes de petits oiseaux. If

> A robin redbreast in a cage
> Puts all Heaven in a rage, what can be the celestial view of a robin redbreast in a pie!

But this kind of sentimentality is English, and would not have troubled M. Pierre Guillyn, King Louis Quinze, Madame de Pompadour, Madame du Barry, or that dignified old officer of hers who could not resign himself to an ordinary or inferior situation.

A STUDY OF MILTON.

MILTON. By WALTER RALEIGH. (Edward Arnold, 6s.)

Pure criticism is a form of literature which seems to offer so few attractions to the younger generation of writers that a work so conscientious and intelligent as this of Mr. Raleigh's invites particular attention. For while there has never been a time in which so much was written about literature, it is becoming more and more the fashion to write of it and regard it from the outside; so that, in our interest in the literary man, we are in danger of losing appreciation of the literary art by which alone the artist presents subject for controversy or curiosity. The multiplication of biographies, and the persistent recurrence of personalia in the columns of literary gossip, are things harmless enough in themselves, and indeed often illuminative and of value to criticism; but when they are allowed to overrun the field of critical discussion, and to obscure the work in a jungle of facts pertaining to the worker, they constitute a grave menace to the sense of literary proportion and literary aim. It is, therefore, an encouraging augury for the preservation of the literary spirit that a critic should be seen working so patiently and wisely as Mr. Raleigh in the succession of thoughtful and suggestive volumes which he has already given us. For his concern is entirely with the criticism of pure literature; and when, as in the case of this study of Milton, he has to use biographical data to clear the ground, he is careful to employ only such material as is essential to the task. He tells us so much of the man as is necessary to an understanding of the man's work, and his inquiry is free alike from "chatter" and impertinence. It is conducted with the best traditions of criticism before its eyes, soberly, thoroughly, and with judgment. It is a self-respecting and deliberate piece of work, and it demands respectful and deliberate consideration.

This being so, it would be pleasant to dismiss the book with unaffected praise, if to do so were not to be unjust to the very traditions which Mr. Raleigh himself essays to preserve. But those austere traditions, always difficult to follow, are becoming yearly more difficult in the passion for effective writing, for display of intellect, and for the reputation of wit; and, if we were to pretend that Mr. Raleigh is uniformly successful in avoiding dangers, we should do scant justice to the height and integrity of his aim. In point of fact, the blemishes of his work are the natural outcome of a severe effort to avoid dull and commonplace effects; they are nowhere faults of carelessness or conventionality. A University professor, to be sure, should not talk about "The Book of Revelations," which is a vulgarism; but such a slip is isolated. The chief fault of Mr. Raleigh's workmanship lies at the other pole, and consists in too much striving after effect, in too persistent an effort at phrase-making, and in a consequent dislocation of style and want of harmony in manner. Mr. Raleigh has, indeed, written a clever essay on "Style" (in which he leads off with the phrase "time and again"), without maturing or harmonizing his own; and his workmanship is occasionally marred by abrupt changes of note and manner which are often disconcerting and vexatious. Here, for instance, is one manner, familiar to every student of criticism. "I have tried to understand Milton; and have already praised him as well as I know how, with no unstinted admiration, I trust, and certainly with no merely superstitious reverence. If I must round my discourse by repeating something that I have already said or suggested, it shall be this—that, as he stands aloof from his contemporaries, so in the succession of great figures that mark for us the centuries of a literature he is seen once more singular and a stranger." This is the Arnold manner, pure and simple; and an excellent imitation of a highly individualized style. But Mr. Raleigh's style is by no means modelled on Arnold as a whole, and it has passages which Arnold would have read with amusement and deprecation. "In one sense, of course, and that not the least important, the great works of Milton were the products of the history and literatures of the world. Cycles ferried his cradle. Generations guided him. All forces were steadily employed to complete him." The idea which these sentences seek to convey is indisputable, but the language is tortured beyond all decent moderation. "Cycles ferried his cradle" is a violent attempt at expressing a simple thought in a complex manner, and it ends in expressing nothing at all.

The same straining after originality leads Mr. Raleigh to frequent illustrations, far sought and over-ingenious, which, seeking to arrest the attention, do so merely by a sense of incongruity. Thus, when speaking of the sententiousness of Milton's Adam, Mr. Raleigh points the moral with an instance. "He (the poet) even goes so far as to make Satan afraid of Adam, of his heroic build and intellectual power. This last, it might be said, is a fear not explained by anything we are privileged to hear from the lips of Adam himself; but, perhaps, in the case of our great ancestor, we shall do well to remember Hamlet's advice to the players, 'Follow that lord, and look you mock him not.'" Now, to illustrate Adam by Polonius is a violence to Milton's dignity, and the illustration has the further disadvantage of being entirely "out of the picture." It offends the taste, and adds nothing to the imagination. A few pages further on we find a similar example. "It is a great loss to literature that Mrs. Millamant, the delightful heroine of Congreve's comedy, was no reader of Milton. Her favourite author was Suckling. . . . If she had a copy of the Paradise Regained, doubtless it stood in some conspicuous place, and was never opened," and so forth. This is incongruous frivolity, and it spoils a fine passage of criticism. And once again (to have done with instances), when treating of the question of plagiarism:—"If the original genius of a poet is to be sworn away at this rate, there will soon come a time when no man is secure. Any one who confesses to 'considerable difficulty' in getting upstairs might hereafter be accused of plagiarism if it should be found that a Latinist of repute has stated that 'the difficulties of translating Persius are considerable.'" This is, we take it, one of the feeblest and most pointless illustrations ever offered by a responsible critic. It is incredible that Mr. Raleigh should have let it pass in proof. We have, very reluctantly, pointed out the failings of the author's style, because they seem to us to illustrate a prevalent vice of modern writing, and to be of more than individual significance. There is so much weak and "sloppy" writing nowadays, that the temptations to the critic towards over-elaboration and violence of illustration are very insistent, and may well intrude themselves upon even the most conscientious workmanship. But the foundations of a sound style can never be laid till rubble of this sort is cleared away; and as long as reputed critics are content to say that "cycles ferried a poet's cradle," we cannot expect the herd of imitative and unintelligent writers to get clear of the violences against taste and sentiment which disfigure certain branches of "literary" journalism.

But even to remind Mr. Raleigh of the dangers of example is an ungrateful duty, since the standard of his general criticism makes for an appreciation of the highest qualities of literature and life. Apart from these passing aberrations of taste—many of which are, indeed, due to what Arnold called "the isolated position of the critics in this country"—apart from these, his study of Milton is marked by sensitive and supple judgment, and by an uncommon sense of poetic workmanship no less than of poetic imagination. His analyses of the scheme, actors, and epic harmony of Paradise Lost are full of luminous and original observations, and the chapter which deals with the metre and diction of the poem shows that Mr. Raleigh's appreciation of style in others is, at any rate, irreproachable. His consideration of the development and decay of blank verse in England is full of acute remarks, and contains in brief space the fruitful result of considerable observation and reflection. Excellent, too, is his dissection of the Miltonian method:—

> In a long poem variety is indispensable, and he preserved the utmost freedom in some respects. He continually varies the stresses in the line, their number, their weight, and their incidence, letting them fall, when it pleases his ear, on the odd as well as on the even syllables of the line. The pause or cæsura he permits to fall at any place in the line, usually towards the middle, but, on occasion, even after the first or ninth syllables. His chief study, it will be found, is to vary the word in relation to the foot, and the sentence in relation to the line. No other metre allows of anything like the variety of blank verse in this regard, and no other metrist makes so splendid a use of its freedom. He never forgets the pattern; yet he never stoops to teach it by the repetition of a monotonous tattoo. Hence there are, perhaps, fewer one-line quotations to be found in the works of Milton than in the works of any other master of blank verse. De Quincey speaks of the "slow planetary wheelings" of Milton's verse, and the metaphor is a happy one; the verse revolves on its axis at every line, but it always has another motion, and is related to a more distant centre.

This is admirable metrical criticism, and it is prolonged through several pages of suggestive comparison of the qualities of Miltonian blank verse with those of the Elizabethans, of the metaphysical poets, and with the fluent line of Tennyson's Arthurian idylls.

And to see Mr. Raleigh's style at its best, we must take it where it rises to its subject, as in the eloquent peroration to the volume. Here it is entirely free from eccentricities, and is marked by melody, warmth, and colour:—

> The wind bloweth where it listeth; the wandering fire of song touches the hearts and lips of whom it will. Milton built an altar in the name of the Lord, and he made a great trench about the altar, and he put the wood in order, and loaded the altar with rich exotic offerings, cassia and nard, odorous gums and balm, and fruit burnished with golden rind. But the fire from Heaven descended on the hastily piled altars of the sons of Belial, and left Milton's gorgeous altar cold. . . .
> We breed Shakespeare in our Midlands; he was nourished from the soil that still grows our daily bread. But Milton was an alien conqueror. The crowd of native-born Puritans, who sometimes (not without many searchings of heart and sharp misgivings) attempt to claim him for their leader, have no title in him. It is a proof of his dominating power, and no credit to their intelligence, that they accept him as their representative. His influence on the destinies and history of our literature might be compared to the achievement of Napoleon while he was winning the victories that changed the map of Europe. He could not change the character of a people, nor perpetuate his dynasty. But nothing is as it would have been without him. Our literature is as hospitable as the Hindoo pantheon; the great revolutionary has won a place even in our creed. And the writer has this advantage, at least, over the conqueror and legislator, that he has bequeathed to us not maps, nor laws, but poems, whose beauty, like the World's unwithered countenance, is bright as at the day of their creation.

This is a fine and stimulating passage. It contains a bold and arresting illustration, which, despite its unexpectedness, has nothing of violence or caprice, but, on the contrary, adds fuel to the train of thought. It is conceived throughout with insight, and expressed with dignity; in a word, it is in harmony with the best models of English prose. Of such a passage one may say, as Dr. Johnson said of Gray's "Elegy," that, had its author written always thus, "It had been vain to blame and useless to praise him."

MR. HARE'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

The reviewer who seeks to appraise justly the fourth, fifth, and sixth volumes of THE STORY OF MY LIFE, by Augustus J. C. Hare (George Allen, 31s. 6d.), must approach his task with diffidence. Mr. Hare does not love reviewers—he says so, frequently and with emphasis. He suggests that they are simply the vehicles of an editor's contumely, and he asserts that they read only the first chapter of a book and copy the sentiments and criticisms of the first "notice" that is published. Mr. Hare is an attractive writer, and we can only suppose that his readiness to accept this preposterous theory is to be accounted for by that credulity and that obvious lack of knowledge of the world which are noticeable here and there in his book. "The Story of My Life" (second series) fills 1,191 crown octavo pages, without counting the Index, and we can honestly assure Mr. Hare that we have read every one of them, and that we have read most of them with pleasure. The real blot on the book is not its length, but Mr. Hare's readiness to publish his grievances against individuals; and the asperity of some of his casual remarks, in the case of references to living persons, leads him into statements which no one ought to dream of putting into print. Every man is entitled to write what he chooses in his diary; but before he publishes his memoranda, which are necessarily based, to a great extent, upon hearsay, it is his duty to erase such passages as those we refer to. We refrain from illustrating our criticism because the worst of the remarks which incur it are in such bad taste that we ourselves should fall into Mr. Hare's error if we did so. As to minor lapses we may note that a duchess whom he met struck him as "hideous"; yet another great lady—always a living one—if we may believe an ill-natured story, polished off aspirants to her hand with a businesslike precision which is incredible; one of Mr. Hare's hosts is pilloried for not knowing how to treat a guest; he "does not much like" another family into whose house he goes; in yet another "the women are infinitely superior to the men"; a lady of his acquaintance has a "piteous little white-mouse aspect"; the life of a foreign Prince, who is carefully identified, "has an Eastern license"; another one is "quite hideous"; a third royal personage lady, of course—is "a fine piece of flesh," which is quite as offensive in Mr. Hare's Italian as in our English; the father of a living and distinguished politician and diplomatist could never be "persuaded to cleanliness"; at a house in which Mr. Hare stayed the servants were "arrogant and presumptuous." And even now the corpse of these offences remains unquoted. We do not suppose for a moment that Mr. Hare intended to be offensive—we are willing to believe it has never occurred to him that his remarks would, or could, cause pain or anger to the victims. He is intensely scornful of editors; but a very small allowance of editorial sagacity would have saved him from thus disfiguring his "Story." His other books prove that he is not naturally this kind of person, and he has himself only to blame if his disposition is misunderstood. Happily there is here very little of those family squabbles which left so unpleasant an impression in Mr. Hare's first three volumes. It is not malice, but self-consciousness and want of knowledge of the world which has caused him to set down particulars of his treatment by his earlier publishers, just as it is the lack of that general information about men and things that is often possessed by far inferior writers which has led him into many inaccuracies about places and persons. How pleasant a topographer Mr. Hare can be, if you do not need to be over-precise about facts, a dozen guide-books are at hand to show; but his account of Boscobel House, for instance, is a striking example of the vice of depending upon hearsay. There are six mistakes in half a page. "A Mr. Lawes" is Mr. Hare's way of referring to the greatest agricultural chemist of his time; he speaks of "Percy Fitzgerald, who wrote so many capital articles," when he means Edward Fitzgerald; Dr. Jessop becomes Dr. Jephson, and Miss Beatrice Harraden Miss Harynden. These are not slips of the pen—they result from sheer ignorance of contemporary life.

We have pointed out Mr. Hare's errors of taste and inaccuracies with reluctance; but their existence explains, to a great extent, why reviewers sometimes fall foul of his books. It is pleasanter to turn to what can be honestly praised. Some portion, no doubt, of these entertaining volumes is trivial; but, in the main, they form agreeable reading. Mr. Hare has seen more or less of a number of people worth knowing, from Don Francis d'Assisi—who, although a Roman Catholic, declaimed to him against the Confessional—to Lord Salisbury. As a diner-out and a visitor to country houses he is indefatigable, while as a collector of ghost stories he is unapproachable. We know no better budget of creepy legends about old families and old houses than he has here gathered together. These tales about spooks are all too long to quote; but the vampire story in the fourth volume, its habitat being Croglin Grange, in Cumberland, is the most blood-curdling thing of the kind that we remember. Nor are these narratives confined to hoary ghosts in panelled chambers. A lady, whose name Mr. Hare gives, vouches for having seen the apparition of Lady Augusta Stanley in Westminster Abbey. On the other hand, Dr. Jessop told Mr. Hare he had come to the conclusion that the famous ghost he saw in the library at Mannington Hall, the seat of the Earl of Orford, was an optical illusion. The possessor of these volumes will have no difficulty about making his friends' "flesh creep." The present and the distant past are often linked together by so few lives that it is always rash to express doubts about anecdotes of such matters; but the story the late Lord Redesdale told Mr. Hare is certainly startling. His father, Speaker Mitford, was acquainted with a man in Swaledale who as a child knew an ancient who, as a boy, was present at the battle of Flodden! Now Lord Redesdale died in 1886 and Flodden was fought in 1513. Thus, for this story to be probable, four lives would have to cover 373 years, or, say, 385 to allow for the youthful warrior being at least twelve years old when he first went campaigning. This gives nearly a century to each life which, although not absolutely impossible, is extremely unlikely. Nor are we helped by the assertion that Blevely, the man of Flodden, lived to 160—eight years longer than "Old Parr." Mr. Hare, however, is an admirable raconteur, and we can quite believe that his friends the duchesses are, as he engagingly admits, never satisfied unless he is telling them stories.

The book is by no means destitute of more serious matter. It would be valuable, if for nothing else, as showing how small is the part which what is called "smart society" really plays in contemporary life. The real "Society" of which Mr. Hare has so much that is pleasant to tell us is very different. Mr. Hare is a man of many friends, and his loyalty to them does not cease with their death—perhaps, indeed, he dwells over much upon the tearfulness of things. But there is a real charm in the tender melancholy of his reminiscences of the past which cannot but appeal to every reader of good feeling. It is therefore the more regrettable that Mr. Hare should have disfigured an otherwise most attractive book with numerous and conspicuous lapses from good taste.

Biography.

Zachary Macaulay was a great man though his fame has been overshadowed by his son's; but he was not the particular kind of great man about whom it is easy to write at length without wearying the reader. The LIFE AND LETTERS OF ZACHARY MACAULAY (Arnold, 18s.), which we owe to the piety of his granddaughter, Viscountess Knutsford, will hardly be read without fatigue even by the most whole-hearted admirers of the Clapham set which he adorned. The chief objection to it is that it is so much too long. We are given, for instance, pages after pages of the illustrious abolitionist's love letters. And such love letters! Let a passage be picked at random:—

> My dear Selina,—I owe you some account of the particular manner in which I spend my day. . . . After my devotions I read a passage in the original Greek Testament in order, comparing it, as far as I am able, with our translation and Doddridge's very excellent exposition. Having done this I consider it for a few minutes in a practical or devotional point of view, and perhaps put into words a few of those desires which the scope of the passage suggests. . . . I also make a point of employing ten to fifteen minutes in casting my eye over the passage which I am to read to my family, and considering whether there be anything peculiar in the state of any of them, or in the state of the place in general, which ought to be noticed in one's prayers.

In the history of love-making such a letter should certainly have its place as a type—but that is all. Lady Knutsford has printed far too many of them. Nor can it be said that Zachary Macaulay's voluminous correspondence with other people is very much more interesting, though there is occasionally something from or about his distinguished son which has the charm of being new and characteristic. This, for instance, is from Hannah More's report on Macaulay at the age of ten:—

> Since "Childe Hugh," a long poem on Hunt's election, really a good parody, has been shown us, I have discovered in the writing-box an Epithalamium of many folio pages on Mr. Spragge's marriage. I do compel him to read two or three scenes of Metastasio every day, and he seems to like it.

Macaulay's first letter home from Cambridge, too, bears the recognizable Macaulay imprint in every line of it:—

> The evils of Cambridge, from all that I have been able to learn, are evils which must be sought, and from such a depth of moral degradation I trust that the goodness of God, my own education, and the connexions which I have formed will preserve me.

Such interesting passages, however, are few. One fails to be profoundly moved by Zachary Macaulay's anxiety about the soul of Madame Necker de Saussure—an excellent woman against whom there is nothing to be said except that she improperly paraded Madame de Staël's genius as an excuse for her peccadilloes—or by his fears that the French nation would be punished in the next world for breaking the Sabbath in this. In fact, what is now in the biography is not highly important, and what is important is not new, and we can only once more insist that the book is much too long.

Plenty of amusing anecdotes may be found in the Rev. W. Tuckwell's Reminiscences of Oxford (Cassell, 9s.), together with much of the lighter history of the University for many years past. Mr. Tuckwell has known Oxford since his boyhood, so that his effective recollections may be said to begin about the year 1830. There cannot be many now living who remember Oxford in the thirties, when the Mayor shook Queen Adelaide's hand with "How d'you do, marm: how's the King?"; when ladies set out card tables in their drawing-rooms; when Dr. Bull was the "show" don at Christ Church; when Dr. Buckland and Dr. Daubeny, the latter now at rest beneath the stone pulpit at Magdalen, represented Oxford science; when the place held, besides the great men of the Oxford Movement, a number of minor eccentries and oddities. In a gossiping book such as this, there is necessarily a good deal that is not new, but Mr. Tuckwell's anecdotes also include many that we have not seen before. We will not challenge contradiction and controversy by quoting them. It will be enough to assure our readers that the book is full of entertaining stories and sketches of the Oxford of the past. It becomes serious, however, where it is proper to be serious, and treats men like Newman, Pusey, Pattison, and Jowett with the sober criticism that is their due. As to modern Oxford, Mr. Tuckwell heartily laments both its continual growth, which is inevitable, and the many architectural barbarisms that have been committed in and around the colleges themselves. "The lovely Museum rose before us like an exhalation," but nothing north of it has his approval—that is, nothing in the Norham Gardens style of architecture. Elsewhere, in the heart of Oxford, he rightly denounces certain modern buildings, to which, as they are not likely to be pulled down, it seems useless to call attention. The book contains several interesting portraits, mostly reproduced from old drawings; but Kett, whose well-known caricature by Dighton is dated 1807, died in 1824, and, we suppose, is not, strictly speaking, among the author's reminiscences.

If Canon Rawnsley's Memories of the Tennysons (Maclehose) adds nothing very important to what is already known of the late Laureate, it may at least be praised for its excellent descriptions of Lincolnshire people and scenery. Not all poets have been as susceptible to local influences as Wordsworth and Tennyson, the one drawing much of his inspiration from mountains and lakes, and the other from the large skies, the quiet landscapes, and the rich bird-life of the Fen country. One may understand Tennyson's poems well enough without knowing Lincolnshire; but for their fuller appreciation, and for the recognition of his powers as an interpreter of nature, it is necessary to realize the surroundings of his boyhood. It was Lincolnshire, the home of his early days, of which he wrote and thought, not of Farringford or Aldworth, except now and then. For this reason, we welcome what the author, himself a Lincolnshire man, has written of Somersby, and its neighbourhood and its natives. Of the poet himself he has less to say; he did not even see him until 1881; but in Tennyson's native district he is thoroughly at home, and this is the real merit of the book. Its title includes the whole family, and especially Charles Tennyson Turner—like his brother, a poet—of whom we have a memoir and a portrait. By the way, the spelling of the names of Edward FitzGerald and Sir Andrew Clark might be corrected in another edition.

Mr. George Dolby's Charles Dickens as I Knew Him (Unwin, 6s.) is an old book reissued, giving a detailed account of Dickens' reading tours. The full number of the readings was 423. "Of these," says Mr. Dolby, "111 were given under the management of Mr. Arthur Smith; 70 under the management of Mr. Headland (who succeeded to the post of manager on the death of Mr. Smith), and 242 under my management. These latter were delivered in England, Ireland, Scotland, and America, between April 10, 1866, and March 15, 1870." With this intimate knowledge of the matter, Mr. Dolby has produced a good description of Dickens' successes in public, particularly in the great cities of America, and has recorded many incidents and personal traits that will interest the reader. One hardly realizes, perhaps, what it was to deliver 242 readings in less than four years. It meant incessant travelling, either by expresses, which made Dickens nervous, or by slow trains, which he found tedious. From these evils, and from the other inconveniences of travel, and from the excitement of continual popular enthusiasm, no manager could save him. They told seriously upon his health. Latterly, too, Dickens himself was unwise enough to overtax his powers by repeatedly reading the scene from "Oliver Twist," in which Nancy is murdered by Bill Sikes. Mr. Dolby believes that this scene actually shortened his life. It is certain that he persisted in his renderings of it in spite of the entreaties of his friends and doctors, and that physical prostration was the invariable result. It was so perfectly given that "Macready was as much affected by the reading as if he had given it himself." The pecuniary results—though the total profits of these 242 readings, to Dickens himself, were nearly £33,000—were dearly purchased, after all, by death at the age of 58.

The Rev. R. Patterson, the writer of Richard Elwyn (Gardner, Darton, and Co., 3s. 6d.), seems to have had plenty of materials, assistance, and advice, but does not understand what a biography ought to be. He gives a full account of Elwyn's early days and of his Cambridge career, with letters from Elwyn himself to illustrate this part of his life. That is well enough, but, after these Cambridge days, we have scarcely anything to show at first hand what Elwyn said or wrote or thought. Mr. Patterson describes his parish at Ramsgate, and others speak of his work at Charterhouse or York; but these are the appreciations of friends, and not real glimpses of the man himself. Of Elwyn's own expressed opinions on important subjects there is no trace whatever, beyond one memorandum on the educational course at Charterhouse. He was a senior classic and a schoolmaster; we look in vain for a single specimen of his scholarship. We have, instead, an invitation to lunch at Lambeth Palace on Thursday at 1.30, and many other irrelevant trifles which have no place in a properly written memoir. Mr. Elwyn married, but his biographer does not think it worth while to mention the lady's name. He prefers to write:—"In December, 1855, we find him announcing the date of his marriage to a friend, and showing in this, as in all his life, a deep piety and earnestness, which was the more remarkable as being combined with such a cheerful and lively disposition." Mr. Patterson's sense of humour should have saved him from this style of writing, and from a reference to the present Regius Professor of Greek at Cambridge as "well-known for his classical attainments." There are footnotes, too, some of which will provoke more than a smile. In short, we fear that our notions of relevance and irrelevance in biography are not those entertained by Mr. Patterson.

Travel and Geography.

In the Ice World of the Himalaya (Unwin, 16s.) relates the mountaineering experiences of Fanny Bullock Workman and William Hunter Workman, both members of the French Alpine Club. A good deal of the ground had been previously covered, though the chief ascents had not been made, by Sir William Conway's expedition. The chief result of this last excursion seems to be that Mrs. Workman has now been higher above the sea-level than any other woman, and that the site on which she broke the record has been named after her, Mount Bullock Workman. It is a matter of opinion whether this system of nomenclature produces, in this instance, a more satisfactory result than the system of the trigonometrical surveyors who refer to mountains as K² or B⁶. The book itself is dull and disappointing. An account of an ascent of Primrose Hill could hardly be more tedious. But, of course, it is not given to all writers to write as well as they climb; and the illustrations, at any rate, are meritorious.

In Arabia: The Cradle of Islam (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier, 7s. 6d.) the Rev. S. M. Zwerner does not profess to do more than epitomize the results of other travellers and explorers in the interior of Arabia, but he writes at first hand on the provinces bordering the Persian Gulf, where he has been established for some years as a member of the American Arabian Mission. His compilation is well executed, and his personal contributions are valuable and interesting. It is pleasant to find a cultivated American of scholarly training writing with such admiration of the influence of England on the Arabian littoral. The future of the neglected peninsula obviously lies, in his opinion, in the hands of Great Britain. The government by Turkish officials is corrupt and oppressive where it prevails, and even were it efficient its power is so slight that in Yemen no one values a Turkish passport or collects Turkish taxes twenty-five miles away from the chief city. The Arabs abhor the Turks, and should the Ottoman Caliph be driven out of the Golden Horn, Mr. Zwemer is confident that he could expect no welcome in the holy city of Mecca. The descriptive parts of this well-illustrated volume are by far the best. The historical sections—except as regards quite recent history—are too sketchy; and the account of the Mohammedan religion and its founder is naturally biased by missionary prejudice. Mr. Zwemer believes in the conversion of Moslems, but we do not observe that he is able to produce satisfactory statistics to bear out his belief. The modern Arab is, perhaps, too thoroughly pagan an animal to care much about any religion; and if he does care, by hazard, he becomes a Moslem so bigoted that no argument will shake him. But this volume may be commended as a useful and concise summary of the chief characteristics of the country and its inhabitants, expressed in good English, and adorned by numerous process-cuts from photographs and from other books. The references to authorities and the bibliography at the end are valuable aids to readers who wish to know more about special departments than could be included in the brief compass of this painstaking and instructive work.

It is impossible to speak with entire satisfaction of the new volume of the British Empire Series, AUSTRALASIA (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co., 6s.), and that is probably because fifteen well-known people at least have contributed to it. Had the book been written by one man he might have been conscious of some responsibility, but in these rather casual contributions to the lecture room it is quite obvious that the influence of a strong editor is lacking. In many instances a far better choice might have been made of contributors. What claim, indeed, has Mr. Wilson Hall to speak on the subject of Australian aboriginals? It is hardly possible to credit the fact that he practically dismisses the subject of marriage and the implied classificatory system of relationship with the irrelevant and absurd remark that the aboriginals "are not believers in close marriages, but prefer crosses." It is rather a pity that Mr. Lorimer Fison was not asked to contribute to the book. Nor is the contribution of Mr. Macfie very satisfactory. His views as to State emigration to Australia are prehistoric, and obviously belong to the time when unlimited migration was held to bless those who give and those who take. In his desire to open the great Southern Continent to the outsider he even includes the Chinese, Japanese, and Indian. It is such ill-considered remarks as these which frequently play directly into the hands of selfish capital, and produce the bitter distrust with which the labouring classes of Australia view employers. It is a pity that so much of the matter in this volume has been compiled by men from the cities. How else, indeed, could Mr. Bonwick affirm that snakes are not uncommon in the bush, but that they are rarely of poisonous kinds? It is notorious that Australia is the only country in the world where poisonous snakes largely outnumber the harmless sorts. Out of some sixty-five species at least forty-five are venomous, and in many parts of New South Wales the only common snake is the black snake, perhaps the most venomous of them all. There are certainly many large districts where an innocuous snake is utterly unknown. Mr. Harry Vogel contributes an interesting, if rather inconsecutive, chapter upon the Maoris. He, at any rate, speaks from first-hand knowledge of these remarkable people. We see, however, that he repeats the usual error of making Abel Tasman name Cape Maria Van Diemen from the Governor of Batavia's daughter. He had no daughter, and the promontory was named after his wife.

Beauties of the Desert.

Only a Frenchwoman could have written AMONG THE WOMEN OF THE SAHARA, "from the French of Mme. Jean Pommerol," by Mrs. Arthur Bell (N. D'Anvers) (Hurst and Blackett, 10s. net). We do not refer merely to its bright vivacity and seizure of the essentially effective points in character and customs, but still more to the intuitive comprehension, the sympathetic insight, of a woman who knows the world and understands her own sex. An Englishwoman would have blundered or been shocked—she would not have won the confidence, we feel sure, of the wild beauties of the desert. That they are wild in every sense of the word Mme. Pommerol does not affect to conceal. No doubt it is very wrong, but we cannot help being glad to hear that the shut-up wives of the desert frequently evade their husbands' jealous ward and amuse themselves like other folks' wives. Indeed, the Arab wives of the Sahara seem to be much better off than most Mohammedan women. Of course, there is hardly any polygamy—that is a delusion which Europeans are slow to get rid of; but the fact is that extremely few Moslems have more than one wife. It was so among the Arab harems Mme. Pommerol visited, and the absence of concubines made the one wife as supreme as in any other country. She is said to be as happy and as free as she need be; she has very little work to do except what she pleases; is never ill-treated, and has only too much influence over her husband and sons. "I shall always be ready to assert," says Mme. Pommerol, "that the women of the Sahara, the women of the kusûr (or fortified villages), however childish and limited their ideas may be, are not to be pitied. I consider them, indeed, far less to be pitied than the work or peasant woman of Europe, less to be pitied than the female clerks at home. The household work the Saharian women have to do is very light, and they have plenty of the leisure they enjoy so much. Above all, they have what our European women certainly lack, and what at first sight no one would expect of the simple children of the desert—a true appreciation, an intense love for the beauty of the brilliant sunshine, the soothing shade, the sublime harmony of their native land. This feeling for beauty makes up to them for the intellectual tastes with which nowadays we try to imbue the women of Europe. It gives them a taste of the very highest joy of which a human creature is capable." This may be a trifle highly strung, especially after what the same writer records of the Arab ladies' morals. "It seems to me," she observes, "that the women have no code of morals properly so called." Intrigues are quite common, especially in the wandering camps, where the corner of a tent is easily lifted. "But what of that?" asks our philosophic guide. "It is not fair to judge these children of the desert by our own European standard; they are of a type so utterly different to any with which we are familiar. The sensuality is physical only; it does not affect the soul in the least. Highly nervous, impulsive, and passionate, with but little intellect, the women of the Sahara are not depraved, and their lapses from the straight path do not leave any real stain upon them." In fact, the thing is a matter of course, just human nature, and though, if found out, the lady has to be fetched away by her stern papa and taken over the desert to the paternal tents, she is ready to risk it, and, as a rule, it is not noticed and nobody seems a penny the worse. In spite of indiscretions, however, the Arab woman as depicted by Mme. Pommerol is an engaging child. It is a desperately narrow life that she describes, but it has its pleasures, decidedly more frequent than its duties, and the social amusements of the Sahara appear to content their votaries. That Mme. Pommerol is able to write so intimately of these remarkably shy birds is astonishing, for every woman who tries to penetrate the reserve of a Moslem harem knows its blank obstruction. The author had sympathy, insight, and, above all, patience, besides an unusual share of venturesomeness, and the result was success. Her account of this little-known variety of the genus incomprehensible deserves to be widely read, and Mrs. Arthur Bell has rendered it so sympathetically that it is hard to realize that it is a translation.

On the Banks of the Seine.

THE LIFE OF PARIS, by Richard Whiteing (Murray, 6s.), is a pleasant book, and to stigmatize it as superficial would be to complain because it is not something that it was not meant to be. Mr. Whiteing's purpose evidently was not to tell us everything that he knows, but to gossip agreeably round the subject. He is a sympathetic rather than an enthusiastic critic, indulgent to faults of the national character, but by no means blind to them. He smiles at French athletic sports. He is very just to the Frenchwoman, who when she is good is very, very good, and when she is bad is horrid. He explains the position and importance of the Faubourg Saint Germain; and he sums up the history of modern French literature in a paragraph:

> The schools generate just as the midges do, and each may suffice for its hour. One springs out of the other. "Rousseau," said Tocqueville, "begat Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, who begat Châteaubriand, who begat Victor Hugo, who, being tempted of the devil, is begetting every day." It might be put in another way. Zola hunted Hugo, Huysmans hunted Zola; and now Saint Georges de Bouhélier hunts Huysmans, and with him the Symbolists and the Decadents. . . . It is all very well, but it tends to bring literature down to a question of mere procedure, and to reduce its entire priesthood to a gang of workmen squabbling over the make of their tools.

It is true, but not the whole truth, and that sentence may almost stand as a criticism of the book as a whole. It does not go very deeply into any subject except the housing of the poor, but it tells a part of the truth—the picturesque part—about many subjects. And the omissions are very often, we fancy, the result not of ignorance but of consideration for the feelings of the reader.

A. M. F. is full of Parisian stories—stories of the Second Empire at first hand, and dread stories of the Terror handed down to her by tradition. The fount of revolutionary anecdote seems well-nigh inexhaustible, and the authoress of ON THE BANKS OF THE SEINE (Longmans, 6s.), had the good fortune, when in France some forty years ago, to meet with at least two survivors from those old days. Hence the strange story of "La Dame Blanche," whose mother had come over in the suite of Marie Antoinette, and whose brother had been one of the only survivors of the Swiss Guard. But all the curious tales in this collection are interesting; most of them absorbing. They deal with history in the making; they bring before us figures like Henry, Cardinal, and Duke of York, the last of the Stuarts, and Hortense, ex-Queen of Holland, and many others. The anecdotes are always well worth telling, both for themselves and for the personages with whom they are concerned. A. M. F. may be assured of as warm a welcome for her new book as for her "Foreign Courts and Foreign Homes."

The War.

CAMPAIGN PICTURES (Cassell, 6s.) is by the ebullient and flamboyant Mr. A. G. Hales. One finds in the book no connected account of the war as a whole, or even of those incidents of it at which Mr. Hales was present as a spectator. His work, in fact, is not narrative but impressionism. Those who do not like it might parody another famous criticism and accuse the author of flinging a bottle of ink in the face of the public. Those who do like it may compare it to the work of G. W. Steevens. Mr. Hales, in fact, writes very much as Steevens might have written if he had not been a scholar. His pictures certainly stand out, though he now and again oversteps the boundaries of good taste in his descriptions alike of the haughty manner of British officers (some of whom seem to have regarded Mr. Hales as a sort of wild man from the woods) and of the charms of the Boer hospital nurses. As for his cock-sureness in matters of military criticism, which has given offence to many, we are disposed to hold that, though it would have been out of place if Mr. Hales had been writing a military history, it is an excusable feature in a work of this kind. We observe, moreover, that a good many of the trenchant observations which were printed in the Daily News are not reproduced in the volume before us.

IN THE WEB OF A WAR, by H. F. Prevost Battersby (Methuen, 6s.), takes up the story of the campaign at the moment of Lord Roberts' great turning movement. It ranks among the better books of the war correspondents, though hardly among the very best of them. Much of it bears upon the interesting question whether the typhoid outbreak at Bloemfontein ought not to have been expected and prepared for. Mr. Battersby, for his part, claims to have foreseen it, and says that he drafted a telegram to England, but was not allowed to send it.

Games.

Mr. Franklin K. Young has already published three books on the theory of chess, and the fourth, CHESS STRATEGETICS ILLUSTRATED (Sampson Low, Marston, and Co., 12s. 6d.), is the crown and consummation of them all. We can only admire Mr. Young's ingenuity; the practical value of his work is, to our mind, open to doubt. A strong player, when he has mastered the meaning of such strange phrases as topographical horizons, tactical horizons, strategic horizons, logistic horizons, logistic radii, prime logistic operations, prime strategetic factors, and many others, will be inclined to think that Mr. Young is only telling him what he knew before, in terms with which he was previously unacquainted. The fact is that if these theories and laws and demonstrations are translated into ordinary language, they lose their apparent scientific profundity, and are at once recognized as truths familiar to all players. For example, the First Law of the Art of Chess Play is thus stated by Mr. Young: "Whenever two undefended kindred pieces having no line of communication are simultaneously attacked by an adverse force, then one of the given kindred pieces is lost." No doubt; but can anything be more obvious? Again, the Fourth Law is: "In every situation and at every turn to move, always manœuvre either with that kindred Prime Strategetic Factor which has the advantage; or with any kindred Factor to make subordinate a dominant adverse Prime Strategetic Factor." In plain English, "follow up your own advantage, or seek to reduce that of your opponent." Surely, every chess player in the world has done all this from his youth up. The book is dedicated to the memory of Morphy, and the illustrative situations are from Morphy's games. An amateur will find the study of such games as these much more instructive than theoretical strategetics.

We have received three small books that form part of the Burleigh Library (Sands, 1s. 6d. each)—namely, CHESS, POKER, and DICE AND DOMINOES, all of them by Mr. R. F. Foster. They are attractively got up, and are written with admirable clearness. Poker, of course, is a game of skill, but there cannot be much difficulty about dominoes, and it is better, on the whole, not to show great familiarity with dice, which have never been respectable, in spite of their antiquity. Mr. Foster takes a line of his own in his little chess book. He virtually ignores the gambits and openings, and directs the learner's attention especially to model formations, exchanges, and theories of attack and defence. It may be that these matters are not studied early enough by beginners, but if a beginner neglects the regular openings, he will find himself in trouble before he can develop his model formation. We note, by the way, a new and entirely wrong definition of a "passed pawn," illustrated, too, by a diagram.

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF AUSTIN DOBSON (Derby, Frank Murray), has been "attempted" by Mr. Francis E. Murray, and the volume produced contains a mass of detail which will be of much interest and of some value to the ever-widening circle of the lovers of poetical work that will endure for ever as a witness that the English tongue is capable of being used in dainty verse with Gallic precision. It is somewhat unfortunate that Mr. Murray should follow a preface, wherein he attacks the accuracy of Mr. W. Davenport Adams (upon insufficient grounds), by a long list of his own errata which does not exhaust the mistakes to be found in his own text. A thorough revision of this "bibliography" by some one who has the gift—which (we can assure Mr. Murray) is not bestowed upon every lover of literature—of literary accuracy would furnish a reference-book permanent importance to public libraries and book-collectors.

ART.

Sodoma. By the Contessa Priuli-Bon. (Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.) (Bell and Sons. 5s. n.)

This little volume from the pen of an accomplished English lady living in Italy is of especial value and interest, since it deals with a painter whose life and works are less familiar to English readers than most of the artists whose biographies have appeared in this series. Giovanni Antonio Bazzi, generally known by his nickname of Il Sodoma, is one of the many excellent sixteenth-century masters whose fame was eclipsed by greater painters who flourished in those golden days. His name was almost forgotten a hundred years after his death, and until quite lately several of his best works bore the name of Leonardo or of Raphael. But modern critics have fully recognized his merits, and have done something more than justice to his rare gifts of drawing and expression. Both Morelli and Signor Frizzoni have studied his works carefully and shown a keen appreciation of their beauties, while M. Muntz has pronounced him to be worthy of a place by the side of Correggio. This assertion may be reasonably disputed when we compare the frescoes of Monte Oliveto or the Farnesina with the marvels of Allegri's conception at Parma. The Lombard painter lacked the great creative powers and skilful composition of the master of Correggio, and it is only in his single figures that the charm and beauty of Sodoma's art are fully revealed. Such pictures as the famous St. Sebastian of the Uffizi, the fainting St. Catherine in the fresco of S. Domenico at Siena, or the wonderful fragment of the Christ bound to the column in the gallery of the same city justify this master's claim to a high place among the secondary artists of his day. But it is only very rarely that Sodoma rises to these heights. His natural indolence and carelessness, as well as a certain vein of frivolity in his nature, may explain his failure to fulfil the promise which he occasionally displays, and account for the feebleness and inferiority of his later works.

On the other hand, M. Muntz's contention that Sodoma was one of Leonardo's most brilliant disciples may, we think, be accepted without reserve. The son of a shoemaker of Vercelli, Bazzi was born about 1477, and, as Morelli conjectures, probably went to Milan in his youth and came under Leonardo's own influence. Certainly such works as the Madonna and Saints in the Turin Gallery, and the lovely little Virgin with the Child caressing a lamb, in the Brera, are distinctly Leonardesque in type and sentiment. When the French invasion and downfall of Lodovico Sforza drove the great Florentine from Milan and scattered his followers in all directions, Sodoma was fortunate in finding liberal patrons at Siena, which became his home during the remainder of his long life. It is in the churches and Palazzo Pubblico of Siena that his chief works are still to be found, although several of his panel pictures may be seen in other cities, and a few good paintings, including the delightful little group of St. George and the Dragon, in Sir Francis Cook's collection, are now in England.

Twice over in the course of his career Sodoma was united to Rome. In 1508, his wealthy patron, the Papal treasurer, Agostino Chigi, recommended him to Pope Julius II. before young Raphael came to work in the Vatican; and it is no small proof of the esteem in which the Lombard master's art was held that the Urbinate refused to destroy Bazzi's work on the ceiling of the Camera della Segnatura, and at the same time introduced his portrait side by side with his own in the School of Athens. Five or six years later, Sodoma visited Rome again, when he lived in the house of Agostino Chigi, among the leading artists and men of letters of the day, and painted the frescoes of Alexander and Roxana, which adorn the upper halls of the Farnesina villa on the banks of the Tiber. After that, Sodoma seldom left Siena, where he married the daughter of a rich innkeeper, attained wealth and renown, and enjoyed great popularity among his fellow-citizens. Unfortunately, he squandered his gains on gay and riotous living, and indulged freely in his favourite pastime of horse-racing, frequently sending horses to run in the Palio or annual races, both in Siena and Florence. These extravagances led him into difficulties and distress, and, if Vasari is to be trusted, the once fashionable painter died poor and miserable in the hospital at Siena, at the age of seventy-two. But Vasari, we must remember, was prejudiced against the Lombard artist, and does his best not only to vilify his personal character, but tries to disparage his artistic excellence. There seems to be no truth in the historian's charge that he forced his wife to leave him by his neglect and misconduct. On the contrary, it has been proved that she was living with him in 1541, and it was only after her death and his daughter's marriage that he was left to a lonely old age. In the same way Vasari exaggerates Sodoma's wayward character and eccentric habits, and cannot forgive his love of animals, a peculiarity which he shared with his great master Leonardo. He filled his house with strange pets of every description, and the return which he made of his property to the municipal authorities in 1531 is as original as it is entertaining.

> Be it known to you, honourable fellow-townsmen, by me, Master John Sodoma, that I have, first of all, a garden by the Fonte Nuova, where I sow and other folks reap. Then in Vallerozzi a house, as a residence, not to mention a law suit with Niccolò de' Libri, and a stable, with eight horses which are called my lambs, while I am their bell wether. Further, I have a monkey, and also a raven, which I keep in order that, from his cage, he may teach a theological jackass next door how to speak. Also an owl to frighten the witches, two peacocks, two dogs, two cats, a hawk, six fowls, eighteen chickens, two moorhens and many other birds, to name all of which would only cause confusion. And besides these, I have three wicked beasts—to witt, my three women. Your Excellencies will doubtless admit that I am a proprietor in a large way.

This document may well have scandalized the grave magistrates of Siena, but we confess that the gaiety and humour of the writer strikes us more than what Contessa Priuli-Bon calls "the excessive bad taste" of Master Sodoma's joke. The illustrations of this carefully-written book have been selected with taste and judgment, and give an excellent idea of Sodoma's peculiar merits. They include a fine photogravure of his St. Sebastian, and a characteristic portrait of the painter as he appears in at Monte Oliveto, clad in the new velvet cap and mantle which had been bestowed upon him by the Benedictine monks.

Mr. Van Wisselingh seldom fails to interest the visitor to the Dutch Gallery in Brook-street. The gallery is small, but, although the quantity of pictures shown is limited, the quality is, as usual, superabundant. Taken by themselves the series of pictures by Corot, even the fine "impressions" of Don Quixote by Daumier, would be enough to make an extraordinary exhibition, but Mr. Van Wisselingh exhibits a drawing by Mathew Maris which is sufficient by itself to do so. The atmosphere of the two dimly discernible figures, the grace, the certainty of the draughtsmanship in the somewhat "loose" medium of black chalk, almost leave this drawing above criticism.

Mr. Walter Sickert is rejoicing in a representative exhibition of his works in Paris, concerning which we may have something to say later on.

Several of the pictures which were in the British Pavilion of the Paris Exhibition are now being shown by Mr. Stephen Gooden in Pall-mall. They are better hung than when in Paris, and include Reynolds' "Snake in the Grass," Romney's "Mrs. Clay," Constable's "Opening the Lock," and good examples of Gainsborough, Morland, and Nasmyth.

We publish in our Supplement some remarks on the artistic qualities displayed in the season's output of children's books. The illustrated editions of English classics are not this year quite so numerous or so good as they were last year. One of the best is an edition of Poe's poems, illustrated by W. H. Robinson (Bell), which is of extremely high quality, and which we reserve for further consideration.

FICTION.

Life, Love, and Politics.

We have not always agreed with those who consider Mr. Zangwill a great novelist. "The Master" seemed to us occasionally tedious, and no writer of fiction can be that and live; "Ghetto Tragedies" and some other books of Jewish life unnecessarily sordid and forced; but in THE MANTLE OF ELIJAH (Heinemann, 6s.) we are delighted to recognize the true spirit of the novelist at his best, the skill of the artist, the fine sympathy of the poet, the verbal wit and the constructive humour of the dramatist. The extremely knowing people of the Press have already given us a key to Mr. Zangwill's work, and hinted of portraits of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Rhodes, and others. They have also sought to connect the Boer wars with those which in the novel are spoken of as the Novalbarbese. This is an easy and futile exercise of the imagination. Mr. Zangwill would, we feel sure, not desire to make so cheap a claim upon attention, and "The Mantle of Elijah" need depend on no such meretricious qualities; the sources of its charm and power are to be found in the vigorous intellect of the author, in his knowledge of life, his accomplished style, and genuine wit.

The "mantle" falls from the shoulders of a famous Cabinet Minister, the aristocratic, radical, and peace-at-any-price Thomas Marshmont—the father of a delightful family and of the heroine Allegra—on to those of the Elisha, Mr. Robert Broser, who eventually becomes his son-in-law. The interest of the earlier part of the book lies in Allegra's belief in the obviously false prophet, Broser. The leading motive of the second part is her disillusionment. But interesting as is the story of Allegra's soul, the surrounding incidents and characters are the points at which Mr. Zangwill's skill gives forth the most brilliant light. Marshmont, whose fine nature, quiet humour, and complex interest in the tragedy of man are revealed with a thousand telling strokes; his wife, mysterious, splendid, impossible; his bevy of carefully individualized daughters; his sister, the admirable duchess, the duke, their vaguely sketched but still wonderful daughter; these are but a small part of the galaxy of arresting personages with which Mr. Zangwill jewels every chapter, almost every page, of his engrossing book. But there are depths as well as surface brilliancies. Beneath the life of a gay and busy world one sees the workings of a woman's soul; through its laughter and commercial greetings one hears the faint low cry of a woman's broken heart. No doubt life is like that; we begin with humour and illusion and in losing one the other is lost. But with all his pessimism and suspicion of the common ideals, Mr. Zangwill does not lose his power to laugh. Although the second half of the book, dealing with Allegra's married life and her connexion with the altruistic Jew, Raphael Dominick, and Margaret and Katharine Engelborne, naturally takes on a more sombre air, the verve of the earlier part of the story never wanes; the author never for a moment nods; his grip upon his men and women never relaxes; his style is always equal to the occasion; his verbal restraint is as telling as his singular power of flashing into a vivid enfranchisement of language when the situation demands it. Mr. Zangwill's people are not the puppets of a clever joueur de marionnettes; but, good and bad alike, living people one would like to have known. Thus their brilliancies are welcome, and their succinct wit never wearies. But apart from the occasional fireworks, there are many more extended passages in which the humour is sustained and the semblance of life upheld with a masterly hand—such a scene is that in which Mr. Fitzwinter, the gay and clever supporter of Marshmont and owner and editor of the Mirror, ends by asking Allegra to be his wife. We have one small grievance against the author. That he should have permitted Allegra, the wise and witty, the young Allegra with whom every reader will be in love, to contradict so much of her character and accept Broser at so ridiculously high an estimate as the one he fitted to himself, appears untrue to his own creation. This blurs us for a while, but in the hurrying events of the story—which covers more than 20 years—it is forgotten, swallowed up in the general interest of a work which is, undoubtedly, one of the most significant novels published of late years. "The Mantle of Elijah" will live for many reasons, not least among them being the excellent comedy of the earlier part of the story. The novel is the work of a man who has thought and laboured and known the inner and outward meaning of life. There are few novelists who could tell in so masterly a way so wide-reaching and manifold a story.

An Italian Novel by an Englishman.

It has long been an open secret that "Il Risveglio"—a novel of conspicuous merit which we reviewed a year or so ago—was the work of an Englishman who has devoted himself to the study of Italian letters. Gian Della Quercia (or Mr. E. H. Capel Cure, for we fancy the author has now no objection to the disclosure of his name), has followed up his success with a new romance, SUL MERIGGIO (Fratelli, Treves, Milan), which is to be, according to the modern fashion, the second volume in his Trilogy of Life, whereof "Il Vespero" will be the last. In "Sul Meriggio" the author concerns himself entirely with English life; his hero, in fact, is an English baronet, who has won the Victoria Cross in Africa, and the point on which the interest of the story hangs is, when stated in its baldest form, this hero's infatuation for another man's wife and the course of their passion. We cannot help thinking that it is a pity an English writer could not find a subject more fresh than that of the eternal matrimonial triangle which is the blight of Italian as of most Continental literature. It is true that Mr. Capel Cure obscures the developments of his story by the aid of that very English machinery—a family curse. But if there is no great originality in the plot the manner in which it is dealt with is deserving of praise for a merit by no means too common in Italian novels—it lures the reader on from page to page with an interest which, though it may be mild, is never failing. "Sul Meriggio" is even better written than "Il Risveglio," and we fancy that the most exacting of native ears will only detect in it a very slight foreign accent. We shall look forward with interest to Gian Della Quercia's completion of his trilogy.

May Crommelin.

In THE LUCK OF A LOWLAND LADDIE (John Long, 6s.), by May Crommelin, we find ourselves in the first chapter exhorted to read lightly. "So skip, dear reader, skip along; and give the writer plenty of rope" is the fair author's petition, expressed with a somewhat forced vivacity. Presumably the reviewer is included in her invitation. At any rate, we, too, have skipped—we trust wisely—landing, at about the fourth jump, right into the clutches of the Lamparagua or Beast-tree of Chile, which held us (as it so nearly held the hero of the story) in a vice for some three chapters. The writer betrays a pleasant acquaintance with these far-off climes; she chatters glibly of peonies, haciendas, and the rest; and she assures us that this Beast-tree is not merely indigenous in the pages of fiction, but infests the marshy edges of many a Chilian lake. She accurately represents its appearance, as described by natives, and her description does her considerable credit. The hair on Jock Ramsay's flesh stood upright when he beheld the dreadful thing slowly approaching him. But he escaped—to marry Elsie, and we breathe again. The business of the old will discovered in a secret chamber—but there! the world will never see the end of these old wills. Perhaps this one is a more remarkable will than most, but we will pass it over, and the attempted forgery, for the sake of a certain unconventionality in the rest of the story. It is jerky, but not unamusing, and something is always happening.

Social Satire.

THE SLAVES OF SOCIETY, by "The Man who heard Something" (Harpers, 6s.), is a slight tale built on a familiar foundation, but told with a good deal of skill. It may be read with amusement as a satire on the "ways of society," as illustrated by the schemings of a marchioness to place her perfectly indifferent and candid daughter in the matrimonial market, and her defeat by a music-hall artiste of the respectable type, who turns out to be the marquis's daughter. The wit of the author is a good deal more effective when he gets well under way and lets his characters talk, than when he is introducing them with rather laborious smartness to the reader. The dialogue is good, and we fancy the author could do more solid work with success. The book reads rather like a comedy for the stage transformed into a novel – the "situations" are arranged with an eye to dramatic effect, and the last scene with all the characters brought to the front is the very thing for a final curtain.

The House of Giants, by Yorick Everett (Ward, Lock, and Co., 3s. 6d.), is a pleasant little collection of sketches, many of which have already appeared in periodicals. The most ambitious effort, which gives its title to the book and has not hitherto challenged criticism, is a detective story of a familiar type, ingenious and cleverly constructed. There is much unevenness among the shorter tales. Some are too trivial to justify republication, but "Dandelion Bingles" is effective and has a completeness in itself which the short story only too often lacks.

King of the Rocks (Hutchinson, 6s.) is a good tale, well constructed and well told. It is melodramatic in places. Mr. Ambrose Pratt seems to have resolved that in the making of this story expense should not be spared. He has held nothing in reserve. The characters are strong—some of them, Karl Siegbert, for example, as well as the hero himself, are original and striking. The incidents are numerous and uncommon, and carry the story rapidly along. It looks, from the outside, as though the author had consulted some experienced hand before tackling his work. "What sort of stuff do the public like just now?" we might imagine him saying, and the reply would be, "Oh! plenty of incident, and make it hot, and strong, and sweet." Mr. Pratt has succeeded in carrying out these imaginary instructions. The "King of the Rocks" is that rare bird, the story of adventure acted by characters that are interesting in themselves.

LIBRARY NOTES.

A number of annual reports from the public libraries are before us, among which those of Blackburn, Bradford, Cardiff, Gloucester, Hyde, Leamington, and Watford call for some notice. In Blackburn school libraries have been formed with most satisfactory results. Bradford has tried free lectures on books in the reference library, but will not do so again. The question of rating is agitating the Hyde Library, as its certificate of exemption is not recognized by the Stockport assessment committee. This is certainly exceptional, and there is much force in the chairman's indignant comment that so anomalous a law requires amendment.

The first report of the Gloucester Library gives a concise account of the movement which led, after two defeats, to the adoption of the Acts in 1891. The library appears to be worked satisfactorily on the "open access" system. The Leamington Public Library is to be removed to "adequate, convenient, properly planned, and beautiful new premises." There is a large balance of funds in hand, and Sunday opening has been highly successful. The Library and Technical School at Watford shows a record of first-rate work. The educational department has obtained striking successes in examinations, and the library is to be enlarged at an estimated cost of £7,000.

We called attention the other day to the work of the Cardiff Libraries. They are an example of the growing powers of libraries as advanced educational institutions. The connexion between libraries and schools, elsewhere tentative, is here an accomplished fact, and upwards of 116,000 volumes have been issued from the school libraries during the year. Many additions have been made to the collection of Welsh manuscripts, which is now the most extensive in existence. Mr. Ballinger, the librarian, is on the committee of the Welsh Literary Society—a society formed to preserve and publish Celtic manuscripts of literary excellence. This is an undertaking which gives promise of a genuine Celtic revival, which shall be of deeds not words.

The popularity of the village public library at Middle Claydon has been so marked as to induce the neighbouring parish of East Claydon to adopt the Acts, and, on the 10th of November, Lady Joan Verney opened the library, which occupies a part of a block of new buildings intended to serve as a public hall and for the offices of the parish council. The new library has received substantial support in the shape of books and liberal subscriptions.

The library movement flourishes in Canada, if we may judge from an article to the November number of The Canadian Magazine by Mr. James Bain, librarian of the Toronto Public Library. The premier position is occupied by Ontario with 439 libraries, containing some 860,000 volumes. Both in Ontario and Quebec the Universities and colleges have fine libraries—the Laval University at Quebec including an unrivalled collection on early Canadian history. British Columbia "in library matters is one of the progressive provinces." There are three public libraries; and twenty-four travelling libraries, each of 100 volumes, have circulated through the mining camps and backwoods communities.

Correspondence.

JOHN DONNE AND THE ANTHOLOGIST.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Garstang accuses me of inaccuracy in saying that Donne is unrepresented in "The Golden Treasury"; but the facts, I think, support my statement to the full. In all the early editions the piece called "Present in Absence" was signed "Anon."; but, in the last edition he revised, Palgrave was persuaded to attribute it boldly to "J. Donne." Nothing, however, in the history of the poem justifies this. The poem was first printed, anonymously, in Davison's miscellany, called "The Poetical Rhapsody," in 1602. None of the seventeenth century editors of Donne, who had his authentic MSS. before them, recognized it as his, although it was printed several times. On the other hand, there is a copy of it among the Hawthornden MSS., where it is signed "J. H." This has been plausibly thought to stand for Sir John Harington. It occurs, it is true, in some MS. collections with other pieces certainly by Donne; but the best authorities are highly doubtful of its authenticity, and what evidence there is goes all against its being his. I submit, therefore, that I was more than justified in saying that Donne is unrepresented in "The Golden Treasury," since Palgrave, when compiling it, included nothing that was definitively Donne's, and only one anonymous poem which could by any ingenuity be described as possibly from his pen.

Obediently yours,

Dec. 3, 1900. YOUR REVIEWER.

LONG NOVELS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I remind "Critics" that the "Vicar of Wakefield," the "Legend of Montrose," "Barry Lyndon," "Silas Marner," and "Cranford" are all of them short novels? Many people would think them great novels also. Yours, &c., B.

CROMWELL-HOUSE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your issue of December 1st, speaking of the historical associations of Highgate, you say of Cromwell-house:—"Here lived General Ireton and his wife, the eldest daughter of the Protector, who is believed to have built the house."

In this you are at variance with Dr. Gardiner, who writes (Civil War, Vol. II., p. 59, note 1)—

> Ireton has been traditionally connected with what is now called Cromwell-house at Highgate. It was certainly the property of his brother Alderman John Ireton, but I do not know of any evidence that it was ever owned by the Lord Deputy. The signatures in a book of the proceedings of the governors of Highgate School alleged to be those of Henry Ireton are really John's, and that, too, written some years after Henry's death.

Have you simply followed "the tradition," or can you or any of your readers produce evidence that the house at Highgate belonged to Henry Ireton or was inhabited by him? If such evidence can be produced, it would be very interesting to all who cherish the memory of a great but somewhat neglected Englishman. Yours, &c., E. J. SEWELL.

34, Arundel-gardens, W., Dec. 1, 1900.

 We are much obliged to Mr. Sewell for his correction. The statement that General Ireton and his wife lived at Cromwell-house appears in Prickett's well-known "History and Antiquities of Highgate," and is taken from Prickett by later typographical works. Howitt, in his "Northern Heights of London" (1869), draws an interesting contrast between the house of Cromwell and of that simpler and purer republican Andrew Marvell, and says that the former was built by the Protector "about the year 1630, for the residence of General Ireton who had married one of his daughters."

Ireton, as a matter of fact, did not marry Bridget Cromwell until 1646—just before the capitulation of Oxford. Walford, in "Old and New London," repeats the mistake. Yet there seems to be no direct evidence that the Lord Deputy ever lived at Cromwell-house; in any case he could not have occupied it long, as he went to Ireland three years after his marriage, and died there in 1651. John Ireton, his brother, was Lord Mayor of London in 1658.

ONE-HUNDRED-BOOK AUTHORS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With reference to your note as to authors who have achieved a record in the number of their publications, a comparative analysis of the maximum output of the more prolific authors of the present day is not without interest. The two modern authors who have recently been mentioned as having produced the greatest number of books are the late Mrs. Emma Marshall and Mr. Percy Fitzgerald. But it must be remembered that this prodigious "spawning forth of literature," as Anthony Trollope rather brutally termed it, does not refer only to separate and distinct publications, but avowedly, in the case of Mr. Fitzgerald at all events, includes all editions—so that one book might conceivably count as ten—and even those books which he merely edited. The idea, indeed, of a man producing, say, 200 novels in the course of, say, fifty years, would, indeed, be calculated to "stagger humanity."

With these limitations and confining ourselves to authors of the second half of the present century there can be little doubt that Mrs. Henry Wood, with the innumerable editions of her more popular novels, would head the list. Other popular authors who have produced between one and two hundred books would make a respectable list. It is only necessary to give the first few names that occur to us—Baring-Gould, Miss Worboise, Ascott R. Hope, R. M. Ballantyne, W. H. G. Kingston, G. P. R. James, Davenport Adams, Annie S. Swan, though one or two of these might perhaps be more accurately termed bookmakers, their work having been more in the nature of compilation than authorship pure and simple. But even the dii majores, Dickens, Thackeray, and Wilkie Collins, might have a right to be included among the hundred-book authors of the past fifty years, considering the great number of new editions of their novels which have been published within that period, though no doubt some of their best work was produced before 1850.

This inquiry into the maximum output of authors of the day is not, however, very profitable, though in an age of personal statistics it is not without interest. At all events, it has its place among the curiosities of literature.

Yours faithfully, F. A. REYNOLDS-BALL.

"BY THEIR OWN BEAUTIES."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your review of Professor Dowden's edition of Romeo and Juliet, in the course of some remarks on the editor's construction of a passage in Juliet's speech, Act. III., Sc. II., quotes the lines as follows—

> Spread thy close curtain, love-performing night,
> That runaway's eyes may wink, and Romeo
> Leap to these arms, untalk'd of and unseen.
> Lovers can see to do their amorous rites
> By their own beauties.

May I take this opportunity of calling attention to the authoritative reading of the last line? The imperfect first quarto of 1597 does not contain the passage at all. The second quarto of 1599, which is admitted to be the first correct edition of the play, reads "And by their own beauties." So does the third quarto of 1609, and so does the first folio. Against this overwhelming force of early authorities the accepted reading "By their own beauties" rests only on the inferior authority of the fourth and fifth quartos and the later folios.

We ought, then, if possible, to begin the line in question with the conjunction "and." It will be objected that this would be to destroy the scansion of the line. Only, I answer, to our modern ears, accustomed to the common reading. The authoritative reading scans perfectly well thus:—

> And bý their own beauties; or if love be blind

It scans, indeed, exactly as a line just before it—

> That rúnaways' éyes may wink, and Romeo

In both these lines the trisyllabic foot heightens the excited impatience of the whole speech. The truth is that the reading, "And by their own beauties" is the authoritative reading, scans as well as the accepted reading, and gives the most pointed sense. Juliet first states a paradox, and then explains how this paradox becomes a fact. It is to be hoped then that future editions will read, and Juliets say—

> Lovers can see to do their amorous rites,
> And by their own beauties.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

Oxford, Dec. 1, 1900. THOMAS CASE.

P.S.—With regard to the construction of the whole passage, Dr. Schmidt, in his "Shakespeare Lexicon," shows that "runaway," like "runagate," is a synonym for "vagabond," as in Richard III., Act V., Sc. III.—

> A sort of vagabonds, rascals, and runaways.

If we read, not "runaway's," but "runaways'," the construction is simple. Juliet wishes for night, that runaways' (or vagabonds') eyes may be closed, and Romeo may come untalked of and unseen by them; while lovers can see well enough, and by their own beauties. The ingenious interpretation accepted by Professor Dowden is as unnecessary as it is forced, and is rightly doubted in your review.

LORD ROSEBERY'S "NAPOLEON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The letter of Mr. Algernon Warren in your number of 1st December seems to show his complete misapprehension of the difference between Lowe and Napoleon in the circumstances to which he refers.

Lowe at Capri was commanding a small detachment, and it was his duty to remain with it. If he had obtained his own release, he could have done nothing at Naples that any other officer could not have done as well.

Napoleon in Russia was not merely in command of an army; he was also Emperor of a mighty State. He had plenty of men with him fit to command the army. On the other hand, he alone, by going back to France, could have raised the fresh army with which he soon swept back the Russians and Prussians to the further edge of Germany. Indeed, one of the best military critics, Marshal Saint-Cyr, considers he would have done better by sending a Marshal on Moscow, and not going himself.

As I am writing on the subject, may I point out that in birth and education Napoleon was on a level with most English officers? He was an officer of the old Royal army, a fact he never forgot. After long years of absolute authority his manners were often brutal. So are, too often, those of men with not one-tenth of his power. But he well knew what a gentleman was, and he hit the weak point of Lowe when he refused to consider that general as having had the usual experience of an English officer commanding Englishmen.

If Mr. Warren would read my Introduction (unsigned) to O'Meara in Messrs. Bentley's edition of 1888 he will see this point explained. Would any ordinary English officer have objected to Napoleon receiving a present of green vegetables, because the Emperor's colour was green. Fancy the danger latent in "haricots verts!" This was to forbid the "eating of the green" with a vengeance.

I remain your obedient servant,

RAMSAY PHIPPS,
Colonel, late Royal Artillery.

The Stone, Chalfont St. Giles, Dec. 4, 1900.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I honestly believe that nearly every accusation against Napoleon can be satisfactorily rebutted, or at least palliated, by those who will be at the trouble to examine the full circumstances under which each alleged crime or cruelty occurred.

Mr. Warren's comparison is a case in point. Since Trafalgar a French fleet had been practically non-existent, and there was every reason to expect an English squadron at Capri any day. Sir Hudson Lowe had probably sufficient knowledge of history to have heard of the surrender of a neighbouring island, owing to Admiral Byng's want of tenacity, and of his hapless home-coming; so that the instincts which guided Lowe not to accept the shameful terms offered may have been gentlemanly, but were certainly discreet. With regard to Napoleon's return from Wilna to Paris, it had become absolutely necessary from the moment he received the nineteen despatches in one day, including those referring to the Malet conspiracy. Moreover, he had refused to leave his army, although begged to do so by his Marshals, at the Beresina, on the morning when Ney told Rapp "our situation is unparalleled; if Napoleon extricates us to-day, he must have the devil in him." Lastly, when Napoleon finally left the army, it was close to the Russian border and to its supports; and he showed more courage in his journey through the whole of hostile Germany to France, than by remaining in the midst of his army where all acute danger was past. I have looked into Rapp, Marbot, and Bourgogne as being typical reflexes of the opinion of the army at the time, from general's tent to sergeant's mess, and I find them all in accord as to the necessity for the Emperor's action. He had endured their hardships, but had no time to share their rest.

I have to thank Mr. Seaton for helping me to prove my point that "rudeness was a weapon in the hands of Napoleon, and usually his sole punishment, if the victim had the sense to take the hint." What are the facts of the Weimar episode? Duchess Wurtemburg (whose ruler, by the way, had married our Princess Charlotte, but who had been the ally of Napoleon in the Austerlitz campaign), Saxe-Weimar had thrown in her lot with Prussia, and its capital had been the prize of victory, after battles in which Napoleon had lost some of his best men. Its Duchess gets in the conqueror's way at a most inopportune moment and at first receives a snub, which she probably expected.

But if Mr. Seaton will turn up the article Saxe-Weimar, in the Encyclopædia Britannica, he will find that from the first "the war with France was fraught with danger to the continued existence of the principality, and, after the battle of Jena (1806), it was mainly the skilful management of the Duchess Louise that dissuaded Napoleon from removing her husband from among the reigning princes." In fact the very next year Napoleon promoted the State from a principality to a duke dom.

During this campaign there are other instances where Napoleon's love was more than his life, especially one where, in respect to two ladies, he showed himself, by his voice and his pen, more of a gentleman in practice than, to my knowledge, Wellington ever did. The story has been told by Rapp and others how Prince Hatzfeld had been well received by the Emperor at Potsdam, but, later, by an intercepted letter, had been proved to have been a spy, and of course sentenced to be shot forthwith. But, although all accounts agree as to what took place, I prefer to give the sequel in Napoleon's own words, in a letter to his wife, which (unfortunately) is not so well known, and is also a defence against his rudeness to other women. It is dated 9 p.m., on November 6th, 1806, and begins, without the customary salutation:—

> Yours to hand, in which you seem annoyed at the bad things I say about women; it is perfectly true I hate intriguing women more than anything. I am used to kind, gentle, charming women; these are they whom I like. If I have been spoilt, it is not my fault but yours. Besides, you shall see how kind I have been to one who showed herself sensible and good, Madame d'Hatzfeld. When I showed her her husband's letter, she said, amid her sobs, with profound emotion, and ingenuously, "Ah, that is indeed his writing!" When she said this, her voice went to my heart, it gave me real pain. I said to her, "Ah, well, madame, throw that letter on the fire, I shall then no longer have the power to punish your husband." She burned the letter, and seemed very happy. . . You see then how I like kind, unaffected, and gentle women, but it is only because such alone resemble you. Adieu, mon amie, je me porte bien.—Napoléon."

Yours faithfully, H. F. HALL.

Sheffield, Austerlitz Day, 1900.

P.S.—Sir William Fraser, in "Words on Wellington," tells us, on the authority of his father, that Sir Hudson Lowe was "wanting in many of the essentials of a gentleman."

"PREMIER VOYAGE, PREMIER MENSONGE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The book "Premier Voyage, Premier Mensonge," published as one of Daudet's posthumous works, to which you refer in a recent issue in a paragraph in which my name is mentioned, is a translation from my English manuscript. Daudet told me the story; I took notes and wrote it out in English. After Daudet's death his executors asked me for my notes and the complete English text—and the present volume is the result. It was always clearly understood that my name was to appear on the book—in some such form as "Told by Alphonse Daudet to his friend Robert Sherard"—for though the tale is Daudet's, the construction and writing are mine. I was surprised to see that my connexion with the work was altogether ignored, and I did enter a mild protest. I suppose a French Court of law would grant me an injunction, were I hankering after la gloire, but I have far too much reverence for the memory of my dear dead friend and master to evoke over his grave any unseemly wranglings.

I have the honour to remain your obedient servant,

ROBERT HARBOROUGH SHERARD.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

A certain distinguished Irishman, speaking of the writings of Sedulius, the Latin poet of early Christendom, who was born in Ireland, wittily remarked that if any corroborative proof were needed that the poet was Irish, it was to be found in the fact that, while editions of his works had been published in most European cities, no edition had ever been brought out in Ireland. This remark was a well-merited rebuke to the Irish booksellers who call themselves publishers and yet never publish anything except under extreme pressure; but, as far as one branch of Irish literary activity is concerned, it is beginning to lose its force. One of the most remarkable results of the movement for the revival of the Irish language is the astonishing enterprise of several societies in Ireland which are publishing Irish-Gaelic literature every week. Within the past few months several notable additions have been made to the available reading matter in Irish, and quite a number of new books are announced. The poems of Geoffry Keating, one of the most classical of Irish writers of the seventeenth century, were brought out the other day, and it is a fact not known that it was the first collected edition of an Irish poet's writings ever issued. Besides the complete collection of the poems of Egan O'Rahilly, the leading Munster poet of the early eighteenth century, edited and translated by the Rev. P. S. Dinneen, which is now ready, the Irish Texts Society promise a complete edition of the "Duanaire Finn," a collection of Ossianic poems preserved in the Library of the Franciscan Monastery, Dublin. The larger number of the incidents related in these poems will be new to the public, and their publication will shed light upon the development of Ossianic romance. Mr. Dinneen has in preparation an Irish edition of another notable poet, namely, Owen Roe O'Sullivan, and has also in the press an original novel of his own, written in Irish. Meanwhile, the Gaelic League of Dublin is sending out a shower of penny booklets in Irish, and has decided to publish a story by the late Denis Fleming, an accomplished Irish-Gaelic writer who died the other day. Moreover, the text of Keating's great "History of Ireland," written over two hundred years ago, is in course of publication (for the first time, though several English versions have been issued), and one or two Irish dictionaries and grammars are on the way, as well as a remarkable collection of unpublished Ossianic literature. Altogether, the output of Gaelic literature for this winter and next spring will be not merely abnormal, but also highly important to all who are interested in the old language and literature of Ireland. It seems a pity, however, that money should be spent on the recent Gaelic literature, a school of which is slowly springing up, while such an enormous number of unpublished and valuable texts lie unknown in all the great libraries of Europe.

Mr. Robert H. Sherard recently made a study of the condition of the poor in various big towns. The result will be published after Christmas in a syndicate of newspapers by Messrs. Tillotson under the title of "The Cry of the Poor—being a faithful account of a three months' tour amongst the Pariahs of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in the last half-year of the Nineteenth Century." We regret to hear that his work has seriously affected Mr. Sherard's health.

Principal S. D. F. Salmond's "The Christian Doctrine of Immortality" (T. and T. Clark) will appear shortly in an entirely new form and at a lower price.

Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co., have just bought the business of Mr. James Bowden, of Henrietta-street, Covent-garden. Mr. Bowden was formerly managing director of Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Bowden, and later became managing director at Routledge's, but now confines his energies to the Religious Tract Society, of which he is lay secretary and business manager. The books taken over by Messrs. Ward, Lock, mainly consist of four novels by Mr. Joseph Hocking—his other books, nine in number, were already the property of Messrs. Ward, Lock—and Bowden's Popular Series of cloth-bound shilling books, including the four volumes by "Madge"—"Manners for Men," "Manners for Women," "A Word to Women" and "How to be Pretty though Plain"—of which close upon a hundred thousand copies have been sold.

We understand that Mr. Arthur Lawrence is engaged upon another Life of Sir Arthur Sullivan. "The Life Story, Letters, and Reminiscences," to which we referred last week, was written under the composer's authority and with his assistance; the new biography will be entirely re-written and contain much new matter.

Books to look out for at once.

"PROBLEM No. 101, by A. Troitzky.—White (4 pieces)—K at Q 3; Q at K R 3; Kt at K Kt 4; pawn at Q R 4. Black (5 pieces)—K at Q 4; Q at K Kt sq; R at K B 2; pawns at Q B 3 and Q Kt 5. White to play and win.

"I must admit that Troitzky fairly beat me in No. 77; but if I may say so you have not published the cream of the solution. I knew from the first that if 1. B—Kt 3 ch, K—B 3, White would win by 1. R×P ch; but I imagined Black to be less obliging than to move his king. It is after 1. B—Kt 3 ch, B—B 5 that the real Troitzkyism of the problem comes in; and this is where I failed. Thanks to the shortened form of solution you have given, I have now had the pleasure of discovering that after 1. B—Kt 3 ch, B—B 5; 2. NOTES OF THE DAY.

A new point has arisen in connexion with Canadian Copyright. It has hitherto been taken for granted that Imperial Acts bearing on the subject apply to the colonies as well as to the United Kingdom. Our Canadian correspondent, however, tells us that Mr. Justice Rose, of the Superior Court, has just held that no such Imperial Act is a part of Canadian law unless "either by express words or at least by necessary implications it extends to the Dominions of the Crown," and that the Act of 1862 relating to artistic copyright does not so extend. This decision is, of course, subject to appeal, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council may reverse it. But it introduces a difficulty which those who drafted Lord Monkswell's Bill do not seem to have anticipated, and that Bill will probably be amended in consequence.

Plato's quarrel with the poets is an old grievance, but the poets are at last avenged. The philosopher has been described by a speaker of the Society of Women Journalists as "the first interviewer." Mrs. Stannard (an "interviewer" of experience, we learn, as well as the author of "Bootles' Baby") read a paper on interviewing at a recent meeting of the society, and in the discussion which followed Mrs. Tooley upheld this form of journalism, and "claimed Plato as the first interviewer." After that no one need be surprised by Mrs. Jack Johnson's confession that she felt no embarrassment in going to interview any one, because the "interviewee" (what is the Greek equivalent, we wonder, of "interviewee"?) ought to feel grateful to the interviewer for her attentions. The late Mr. Pater called Plato the first essayist; but the "first interviewer" makes the philosopher something still more modern. And to think that poor Nietzsche used to despise Plato as the antiquated post-philosopher of the dressers!

Henry Russell's death has given a slight spurt to the sale of some of his best-known songs, but for the most part the demand for them has for many years been insignificant compared with the enormous sales of their earlier days. "Cheer, Boys, Cheer," now the property of Messrs. Chappell—was at one time so popular that thirty-nine printing-presses had to be kept at work night and day to meet the demand. The strains of "Cheer, Boys, Cheer," helped to encourage our soldiers as they left England for the Crimean War, but very little was heard of it while the troops were pouring out to South Africa a year ago; Sir Arthur Sullivan's music to Mr. Kipling's words was then the song of the hour; and it is a coincidence, after an interval of forty-five years, that both composers should die within a week of each other.

* * * *

"Cheer, Boys, Cheer," to which Mr. Russell referred with mistaken modesty as one of his poorest compositions, belongs to a type of song in which our English musical répertoire is peculiarly rich. Purcell's "Britons, Strike Home!" "Come if You Dare," and "Mad Tom" were the first in a long list of tunes which for sheer heartiness both in words and music have few parallels in other countries. Handel himself, the special favourite of the English people, is said to have been affected by our Falstaffian spirit of good cheer which has vented itself again and again in songs of the "flowing bowl" and of the "roast beef of old England." But the sea has always been a deeper source of inspiration. Our epic and narrative poets have been too little inspired by the waves that beat on our shores; but our song writers, Dibdin, Campbell and the rest, have more than made up for the deficiency. Mr. Russell's "A Life on the Ocean Wave" was not so good as "Hearts of Oak," "Ye Mariners of England," "The Bay of Biscay," or "Tom Bowling"; but it belongs to the same tradition, and it compares favourably, for instance, with "The Death of Nelson," or with lighter naval ditties, such as

> I'm married to a Mermaid
> At the bottom of the deep blue sea.

* * * *

Another of his popular songs was "The Ivy Green," the words of which are so familiar to readers of "Pickwick." This ballad, perhaps the favourite of all Dickens' verse, was, however, first set to music by the novelist's brother-in-law, Mr. Henry Burnett, at the author's request, and was sung by him (Mr. Burnett) scores of times among literary men and artists, Landor being particularly fond of it. The ballad was not written for "Pickwick," but on its being so much admired, Dickens said it should go into a monthly number, and it appeared in the sixth chapter. A writer in the Daily News declares that "'The Ivy Green' was sung—or pretended to be sung"—by Dickens at his farewell reading at St. James's Hall in 1870, and it would be interesting to know his authority for this statement. No allusion is made to such an incident in Forster's "Life," nor in Charles Kent's "Charles Dickens as a Reader," nor in George Dolby's

"Charles Dickens as I Knew Him." Indeed, there is (we believe) no reason, as far as we know, for supposing that The Novelist ever attempted to sing—at any rate in public.

For the historian of English music great interest attaches to a Mass being given at the Brompton Oratory during the present Advent. If we except a recent performance at the College at Downside, this composition probably has not been heard before. It is not generally known that Tallis, or Tallys as he spelt his name, the father of English Church Music, wrote a Mass. No mention of it appears either in Dr. Burney, Sir John Hawkins, or even in Grove's Dictionary of Music. It has, indeed, only lately been discovered in four part MS. in the British Museum, and has never been printed. Queen Mary may have heard it sung in the Chapel Royal if, as is often stated, Tallis was organist there; or the Monks at Waltham Abbey may have listened to it, for Tallis was their organist at the dissolution of that monastery. But from that time to the present it has remained only in the notation of the composer. Although Tallis and his pupil Byrd had a joint monopoly of printing music from Queen Elizabeth, they were presumably unwilling to produce a work in print that might savour of Popery. Yet, though carelessly written, it is of great interest to the technical musician, besides being a work of extreme beauty. The Benedictus qui venis is amongst the noblest things of the finest time of music. The whole work is of extreme importance to the historian of music, for it shows a school of music existing in England independent of the great school of Palestrina in Rome. Palestrina's first Mass, the Missa Papæ Marcelli, was written in 1563. That Mass, even if it was prior to this one of Tallis, was certainly unknown to him then. And this reflection may well be made—that as both Tallis and others of our early musicians, as well as Palestrina himself, founded their exquisite style on common predecessors, how is it we never hear, nowadays, the music by which these great masters were educated? The Mass is perfect except that it has no kyrie; the kyrie used at the Brompton Oratory is an adaptation of a Motet of Tallis.

We seem to have done some injustice to Professor Thatcher of Chicago in a note which we recently published on a lecture he was supposed to have delivered on Charles I. Mr. Edward Osgood Brown, Counsellor-at-Law, writes to us from Chicago to assure us that the Professor's "worst offence in the way of 'slang' was an instance or two of colloquial expressions, in his teaching work, which would have passed entirely unnoticed if uttered from any chair in England, but which the 'priggishness,' so to speak, of certain of his female auditors made a subject of criticism which accidentally reached the newspapers." The quotation which we gave was, as Mr. Brown supposes, "taken from some American newspaper, where it was jocosely ascribed to Professor Thatcher." This, says our correspondent, is "a very common form of American humour." The jocosity of the newspaper which gave the extract had, we fully admit, escaped us. For us in the old country the true inwardness of the Chicago humorist is somewhat subtle; we have hardly yet risen to what may be called "the higher jocosity." But we are much obliged to Mr. Brown; and the more so because he assures us that "those of us in America who have most attachment to the 'old home' and its people are often obliged to defend your fellow-countrymen from the charge that they have a very poor sense of humour, and find it difficult to take a joke."

* * * *

Last week we touched on M. Rostand's poem on Kruger and some of its absurdities, and we notice that even the most "nationalist" of the more purely literary journals of Paris has been exercising its irony on the poem. The Echo de Paris has published an article by M. Lucien Descaves, entitled "Have we a National Poet?" M. Descaves is constrained to admit that, in spite of M. Rostand, France has not yet a national poet, not yet an emulator of Mr. Rudyard Kipling.

The position he says evidently tempts M. Rostand. . . . But he has understood with much good sense that his successes as a dramatist did not suffice to confer upon him a privilege which belongs to no one in France since the death of Victor Hugo. . . . Much was expected of M. Rostand, but I am bound to admit that his débuts in the rôle of national poet are not looked upon as a coup de maître. . . . "Ah," say his admirers, "if you only heard Coquelin or Mme. Reichenberg declaim:—

> Je dis que l'empereur aux moustaches en pointes
> Sourira quand cet être clair
> Paraîtra sur le seuil en disant, les mains jointes—
> 'Mon cousin, c'est monsieur Krüger.'"

Certainly the scene would gain by being played, even if only by a pupil of the Conservatory as clever at repeating "Mon cousin c'est M. Krüger" as "le petit chat est mort." A national poet must be able to do without such assistance.

Some of the poetry in L'Aiglon is equally dependent upon stage rendering, and this explains, quite as well as M. Rostand's recent illness, the long delay in the publication of L'Aiglon, which is now at last accessible to every reader (Fasquelle, 3f. 50c.). Its workmanship too often betrays the laborious hand of the "Ode to Kruger." There is lyric and dramatic energy to spare, astonishing ingenuity, and also a meridional flow of words. But poetry is more than this, and such utterances as these show what it is not:—

> Oh! d'abord, l'amitié, tante aux yeux de cousine,
> L'amitié de l'amour est toujours trop voisine.
> Entre les tantes et les neveux, les filleuls
> Et les marraines—oh! sentez-vous les tilleuls?
> Entre les colonels et les chocolatières,
> Pour qu'il n'y ait jamais d'incidents de frontières.

Whence sprang that peculiar product Gilbertian wit, if not wholly in the brain of Mr. Gilbert? Some answer to this question may be found in the "Théâtre de Meilhac et Halévy," just published by M. Calmann Lévy in two small volumes, Frou Frou, La Belle Hélène, L'Été de la Saint Martin, and Le Roi Candaule being in the first; and in the second, La Petite Marquise, La Veuve, La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein, L'Ingénue, and Les Sonnettes. When Kergazon in the Petite Marquise says:—"Il n'est pas indispensable que je soupe. Il suffira que j'ai l'air d'avoir soupé," one seems to be listening to the violins of the old Savoy. The rollicking note rings almost as wittily from the printed page as from behind the footlights. What a contrast to the theatre of the North—to the "When We Dead Awake" of Ibsen, which appeared in a French translation published by MM. Perrin on the very same day as the "Théâtre de Meilhac et Halévy."

Among Mr. Lane's announcements is that of a new edition of the late Sir Arthur Helps' History of "The Spanish Conquest in America," edited by Mr. Michael Oppenheim. One is pathetically reminded of the transitoriness of literary fame by the remark of a contemporary that Helps is probably now best remembered as the editor of the Queen's "Journal of My Life in the Highlands." Thirty years ago there were few more accepted essayists than Sir Arthur Helps. His "Friends in Council" attained so much of the position of a classic as to be a favourite school prize; and no gentleman's library was complete without it. Nor was the favour undeserved. Dialogue has been much in favour since Helps' day, yet few writers have managed the difficult business of serious dialogue more naturally than he, and his skilfully contrasted group of talkers, notably Ellesmere, the witty lawyer, was well conceived. To the last generation it seemed a natural thing that, when the Franco-German War broke out, Ellesmere and his friends should be invited to discourse at large in the leading review on "The War and General Culture."

Dr. Momerie, who died suddenly last week, was known as an eloquent preacher and a theologian of the sort that is sometimes called "advanced" and "daring." He objected to what he called "mechanical theology," but claimed the right to prefer his objections without quitting the Church of England to cultivate heresy while drawing the line at schism. His opinions necessitated his retirement from two appointments—a Professorship of Logic and Metaphysics at King's College, London, and the morning preachership at the Foundling Hospital. His best known books are "The Origin of Evil," "Personality," "Dogmas of Modern Christianity," "The Basis of Religion," "Belief in God," "Inspiration," "Church and Creed"—all written from a standpoint hardly compatible with membership of the Church. As an ornate pulpit orator Dr. Momerie had a considerable following.

The homes of Dickens are slowly but surely disappearing. Might we not therefore make the most of those that are left? In Mr. Hammond Hall's article on "The Writing of 'Pickwick,'" in the New York Book Buyer, there is an illustration of No. 48, Doughty-street. Here, in the back room on the ground floor, it is said that the concluding chapters of "Pickwick" and nearly all "Oliver Twist" and "Nicholas Nickleby" were written. This fact surely justifies the fixing of a tablet on the front of the house, recording the above particulars. We commend the suggestion to the Society of Arts.

It is announced that the houses in Fleet-street, from Nos. 23 to 28, will shortly be demolished for rebuilding purposes—which presumably means the removal of Messrs. W. Clowes and Sons, who publish (at No. 27) "The Law Reports" and "Hymns Ancient and Modern." No. 27 is interesting for other reasons; it occupies the site upon which the "Hercules Pillars" once stood, famous in the days when tavern life was in its glory, and well-known to Pepys. The tavern faced St. Dunstan's Church, now partially eclipsed by the building which has blotted out the memorial to Izaak Walton and given the church a lamentably one-sided appearance, with the statue of Queen Elizabeth looking grimier than ever in the background. Pepys first mentions the tavern on October 11th, 1660, when, after going to the cockpit to see Burt act the Moor in The Moor of Venice—which was so well done that "by the same token, a very pretty lady who sat by me called out to see Desdemona smothered"—he adjourned "with Mr. Creed to Hercules Pillars, where we drank." Another day he took his wife there, with Betty Turner, Mercer, and Deb, "and did give them a kind of supper of about 7s., and was very merry," and, again, after staying about the Court at St. James's for a while, he "went to look for a dinner, and had it at the Hercules Pillars, very late, all alone, costing me 10d." There is no visible sign of these associations to-day, and the passer-by is usually too busy to bother his head about such things; but it is well to perpetuate some memory of the spot before the pick-axe gets to work again.

* * * *

Apropos of the uncut edition of Browning's "Pauline," sold last week for £120 (see under "Sales of Books and MSS.," page 490), readers of Literature may be glad to have details of the defect whereby the value was considerably diminished. A small hole was discovered on page 21 which robbed the text of sixteen letters. The following line on page 21 lacked the italicized letters:—

And then I shall show how these elements.

Behind, on page 22, a line was similarly marred:—

And of my powers, one springs up to save.

What sum the first uncut copy sold by auction would have realized had it not been for this defect it is difficult to say.

The Claim to be Booed.

There are certain aspects of the question of booing and being booed at theatres on first nights which give it an interest somewhat wider than the purely professional one. The theatrical side of it is still exercising the correspondents of certain newspapers.

It is a curious question, and not the least curious thing about it is the fact that intelligent people talk as if it were a question on which opinions could reasonably be divided. The right to boo has, we believe, been declared by a Judge sitting to interpret the common law of the land, and one would have thought that the right of an author to stay away from the theatre rather than take the risk of being booed was as clear as his right to stop indoors in cold weather rather than take the risk of catching cold. Yet Mrs. Craigie, the intelligence of whose attitude towards most questions cannot be disputed, declares, with the concurrence of some other playwrights of repute, that an author is guilty of "cowardice" if he or she declines to face the music and smile benignly in response to the catcalls of the gallery. This is to confound the functions of the artist with those of the showman. It also implies the erroneous view that the actor and the playwright stand in a similar relation towards the public. Actors, living by applause, must confront, with such equanimity as they require and can command, the alternative possibility of being hissed. It is a part of their education—one of the means by which they rise on stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things. In France it used even to be argued that this necessity was one of the reasons for degrading actors to a lower social scale. That view has happily passed away, and indeed, in these democratic days, it would have to brand platform speakers with an equal ignominy. But where is the law, written or unwritten, which obliges the dramatist to submit himself to this ordeal? It certainly cannot be deduced from the practice of those who follow other branches of art. Painters and sculptors do not think it necessary to unveil their pictures and statues before the eyes of mixed assemblages that will yell at them if the work does not happen to meet with their approval. Poets are generally careful to make sure of their audiences before they begin reading their poems aloud. They know, of course, that whoever publishes a work of art invites the reasonable criticism of the public; he is held to do so by the law, and the law accords with common sense. But authors do not invite it in circumstances in which they are liable to be exposed to any public condemnation. Why, then, should the dramatic author make a law for himself, and make it a point of honour to obtrude his personality, as well as his work of art, upon a fortuitous concourse of self-elected judges who have paid a shilling each for their places on the judgment seat? There is no reason why he should do so, and some dramatic authors, we are glad to say, are careful not to do so. Nor is the reason why the practice, on the whole, gains ground entirely creditable to those who follow it. It is, in fact, of a piece with the common tendency of the day, particularly conspicuous in literary circles, to use the personality of the artist as a means of exploiting his art, and to satisfy the public curiosity on matters on which the public has no right to be curious. The tendency has grown largely of late years, and editors imagine that they pay an author a compliment by publishing his portrait when they review his books. Instead of letting his message rest on its own merits they help him to gain a hearing by describing his appearance and unveiling his personal history, by telling the world that he lives in Kensington and owns a motor car. It is a depressing tendency wherever one sees it. In the case of authors a certain excuse may be made for their concessions to the idle inquisitiveness of their readers; for, strange as it may seem, these self-revelations have a certain market value. There are readers who would sooner read a novel by a man who drives a motor car than a novel by a man who only drives a donkey cart; so that the novelist with an eye for business acts wisely, not only in buying the motor car, but also in letting the world know that he has bought it. But this plea is not available for dramatists in the case under consideration. Their appearances before the curtain have no more market value than artistic value. The suggestion that vanity may have any share in these appearances is indignantly repudiated by Mrs. Craigie, and, indeed, her literary and dramatic position may be said to have passed the stage at which the indulgence of such a feeling may be excused or expected. But when we analyse the matter from a purely impersonal standpoint, it is hard to arrive at any other explanation of the desire on the part of dramatic authors to "bow before the curtain."

Personal Views.

THE MAN OF LETTERS AND THE PUBLIC.

That he who lives to please must please to live is indisputable. All writers of books who depend upon their writings for a livelihood must gratify the taste of some section of the reading public. The only alternative to "pleasing to live" is for the writer to be independent, either by private fortune, or by exertion in some other sphere of toil. Then he can follow his own bent. "I have often thought," wrote Sir Walter Scott to good old Parson and Poet Crabbe, "I have often thought it is the most fortunate thing for birds like you and me to have an established profession and professional character, to render us independent of those worthy gentlemen, the retailers, or, as some have called them, the midwives of literature, who are so much taken up with the abortions they bring into the world, that they are scarcely able to bestow the proper care upon young and flourishing babes like ours. That, however, is only a mercantile way of looking at the matter; but, did any of my sons show poetical talent, of which, to my great satisfaction, there are no appearances, the first thing I should do would be to inculcate upon him the duty of cultivating some honourable profession, and qualifying him to play a more respectable part in society than the mere poet."

Whatever we may think of the "respectability" of the poet's career, there is sound sense in Scott's words, as there generally was in anything Scott took the trouble to say. A writer who has a squalling, starving family around him, like the poor wretch in Hogarth's picture; who is forced to write for sheer life, cannot do his best. "Having the prospect and terrors of poverty constantly before his eyes," he is only too likely to follow the example of Perugino, who, according to Vasari, "undertook works for gain on which he would probably not have cast his eyes if he had possessed wherewith to support himself." It is one of the endless controversies whether the best work is likely to be produced by men who have their living to gain or by those whose present and future are assured. Would Goldsmith have left us more "Vicars of Wakefield" and more She Stoops to Conquer if he had not been perpetually harried by improvidence and the booksellers? Possibly he would. On the other hand, it is quite likely that, except under the spur of need, Goldy would never have troubled himself to write a line of anything more serious than letters to his tailor ordering plum-coloured suits or scarlet breeches, like the famous pair in which he presented himself for ordination. Look at Fielding's career. When he wanted a dinner, he wrote the plays which no one except Mr. Bernard Shaw now pretends to care for. It was not until he was removed from immediate anxiety by his magistrate's salary that he wrote "Tom Jones," that exquisite picture of humour and manners which, in Gibbon's magniloquent phrase, "will outlive the palace of the Escurial and the Imperial Eagle of Austria."

The best work is done, as a rule, by those who are not compelled to struggle against actual want. Now there are a great many writers of the present day who are obliged to make a living out of their work, and the steady deterioration of the standard of public taste is for them a calamity. The serious, sincere man of letters is not greedy of gain. "A literary man," P. G. Hamerton said, "ought to be satisfied with earning £500 a year." That income, small as it may be reckoned nowadays, is enough to put him beyond reach of actual want. But it is becoming more and more difficult every year for literary men to earn £500 a year, and this is one reason why so very little literature of any value is produced. The men who, with time at their disposal, might produce it, are forced to take service with the Tenth Muse and to spend their strength upon ephemeral instead of permanent labours. Oliver Wendell Holmes hit off the ideal for the man of letters in his verses on "Contentment":—

> I care not much for gold or land;
> Give me a mortgage here and there —
> Some good bank-stock — some note of hand,
> Or trifling railroad share.
> I only ask that Fortune send
> A little more than I shall spend.

The literary man to whom Fortune denies even the little that he needs must spend can do no good to himself nor any service to his time.

So depressing is the outlook at this moment that a suggestion was lately made that we should revive the "patron"—that poets should attach themselves to some modern Mæcenas or Chesterfield, and work to please his taste and their own instead of the taste of the public. But we cannot go back to the methods of past ages. The individual patron gave way to the State as patron; the State gave way to the bookseller; and the bookseller in his turn gave way to the public. The public is now the only patron writers can hope to win — that is, if their object is to make writing support them. Personally, if we were to go back to any of these methods, I would sooner have the State as patron than the individual. It is true you had to find some individual to introduce you to the State with due appreciation of your great claims upon the State's gratitude. But, as soon as this was over, you were your own man again. When Addison got his Commissionership of Appeals, when Steele was made surveyor of the Royal Stables, when Matt Prior became Secretary of Embassy, they had no longer to bear themselves as suitors. They stood up straight in their square-toed shoes. They had done their party some service, and their party knew it, and they had their reward. So things went on comfortably enough, literature holding on behind the state-coach of politics until Walpole found out an easier trick. Instead of bribing the wits to influence opinion, Walpole bribed the House of Commons itself. It cost a little more money, but it was more effective. The poor wits found themselves left out in the cold. Here was the bookseller's opportunity, and he took it.

The bookseller's day—and a hard, moiling day it was for the poor hacks—ended somewhere about the end of last century. By that time writers had begun to find that there was a public to which they could appeal direct. They threw off the yoke of Grub Street. They became the masters instead of the servants—or rather they changed their servitude. Far-sighted booksellers, if there were any such, accustomed to the "intelligent anticipation of events even before they occur," must have chuckled grimly at the author's exultation to be free. "Thou hast appealed unto Cæsar," they might have said, "unto Cæsar shalt thou go." And the state of the author to-day amply justifies their malevolent chuckles. The Cæsar, to whom the author appealed, was the public which can read. So long as it was such a public as he had at the time of his revolt, his state was the more gracious. He did not contemplate the development of the sort of public he has to face to-day.

From this body of readers taken in the mass the man of letters can expect neither support nor sympathy. But it is a mistake to suppose that the public in the mass is the only body to which an appeal can be made. There are in reality many publics. There is even a public, strange as it may seem, for good work. But it is a public widely scattered. The difficult task before those who produce and those who care for good work is to consolidate it, to establish lines of communication, to find some means of bringing the best that is thought and felt to the notice of those who have an appetite for it. In this lies our only hope. There are many men of letters who would be content with Mr. Hamerton's £500 a year, and the section of the public which would stand by them is large enough to provide this modest income by purchasing their books, if only it were made aware of their merits. Unless the producers and the amateurs of good literature can be brought together, the supply must inevitably cease so far as those are concerned who are obliged to live by their pens. Good work, it is true, is done by men who are under no such obligation. But the growing tendency amongst the latter class is to the predominance of what the American calls the "freak-author," an Ignatius Donnelly, for example, or a Mr. Augustus Hare, who writes his uneventful life in innumerable stout volumes. Authors must be subject to a healthy criticism if we are to have the best that is in them—and the criticism they need can come only from the wise few not from the foolish many. The only test that can be applied to the work of a man of letters during his lifetime is—does it win the sympathy and admiration of the majority of intelligent readers? In the present day it is difficult for men of letters to be sure that their work will reach this class. If they persevere in face of discouragement, as Mr. Meredith persevered and Mr. Henry James (to take two obvious examples), they are recognized in the slow course of time, and the mass of intelligent opinion ranges itself solidly upon their side. But where a few fight on, many give up the battle in despair.

The man of letters is seldom sufficiently business-like to establish personal relations with his public. What we want is a class of middlemen who would make it their business to supply the wants of the intelligent alone. A publisher who made up his mind to do this would soon create a position for himself. He would, of course, decline to publish on commission; to lend his name—that is to say, to authors who pay for the pleasure of foisting on the public their unsaleable wares. He would equally decline to issue lives of minor celebrities, living or departed, at the charges of themselves or of their friends. He would ask his "reader" to recommend to him, not the kind of book that would sell at once in enormous numbers, but the books which give genuine pleasure to cultivated minds and which seem likely to yield a fair profit. He would be content, in short, with moderate gains. The satisfaction he would feel when he reviewed his publications (for we assume him to be a man of taste and conscience in literary matters) would compensate for the loss of a "palace in Park-lane" and any other magnificence he might have missed. I believe a publisher working on these lines would have no cause for regret. I believe that a theatrical manager who set about catering consistently for the intelligent playgoer would find it a paying as well as an honourable employ. Around such a publisher and such a theatre, informed, cultivated opinion would concentrate. They would serve to focus intelligent criticism, intelligent interest in books and plays. They would stimulate artistic and intellectual effort; they might, in time, re-establish the standards we solely need. The way lies open. Are there no enterprising, far-sighted men of the coming generation who will follow it?

STUDIES IN RECENT FICTION.

II.—THE WEIRD.

I heard it said recently that the "Uncle Silas" [illegible] of novel was dead and gone. It has not so much disappeared as changed its aim. It exists in the basement and the cellar-room (with occasional direful results to the latter!), but the drawing-room no longer thrills to the creak of the hidden trap-doors or the sough of the wind in the moat. It may be due to a refinement of our sensibilities; it may be only one more sign of degeneracy. The fact remains that our nerves refuse to be affected any longer by what I might call the natural-heir trick, the commonly terrifying. When Mrs. Williamson is brave enough to [illegible] her inconvenient gift of humour and write book after book in the style of "Lady Mary of the Dark House," we read with only a mild interest in the author's ingenuity how somebody came to a bed-room in the Dark House, swept away the hair from the temples of somebody else, and proceeded to hammer in a death-dealing nail. That nail would have probably made our flesh creep even so short a time ago as the year in which appeared "The House on the Marsh." To-day it leaves us calm. When Lord Ernest Hamilton tells of "The Perils of Josephine" and leads that unhappy young person through a series of excursions with bolting horses, sliding panels, crazed cousins, [illegible] priests, and burning houses, we are sensible of being mildly entertained by what reviewers call "the assured fluency of the style." We even call it "a pleasant little story." Poor Lord Ernest Hamilton, with his well-meaning horrors! Mr. William Le Queux deals also in deserted houses, miscellaneous corpses, strangely changed at birth (so to speak), and deadly drugs that suspend consciousness. A strong impression remains with the reader that "these things are not done." In our well-policed days, the most malevolent of wicked uncles whom our father's will is keeping out of his rights is hardly the cloaked and sinister figure that he was. Our rival in love is not so likely to drop poison into our tea as to pity us for our unfortunate taste in collars. Our athletic young women, with their inches and their biceps, cannot be counted upon to swoon when the panel slides back, but would probably make things unpleasant for the slider. When Dr. Arabella Kenealy gives us a heroine like "Clarissa Renée," who suffers from mysterious visitants and blood-stained knives as if the century were only middle aged, we do not shudder with Renée, we only wonder at the anachronism.

The world has begun to realize that the true horror is not fear of death, of dangerous weapons, or of violent persons, but of the unknown waters that for ever lap our feet, chilling us as no cold steel can chill if we step but an inch too near. It needs no fantastic background, no conventional adjuncts. For a serpentine effect one need not produce a serpent. The age wants no trappings of secret staircases or sheeted apparitions. The more ordinary the surroundings, the more effective the terrible incongruity, the sudden revulsion from the commonplace. Among modern writers, Mr. Arthur Machen has fully realized the value of incongruity in the weird. In "The Inmost Light," his sequel to "The Great God Pan," it is among "the rows of red houses and the rows of white houses and the bright green venetians and the blistering doorways and the little backyards they call gardens"—in modern, unspeakably new and unghostly Harlesden, in short—that he sees the face at the window, and the inhuman something that made that face so awesome. Throughout the book the actual horror is kept, like Queen Elizabeth in "The Critic," outside upon the door-mat—but none the less it is a Presence—for we still respect that capital P—and it makes itself felt. Put the horrid thing into definite, descriptive words, and its power is gone. It ranks with "the ills we know," instead of filling us with the vague terror of "those we know not of." Of this unnerving suggestive power Mr. Machen's books are among the best modern specimens, and are, moreover, written in admirable English. True, he condescends in his "Three Impostors" to red-hot irons and the slow burning of human flesh, with other engaging tortures. But he by no means depends for a gruesome effect upon mere pain. The "clumsy movement, as of a beast's paw," that pushes aside the blind in Leicester's room is more horrifying in its suggestion than the catastrophe that follows. Mr. Machen's reviewers pronounced him impressively appalling. The Hartford Courant (U.S.A.) went so far as to draw a moral inference from him. "The implied lesson," it said, "is that it is dangerous and unwise to seek to probe the mystery separating mind and matter." The story certainly proved the great unwisdom of any such attempt!

Mr. Hichens can juggle with most styles, and he is at home with the weird. In the parrot tale in his "Tongues of Conscience" there is a horror about the unseen third person in the servant's house, and the longer it is kept vague the more "creepy" it is. First we find ourselves regarding the parrot itself with some uneasiness. We have a horrid fear, skilfully encouraged by Mr. Hichens, that he is the third person. When the supernatural element is dragged into the light of day and its mannerisms and voice described our interest cools off. But the thing is well done. Mr. Henry James' taste in the weird needs no description and hardly admits of it—a fact which shows its genuine quality. "Q's," too, has a quality of its own. One of his less important tales, "The Real Householder," shows it best, I think. The moment when the unwonted silence of the house-dog strikes the visitor and sends him straight to the room where "the real householder" lies, a murdered man, is a moment which remains with one, at any rate till dinner time. The reader who can recall his creepy moments will probably think of Mr. Richard Marsh. His "Beetle" really effected a little curdling of the blood. Since then, he has turned out some half-a-dozen books a year. His rate of writing is prodigious, and, naturally enough, the work suffers. Sometimes, though by no means always, he is utterly dreary. Nothing could be more unequal than the tales in "The Seen and Unseen." They begin with a foolish, far-fetched, altogether unimpressive reptile story. The next has atmosphere; it is about the figure of the convict's absent wife who invariably appeared in all photographs of the convict. The Tipster again is a good story. Given time, Mr. Richard Marsh's weird should hold its own; but he does not give it time, or trouble enough.

But the weird is a subject difficult and elusive to discuss; you mar its potency by criticism, even by admiring criticism. If you can say that a book has the true touch, the true horror, there is nothing more to say. If a writer would describe cold, all the icebergs he can pile up will not convince you like a thin draught of freezing air, creeping between hair and collar. So with the really successful weird novel. Its horror must be unanalysable, instant, inevitable; at the right moment we must shudder and catch the breath; and the old machinery has become inadequate for the purpose. A. H.

EARLY BOOK AUCTIONS.

The copy of William Cooper's first catalogue, lately acquired by the British Museum, recalls an interesting chapter in the history of English bookselling. To William Cooper belongs the honour of having introduced the "Auctionary Way" into this country, though the method seems to have been practised by the Elzevirs at Leyden at least seventy years before it came to England. "Reader," says William Cooper in the preface to the catalogue of his first sale—which began on October 31, 1676, at his bookshop at the sign of the "Pelican" in Little Britain—"It hath not been usual here in England to make sales of Books by way of Auction, or who will give most for them; But it having been practised in other countreys to the Advantage both of Buyers and Sellers; It was therefore conceived (for the encouragement of Learning) to publish the Sale of these Books this manner of way; and it is hoped that it will not be unacceptable to Schollers." The catalogue deals with between five and six thousand lots—forming the library of Dr. Lazarus Seaman, one of the Assembly of Divines—and Cooper realized about £1,600 by them. The second sale, which was also held by Cooper in Little Britain, was that of the library of the Rector of Hitchin: and these first attempts, according to the catalogue of the third sale—which took place at the Turk's Head Coffee House in Bread-street—gave "great content and satisfaction to the gentlemen who were the buyers, and no discouragement to the sellers."

Other booksellers then followed suit, and the sales soon became common in London; but it was apparently ten years before the method found its way to the provinces—introduced by Edward Millington—and twelve years before it reached Scotland. John Dunton, the Quixotic bookseller, "who," in the elder Disraeli's words, "boasted that he had a thousand projects, fancied he had methodized 600, and was ruined by the fifty he executed," took a shipload of books in 1698 to sell by auction in Dublin. He had proved unsuccessful as a regular bookseller in London, as well as unfortunate in his second marriage; but he returned to London boasting that he had done greater service to literature by his auctions "than any single man that had come into Ireland these hundred years." His financial troubles increasing, Dunton took to scribbling, although he declares that he "could not stoop so low as to turn author"—which he nevertheless thinks was what he was born to. His "Life and Errors of John Dunton, late Citizen of London, written in Solitude," in which, "out of mere gratitude," he says something pleasant about "the characters of the most eminent of the profession," has been described as the "maddest of all mad books," but it is an extremely useful volume in the bibliography of bookselling. Edward Millington was one of Dunton's most distinguished contemporaries:—"He had a quick wit and a wonderful fluency of speech. There was usually as much wit in his 'One, two, three!' as can be met with in a modern play. 'Where,' said Millington, 'is your generous flame for learning? Who but a sot or a blockhead would have money in his pocket, and starve his brains?'"

There is no doubt that the new system greatly encouraged the love of reading throughout the country. One catalogue mentioned in Mr. Lawler's little book on the subject ("Book-Auctions in England in the Seventeenth Century") specially invites the country clergy to buy at low prices for distribution among their parishioners, and a bid of one penny was frequently accepted. "The Life and Trial of Sir W. Raleigh" could be bought for 1s. 6d.; Walton's "Life of Hooker" went for 9d.; Lancelot Addison's "Life of Mahomet" for 4d.; "Paradise Lost" for 3s.; "Bacon's Essays" for 2s. 4d.; and theological works for 6d. and 1s. each. The book auction was soon a regular feature at the country fairs, and gradually became a distinct branch of the bookselling trade. There were book-lotteries as well, and sales by inch of candle, announcements to that effect being found in the newspapers of the period. The first English auctioneer to compile good, classified catalogues was Samuel Paterson, of King-street, Covent-garden, who died in 1802—"a man," wrote Johnson, who was godfather to his son Samuel, "for whom I have long had a kindness." Samuel Paterson was a first-rate bibliographer, but he loved his books too well to make a good business man. We are told that when he came across a book that was new to him he would sit reading it for hours, and the time appointed for the sale could go by for all he cared. No wonder he frequently failed in business. Samuel Baker, in 1744, founded the first auction room instituted in this country (in York-street, Covent-garden) exclusively for the sale of books, MSS., and prints, and it was here that Baker's nephew, John Sotheby, entered the business—the first of the long line which has been inseparably associated with the history of book auctioneering for considerably more than a century.

AN IDEAL NEWSPAPER.

We mentioned last week Dr. Parker's forthcoming experiment in the way of a Christian daily paper. The question of a reform in daily journalism has also been agitating New York, where another minister of religion has given his views on the subject. A correspondent in America writes:—

Some of the New York papers have recently discussed the subject of "An Ideal Newspaper." The discussion was begun by a statement made by Dr. Parkhurst, the well-known minister and reformer, to the effect that certain capitalists were considering the publication of such a paper. Dr. Parkhurst lays down, in substance, the following principles which ought to guide an ideal paper :—

It must print all the news.

It must tell the truth and nothing but the truth.

It must have enterprise and courage, and be conducted without fear or favour of any man or party.

It must not pander to the profits derived from advertisements or business, and to guard against such temptation must be amply endowed.

It must lead public opinion and be so conducted as to be believed by the public.

In short, it must be "a newspaper with a high moral purpose which is unshakable and unpurchasable." Parenthetically, I trust this paper when published will be written in grammatical English, a merit which cannot be ascribed to some of the learned Doctor's reported utterances.

The average editor would probably feel some modesty in at once claiming for his own paper the title of "The Ideal Paper," and its readers might even hesitate to give it that title. It is satisfactory, therefore, to have all doubt on this subject removed and all hesitation set at rest by the authoritative announcement of the Journal of New York (in their issue on the day following the publication of the Doctor's statement) that "it (the Journal) answers every item of his description," with the somewhat caustic remark added, that "it never hesitates to nail a mountebank and humbug on sight, even if he occupies a position in which he brings disrepute on an otherwise respectable pulpit." The Journal certainly prints a great mass of detail; but for an ideal paper the Doctor's dictum must read, "all the news that is fit to print"—a rule actually followed by the New York Times and other papers. And news of general interest should have its due space; too much attention should not be given to local and temporary matters. A paper with "a high moral tone" should adjust its news columns so as to educate the people to a truer knowledge of the world's progress. It should also not print details which pander to depraved tastes or create an unhealthy curiosity. I examined with some care and in a hopeful spirit the next day's evening edition of the Journal with the following results:—It consisted of twelve pages of seven columns each. Of these 84 columns, two were deemed sufficient for the news of the world outside of America, two for American news other than that of New York, 34 were given up to advertisements, two to "comic" pictures, the best part of a page to a story entitled "The Burying Alive of Nais," two to a leading article, and the remainder to New York news. The character of this news may be gathered from the headlines. The first page begins with the motto, in letters 1½ inch high, "I will shock Wall Street." Other headings on this page are:—

Girl forger, in jail, took moonlight rides.
Mystery in failure of W. L. Strong's firm.

High moral purpose is further carried out on the following page by paragraphs on—

Seeks divorce from wife whom for years he thought dead.
Widow shot dead by assassins in ambush.
Woman fears father will steal children, and the like. The greater part of a page is given up to an account of "Multi-millionaire J. Pierrepont Morgan's daughter's marriage," with a scheduled statement of the exact cost of the trousseau, breakfast, and other items. Opinions may differ whether all this adequately carried out Dr. Parkhurst's ideas.

As to truthfulness, there are certainly very successful newspapers which prefer sensation and amusement to accuracy. They attract advertisers and business; but (to quote the New York Times) :—"Truthfulness is not only a clear moral obligation for a newspaper, but in the long run, and for the solid and lasting prosperity of the paper, it is essential." The Doctor's dictum as to price seems to me fatal to his scheme. He says:—"In the summer I read the London Times . . . and I feel as a rule that I am reading what is true . . . I recognize that it is not as enterprising, but I get more out of it than I do out of the New York papers. I would gladly pay six cents (threepence) for a good paper here. I do not like to see penny papers; they do not signify anything." Now, if the ideal paper is, according to the present proposal, to be richly endowed, the price would be, more or less, a matter of indifference to the proprietors; but if it is to compete in New York or in other cities with existing papers it would have to be a penny paper. It is just the class that cannot afford a high-priced paper, or will not pay that price when other papers can be obtained for a penny, whom it is desirable to educate, and who form the public opinion which the Doctor wishes to influence. To lead public opinion it must be low-priced, and to have a large circulation it must be attractive. I doubt whether such a paper will really be strong or independent. It must necessarily reflect the opinions of those who endow it, and their continued support could not be relied on if it advocated or gave undue prominence to views which did not harmonize with those of the founders. A paper so conducted would not be on a solid and lasting basis. A somewhat similar discussion, by-the-by, was started in America in February, 1789, when the Monthly Museum of Knowledge and Rational Entertainment, of Boston, published an article advocating the establishment of a newspaper on as elevating principles as those laid down by Dr. Parkhurst.

THE DRAMA.

"THE SECOND IN COMMAND."

Isolation from one's fellow men, especially when it is accompanied by a strict and strange rule of life of another's choosing, curiously alters one's mental perspective. The monk and the convict are, I suppose, the extreme instances; but I can speak without conjecture for the invalid. If I allude to the sick-room it is with no impertinent idea of teazing the reader with my private concerns, but merely to put him on his guard against anything I may have to say about Captain Marshall's Haymarket comedy The Second in Command, which, recalled to memory after an intervening fortnight of solitude and medicine bottles, can hardly seem to me the thing that it did. The truth is that the theatre and all its works come to appear in the eyes of the isolated man very easily negligible. To be denied tobacco or solid food is tiresome enough; not to be able to read is a really terrible privation; but one very readily makes shift to do without the theatre. It is so bustling, so garish, one has to elbow so many strangers there! There are men I know who are born passionate lovers of the theatre, men who after ten years' penal servitude would make straight from the prison gates to the nearest penny gaff. I have seen these men, pursy and portly citizens some of them, at the corner of the street standing in rapt enjoyment before a Punch-and-Judy show. The huge and hideous posters on the hoardings are set up to please these men—to say nothing of the miserable theatrical chit-chat and scandal and photographs and interviews in the newspapers. For these people, of course, physicians are in vain. As a rule these people do not read books; nor for art of any kind, in itself, do they care much. In reality they exhibit a peculiar form of the gregarious instinct. The playhouse means for them primarily a congenial crowd, just as a dance does to others, and to others yet again a public dinner, a procession, or a fashionable church service. And note that what the born theatre-lover loves most in the theatre is precisely the most theatrical part of it. He dislikes what he calls "literary" plays because they remind him of the books and solitary cogitation which his soul abhors. He dislikes plays which offer him a faithful transcript of life because these subsume the superiority of life to the theatre. No; what he likes is the theatrical, that which is written solely from the point of view of the theatre, characters that are readily recognizable theatrical types. No matter that they are false—faux à crier—in the broad light of day, so long as they "make up" well for the footlights. For your true theatre-lover they cannot be too exaggerated in outline and colour, too stilted in language, too strained in sentiment. It is significant (and from the "isolated" point of view which I am driven to adopt just now it is damning) that not a "boo" was heard, not a funeral note, on the first night of Captain Marshall's comedy. For here was an adroit combination of all the theatrical things that delight the born playgoer.

I will take a capital instance. The most effective scene in the play is that at the end of the third act, when Major Bingham's regiment departs for South Africa, drums beating and colours flying, while the major himself, always unlucky, always passed over, is the one man left behind. He sinks into a chair and buries his face in his hands and, in the consecrated phrase, there was not a dry eye in the house. And yet no sooner has the curtain risen on the next act than we learn it was all a false alarm. The major, having successfully importuned the War Office, did go to the front after all; and so we had been cheated out of our emotion. From the point of view of real drama, then, this great scene was nothing else than fraudulent. But as a passing theatrical trick it was eminently successful.

Another example. The major has resigned the heroine, suggested to him by an unhappy bungle but not in love with him, to the colonel, whom she does love. Then, upon suspicious inquiries from the colonel, the major, in a fit of momentary weakness, lets it appear that he was really the girl's love. Subsequently, ashamed of this lie, he determines to make a clean breast of it. To the colonel? Oh, no; for if the colonel knows the truth there is at once an end of the play. To the girl? Yes; but how? Not by word of mouth, for the girl would at once tell the colonel, and again there would be an end of the play. No, the major actually is at the pains to leave the girl's presence in order to write her a note of confession; and being agitated at the moment she lets the note go unread. By this artifice the colonel is packed off safe to Africa without the revelation of the play-ending secret. Now plays that can only be spun out to a conclusion by the device of making every participant in them act at a critical moment without a particle of common sense are conspicuously "theatrical" plays. I say nothing of the music lover who is taunted by his sweetheart into enlisting; he comes from a long line of Adelphi ancestors, and we saw him only a few weeks ago in Colonel Cromwell at the Globe. I say nothing of the extraordinarily tall talk of the officers of the Tenth Dragoons—their Della Cruscan tropes and metaphors, their "libations at the altar of Hymen," their "battered hearts, laid in the lavender of memory and wrapped up in the brown paper of experience," and all the rest of it. This sort of talk is not only not military, it is not even human; but it is eminently theatrical. The born theatre-lover has heard it from a boy, and feels he can never have heard enough of it.

But, as I warned the reader, he must set down all these comments as those of the temporarily isolated man. And even my most of aloofness from the theatre cannot induce me to remember Mr. Cyril Maude's humorous-pathetic Major Bingham with anything but gratitude or to find the whole play, however flimsy or artificial it may be, anything but sweet and kind in taste and tone.

CHURCH, CHAPEL, AND LITERATURE.

PURITAN AND ANGLICAN: STUDIES IN LITERATURE. By EDWARD DOWDEN. (Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.)

This is a volume of essays, united by a common subject, but not built upon a common plan. Some of them do little more than extract the essence of old books seldom read except by the professional students of literature and theology. Some of them, too, though extremely well-considered and judicious, exhibit that sort of sustained and somewhat didactic gravity which a reader who remembers Stevenson and Sainte Beuve may sometimes feel in the case of some of our modern literary critics—especially in America—to be a little excessive. This, however, is the only criticism, if it be a criticism, which we feel inclined to pass on these essays, which well display Professor Dowden's scholarship, wealth of phrase, and originality of view. They treat an interesting subject from many points of view, and in a sound and suggestive manner. The question at issue is the influence on English literature of Anglicanism and Puritanism. To a certain extent, perhaps, the battle between the two points of view covers the same ground as the old battle, celebrated by Matthew Arnold, between Hellenism and Hebraism; but the issue which Professor Dowden has chosen for examination is more circumscribed. The Hellenism of the most characteristic Hellenists, like Keats and Shelley and Mr. Swinburne, was quite uninfluenced by any Church, whether free or by law established; and at the period when Puritanism most successfully exalted its horn, the writers who might be taken to have a savour of Hebraism were often better Hellenists than their opponents. Milton is the great example; Professor Dowden cites Colonel Hutchinson and sundry others. His attention, therefore, is concentrated upon those contributions to literature which have obviously been produced under the direct influence of religion as expressed in a creed. And thus the question arises: Why is it that, though the Puritans deliberately opposed themselves to every poetical and artistic adjunct to religious worship—breaking stained glass windows, destroying images, vulgarizing Church music—they were yet able to write masterpieces of imaginative religious literature which have impressed and moved the world far more than the imaginative works of Churchmen?

The fact that they have done this is beyond doubt or argument. Among men of culture, Puritanism produced John Milton, whilst Anglicanism only produced George Herbert. Among writers who were not scholars, Puritanism can point to Bunyan, and Anglicanism can only point to allegorists of the calibre of "A.L.O.E." The difference in achievement is palpable, and can hardly be dismissed as an accident, which occurred because two men of genius "happened to be" Dissenters. That explanation would only suffice if one were discussing the purely accidental accomplishments of Puritans and Anglicans—if we were comparing, for instance, Puritan and Anglican chess players, or Puritan and Anglican mathematicians. It does not suffice in the case of literature, which is the direct mirror of the spiritual life and the direct presentation of its points of view. In part, perhaps, one might find the explanation in the fact that Puritanism, at the time of its supreme literary achievements, was the party of revolt; and that such a party, when the cause is worthy, naturally attracts the best type of intellect. It was so in the age of Rousseau and Voltaire, and in the age of Shelley. It may very well have been so in the age of Milton and Bunyan. But Professor Dowden rightly goes further than this, and discovers, in the Puritan attitude towards the Unseen, certain potentialities of high literary performance.

The early Puritans, be it remembered, struck against forms, and insisted upon realities. They would have no priest standing between man and God as revealed in His Holy Scriptures. Religion for them lay not in the docile acceptance of the teachings of the fathers of the Church, but in the special experience of the individual soul. They sought to realize God as well as to believe in Him. And so

> In the Puritan inwardness of spirit, in its vivid realization of the unseen, if only these could find a suitable medium of representation and vehicle of expression, lay important possibilities for literature. If Hellenism served to broaden, Hebraism served to deepen the national consciousness of England. The inward drama of the spiritual life became more tragically earnest; its lyrical cries of hope and fear, of anguish and joy, became more poignant. God and the soul were the chief actors in the drama, but for the Puritan imagination a world of magic lay around the human soul—blessed angels, demons of the pit, special interpretations of Providence, miraculous words of Scripture, preternatural voices echoing in the heart. In the introspective habit which scrutinized and searched the soul for intimations of loss or gain there were grave dangers; it might pass into a diseased fascination; but it might also be a great discipline; it might discover a world of marvellous phenomena hidden from those accustomed only to turn the eye outward on the world of action.

It comes to this—that the Puritan writer was the religious writer who "let himself go," and that the Anglican writer was the writer who was bound by the fetters of formalism. They might be beautiful fetters, chased and jewelled, but they were fetters all the same. The Puritan, in short, was to the Anglican very much what, in secular literature, the Romantics were to the Classicists; for the Romantics, too, the distinguishing note is the demand for a free untrammelled expression of emotion. And, of course, this habit of "letting oneself go" does not always lead to equally admirable results. It may undoubtedly lower the general standard of performance, and it certainly leads to the ridiculous more often than to its next door neighbour the sublime. But it does lead to the sublime now and then; and that, no doubt, is the secret of the fascination which Puritanism had for the religious writers who, like Milton and Bunyan, were capable of attaining to the sublime. At any rate, it is a high and interesting theme which has hardly received sufficient attention. And it is one well worthy of the careful attention here given to it by one of the few living critics who is adequately equipped for the task.

PRINTING IN ENGLAND.

A Short History of English Printing, 1476-1898. By Henry R. Plomer. Edited by Alfred Pollard. Vol. II. of "The English Bookman's Library." (Kegan Paul. 10s. 6d. n.)

We wish we could say all we had hoped to say of this book. We came to it with every desire to be pleased, but we put it down feeling that the "Bookman's" history of printing has yet to be written. The book is packed full of information, a good deal of which is new, but the grouping lacks perspective. In fact, "A History of British Printers and Records of their Books" would have been a far more correct title for this work. But dealing with it even as it stands, we think Mr. Plomer would have been better advised had he taken quite a third of his material and thrown it into two columns, one of printers' names, the other of the books they are known to have printed, with the dates. That is all the record that a great deal of the representative work of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries deserves. English printing, especially in the early and middle stages, is, generally, not a thing of which we have any reason to be proud. On the Continent the art reached perfection almost at once. In England it was often in the hands of third and fourth rate men who seldom rose above the mere artisan. Few of them were artists. To make, therefore, their history attractive is not an easy matter, and what little chance the author of this book had is nearly wrecked by the slovenly manner in which a good deal of it is written. One hardly expects to meet in a work of this kind such a sentence as this:—"In 1528, John Scolar, no doubt the same with the Oxford printer, is found at Abingdon" (p. 125). A rather irritating thing to the reader is the topsy-turvy use of the tenses throughout the greater part of the book. Thus:—"The Psalterium which he (Faques) printed in octavo was in a large well-cut English black letter. The statutes of Henry VII. are also in the same type." "His device has the double merit of beauty and originality. It consisted of two triangles."

The really great names illuminating the history of English printing are not many. Caxton, Pynson, Day, Baskerville, Foulis, Whittingham, Morris, and the best printers of our own day do not make a great number when all are told. In the pages of Mr. Plomer's book the work of these men is fairly and sympathetically dealt with. Interesting also are the all too brief surveys of the history of type-founding and the development of the printing press from the old hand machine to the "Walter" and the other wonderfully ingenious presses of to-day. It is in place of so much of the dreary material that fills the gaps between that we could have wished to see such things as the art of stereotyping and its kindred crafts, as well as the various causes which have led to the present minute subdivisions in the printing trade, dealt with. These are matters which, one would think, should be treated more or less fully in any "history" of printing. Mr. Pollard says in his preface that "in a sketch of a large subject there is no room for digressions." If the points indicated above are "digressions," then, in our opinion, this book would have been truer to its intent had it possessed more of them. It is often by means of the sidelights that the clearest conceptions of history are obtained. We will mention only one point—and that not touched upon in this book—the practice of printing at one place and publishing at another. As early as the middle of the sixteenth century the printer Griffith was printing books at de Worde's old place, "The Falcon," in Fleet-street, and selling them by Pynson's old shop in St. Dunstan's Churchyard. But what led men in those early times "to buy their bookes in grosse of the said printers, to bynde them up and sell them in their shops"? The answer to that question supplies much of the material which must go to the making of a history of printing; besides which it gives scope for the introduction of just that amount of the personal element which attracts the student and interests the bookman, and without which history cannot nowadays be written with success.

"AN ENEMY OF THE PEOPLE."

Mr. Belfort Bax has set himself the congenial task of whitewashing Jean Paul Marat, the People's Friend (Richards, 10s. 6d.). And he would be more successful than he is but for two errors of judgment. He has had authentic portraits of his hero reproduced, and one does not need to be much of a physiognomist to read in every trait, in every line of face and figure, that which stamped Marat as an enemy of the human race. Open the book at the medallion frontispiece; look at the receding forehead, the bird-of-prey nose, the simian upper lip. In the portrait after Langlois observe the wild, fanatical eye, the loose cheeks, the cruel and sensual mouth. And remember that in both these portraits the sitter was on his guard, knew that he was being painted; in the medallion, has obviously assumed that pleasant expression inculcated on us at the photographer's. But turn now to the engraving of the head of Marat from David's picture painted some hours after the assassination. Here all disguises have fallen, the natural man is revealed, and the revelation is indescribably ignoble and repulsive. Mr. Bax's second mistake lies in his vilification of Charlotte Corday. All the soot which he has laboriously scraped from Marat he has smeared thick upon her, and in endeavouring to prove that she possessed every characteristic of the criminal class he discredits not her, but his own judgment, his own love of fair play. Was it not possible to plead such extenuating circumstances as he could find in Marat's favour without blackening a woman who, however mistaken in her methods, was at least actuated by altruistic motives which mankind commonly regard as noble? Mr. Bax draws a contrast between this popular estimation of Charlotte Corday and the execration given to the assassin of a Carnot, of an Empress Elizabeth, and he can so far blind himself to truth as to see the reason for this in the fact that the former assassinated a man of the people, and is, therefore, praised by the rich and mighty, who, it would seem, according to him, are the sole makers of public opinion; while the others, who assassinated members of the ruling classes, are in consequence hounded out of life.

But if we leave aside Mr. Belfort Bax's treatment of Charlotte Corday, we have only praise to give the book. It is well constructed, well written, and the style is interesting and vivid. It has told us more of Marat than we knew before, and has corrected our impressions in many respects. In the vitriolic glimpses given by Carlyle we see now that the Sage showed less than his usual sagacity. Whatever Marat's exact position may have been in the Comte d'Artois' household—the salary of only £80 a year does not seem to indicate that it was a very important post—at least he was no mere "dogleech" or "horseleech," but a properly diploma'd doctor of medicine, with an authentic degree bestowed upon him by the University of St. Andrews in 1775, the certificate of which Mr. Bax gives in extenso. Few people probably know that Marat practised as a doctor in London during twelve years (1765-77), living in Church-street, Soho, which was the Harley-street of the day; writing in idiomatic English philosophic essays on Man and the Soul; mixing in literary, scientific, and artistic society; an occasional guest at the house of Angelica Kaufmann in Golden-square, for which lady, indeed, he is suspected of having had a tendresse. Pity it was that he ever abandoned those respectable Soho tea-tables to accept the offer in 1777, made through what interest is not clear, of that fateful post, the precise nature of which remains obscure, in the household of Louis XVI.'s brother. For in the wild turbulence of French minds at that moment, his own latent potentialities for evil found their requisite nidus.

Marat has many points of resemblance with Rousseau, such as his inflated opinion of his own youthful virtue:—

> My moral sense was already developed at the age of eight. Even then, I could not bear to behold ill-treatment practised upon another; the sight of cruelty filled me with indignation, and an injustice always made my blood boil with a feeling as of personal outrage.

This gives food for thought when one remembers that it was he who first suggested the iniquitous law of "suspects," and whose remedy for the cleansing of France in 1790 was to erect 800 gibbets in convenient rows, "and proceed to hoisting—Riquetti on the first of them." Marat, likewise, shared with Rousseau a love of study and of solitude, as well as a maniacally suspicious nature. But, whereas Rousseau suspected every friend he possessed of being an enemy in disguise, Marat suspected humanity en bloc of being the enemy of the Republic, of the people. Rousseau's mental twist led him over and over again into the blackest ingratitude; to gratify his, Marat was ready to submerge his country in seas of his countrymen's blood.

During four years (1789-93) France trembled beneath the fanatical violence of his pen. Then a daughter of the people rose—a woman who could say, "I was a Republican before the Revolution; I never wanted energy"; and she, to adapt Marat's own words to his exterminator, while abhorring the shedding of blood, nevertheless brought herself to the sacrifice of a few ignoble drops to prevent its being made to flow in streams.

RECENT BOOKS ON PHILOSOPHY.

The Work of Professor Grote.

The second part of John Grote's EXPLORATIO PHILOSOPHICA (Cambridge University Press, 9s.) appears under remarkable circumstances. Grote, who was Professor of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, published the first part of the "Exploratio" in 1865, and announced that the second part would shortly follow. His projects were unhappily cut short by his death the next year at the age of 51. His literary executor, Mr. J. B. Mayor, the editor of the present volume, found a great mass of Grote's MSS. on his hands, and from them published an "Examination of the Utilitarian Philosophy" in 1870 and "Moral Ideals" in 1876. These works attracted but little notice, and Mr. Mayor was long discouraged from attempting anything further. There have, however, always been a certain number of students at Oxford who have recognized the value of Grote's work, and two years ago they made a strong appeal to Mr. Mayor to publish so much of the second part of the "Exploratio" as could be collected from the manuscripts in his hands. We now have the result, and it makes us feel grateful for the zeal of those who have rescued so much good work from oblivion.

At the time when Grote lived and thought, the aspect of English philosophy was very different from what it is now. The tyranny of utilitarianism and sensationalism was strong in the land. Hence it comes to pass that a great part of the "Exploratio" is devoted to criticism of Locke, Hume, Comte, Mill, and Mr. Herbert Spencer. The first part, however, is the more critical; in the second we have, fortunately, a more direct exposition of the writer's own views. There can be no doubt that Grote's fame and influence have suffered severely from his excess of criticism. He remains a standing example to those who carry a method which is admirable for the lecture room into the very different medium of the printed treatise. But, method apart, what he had to say was admirable. His philosophic faith was an idealism of the best kind; an idealism springing not from emotional feeling or impatience at the limitations of fact, but from the careful and profound study of fact. His burden of objection to sensationalism is that it neglects fact and is self-contradictory. Perhaps the best paper in the present volume is that on the Right and Duty of Private Judgment. Grote the philosopher is there arguing against Grote the historian, who in his comments on Plato's "Protagoras" had insisted that, as what an individual thinks true is true for him, and as truth is an important and valuable possession, the individual has the utmost right not to be deprived of it. Against this individualism, this assertion of the rights of private judgment, John Grote lays stress on its duties. Truth, he urges, has no meaning except as implying an objective system independent of individuals. Each individual has a solemn duty to use his own judgment just because he is himself an organ of the objective system. George Grote's individualism, he points out, leads to the worst kind of authority, the tyranny of numbers. For, if the opinions of A, B, C, and D are each severally truth for them, then the only objective truth is the opinion of the majority. Such thoughts are well worth attention in a democratic age. Besides their contribution to thought these papers reveal to us a most interesting personality, direct, devoted to truth, utterly free from affectation or any slavish adherence to formulæ. Very likely it was this personal quality as much as anything else that made the "Exploratio" a favourite with Lewis Nettleship, who loved most the philosophy that reveals character.

Leibniz.

Mr. Bertrand Russell's CRITICAL EXPOSITION OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF LEIBNIZ (Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d. n.) is an important contribution, by one of the ablest of the rising generation of philosophic writers, to the study of a thinker who is now attracting an increased share of attention. In 1893 the late Professor Wallace wrote:—"Of the greater pre-Kantian thinkers Leibniz has received less than his fair share of research." This could hardly be said now. For this task of exposition Mr. Russell is well equipped. It was Locke who set the problem of philosophy in the form in which we are still bus upon it. To the modern thinkers of the elder lineage, Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz, philosophy was interfused with mathematics and natural science. Their interpretation consequently requires a mathematical and scientific training which few philosophers of the present day can claim, but which Mr. Russell possesses in ample measure. His book invites comparison with Professor Latta's introduction to his admirable translation of the "Monadology." The difference is that Mr. Russell is more severely critical. He is more concerned to exhibit Leibniz's thought as rigorously deducible from a few premisses than to treat it as organically growing from a primary mental nucleus. The result is a sacrifice of literary form and a failure to be fully convincing. Mr. Russell does not succeed in persuading us that the starting-point of Leibniz's philosophy was the analysis of propositions rather than the problem of physical substance. The exposition, too, is influenced by some views of the author's which are not generally accepted—for example, his doctrine of absolute position in space. Nevertheless, he has produced a valuable piece of work, indispensable for all students of a thinker who is in harmony with some of the most promising tendencies in modern speculation. Such students should also note the new edition of M. Paul Janet's PHILOSOPHICAL WORKS OF LEIBNIZ, originally published in 1866, which the author revised and enlarged just before his death in November, 1899. It has been edited, with a bibliography, by M. Boirac, Rector of the Grenoble Academy. The new edition, which is sold at 20f., practically renders needless the expense of the bulky seven volumes of Gerhardt, from which, indeed, M. Janet has borrowed essential documents, such as the philosophical portions of the letters which passed between Leibniz and Pere des Bosses.

James Martineau.

It does not seem long since the papers announced the death of Dr. James Martineau, full of years and honours; and already we have before us Mr. A. W. Jackson's JAMES MARTINEAU: A BIOGRAPHY AND STUDY (Longmans, 12s. 6d.). The authoritative biography of the great Unitarian is being prepared by his intimate friends and successors at Manchester College, Dr. James Drummond and Mr. C. B. Upton. Meantime Mr. Jackson's work gives us a tolerable presentment of his life and thought. Mr. Jackson is an American who only knew Dr. Martineau towards the close of his life, and thus the volume lacks the personal touches of long intimacy. Nevertheless, he tells nearly as much as the general public will care to know about the externals of a life spent in the quiet activities of the clergyman and the thinker. The larger half of the book is devoted to an exposition of Martineau's views as a religious teacher and philosopher; an elaborate discussion of the ethical philosophy was omitted as unduly enlarging the volume. With this exposition our complaint is not that it is inaccurate or obscure, but that it is superfluous just because it is too faithful. Nothing can exceed the vigour and finish of Martineau's own statement of his views; we do not want them restated by another hand. What we want and what Mr. Jackson does not give us is an estimate of Martineau's position in the development of religious thought; his debt to the older and his influence on the younger generation. Our own impression of Martineau's religious philosophy is that he made a great advance and finally lifted the subject from the arid plain of Deism; but that he left much for younger minds to do both in clearing up his own position and advancing to a better one.

The Rev. Wilfrid Richmond in his ESSAY ON PERSONALITY AS A PHILOSOPHICAL PRINCIPLE (E. Arnold, 10s. 6d.) has really written a dissertation on human fellowship or communion. He has entitled it Personality because he "wishes to claim as the due of the social fellowship capacities which are usually treated as prerogatives of the individual." His intention is to attack the individualism, against which he protests, in "its own citadel, the conception of the individual personal being." His main definition is that "personality in the individual is the capacity for society, fellowship, communion." The difficulty about such a view is that if you reduce everything to sociality, what are the units which are associated? It is like T. H. Green's reduction of reality to a network of relations with no points of attachment for the network. Still, Mr. Richmond's treatment is interesting, and what he says about the primacy of love is true, though onesided. The methodical exposition and fervour of the work deserve a word of praise.

The expectation which Professor Otto Pfleiderer's name awakens is not altogether fulfilled by his volume of essays EVOLUTION AND THEOLOGY, edited by Orello Cone (A. and C. Black, 6s. n.). They are marked by learning and good sense, but do not impress one as strikingly original. Their standpoint is that very liberal Lutheran Protestantism of which Professor Pfleiderer is so well-known an exponent. The first essay, which gives the volume its title, is an argument in favour of the application of modern scientific method to theology; the last, "Free from Rome," is a word of encouragement to those Austrian Germans who combine a growing dislike to the religious domination of Rome with that patriotic resistance to the encroachments of Slavism which is typified by Herren Wolf and Schoenerer. The range of the author's arguments lies between these extremes. To him a pure and rational religious faith is closely connected with the development of national greatness and character.

Professor Ernest Haeckel occupies in Germany a position somewhat analogous to that of the late Professor Huxley in England. There is the same scientific eminence, the same gift of popular exposition, the same dabbling in philosophy, the same hostility to dogma. But, while Professor Haeckel is quite the peer of Huxley in science, in literature and philosophy he is far inferior. Huxley was not a great philosopher; Professor Haeckel is a very bad one, and we see him at his worst in THE RIDDLE OF THE UNIVERSE AT THE CLOSE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, translated by J. McCabe (Watts, 6s. n.). His solution of the "Riddle" is a violent, uncritical, atheistic materialism which he dignifies with the name of monism. The book appeals to popular taste because it is forcible and easy to follow. But so far from explaining the facts of mind the author has not got to the point of seeing that they need explanation.

Dr. Ferris Greenslet's JOSEPH GLANVILL: A STUDY IN ENGLISH THOUGHT AND LETTERS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY (Macmillan, 6s. n.) is devoted to reviving the memory of a worthy who is now nearly forgotten, or remembered only for what is least to his credit. Amateurs of the occult know of Glanvill as the author of "Sadducismus Triumphatus," which attempted to prove, first, the possibility, secondly, the real existence of witches and apparitions. But he has really much more solid claims to remembrance. He was rector of Bath, a Fellow of the Royal Society, a friend of the Cambridge Platonists, and an energetic Broad Churchman. In his scholarly monograph Dr. Greenslet shows that, while the "Sadducismus" is a curiosity, Glanvill's other numerous writings offer solid instruction to the student interested in the development of philosophic and religious thought in England.

Mr. C. F. Dole's THEOLOGY OF CIVILISATION (Allenson, 4s. 6d. n.) is an attempt to formulate a faith which will satisfy the needs of modern civilization. Theology he explains to mean the basis of thought on which religion rests. The tone of the book is generously enthusiastic and hopeful. It inculcates Christian morals without Christian dogma. But the philosophic substructure is open to serious question. His conception of personality, for example, seems to merge man into the infinity of God.

Father Michael Maher, of Stonyhurst, is to be congratulated on the fourth edition of his PSYCHOLOGY: EMPIRICAL AND RATIONAL (Longmans, 6s. 6d.). The work has thoroughly earned its place as a standard text-book in Roman Catholic academies, and now appears with considerable additions and improvements. Naturally, its standpoint is scholastic; but it by no means neglects the light of later days.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Africa.

We have already had the memoirs of the first Premier of Cape Colony, and now the first Premier of Natal gives us his reminiscences, of which a large part appeared in the Cornhill, in A LIFE TIME IN SOUTH AFRICA, by the Hon. Sir John Robinson (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d.). Sir John Robinson emigrated to Natal with his family in the middle of the century, when he was a mere child, and the story of his life there is extremely interesting. He began his life-long journalistic career in his teens, when his father started the Natal Mercury as a little weekly sheet in 1852. There was no money available for the payment of anything but printing, and the lad combined the functions of reporter, proof corrector, accountant, and collector. Meanwhile he educated himself with the help of the scanty collections of books that he was able to import from England, the first of them containing Alison, Prescott, Bancroft, Shakespeare, Longfellow, and Byron. As the colony grew, so did the paper, until it became the great daily of the present time. At an early stage

Sir John Robinson turned his attention, like so many journalists, to politics, and became a member of the Legislative Council, then in the second session of its existence; he had already enlarged his experiences by a year's tour in Europe. Natal was then a new country, with all its future to be made and shaped, and Robinson's political life was devoted to three ideals:—Railway extension, responsible government, and South African union. The first two have been realized. In one of his chapters Sir John Robinson traces the development of the Natal railway system from the laying of the first local line in Durban, forty years ago, to the day when it fell to his lot, as Prime Minister of the Colony, to take a leading part in the final connexion of the Natal system with that of the Transvaal. In another he traces the growth of the political system of Natal from that of the original Crown Colony, through the epoch-making administration of Sir Garnet Wolseley, to the day—the proudest of his life—when in 1893 he became the first Premier of the self-governing colony of Natal. All this, as well as the very entertaining and instructive account of the early settlers' life in Natal, will be read with interest; but just now the most important chapters in Sir John Robinson's book are those which contain his views on the causes of the war, the possibilities of a permanent settlement, and the future outlook in South Africa. Here we can only indicate their drift. Sir John Robinson traces the origin of the war from six causes:—"Boer dislike to and distrust of the Englishman. Hollander influence. The workings of the Afrikander Bond. Boer delusions after Majuba. The fruits of gold discovery. The Jameson Raid." On all these heads he has much of value to tell us. He then goes on to remind us that all these remote causes were set aside by the Boer Ultimatum to which they led up. As he sensibly puts it, "If a man suddenly knocks you down, you do not pause to ask him why he has done so before you resort to self-defence." Next he considers the outlook. The future of South Africa he still holds to be governed by a threefold condition. "Namely, that no one man should be dominant in South Africa; that no one State should be dominant in South Africa; and that there should be no subordination of the destinies of South Africa to speculative or sordid interests." Sir John Robinson looks for the speedy inauguration of some system of federation of all the South African colonies, new and old, as a primary condition of peace and prosperity; and he writes very wisely and magnanimously on the supreme importance of adopting a policy of sane and broad-minded conciliation towards the great body of the Boers.

Shadows of the War, by Mrs. Bagot (Arnold, 10s. 6d.), is a war book which should be read even by those who have only time to read a few of the war books. It not only tells us what the war was like from the point of view of a hospital nurse, but it actually draws the pictures so that we see them. There are hospital stories both humorous and pathetic; and there is also the most vivid account that we have read of the condition of Bloemfontein when Lord Roberts descended upon it, and found it destitute of supplies. Mrs. Bagot realized the destitution by going shopping. She could have bought hats or babies' boots, but what she wanted to buy was jelly powders:—

> I was only shown a series of empty shelves and cupboards. At last some one told me in strict confidence that there really was one shop where a few groceries remained to which I went. It was locked and the shutters were up. After banging at the door for a while, it was stealthily opened, and I slipped in, and the door was again quickly bolted. Inside a few soldiers were hurriedly buying some stores, for actually there were a few foodstuffs and groceries on the shelves.
> "Have you anything I could make jelly of?" I asked for the twentieth time that morning. The man shook his head. "There is no such thing in the town, I am afraid." Sadly I turned away, so sadly, perhaps, that the man called me back. "My wife has just a few jelly powders left," he said, "I believe she would spare them." He was right—the kind-hearted woman gave up her own little store in a most generous manner to a perfect stranger.

Mrs. Bagot's account of the epidemic of enteric is also the most vivid of the many that we have read. She tells us just those details that make us realize the horror of the position, and she leaves out nothing that is essential.

Among the countless books more or less bearing on the war is one in which the Rev. Adrian Hofmeyr relates The Story of My Captivity (Arnold, 6s.). Mr. Hofmeyr is a cousin, we believe, of the famous leader of the Afrikander Bond, but he is strong on the British side. Before the war broke out he made many speeches to that effect, and after the delivery of the Ultimatum he was taken prisoner by a commando of Boers who treated their prisoner in a way that has made him more anti-Boer than ever. He uses language of considerable strength when he speaks of his captors, and abuses the Boers in general in a fashion that is all the more amusing for the slight unfamiliarity with English which it betrays. Mr. Hofmeyr was ultimately sent to Pretoria where he shared the captivity of the English officers, to whom he dedicates his book. The best thing in it is the warm testimony that it pays to their qualities. "The British officer," says Mr. Hofmeyr, "is a gentleman, and a fine one withal. His self-restraint, his resourcefulness, his, in many cases, splendid intellectual development, his invariable courtesy, his kindness, his courage, have taught me honestly and fervently to admire him." We, at home, do not need this witness, but, in face of the calumnies that get into the foreign Press, it is welcome as coming from a Dutch Afrikander.

Kruger's Secret Service, by One who was in It (Macqueen, 3s. 6d.), tells many sensational stories, including a story of a plot, in which Dr. Leyds is implicated, to poison Mr. Rhodes in Matabeleland, and another story of another plot, in which many eminent South African loyalists are implicated, to blow up Dr. Leyds with a bombshell. It is obviously impossible to disprove these stories, but the fact that the author who makes himself responsible for them prefers to remain anonymous does not make it any the easier to accept them. His accuracy, indeed, sometimes breaks down in little matters where it can be tested. He speaks of Lord Rosmead as Lord Rosemead, and in a passage in which he boasts of his skill as a pugilist speaks of the "undercut," when he obviously means the "upper cut."

A fairly entertaining book has been written by Miss Beatrice M. Hicks on The Cape as I Found It (Stock, 5s.). Miss Hicks lived for some years as a governess in various farms in Cape Colony, and gives a lively and no doubt faithful picture of English and Boer life in the years before the war. It is pleasantly written and full of picturesque detail.

The Pacific Slope.

It is the lot of most books of travel to satisfy, at the very best, those who have never been in the countries with which such books are concerned. In Life and Sport on the Pacific Slope (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) Mr. H. A. Vachell has succeeded in a vivid and comprehensive sketch of the genius of the West, and has attained two ends which are both equally desirable. The book will fill out the memories of those who love the wonders of the "Slope," and flagellates the baser sort of Californian. Mr. Vachell is a novelist and an acute observer, as those who recollect "The Procession of Life" will know, and his analysis of Western types, from the men of the Sierras to the Anglo-Franco-Californians, has all the value of real psychology. California, as he knows it—and he obviously knows it very well indeed—is a country which combines alien and opposite populations in a sort of mechanical mixture which has no parallel on earth. The ancient and rapidly disappearing Spanish element exists cheek by jowl, and yet without any real contact, with a gross-mannered, money-making section that resembles the worst element of the Rand, and with another exclusive set that aims at living somewhat after the fashion of English county society. It is still a country in the making, and its future is evidently a matter of pained, yet hopeful, speculation to Mr. Vachell. What kind of a man the young Californian native will be the next generation must show. At the present time the sons of rich men are almost entirely without any true promise of manhood, and have a kind of mental likeness to half-castes. They resemble the Spaniards, who were, after all, akin to the soil, in their aversion for labour, and they possess the faults of their fathers, without any of the sterner virtues which characterized the pioneers. It is a curious fact that the imported Englishman is as much a failure as the native growth, and Mr. Vachell's estimate of the outcast, hopeful yet hopeless, Briton has much melancholy interest.' One point which is of strong political and international importance the writer is, rightly, thoroughly convinced of. The imaginary bond of brotherhood between England and America is, indeed, imaginary in the West, where the whole feeling about England is, at the very best, latently hostile. And if this hostility is tinged with contempt, it is largely due to the English fools of their families who never succeed at anything they undertake. Mr. Vachell adds a few chapters on sport which are written in the right spirit. But we should like to know how he has been able to settle the vexed question of the "silvertip," which he declares to be the offspring of the true grizzly and the cinnamon.

Military.

The publication of such a book as Colonel Denison's SOLDIERING IN CANADA (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. n.) could hardly have come at a better time than when England is so much interested in war and in the daughter nations which have ranked themselves with her. It is not too much to say that the book is in some ways as remarkable as it is interesting. For Colonel Denison, who is not a professional but a natural soldier, has much to say, directly and by implication, which is of vast interest to the whole English race at the present hour. He, indeed, unconsciously suggests that part of the reluctance at least, that was at one time visible in Canada, to the Dominion lending help to the army in South Africa was due to a natural and well-founded distrust of professional army methods. Only those who are unacquainted with Canadian history, which is much more a military history than most Englishmen are aware of, will feel surprised at this. Colonel Denison's remarks on the retreat of Sir George Prevost from Plattsburg are well justified, and the success of Brock with raw levies of Canadian militia emphasizes the failure of an English general in command of an army of sixteen thousand Peninsular veterans. Indeed, the whole book, which is a very plain tale indeed, is continually suggestive of professional military arrogance and ineptitude, as well as of that want of tact with the "colonials," which has again and again repeated itself in Natal during the past year. There will, of course, be a tendency among professional soldiers of the old type to ignore anything that the author says, but it should not be forgotten that Colonel Denison, the author of "Modern Cavalry," also won the prize given by the late Tsar for the best history of cavalry, although he is technically a civilian. There is much in the earlier part of the book about the United Empire Loyalists, that body which took its rise in the noble band of devoted men who clung to the British flag during the American rebellion, and lost everything they possessed by doing so. It is curious to consider that the Imperialist idea practically took its rise in a colony, and did so at a time when it seemed to Englishmen that their Empire was at an end. Colonel Denison gives very interesting accounts of the Fenian Raid and of Riel's Rebellion; but the book is really interesting from the beginning to the end, and might be read with the greatest advantage by all young officers.

A translation, by Mr. H. Havelock, of Colonel Epauchin's OPERATIONS OF GENERAL GURKO'S ADVANCE GUARD IN 1877 (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d.) is added to the Wolseley series. It is the story of a fine piece of cavalry work, for the force in question seized the Balkan passes, destroyed two lines of railway, and penetrated to within a few marches of Adrianople before other events elsewhere made its further progress impossible. It is a story, too, which anticipated a moral re-drawn quite recently from certain incidents in the cavalry raid of General French. The waste of horses was terrible, and, in Colonel Epauchin's opinion, might have been avoided. "The want of practice in the making of lengthy expeditions in large bodies in peace time led to the result that no practical method had been evolved for maintaining the vigour of the horses during a long spell of work." And, again, "At that time there were still many cavalry leaders who had not yet realized that only a properly fed horse can bear the brunt of active service." There may be cavalry leaders still who fail to realize that it is only less important to be a good horse-master than to be a good horseman. One hopes that they may assimilate the identical teachings of their own experience and Colonel Epauchin's monograph. On the other hand those experts who grumbled at Lord Roberts' long delay at Bloemfontein, and the number of reservists required there, may ponder Colonel Epauchin's statement that "this ceaseless and strenuous activity of our horses so undermined their powers that when they got back to Thenovo, greatly diminished in numbers, they were quite unfit for service for the time, and did not recover till they had rested a whole month and been reinforced to full strength from Russia."

Instinct and Intelligence.

Mr. C. Lloyd Morgan's ANIMAL BEHAVIOUR (Arnold, 10s. 6d.) is an outcome of his former book on "Animal Life and Intelligence." It was said of a great metaphysician that he gave one the impression of always being on the point of making a discovery. Mr. Lloyd Morgan is a psychologist, and so far as his book is psychological he gives one that impression until one becomes aware that one is not really getting more than scientific definitions, beyond which lies a country which we have not and probably cannot explore. We find, for instance, that the congenital tendency of chicks to peck at objects which they see may be modified by new situations. But we cannot explain it, nor do we gain much by clothing our ignorance in scientific language:—

> All we can say is that connexions seem to be in some way established between the centres of conscious control and the centres of congenital response; and that through these channels the responsive behaviour may be either checked or augmented (as a whole or in part) according to the tone, disagreeable or pleasant, that suffuses the situation.

It is impossible to shake off a sense of aridity in studying Mr. Lloyd Morgan's copious philosophical analysis. At the same time his researches have much value not only for the abundance of evidence which he groups together, but for his careful sifting of it. He deals exhaustively, for instance, with the evidence for an apparent rise in the cases of some animals from the intelligent to the rational, and finds that stories of great apparent ingenuity resolve themselves not into any proof of a reasoned-out plan of action but only of a power to profit by a series of experiments. He also throws considerable light on the nature of animal consciousness. It is curious, perhaps, that he does not touch the difficult questions of migration and of what is known as the homing instinct. A capital account is given of the behaviour of Paramœcia under the microscope, and in all his descriptive passages Mr. Lloyd Morgan is an extremely lucid and interesting writer.

Captain Mayne Reid.

CAPTAIN MAYNE REID, HIS LIFE AND ADVENTURES, by Mrs. Mayne Reid (Greening, 3s. 6d.), is an indifferent book on an interesting subject. It would probably have found more readers ten years ago than it is likely to find now, but it was quite right that we should have an authentic biography of the only writer of adventure stories for boys who came near to being a man of letters. Captain Mayne Reid's early vicissitudes were many and various. He was intended for the Church and was actually sent to a college to be prepared for the Presbyterian ministry, but preferred to emigrate. Before he found his true vocation, he was, among other things, a slave-driver, a shop assistant, a private schoolmaster, an actor, and a soldier. After he had found his true vocation, he wanted to leave it in order to become a revolutionist in the society of Kossuth, but, fortunately, or unfortunately, the revolution had come to an end before he had finished organizing an expeditionary corps to take part in it. The rest of the story of his life is mainly taken up with an account of the writing of his books, which enjoyed an enormous sale. The Society of Authors may be interested in the fact that, though some of his works attained a circulation of more than a million copies, his income never exceeded £2,000 a year, and he died a comparatively poor man.

The Land of Home Rule.

Less than twelve months ago we reviewed Mr. Callow's "From King Orry to Queen Victoria," and now we have A History of the Isle of Man, by A. W. Moore, M.A., Speaker of the House of Keys (Fisher Unwin, two vols., 32s.). This is certainly the most important book on the subject since Sir Spencer Walpole's "Land of Home Rule." Mr. Moore has had the advantage of consulting the family papers of the Earls of Derby, who were so long Lords of Man, as well as the archives of the island, and has been enabled to produce the fullest and most authoritative, as well as the most comprehensive, history that has yet been published. Mr. Moore lays especial stress upon the modern story of the curious little land which, although smaller than any English county, with the exception of Rutland, yet possesses much of the interest of a separate Imperium. Successively Scandinavian, Irish, and Scotch, before it became a fief of the English Crown, Mona retains to this day its own laws and customs, Parliament and judicature. Long ago it conceded female suffrage, and its Governor is still, in theory at all events, an autocrat. That seventh Earl of Derby, whose Countess, Charlotte de la Tremouille, made so stout a defence of Lathom-house, was, in his island sovereignty, "the great Stanley." He was, indeed, until the fight at Worcester, which resulted in his execution, the most notable of its rulers, and he, and his son after him, had their own rebellious people to deal with, also with ultimate resort to the scaffold. It was, however, under the Dukes of Atholl, who succeeded through females, that the island had its most romantic time. It then became a centre of smuggling, for which, lying close to the shores of all three kingdoms, it was admirably placed. But there is no romance about Chancellors of the Exchequer. The British Government objected vehemently to the smuggling, and the Atholls were bought out at a stupendous price, which, however, events have justified. Mr. Moore has not confined himself to writing a mere political account of the Isle of Man, but has devoted a good deal of space to an account of the social and economic condition of the little "kingdom." He gives an excellent view of its trade, revenue, and taxation, and the chapters in which he describes recent progress and legislation render it, along with Sir Spencer Walpole's treatise, an indispensable book of reference to those who take a serious interest in the subject. There was a time when the cheapness of living in the island made it a very agreeable refuge for retired officers and other persons of fixed limited incomes; and Mr. Moore bewails that they have been driven away by the rise in prices which has followed the invasion of tourists and cheap trippers. The consequence is the creation of a temporarily-employed class who minister to the wants of visitors in the "season," and, at other times, create a new problem in the way of pauperism as distinct from poverty. Yet, on the whole, the community is prosperous.

International Law.

International Law, by F. E. Smith (Dent's Temple Cyclopædic Primers, 1s. n.), is a book that would have made Grotius, Bynkershoek, and Vattel stare and gasp. To find compressed within the limits of less than two hundred pages the subject for which they required substantial folios would indeed have given them cause for wonder. But we have long passed the folio stage of existence, and a book, even on a technical subject, must, if the writer expects it to be read, not be too long. Mr. Smith's book certainly does not err in this direction. It is the smallest book on International Law we have seen, but, while small and only professing to offer an outline of the subject, it is an admirable piece of work, forming an excellent introduction to a difficult but, at the same time, highly interesting department of law, and to the larger treatises such as the classic volume of the late Mr. Hall. Brief but very clear explanations are given of the terms "spheres of influence" and "leasehold interests," of which we have heard a good deal of late. As regards the latter term, Mr. Smith caustically observes that "if a European country obtains a lease from China, fortifies its acquisition, and undertakes responsibility within its limits, no devices of nomenclature can disguise the change which has been covertly effected." The subject of naturalization is also very clearly treated, although, perhaps, a line might have been spared to explain the difference between a certificate of naturalization and letters of denization. In the section on Consuls, too, it might have been pointed out that they, like Ambassadors—Mr. Smith mentions the case of Lord Sackville in 1888—are liable to be dismissed by the State to which they are accredited for acts which that State may conceive to be an interference in its political affairs. We have noted a few errors of the press, such as the reference to a case on page 136, which is given as "2. Hunslet and Cott," instead of "2. Hurlstone and Coltman"—a series of reports familiar to every lawyer; and at page 161 attention is directed to a judgment of "Lord Justice Brown" where Lord Justice Bowen is meant. These, however, are small matters. The primer is furnished with a portrait of Lord Stowell, a great authority on International Law; it is also provided with a fairly full Table of Contents, but we do not consider that this atones for the want of an index.

Belgium.

Mr. Carlyle Smythe says that when he wanted to read "a compendious history of Belgium," he found that "there was nothing in English and nothing really very good in French." Therefore, he has written The Story of Belgium (Hutchinson, 6s.), which is certainly compendious, but is otherwise only moderately good. He seems to have got up the facts without really acquiring very intimate knowledge of the subject; and, though his style is fluent, he has a way of pouring out words without stopping to consider what they mean. Thus he tells us, in the same sentence, that Philip of Spain "disapproved of Alba's method" of pacifying the Netherlands, and that he probably did not know what Alba was doing; and whereas, in an eloquent peroration, he speaks of modern Belgium as a "highly cultured kingdom," he tells us elsewhere that "only about 60 per cent. of the population can read and write," and that, "according to the militia examinations of 1882, more than three-fourths of the candidates could not name a famous Belgian and state his claims to remembrance, whilst more than 91 per cent. could not adduce a single fact relative to the Spanish occupation of the Low Countries." What, then, does Mr. Carlyle Smythe mean by culture? And whom does he expect to believe his statement that the Belgians are so much like the French that "only an expert could tell them apart." As a matter of fact, the Belgians only resemble the French in their turn for good cooking. On the other hand, they speak the French language with an accent that you can cut with a knife, they show an indifference to literature which makes a Frenchman shudder, they are very far from being what the French are—among the most sober people in Europe—and their manners, at least compared with those of the French, are the manners of outer barbarians. Nor is Mr. Carlyle Smythe's account of contemporary Belgian men of letters adequate. It mentions neither Verhaeren nor J. K. Huysmanns. But an interesting point is made in connexion with Maeterlinck's trick of repeating phrases—a signal evidence, according to some of his critics, of his marvellous, if mysterious, originality in art.

> It is (writes Mr. Carlyle Smythe) nothing more or less than the most conspicuous local note in the dramatist's work. Maurice Maeterlinck is of the soil, Flemish; and a most noticeable habit of the Flemish peasant, whose intellect is only suited to a slow gait, is to repeat epithets, verbs, and even phrases, while his mind is pursuing the train of thought. Maeterlinck has merely seized that characteristic of his compatriots, and given it a poetical setting in the literature of his native land.

The book must be welcomed as filling a gap; but it is a pity the work was not better done.

John Barbour.

The Scottish writer who took up the cudgels for his native heath against Dr. Johnson was not more valiant than his fellow countryman, Mr. George Neilson, who, in JOHN BARBOUR: POET AND TRANSLATOR (Kegan Paul, 1s. 6d. n.), reprinted from the "Transactions of the Philological Society," appears as the champion of the old Scotch poet of Chaucer's time. Mr. Neilson undertakes to prove that Barbour, who was undoubtedly the author of a poem called "The Brut" on the Scottish hero Bruce—one of the few modern poems, as readers of "Waverley" will remember, affected by the Baron of Bradwardine—also translated the Legenda Aurea, a poem from the French on Alexander, and fragments of Guido de Columpna's "Destruction of Troy." The arguments against Barbour's authorship of the Troy fragments and of the Legends (it is admitted that they are from a single hand), are based upon differences between these poems and "The Brut" in vocabulary, style, and rhyme. The case against "The Buik of Alexander" is stronger, as it is dated some years after Barbour's death. Mr. Neilson's method of defence is to quote parallel passages between the poems of doubtful authorship and "The Brut." These parallels, as he shows, are very striking, especially those between "The Brut" and "The Buik of Alexander." But although Mr. Neilson goes far towards convincing us that the author of the latter poem was Barbour, it is difficult to prove with certainty that it was not by a plagiarist of "The Brut."

The Gotham Tales.

In ALL ABOUT THE MERRY TALES OF GOTHAM (Nottingham, R. N. Pearson), Mr. Alfred Stapleton makes a lengthy and somewhat laborious attempt to summarize all the fancies and conjectures which surround this familiar collection of medieval jests. The ascertained facts are extremely few, and hardly extend beyond this, that the earliest written mention of the "fools of Gotham" is found in the Townley Manuscript of about the middle of the fifteenth century, and that the story of their absurdities was first printed a century later. The "Tales" are so obviously traditional, and smack so considerably of folk-lore, that it was hardly to be expected that anything should be known of their authorship. A less critical age was content to believe that they were the work of Andrew Borde, the sixteenth-century physician—chiefly, it would seem, because the initials "A. B." usually appeared on the title-page of the chap-book editions. Mr. Stapleton makes it clear enough that this is mere conjecture, and comes to the inevitable conclusion that the identity of the original compiler of the twenty tales is hopelessly lost. He is a good deal concerned to prove that they relate to the Nottinghamshire village of Gotham, and not, as has been suggested, to the neighbourhood of Pevensey, where there is, or was, a manorial house of the same name—a notion which perhaps originated in the circumstance that Andrew Borde left some property at Pevensey. Traditional stories of this character are always interesting, although we are bound to say that, as humour, those which are attributed to the "wise men of Gotham" are not especially brilliant. A little wit went a long way in the Middle Ages, as the very great popularity of the collection testifies. Mr. Stapleton throws little, if any, new light upon the origin of the traditions, although, in his anxiety to absolutely exhaust the subject, he beats out his material very thinly. It is, however, a handy compendium of all that is to be said on the matter, alike from the literary and the topographical point of view. But it could have been wished that its typography had left not quite so much to desire.

Leo Tolstoy.

THE SLAVERY OF OUR TIMES is the latest work of Tolstoy that has been published by The Free Age Press (1s.). It is translated from the Russian by Mr. Aylmer Maude, and will be interesting reading for those who wish to know the remedies which extremists like Tolstoy would apply to social and industrial ills. More than this we cannot say in these columns, which are no place for the discussion of such dicta as the following:—"Slavery results from laws, laws are made by Governments, and, therefore, people can only be freed from slavery by the abolition of Governments." And, again, "Legislation rests on organized violence." "Organized violence is government." One remark, however, we feel called upon to make. This word "violence," which we assume to be a correct translation of Tolstoy's Russian, is used all through the book for the coercive powers inherent in every free community for its own protection. Tolstoy always speaks of government as of a thing external to, and hostile to, the people who call it into existence. No Anglo-Saxon in any part of the world will accept that view of the matter. He knows perfectly well that it is he himself, and not the "violence" of others, that enforces his own laws.

The Cinque Ports.

Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer may be said to have succeeded in the object he put before him in writing THE CINQUE PORTS (Blackwood, £3 3s.)—viz., to produce a book "neither archæological nor topographical nor even archæologico-topographical," but "a piece of literature, pure and simple." He does not write a guide-book for the tourist, nor a careful historical study such as Mr. Burrows' volume in Longman's "Historic Towns Series," but attempts to revive and colour the old life of the ports, a task which he performs with knowledge and much literary skill. The value of this sumptuous volume, however, is due as much to Mr. William Hyde as to Mr. Hueffer. All lovers of fine artistic work must have followed sympathetically the artistic work of Mr. Hyde, but we have hardly seen any work from his brush so powerful in conception and in execution as these masterly representations of a most picturesque country. For subtlety of treatment and intimate knowledge both of sky, land, and sea, we should find it difficult to match these drawings in the whole range of English landscape work in monochrome. M

Hawking.

Various causes, particularly the decrease in the area of open land and the erroneous prejudice against hawking on the part of owners of grouse moors, militate in this country against the practice of this beautiful sport. But it is a pastime strong enough to support a literature, and following upon Mr. Harting's book republished a year and a half ago, and Mr. Michell's "Art and Practice of Hawking," published last spring, we have Major C. H. Fisher's REMINISCENCES OF A FALCONER (Nimmo, 10s. 6d.). If modern falconry can achieve the honour of "reminiscences" it is certainly not extinct. Major Fisher's tales are well told, and will be intensely interesting to the select company of genuine falconers. They are full of curious experiences, such as the contest between an old grouse-hawk and a curlew; the story of a falcon's courtship; and the disproof of a well-known proverb in the struggle between a falcon and a sparrow-hawk. There is little, if any, heron-hawking nowadays; rooks are as good a quarry as any, but the modern falconer is by no means fastidious in his choice, and Major Fisher seems to have no compunction about lark-hawking by merlins. We must warn Major Fisher's readers, by-the-by, that pages 49-55 in his book are identical in substance with pages 93-100—a hardly justifiable piece of bookmaking.

In the Grand Style.

> And ever arose the sounds, rising, falling, of that long strife, from near and graduating afar, until there was no atom but vibrated with uproar where thousands fought and died. . . . There died of Toltiah's warriors the stout Ez-Ra, the only survivor before the prowess of Izta's troops, and smitten by Amal fell Mazapilli and the valorous Aramath, governor of Bitsar, and Abbas of Surapa in Astra.

Thus speaks Mr. Bridgman Metchim in ATLANTIS, The Book of the Angels (Swan Sonnenschein, 10s. 6d. n.), a work such as we do not often see in these degenerate days. It is an imposing romance of the Pliocene epoch (unless we are mistaken), or at any rate of the time before the Flood. The author, or, as he prefers to call it, the interpreter, is also the illustrator. He also provides notes, appendices, and a blank verse prologue. He can neither draw nor write correctly, but in his illustrations and text alike there is a certain quality of bigness—of spaciousness—that produces its effect. In fine, his book is an antediluvian master. But it is not without talent and imagination. There is something of Flaubert's intensity about his descriptions of war, and tortures, and barbaric horrors. Here and there may be found creditable patches of writing, very purple indeed, for Mr. Metchnikoff is never happy unless he is assisting at a holocaust. We hope that he rests satisfied with his final catastrophe.

From Japan.

SHADOWINGS (Sampson Low, 8s.6d.n.), by Mr. Lafcadio Hearn, Lecturer in English Literature in the Imperial University at Tokio, and author of "Exotics and Retrospectives" and other books on Japan, is a curious medley of material. Beginning with half-a-dozen weird and ghostly stories translated from old Japanese books, the author proceeds to pen three learned studies on Sémi (the cicada), Japanese Insect, or Female Names, and Old Japanese Songs. These three long dissertations, following immediately on the short and rather fragmentary tales, give an incredible air to the book, which is not lessened by the appearance, in the third and concluding portion of the volume, of seven short fantasies in an entirely different vein from anything that has gone before. But Japan is always interesting, and Mr. Hearn provides us at least with a new sensation in the earlier part of his book. His dreams proclaim a poetic mind. In youth he confesses to what Charles Lamb once called "a stud of nightmares"—and those of a quite exceptional terror and ferocity.

The Swiss Constitution.

GOVERNMENT IN SWITZERLAND, by John Martin Vincent (Macmillan Company, 5s. n.), is an American book, but it will probably find English readers, as there is no other satisfactory book on the subject in the English language. It would be a still more satisfactory book if the author's exhaustive theoretical knowledge of the Swiss Constitution were supplemented by a more practical experience of its working. One feels the need of this particularly in reading the chapter on the "Cantonal Judiciary." It is a melancholy fact that, in the poorer Swiss Cantons, the effectiveness of justice, and more particularly of criminal justice, suffers from the lack of pence. They have a lamentable habit of expelling misdemeanants instead of imprisoning them, because of the cost of keeping them in prison. There is no hint of the existence of such a state of things in Dr. Vincent's book; but it is a good and useful book all the same. The proper authorities have been consulted, and proper use has been made of them.

Infallible Identification.

The author of CLASSIFICATION AND USES OF FINGER-PRINTS, Mr. E. R. Henry, C.S.I. (Routledge, 2s.), has filled a high administrative police post in India, and with such brilliant success that when the Colonial Office was looking for the best man to organize a new police department for Johannesburg he was obviously the one man for the purpose. Therefore, he left to take up his new duties just as this work appeared. It is commonly believed that the Bertillon method of correlated measurements of the body—anthropometry—as employed in France, is an infallible and ideal system of human identification. Experts know better. Indeed, so far from this being the case, the Bertillon method is now thoroughly discredited, and it is safe to say that wherever in future the authorities establish a system of identification they will choose the finger-print method, to which attention was first called in modern times by Mr. Francis Galton, and with which Mr. Henry, having developed and systematized it, has achieved such remarkable results in India. The Bertillon system is complicated, and it leaves room for the personal error. Two ordinary police officials will often take two differing sets of measurements of the same man. By the finger-print method no such loophole for error occurs. The individual to be identified simply presses his finger or fingers upon a smooth surface thinly coated with printer's ink, and then presses or "rolls" them upon a sheet of paper. Then, from childhood to extreme old age, indeed, after death, until decay has destroyed the surface of the flesh, he is identifiable immediately and infallibly. For the ridges of a man's finger bulbs are as different from every other man's as his character is. Classification, which at first sight might seem so difficult, is, in fact, perfectly simple. All impressions are divisible into four types by Mr. Henry's system, according to the prevalence in them of "arches," "loops," "whorls," and "composites." "Arches," again, are subdivided into "arches" and "tented arches"; "loops" into "ulnar" and "radial"; "whorls" into single and double-cored, and so on. When by this means the new finger-print is found to correspond to one already in the collection, the two, if they are really from the same man, present such a multitude of identical markings that mistake is impossible.

The most extraordinary example of the infallibility of this method occurred in Mr. Henry's Indian experience as follows. The native manager of a tea-garden was found with his throat cut and his safe rifled. The police could not find a particle of evidence against anybody. An ex-servant, who had been recently released from prison, named Kangali Charan, had been seen in the neighbourhood, but there was nothing whatever to connect him with the crime. In the rifled safe, however, was found a cheap native calendar, upon the cover of which was a small, faint smudge. The microscope showed this to be mammalian blood. It was photographed, enormously enlarged, and discovered to be a passing touch of somebody's right thumb. In the Central Office of the Bengal Police was the thumb-print of Kangali Charan, and this was compared with the magnified lines of the smudge. Identification was instant, and the man was convicted and punished. The present writer has seen the blood-smudge—it is a small, faint dirty mark—and the two prints—their identity is wholly unmistakable.

Finally, finger-prints are of inestimable value not only in criminal cases, but in all cases involving identification, such as wills, contracts, passes, &c. The finger-print, in fact, is the signature of the illiterate native.

This little volume gives a full and precise illustrated account of the theory and practice of Mr. Henry's now accepted system of finger-print identification, and a study of its contents will enable any intelligent person to put it into operation.

Among the many books inspired by the story of the Naval Contingent and the 4·7 gun at Ladysmith we may reckon THE HANDY MAN AFLOAT AND ASHORE, by the Rev. G. Goodenough, R.N. (Unwin, 6s.). A Naval chaplain of long standing, who has taken a real interest in his work from the training ship to the sea-going squadron of battleships and cruisers, could hardly fail to produce something of interest on such a subject, and this book is so brightly written that it can well be recommended to those who wish to know more of the bluejacket than they can gather from the illustrated papers. The more we learn of him the more we find out how fine a fellow he is with all his failings, which, after all, are not so many, and would probably have been far worse had he stayed on land.

Some of the papers included in Mr. Sydney Hallifax's ANNALS OF A DOSS-HOUSE (George Allen, 2s. 6d.) have already appeared in the Echo; others are now printed for the first time. Possibly our readers may like to be informed that a doss-house is the alternative provided by private benevolence for the rigours of the casual ward. The thing being thus defined, they will know what to expect from Mr. Hallifax's short and simple annals. He has done well to publish them, and has not minced matters in the plain stories that he has to tell.

A word of welcome may be given to the papers which Mr. J. Ashby Sterry has collected under the title of THE BYSTANDER (Sands and Co., 5s.). Some of them have already appeared in various periodicals, where their light philosophy and cheerful humour must have contrasted pleasantly with more solid literary fare. But, just as one cannot dine entirely off hors d'œuvres, or savouries, so these little trifles are rather trying when one absorbs them, one after another, in a substantial volume.

WHAT IS CATHOLICISM? (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.) is, it should be explained, not an inquiry into Catholicism, but into Roman Catholicism; and contains the lucid and able letters of M.

Edmond Scherer, attacking the Roman system as a centre of reaction, translated by the Rev. T. A. Seed, and prefaced by an introduction from the hand of Dr. Horton.

A good example of the religious biography likely to interest all who are engaged on missionary work at home is GEORGE H. C. MACGREGOR (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), in which Mr. Macgregor's cousin, the Rev. D. C. Macgregor, of Wimbledon, sketches the ministerial work in Aberdeen, London, Nottinghill, and elsewhere, of this singularly earnest Presbyterian clergyman, who died last May at the early age of thirty-five.

GOLDEN TIPS, by Henry W. Cave (Sampson Low, 16s. n.), is a book about Ceylon from the pen of an author whose name appears on the title-page of several books about Ceylon. It contains much information, carefully accumulated and lucidly arranged, about the scenery, the sport, the tea trade, &c., which will be of the greatest interest to those who know Ceylon, or are about to visit it. To a wider public it will not, we think, appeal very successfully. But it is beautifully printed, beautifully illustrated, and beautifully bound.

The practised hand of Mrs. Mackarness, known as the author of "A Trap to Catch a Sunbeam," is responsible for four little books designed in like manner to promote the welfare of young married couples, or of young couples about to be married. ONLY, THE DREAM CHINTZ, THE CLOUD WITH THE SILVER LINING, and COMING HOME are the respective names of these tiny volumes, which are attractively got up and published by Messrs. Warne at 6d. each.

In a tract lately published by Elliot Stock, with the somewhat misleading title REFLECTIONS ON THE CHARACTER AND DOINGS OF THE SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY OF ADDISON, the Rev. R. E. H. Duke seeks to identify the "good old Knight" with one Richard Duke, presumably an ancient member of the author's family and the contemporary Squire of Bulford, in the county of Wilts. Except that Bulford is the next parish to Milston, where Addison lived in his father's rectory till his twelfth year, nothing is brought forward that can be called evidence, direct or indirect, for this identification. Mr. Duke gives us no dates; indeed, he tells us nothing whatever of his ancestor (collateral, we may presume) beyond a hint that he, too, suffered from the coquetry of a "perverse widow." The local colouring in the picture of Sir Roger's neighbourhood, upon which Mr. Duke mainly relies, is too faint to give much support to his theory. If it is to gain any acceptance he must give us a few details, which the family pedigree might supply, such as the claimant's age in 1683, and whether he lived and died a bachelor.

ART.

The Art Impulse.

THE ORIGINS OF ART (Macmillan, 10s. n.) claims special attention for more than one reason. It is a philosophical work written in admirable English—for which the apology in the preface is quite unnecessary—by a Lecturer in the University of Finland, Mr. Yrgö Hirn. It handles a subject of great speculative interest which has received more attention in Germany than in England, and it handles it with great ability. Mr. Hirn's method in approaching the subject of "æsthetic" is the exact opposite of that followed by the German Idealists. It is the method of experimental psychology in which so much work has been done during the last few years. The beautiful, the ideal, the absolute, are conceptions which have little meaning for him; they are for the metaphysician, not for the scientific psychologist. So averse, indeed, is he to the dangerous abstractions which cluster round the word "beauty," that he attempts no analysis of it, and apparently will not recognize any faculty or function of the mind which requires the use of the phrase "the beautiful" as part of its definition. His inquiry is confined to the question, What is the impulse which urges human beings to draw, to dance, to build in ornamental fashion, to sing and play, and compose music? Two main characteristics of the art impulses are kept steadily in view, viz., that it is "emotionalistic," a matter entirely of feeling, not of intellect; and that it is "autotelic," that in its ultimate analysis it has no end beyond itself. The first ten chapters are devoted to the strictly psychological side of the subject, and from them the author's position may be gathered. The impulse to prolong and enhance a pleasurable "feeling state," and the impulse to arrest or lessen a painful one—these we may accept as primary facts in the sphere of emotion. Now nothing will so much tend to prolong the pleasure or relieve the pain as an external manifestation of the emotion; and to proceed to this external manifestation is the natural automatic tendency of every "feeling state." So far the individual only is affected, but as soon as the external manifestation is accomplished, a social aspect is given to the process. The original emotion is now excited in those who see the manifestation, and this diffusion of it reacts sympathetically upon the author of the manifestation so that he experiences a still further heightening of his own emotion. This, according to Mr. Hirn, who rejects as inadequate such special factors as the play impulse or the imitative impulse, is the "art impulse in its broadest sense." It seems to us, as a definition, to be so broad as to be valueless. Every hour of the day every one of us is performing actions which are "the externalized expressions of his moods." But we are not all of us artists. Mr. Hirn would apparently reply that the artist is that man among us who finds he can heighten pleasure or relieve pain "not only by the direct action of giving expression to his feeling, but also by arousing a kindred feeling in others"—for it is part of Mr. Hirn's system, and a part which he includes rather too unhesitatingly, that there can be no art without a public—and that "the work of art presents itself as the most effective means by which the individual is enabled to convey to wider and wider circles of sympathizers an emotional state similar to that by which he is himself dominated." It certainly does not always do so. Does Mr. Kruger find in the production of a work of art "the most effective means" of heightening his own emotion and attracting the sympathy of others? The impulse on which Charlotte Corday acted would fit exactly to the definition here given to the art impulse; but the murder of Marat was not a work of art. Mr. Hirn may have established the proposition that the art impulse is a matter of emotion not of intellect, but he does not seem to us to have given any solid ground for differentiating it from other emotional impulses, or to have explained what it is that impels this man, and does not impel that man, to produce or attempt to produce a work of art. More interesting and valuable are Mr. Hirn's investigations of the "concrete origins of art," the special channels into which the art impulse has run, the non-æsthetic factors that have helped to fashion different art forms. The impulse, though it has no end beyond itself, yet works through various media; it may serve to impart information, to record events; to propitiate love or favour; to stimulate to work or to war; to influence the imagination for the purposes of magic. The influence of religious emotion upon the graphic arts, the power and universality of which is evident alike in the drawings of the catacombs and the paintings of Raphael, is curiously neglected by Mr. Hirn. But he has collected a number of interesting facts and observations as to the purposes served by the arts in the life of primitive man, and, though he does not seem to us to have advanced very much the psychological study of æsthetics, he has written a book which should stimulate inquiry and which helps to elucidate and classify the diverse manifestations in human history of the artistic impulse.

Few things could be more characteristic of the unacademic revival of the arts and crafts in England than the collection of enamel work by Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Dawson now being exhibited at the Fine Art Society. In the first place the work is designed as well as executed by the two workers, and in the second place it holds its own in interest with any exhibition of pictures that has recently been held in these rooms. Much of it, moreover, is frankly utilitarian, and as much skill and knowledge has been lavished upon electric light fittings and fire irons as upon ornamental necklaces and hair ornaments, and other articles of bigotry and virtue. Such an exhibition would have been impossible in England twenty years ago, as much on account of its unpopularity as by reason of the lack of a sufficiently capable craftsman. Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Dawson rely as much upon simplicity of form as upon the unquestionable beauty of colour in their enamel work, and, in the presence of so fine and inspiriting a collection, we must be excused the question how much longer the Royal Academy of Arts will turn a blind eye to the certain claims of artists who express themselves in media other than the painting of easel pictures. Such an exhibition as this demonstrates beyond the possibility of doubt that the Arts and Crafts movement in England has left a deeper impression during the past twenty years in this country than any other art movement that we can recall. Line engraving, in the heyday of its prosperity, did not afford a greater opportunity for the expression of the artistic temperament than is offered by the successful practice of the useful and beautiful minor arts; but its successful practitioners were enrolled amongst the associates of the Royal Academy. It is surely time that the fathers amongst the forty should recognize the claims of the latter-day Benvenuto Cellinis and Luca della Robbias to representation in an academy of arts. The present state of things is especially anomalous when we remember the frequent honour which is paid by the masters of Burlington House to architecture.

That even Sir E. J. Poynter, in spite of his years of useful work at South Kensington, is not powerful enough to reform the Royal Academy schools is once more shown in the display of students' work which has, during the present week, accompanied the annual prize distribution. The students are still taught to consider that painting, sculpture, and architecture alone comprise the fine arts; and they are left to discover later on, when they are face to face with reality, that art includes much outside these conventional limitations. The Royal Academy still limits its prize list to landscape—the Creswick this year being taken by Mr. Ernest Board—to painting and drawing from the life, to modelling, to sculpture, and to architectural drawing, and Sir Edward Poynter complacently congratulates his students and his colleagues upon one of the best competitions on record. He further bravely states his opinion that we could not find better cartoons of a draped figure at any school in Europe. The President would have more reason for boasting if he could announce that in the future the Royal Academy will reward those who could show how to apply all this fine art to the common necessities of our modern life.

English book-binding as a fine art is in some danger of languishing for want of encouragement if we may judge by the prices given at Sotheby's on Monday for the books bound by the Guild of Women Binders and the Hampstead Bindery, of which we spoke last week. Some of the prices were surprisingly low. The prevailing demand was apparently for over-elaboration. One notable instance was the copy of the Vale Press issue of Shelley's "Lyrical Poems," a duodecimo, which had its covers decorated with no less than 300 pieces of inlaid leathers in seven different colours. This tiny volume fetched £18. The effect of the design was garish, and the inlays struck one as being too thin—a remark equally applicable to some other volumes. The thinner the inlay, the more perfect the surface; but even this doctrine can be carried too far. There were, however, some books which obtained fair prices. An extra-illustrated copy of Pickering's 1826 edition of Walton and Cotton's "Angler," 2 vols., with fine artist proof-plates, bound in green morocco with a beautiful inlay design of fish and water lilies, fetched £46. Keats, the "Endymion" edition of 1897, on vellum, with designs by Anning Bell, dark-green morocco, inlaid roses in crimson, £12 5s. Grimm's "German Popular Stories," introduction by Ruskin and plates by Cruikshank, a rich and very fine binding in red morocco with inlays of blue, white, and maroon, £12 15s. "English Lyrics from Spenser to Milton," 1899, on vellum, green morocco with inlays of dark flowers, £14. Campbell's "Poetical Works," first edition, splendidly bound in dark morocco with elaborate and finely tooled mosaic inlays, £14. "The Book of Gems," 1837, containing a set of 49 artist-proof illustrations, pink morocco, covered with a crowded design in various colours, a showy piece of work, £16 15s. Dickens' "Pickwick Papers," Victoria edition, 1887, 2 vols., extended to 4 vols., with facsimiles of original and numerous other illustrations, in green morocco, with inlaid portraits of the more famous characters, £40. Rogers' "Italy," first edition, engravings by Turner, &c., a fine copy bound in green morocco with inlays and vellum doublures, £13. This was the finest thing in the whole collection. If the binders will follow up such work as this they should have a future before them, and yet almost as much has frequently been given for exceptional copies of this book in ordinary commercial bindings. Yet here was a book challenging comparison with the work of Meunier and the best modern French artists, a sufficiently high standard, which commanded a price probably far less than the initial total outlay. The same reflection occurred in regard to the books bound by the members of the Guild of Women Binders in which the work was undoubtedly serious and honest, though in some cases finish was sacrificed to design. An example was the Vale Press copy of Keats' "Poetical Works," bound in "mediæval" morocco, with a richly embossed design, which sold for £5 17s. 6d. The last copy of this same work in paper boards, sold in the same rooms in March, fetched £5 15s.

Bernheim's in Paris is just now occupied with an exhibition of works by Boudin, an exquisite series of landscapes with sea, shipping, and figures at seaside resorts. Boudin holds a very important place in the history of painting in this century, following on the great school of 1830, and being followed by Claude Monet, who was his pupil. An interesting work on Boudin, by Gustave Cahen, has just been published in Paris, with many interesting passages from the painter's diary throwing critical light upon contemporary art.

Messieurs Durand-Ruel opened on the 6th of December an exhibition of forty-two tableaux by Walter Sickert, who has for some years past made Paris his home. Writing in the Figaro of this début in Paris of the young English painter, M. Arsène Alexandre remarks that "Ses études"—for, apparently, they are chiefly studies of effects—"sont pleines d'art, et elles ont une qualité, rare en ce moment, la modestie." We must confess to our surprise, for the Walter Sickert of the new English Art Club was better known for dessins de la vie moderne than for any excess of modesty. M. Alexandre further chooses a somewhat startling juxtaposition when he declares that there is in Mr. Sickert's work "un harmonie qui fait penser un peu à Whistler et à Brangwyn." The dainty, delicate Whistler and the robust, seafaring Brangwyn run oddly in double harness. Mr. Sickert, however, has made a most satisfactory impression upon the art world of Paris—the most sanely critical in Europe—with this, his first exhibition.

Mainly concerned as he was with painters and painting, Mr. Roger E. Fry, in the ten lectures just delivered on Florentine art of the fifteenth century, more than once made interesting allusion to literary matters. The story of Tobias and the Angel became a favourite one with artists about 1470, many of them basing their conception upon popular representations of the time. In one contemporary manuscript examined by Mr. Fry the sole allusion to Tobit's blindness is put into the mouth of his wife. She goes up and asks Tobit if he has not got some foreign substance that hurts in his eye. Picturesque these popular representations may have been, but if we judge by this Tobias the text was of small account. Mr. Fry pricked more than one Vasarian anecdote, among others the legend that Domenico Veneziano murdered Castagno, who, however, succeeded in outliving his so-called assassin by four years. It is said, again, that proof will soon be forthcoming as to the incorrect title of a familiar picture in the National Gallery. Uccello's battle piece—in effect more like a tourney—has for long been deemed to represent the battle of July 7, 1416, fought out on a plain between Sant'Egidio and the Tiber, on the road to Assisi; moreover, it has been pointed out as the earliest work in our National Gallery which contains portraits of Carlo Malatesta, Lord of Rimini, and his nephew Galeazzo. Mr. Horne, however, is said to have discovered a contemporary document which shows that Uccello was not here concerned with the Battle of Sant'-Egidio at all. Mr. Fry has read widely as well as made a profound study of Italian art. In the spring, perhaps, he will deal with the literary sources to which Botticelli went for inspiration.

FICTION.

"Lord Jim."

Mr. Conrad has been greatly praised and his gifts are many. Yet as one at length nears the close of the 450 densely-printed pages of LORD JIM (Blackwood, 6s.) there is a strong impression that he cannot write what is commonly understood as a novel. Judged in comparison with his successful contemporaries, weighed in the balance against such men as Mr. Hardy, Mr. Meredith, Stevenson, or a dozen lesser men, or gauged by even more catholic standards, he fails to satisfy. In "Lord Jim" Mr. Conrad wants to tell in monumental and soul-raising fashion the effect on a young man highly considered by his own people, of fair disposition, charged with a boyish passion for fame, and of some altruistic principle—of missing an opportunity of doing his bare duty. Such, it seems to us, is the vital point of the story. The complications in regard to his post on the Patna and many other side issues do not affect this point. Here, then, is a fine motive for a study of the human mind; a simple and effective psychological situation known to most of us. It is the method of telling this history of a soul that appears to us mistaken. When it is, at last, elaborately made clear that Jim has missed the chance of a great emergency, and when, after an existence of enormous mental stress, he is allowed to behold "the face of that opportunity which, like an Eastern bride, had come veiled to his side," one is grateful to the author. But, in the meantime, what an unconscionable amount of involved narrative and confused plot the author has given us. According to Thackeray, we know, a novel may be a sort of confidential talk between writer and reader, which must often be dull, must often flag, and still be most welcome. But with "Lord Jim" the confidential talk is all on the part of a sort of ancient mariner, one Marlow, who generally speaks of seeing Jim through a mist or partly hidden by the veil of his circumstances. When Marlow first sees Jim he looks at him "as though he could see somebody or something past his shoulder." This is not very helpful, but perhaps, like the affair in the Ibsen drama, it only seems very irrelevant. When Marlow first sees Jim and looks so queerly at him the hero is giving his evidence in regard to the abandonment of the Patna and the dereliction of duty of the officers at the time when they believed the ship was going to the bottom of the sea. This evidence is of a remarkably elusive character, although Jim desires to give it with "a meticulous precision of statement." Marlow watches Jim with the deep interest of a journalist who sees future "copy." "And, later on," says Mr. Conrad, "many times, in distant parts of the world, Marlow showed himself willing to remember Jim, to remember him at length, in detail and audibly," for Jim has told him some part of his story, but Marlow, like ourselves, did not quite know "what he was playing up to—if he was playing up to anything at all—" and suspects that Jim did not know either; for it is his belief that no man ever understands quite his own artful dodges to escape from the grim shadow of self-knowledge. With the soul of so illusory a hero to dissect it may be imagined that Mr. Marlow has plenty to talk about; his account of the state of Jim's mind reminds us of the desolate dream which haunts the recovery from a prolonged and powerful anæsthetic—tragic imaginings broken in upon by the horrid facts of life and death. Mr. Conrad has, of course, a convincing hand for the drawing of a vivid picture of semi-marine life in the Malay Peninsula and for description of disagreeable actualities, such as his portrait of the captain of the Patna, a horrid figure; his account of a great storm, too, is vivid, but he shares this gift of expression with many an anonymous "descriptive reporter" of the Press. The world of fiction is wide, and no doubt the author of "Lord Jim" will have many delighted readers; but, for our part, while we find in it infinite power of phrase, infinite observation, infinite volubility, we consider the narrative which his character Marlow tells to a group of rather bored listeners terribly involved, bewilderingly crowded, frequently turgid, painfully phantasmagoric, in no way a thing of beauty or fashioned for our delight.

Mr. Guy Boothby.

In a series of stories called A PRINCE OF SWINDLERS (Ward, Lock, 5s.) Mr. Guy Boothby relates the amazing exploits of a certain Simon Carne. The stories are not thrilling and the swindler's thefts are impossible, except on the assumption that every one else in the world in which he moves is unusually dense and stupid. Mr. Boothby should really find some competent person to read his proofs. Probably his own time is too valuable to be wasted over such matters, but in THE WOMAN OF DEATH (Pearson's, 5s.) he opens with two misprints in a French sentence, and follows this up by calmly writing Facile decensus Averni on page 11. The story itself presents once again that well-worn theme of the suicides' club—only here the escape from boredom lies in a duel to the death, in which every member of the society binds himself to take part when called upon. Love comes to the blasé hero, and his summons to the duel follows, and the rest of the story may be imagined. LONG LIVE THE KING (Ward, Lock, 5s.) is another example of Mr. Boothby's untiring industry. It is not quite so thin as "The Woman of Death," nor does it contain quite so many printers' errors, but the people we meet are more exalted. This is the story of Max, Crown Prince of Pannonia, and his adventures (after his royal father had been compelled to leave a rebellious country) in England, Brazil, travelling with a low class Portugee in search of diamonds, and finally assisting, as a common soldier, in the recovery of the kingdom for his brother. Love was at the bottom of the Crown Prince's noble self-abnegation, and Mr. Anthony Hope's Ruritania was probably at the bottom of Mr. Boothby's mind when he decided to write a story of the neighbouring kingdom of Pannonia. The novel is bright enough, and very full of incident.

For the Young.

GOD'S LAD, by Paul Cushing (C. Arthur Pearson, 6s.), is a vigorous story of the Californian goldfields half a century ago. The rush for gold and the romance of San Francisco have done duty in scores of tales of this type. With the exception of the comic Chinaman all the old stock-in-trade appears once more—six-shooters, Red Indians, mean cusses, and irate skippers. Still the adventures of Mr. Cushing's hero are full of life and variety. The dialogue would bear condensation, but it is certainly racy. The little heroine is described as a "gracious angel-face in blue canvas overalls stuck into high boots." The book is a capital one for boys, and one that will not be without interest for older people who have retained a liking for rollicking adventure.

We know Mr. Ascott R. Hope best as a writer of stories about school life. In TALES FOR TONY (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.) he gives us stories in which animals converse with one another in such a manner that good lessons are taught by their conversation. Proud puppies, dancing bears, swallows, elephants, wasps, and cuckoos are all pressed into the service, and contribute to the entertainment and instruction of the young. It is the sort of thing that children will like, and parents will approve of. The pictures, by W. H. Robinson and S. Jacobs, are very good.

THE LADY OF ROMERVAL, by Jean Delaire (Sands, 3s. 6d.), is an historical story of the peasants' war, intended for children, and written more or less in the Roman Catholic interest. The pictures are better than the letterpress.

THE GOLDEN SHIP AND OTHER TALES is a picture book for children, issued from the office of the Universities Mission to Central Africa. The stories are translated from the Swahili, and were originally collected by Bishop Steere. The morals are sound, though the roads by which they are reached are somewhat tortuous. On the whole we should think they would be more interesting to folklorists than to children. Perhaps a fair division of labour will be for folklorists to read the text, while children look at the pictures, which are by Miss Lilian Bell, and are pretty.

TERRE DE FAUVES, by Pierre Mael (Hachette, 10 francs), is an example of what France can do in the way of Christmas gift books for boys. The scene is laid in the Himalayas, and the heroes nearly climb Mount Everest, and also have adventures with the wild beasts of the Terai. There are both French and English heroes, and they get on very well together, so that the author may be congratulated on having done something for the promotion of the entente cordiale. The pictures are good and numerous, and the make up is handsome, though the interjected scraps of English are sometimes quaint. For example:—"Gentleman, I beg your pardon. Tell me please your name," and "Keep an apartment for the R. H. Major Plumptre and six persons of his attendance."

SALES OF BOOKS AND MSS.

Several libraries were sold last week at Sotheby's. Among miscellaneous books of importance were Boccaccio's "Il Decamerone," 1737, 5 vols., illustrated with plates by Gravelot, &c., £17 10s.; Molière's "Le Tartuffe," first ed., £29 10s.; Pine's "Horace," 1733, £15; Dante's "La Commedia," 1477, a fine copy of Spira's print, £23 10s.; "La Commedia," Florence, 1481, £32; an excellent copy of the first complete edition of Montaigne's "Essais," 1588, £10 5s.; "Missale Romanum," circa 1470, a beautiful French MS. on 130 leaves of vellum with 15 miniatures, £155. And among the English books, Boswell's "Life of Johnson" and "Tour to the Hebrides," 1831, extended to 10 vols., by extra illustration, £35; Brathwait, "An Excellent Piece of Conceipted Poesy," 1658, £42; Breton's "A Solemne Passion of the Soule's Love," 1622, £33; "The Twoo Bookes of Francis Bacon," 1605, £12 10s.; Coleridge's "A Lay Sermon" and "The Statesman's Manual," first editions, presentation copies, £7 5s.; Charles I.'s "Basilika," 1662, 2 vols., binding by Mearne in poor condition, £30; "Chaucer," Kyngston's print of 1561, a fine copy, £19; Dickens' "Sergeant Bell and his Raree Show," 1839, £13; Drayton's "To the Majestie of King James," 1603, £6 15s.; Wordsworth's "The River Duddon," first edition, £1 2s.; Goldsmith's "The Citizen of the World," 1762, £2 7s.; Granger's "Biographical History of England," 1824, extra illustrated with nearly one thousand portraits, £8; Hughes' "Tom Brown's School Days," first edition, in a fine binding by Riviere, £10; Johnson's "The Idler," presentation copy to Anna Williams, £6 15s.; Keats' "Lamia," &c., 1820, £20 10s.; "Endymion," 1818, £17 5s.; Hasted's "History of Kent," extra illustrated, £41; Richardson's "Clarissa," first edition, £4 15s.; Locke's "A Letter Concerning Toleration," 1689, the author's own copy, £6 5s.; Sheridan's "Pizarro," first edition, £6 10s.; Smollett's "The History and Adventures of an Atom," first edition, in excellent condition, £12 15s.; Tennyson's "Poems, Chiefly Lyrical," a perfect copy of the first edition, £18; "Poems," 1842, £17; Turberville's "Epitaphs," &c., 1570, a much cut-down copy, £51; Shelley's "Letters, with an Introductory Essay by Robert Browning," 1852, £17; "Queen Mab," first edition, slightly imperfect, £30 10s.; Spenser's "Colin Clouts Come Home Againe," 1595, £20; "The Faerie Queene," 1596, £21; Shakespeare, the Fourth Folio, very tall copy but imperfect, £7 10s.; "Shakespeare," Boydell's edition with extra illustrations, £13 5s.; Byron's "Poetical Works," 9 vols., 1839; Medwin's "Journal"; Leigh Hunt's "Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries," 1828; Kennedy's "Conversations," &c., in 15 vols., extra illustrated, with some 900 portraits, views, scenes, and several autograph letters, all relating to Byron, &c., £96; Browning's "Pauline," 1833, in uncut copy in fine and clean condition, but with one slight defect, £120. Only twelve copies of this rare work are known to exist. Ten years ago a perfect and uncut copy was sold for sixty guineas; in 1896 the Crampon copy, which was not uncut, but which contained a note from the author, fetched £145.

A good many interesting autographs were also sold. A letter of three pages, dated 23rd Aug., 1849, from Charlotte Brontë, referring to the health of her father, £4 15s.; a pathetic letter dated 26th July, 1817, from Elizabeth Austen describing the circumstances of Jane Austen's death, £3 3s.; a letter of three pages from William Penn to Lord Halifax, £31; a very long letter of ten-and-a-half pages, dated 21st July, 1844, from Mrs. Browning, in which she remarks, "Poetry is more to me than ever, and dearer—and (in an earthly sense), it is a vital organ left to me to breathe with," was sold for £9; a fine letter, dated 2nd March, 1762, from Lord Clive, £11; an interesting letter, dated 22nd Sept., 1775, from Kitty Clive, the Actress, £18; another, dated 11th Feb., 1779, £12; a letter dated 10th Jan., 1818, from Coleridge on his financial troubles, £3 3s.; a letter in French, dated 10th June, 1651, and signed by Oliver Cromwell, £11; four interesting and gossipy letters from Dr. Johnson, which fetched respectively, £8, £7 17s. 6d., £8, and £6 10s. A manuscript criticism on "The Wigwam and the Cabin, by W. G. Simms," written by Edgar Allan Poe, £11.

There were also four characteristic letters from Shelley. The first, covering four pages, is dated 3rd Sept., 1819, addressed to Leigh Hunt, and deals largely (in reference to "The Cenci") with portraits and pictures. In it Shelley explains his own attitude in reference to the great Italian artists. He dissents "with astonishment and indignation on the common notion that he (Angelo) equals, and in some respect exceeds, Raphael." . . . "He (Angelo) has been called the Dante of painting, but if we find some of the gross and strong outlines which are employed in the few most distasteful passages of the 'Inferno,' where shall we find your Francesca, where the Spirit coming over the sea in a boat like Mars rising from the vapours of the horizon, where Matilda gathering flowers, and all the exquisite tenderness and sensibility and ideal beauty, in which Dante excelled all poets except Shakespeare?" £11 10s. was given for this letter. Another letter, also to Hunt, from Florence, fetched £9 5s. In the third letter, dated Pisa, 5th April, 1820, Shelley goes on, after a reference to Hunt's work, "Meanwhile I am anxious to hear what you think of mine ('Prometheus Unbound'). I am afraid the subject will not please you, but at least you will read my justification of it in the preface. I lay great stress upon the argument against a direct effort [effect?] to be produced by works of imagination. The Theatre rejected it with expressions of the greatest insolence. I feel persuaded that they must have guessed at the author. But about all this I don't much care. But of all that I have lately sent, Prometheus is my favourite." £11 10s. was paid for this letter. A fourth letter, for which £11 5s. was given, was from Shelley to Hunt, and dated Pisa, 6th Oct., 1821. It gives Hunt many definite instructions in regard to his projected journey to Italy, and then goes on, "In addition, write exactly when we are to expect you. This is of the last consequence as to cheapness, because it is necessary we should make some arrangement about your lodging, and tell us what furniture you have and whether any. Lord Byron is expected every day, and I know will be delighted to hear of your coming. He has a fine palace and will have a splendid establishment here; that's the sort of thing he likes."

The most important item in the sale of the Waller Library on Wednesday was an uncut first edition, in the original boards, of "Waverley." It fetched £116, and would probably have fetched nearly twice as much but that in each of the three volumes the second half-title was wanting. Grolier's copy of the "Aldine Horace" of 1509 was bought by Mr. Quaritch for £81, and a first edition of White's "Selborne" went for £10.

Correspondence.

JOHN DONNE AND THE ANTHOLOGIST.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your reviewer's reply to my letter is simply an amplification of my own words in qualifying my observation on his remarks as to the omission of any extract from Donne's poetry in "The Golden Treasury," by reciting the different MSS., &c., of "Present in Absence." That the best authorities are highly doubtful of its authenticity and that all subsisting evidence is against its being Donne's are matters of opinion.

The maturer judgment of Mr. Palgrave removed all his doubts as to its authorship.

The principal motive from which my letter proceeded was the idea that, in spite of his preliminary admission that "The Golden Treasury" remains the unit of taste, your reviewer was not dealing absolute justice to Palgrave in his subsequent references to this little book. The impression given to the ordinary reader by your reviewer's statement, following his reference to Mr. Edmund Gosse's fruitful labours, that Donne makes no appearance at all in "The Golden Treasury," is that Palgrave had overlooked Donne's claims to representation in his anthology, which was certainly not the case. It may be that your reviewer had not seen the later editions of "The Golden Treasury." But he appears to have fallen into an additional error, to which I only draw attention because it strongly corroborates the suspicion that your reviewer was, doubtless unconsciously, unfair in his reference to "The Golden Treasury." He complains that Palgrave would give himself the licence of selecting verses or passages and would then print them without confessing the mutilation, and goes on to cite the curtailment of Crashaw's "Wishes for the Supposed Mistress" commencing "Whoe'er she be, that not impossible She," and of Smart's "Song of David," as instances of this deliberate chicanery. If it were so it were a sin even more grievous than admitted mutilation, but of this offence, at least, Palgrave was entirely innocent. Here is Mr. Palgrave's note to "Present in Absence":—"One stanza has been here omitted in accordance with the principle noted in the preface. Similar abbreviations occur in a few other poems. The more serious abbreviation by which it has been attempted to bring Crashaw's 'Wishes' and Shelley's 'Euganean Hills,' with one or two more, within the scheme of this selection is commended with much diffidence to the judgment of readers acquainted with the original pieces." What becomes of your reviewer's accusation? Again, in his note to "The Song of David," Palgrave confesses that his three verses are only an extract. Where is his concealment of mutilation here?

Although it is true there is almost as much danger in slavishly adhering to old standards as there is, when these are from time to time apprised in conjunction with later productions, of underrating them, lapse of time seems to produce a tendency, to which many of us are more or less prone, to disparage the work of older and vanished craftsmen in both art and literature. The permanency of their work frequently remains eventually unimpaired, notwithstanding its probationary trials in the shape of critical comparisons with current writers, and, within its limitations, "The Golden Treasury" will doubtless come successfully out of the ordeal of any comparisons which in the common course of literary existence it may have to undergo. In the press of literary work it is impossible always to be exact in making statements which must often rest on the memory of the writers, but the strictures of your learned reviewer in speaking of Palgrave's collection of verse were hardly warranted by the facts.

Yours, &c.,

Southport, 10th Dec. A. H. GARSTANG.

LINKS WITH THE PAST.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, In your review of Mr. Hare's autobiography you characterize as startling the story told him by the late Lord Redesdale that "his father, Speaker Mitford, was acquainted with a man in Swaledale who, as a child, knew an ancient who, as a boy, was present at the battle of Flodden." From further details this story appears to be an inaccurate version of the legend of Henry Jenkins. It is not likely that he was, as he appears to have stated, 169 years of age; the evidence on the question is summarized in the "Dictionary of National Biography." But as he died at Bolton-on-Swale in 1670, there is no difficulty in supposing that Speaker Mitford, who was born in 1748, may have spoken with a man who had seen the soi-disant arrow-caster of Flodden Field. I am yours, &c.,

Trinity College, Oxford, Dec. 11. H. E. D. BLAKISTON.

SAMUEL WELLER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your note about the Sikes or Sykes family reminded me of an old quarto in my possession, "The Abuse of Grace," by Nicholas Claget, Oxford, 1659. On a fly-leaf at the end of this old volume is the following inscription, which seems to show that the orthographical eccentricities of the immortal "Sam" were an old family characteristic.

SAMUEL WELLER,
HIS BOOK,
1737.

God give him Grace therein to Look, Not to Look but honderstand for Lerning is Most Exland for When house and Land is Gon and Spent then Lerning is Most Exaland, 1737.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

PROFESSOR DOWDEN'S "ROMEO AND JULIET."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I believe that runaway is never found in Shakespeare in the sense thus defined by Schmidt—"one who roves and rambles about, a vagabond." Professor Hales, who thinks the word has this sense in Romeo and Juliet, admits (Longman's Magazine, Feb., 1892) that, so used, it is a ἅπαξ λεγόμενον not only in Shakespeare, but in English literature.

Richard III.'s oration to his army (Act V., Scene III.) is modelled on Holinshed. But Holinshed's Richard describes the opposing army as made up partly of Englishmen—"a companie of traitors, theeves, outlawes, and runagates of our own nation"—and partly of "beggerlie Britans (i.e., Bretons) and faint-hearted Frenchmen." Shakespeare's Richard represents the "gentlemen of England" on his side as opposed solely by foreigners, whom their country "vomits forth," and Shakespeare alters Holinshed's "runagates" to "runaways" (i.e., from France):—

> Remember whom you are to cope withal:
> A sort of vagabonds, rascals, and runaways,
> A scum of Bretons and base lackey peasants,
> Whom their o'erloyed country vomits forth
> To desperate adventures. . . .
> . . . . . .
> Let's whip these stragglers o'er the seas again.

If Shakespeare meant runagates why did he alter Holinshed's word?

I remain, your obedient servant,

Dublin, Dec. 8. EDWARD DOWDEN.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With reference to the celebrated passage in Romeo and Juliet, Act III., Sc. 2, ll. 1-9, Mr. Case, in his letter of Dec. 1, in your issue of Dec. 8, assumes, I think, too much when he speaks of the "authoritative reading" of the line "by their own beauties . . ." It might as easily be asserted that any of the palpable blunders—long since corrected—in the First Folio are authoritative readings just because they were printed in that celebrated volume.

No doubt the second quarto of 1599 is our first "authoritative" edition of Romeo and Juliet, but if Mr. Case means by the "first correct edition" that this quarto is absolutely without spot or blemish, and that anything printed in it is "correct," I join issue with him at once. The third quarto of 1609 was admittedly printed from the second quarto, and the First Folio from the third quarto; therefore there exists no such "overwhelming force of early authorities" with regard to the passage as Mr. Case apparently believes. The authority for commencing the line with "And" really rests on the correctness of the second quarto. Considering that the second quarto has almost conclusively been proved to have been printed, not from Shakespeare's own MS. but from a by no means careful or accurate transcript, it is somewhat difficult to see where the absolute authority of this quarto comes in.

The first quarto, of course, does not contain the passage, but the folios other than the first and the remaining quartos contain, I believe, the accepted reading.

Coming now to the line itself, does the addition of this word "And" lend either sense, force, or rhythm to the commonly accepted reading? Not a shred of sense or force, certainly; and it merely destroys the rhythm of the line. Mr. Case's "authoritative" reading scans most vilely, as he scans it. Who can imagine the writer of the Sonnets—and the Sonnets and Romeo and Juliet belong to the same period of Shakespeare's artistic development—laying stress on an unimportant word like "by" in a fervently poetic passage like this? Besides, if the first foot must be trisyllabic, the proper scansion would be an anapæst—viz., "And by their own beauties." There is no need, however, for laying stress on "their," still less for laying any on "by." The stress, if any, is on the word "own." I, for one, therefore, quite fail to see either the "pointed sense" of the line, as commencing with the word "And," or where Juliet's "paradox" comes in.

It is to be hoped, then, that the accepted reading will keep its place. It is, beyond reasonable doubt, the true reading.

With regard to the construction of the whole passage, I entirely agree with Mr. Case in thinking that Professor Dowden's interpretation is ingenious—and also unnecessary. Schmidt, who was, after all, a German, may have quoted a parallel passage on the meaning of the word "runaway"; but that carries us no further in our quest of the true reading, which "runaway's" or "runaways'" certainly is not. I hope to deal with this and with Professor Dowden's interpretation on another occasion.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

Dec. 10, 1900. HENRY CUNINGHAM.

LORD ROSEBERY'S "NAPOLEON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With reference to the reply to my letter relative to Sir Hudson Lowe by Colonel Ramsay Phipps, as a civilian I may be excused from laying down the law on points of strategy.

But if he and other authorities consider that the retreat from Moscow was well devised and well executed, with proper consideration for the welfare of the troops (such as has been shown by Lord Roberts for our forces in the Transvaal), one may venture to observe that on that occasion the making of Napoleon's omelette seemed to have necessitated the breaking of an unusual number of eggs.

The point remains unshaken that Sir Hudson Lowe at Capri showed gentlemanly instincts in his recognition of the courtesy of his conqueror, General Lamarque.

Yours faithfully, ALGERNON WARREN.

17, Wellseck-mansions, Inglewood-road, West Hampstead, N.W.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—If my quotation of the Saxe-Weimar Incident to prove Napoleon's lack of gentility helps your correspondent Mr. Hall to prove his point, I cannot but feel that his deductions from it are widely different from those which prompted Wellington and Tennyson to consider the Emperor "emphatically not a gentleman." Mr. Hall brings in the political position of Weimar, and points out that this State had cost Napoleon much blood and money; also that Napoleon snubbed the Duchess from irritation against her country and its ruler. He thus shows that Napoleon's relations towards a high-spirited lady were influenced by his aggressive political attitude towards her husband. Here is a bulwark of Napoleon's gentility!

By the letter quoted, moreover, Mr. Hall shows that avowedly Napoleon was polite to such women as were agreeable to himself, a characteristic which unites with many others to show his essentially selfish temperament. There are very few lovers who do not like women who are pleasant to them. Here is the second bulwark. As a still more potent third bulwark I suggest to Mr. Hall that he should consider Napoleon's attitude towards and treatment of his wife Josephine.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully, WALTER W. SETON.

Derwent-house, Anerley, S.E., Dec. 8.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The Germans have been known to suggest that the only fault to be found with Shakespeare is that he had the bad taste to be born an Englishman. This being so, and in view also of the valuable contributions made by Germans to Shakespearean criticism of which English scholars have always gladly availed themselves, it is satisfactory to find Mr. Sidney Lee's "Life of Shakespeare" translated into German, and introduced to the German public by Dr. Richard Wülker with a highly appreciative preface. The translation is admirably done by Fräulein Marthe Schwabe, of Leipzig, under Dr. Wülker's superintendence, and the handsome, well-printed volume is published by Georg Wigand, of Leipzig. Dr. Wülker refers to the almost unanimous praise which the original work received in the German Press. The translation indeed was undertaken in response to a generally expressed wish that a book "indispensable" for all readers and lovers of Shakespeare should be made widely available in Germany. Dr. Wülker declares that the whole point of view of Shakespearean research will be altered by the consideration, so well worked out by Mr. Lee, that the English sonneteers were imitating their French and Italian brethren, and he specially praises the chapters dealing with the relations between Shakespeare and the Earl of Southampton, with the various plays, notably the Taming of the Shrew and the Merchant of Venice, and with Shakespeare's posthumous reputation. The criticism of a foreigner is said to be as near as we can get to the verdict of posterity, and Dr. Wülker's testimony is gratifying to English scholarship. Such exchange of literary ideas will do something, it may be hoped, to cement the amity of nations.

Mr. Sidney Lee, by-the-by, is modest enough to think that his Life was more than is wanted by "the great variety of readers," for whom he now furnishes a reduced and cheaper edition—"Shakespeare's Life and Work" (Smith, Elder, 2s. 6d.). The new book does not differ in any important particular from the old. Mr. Lee has not altered his opinion on any vexed question save that he is content to give his conclusions without so fully stating his reasons.

The delegates of the Clarendon Press will publish in the autumn of 1901 a facsimile, by the collotype process, of the First Folio of Shakespeare. The Chatsworth copy has, by the permission of the Duke of Devonshire, been deposited on loan in the Bodleian Library for the purpose. Mr. Sidney Lee will contribute a brief introduction, and will give as full a list as practicable of all known copies of the First Folio with bibliographical details. Owners of copies of the First Folio who are not already in communication with Mr. Lee are requested to communicate with him, care of the Clarendon Press, Oxford.

The Oxford University Press has some reason to be proud of its recent successes in Paris, as any one can see who presents his card at the University Warehouse at Amen-corner, Paternoster-row, where the bindings, paper, and educational works, for which the three Grand Prix were awarded, are being exhibited for a week or two. The bindings are specially interesting, for the Oxford Press had the largest and, in some respects, the finest collection of bindings in the Exhibition. The total value of the volumes is upwards of £1,100, the more elaborate examples being worth as much as £50 and £60 a piece. Some of the best specimens were bought at the Paris Exhibition, but these may still be seen, for the time being, with the other bindings in the collection. The most striking thing about the paper exhibit is the demonstration of the strength of the famous Oxford India paper, as well as of the marvels of compression accomplished by its means. In one case a volume of between 1,000 and 2,000 pages is seen suspended by a single leaf, and, still further to prove its strength, a narrow strip of this paper is shown supporting a solid oak board on which lies one of the heavy volumes of the Oxford English Dictionary, a total weight of 19lb. The exhibition is well worth a visit.

We understand that the announcement recently made by a contemporary to the effect that the first volume of the collected edition of Ruskin's works would be ready early next year is incorrect. The literary executors are at present engaged in examining the papers and selecting the fresh matter to be included in the new edition; and it will be next autumn, at the earliest, before Mr. George Allen will have the first volume ready for publication.

The late Dr. Momerie's works are all published by Messrs. Blackwood. "Church and Creed" is out of print, but we believe that a fourth edition is in hand. One of his last publications, "The English Church and the Roman Schism," was first brought out anonymously in May, 1890, but a second edition was issued six months later under the author's name. There is a steady demand for most of Dr. Momerie's books. His "Origin of Evil and other Sermons" is in its eighth edition, enlarged; "Defects of Modern Christianity and other Sermons" and "Personality" are both in their fifth editions.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier are publishing, under the title of "China's Only Hope," a work written by Chang Chih Tung, China's most progressive Viceroy, to enlighten his fellow-countrymen, which has reached a circulation in China of not less than a million copies. This book is said to have been the prime cause of the Emperor's reform movement. The same publishers have a book entitled "The Siege in Peking: China against the World," by Dr. W. A. P. Martin, President of the Imperial University in Peking, who went through the siege.

Mr. Patchett Martin, we regret to hear, is still too ill to resume his usual literary work. He is the author of the memoir of the late Sir Henry Parkes for the supplementary volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography."

Mr. Edwin Pugh will, on Monday next, give a recital from his own writings at one of the weekly Free Popular Entertainments held at the Unitarian Church, Fort-road, Bermondsey.

A sixpenny art magazine, which has been running for some months as a private publication, is about to be issued by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein under the title of "International Art Notes." It is intended to be of practical service to artists, art students, and amateurs, with articles on art subjects and special contributions from foreign art centres, and will aim at a high level in the way of illustrations and general production.

Mr. Hugh MacLeay has relinquished the editorship of the Poster in favour of Mr. Charles Hiatt. Mr. MacLeay is to establish a new publication dealing exhaustively with advertising.

The well-known Isle of Wight literary journal Vectis is to become a quarterly publication. We hope that Dr. Dabbs, despite his medical work, will be able to continue his editorial duties in connexion with a local journal of so unique a kind.

EDUCATIONAL.—The lecture recently delivered at the Sesame Club by Mr. A. Sonnenschein on the proper method for teaching children to read English has created much interest in educational circles. "We have no hesitation in asserting," said the St. James's Gazette, in an editorial article on the subject, "that, if the London School Board were to insist on the general adoption of the Sonnenschein method of teaching reading, they would introduce one of the most important educational reforms brought about since the Act of 1870." It is more than thirty years since Mr. Sonnenschein's primer first appeared, and he has just prepared a new series, entitled "Reading in a Twelvemonth," which will be published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein. The principle is, in the main, the same as in the existing work, but the sequence of lessons is improved and some additions made. The little volumes will be illustrated—in colours and otherwise—and accompanied by a teacher's book, containing an essay on methods of teaching reading and explanations and instructions for young teachers. The first two numbers will appear in January.

Books to look out for at once.

White mates in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 104, by A. Troitzky.—White (4 pieces)—K at K Kt 6; B at K Kt 4; Kt at K sq; pawn at Q R 7. Black (5 pieces)—K at K Kt sq; Kts at Q R sq and Q Kt 2; pawns at K 7 and K Kt 2. White to play and win.

NOTES BY CORRESPONDENTS.—"In 87 the way White gets out of ch at the same time mating Black is very neat."—J. D. Tucker.

"In 87 the idea of letting Black capture the queen, and at the same time discover check on White king is charmingly worked out. In the original position, No. 90, White can threaten mate, either by 1. Kt–K 8 or by 1. Kt–K 6; the former is baffled by 1. Kt–B 5, the latter by 1. Q×P. By playing 1. Q–B 4, White forces the B Kt to obstruct the B Q, or the R Q to obstruct the B Kt, excepting in a few minor variations which nerve to round off the problem."—A.C.W. White to play and win.

CHESS BY CORRESPONDENCE.—The amount of correspondence play throughout the world is probably very great—much larger than most players imagine. We are always advising that the game should be more practically acknowledged as purely a resource for the student at home. Too many devotees spend all their spare time, and we fear a good many spend more time than they can properly afford, in skittling away at off-hand "play," which yields no real advantage, and this is frequently in smoky, impure atmosphere. A pocket board for travelling, a supply of diagrams, and a good board and men at home, with some games and problems, and then winter and weather may be defied and the troubles of life will largely cease to exercise their depressing influences.

The Southern and Northern Counties have done well to recognize facts by instituting a 50 a-side correspondence match. In this contest 100 of our best amateurs are engaged, playing two games with each other. The annexed position shows the abrupt conclusion of one of these games. Players may like to find out the reason why White, in this position, brings the game to such an unexpected end. The pieces are equal, the position does not seem very dangerous and yet there is a win in a move or two. How is this accomplished?

NOTES.—A tournament is in progress at the old chess resort, Simpson's Divan, Strand. It is limited to Teichmann, Lee, Van Vliet, Mortimer, and Müller. A tournament to give a start to some new rooms for chess, &c., will be opened at Monte Carlo next month. Salta, a new game, will be a feature. Lasker and Maroczy are touring in the north of England. They will apparently not visit America at present.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week a "Personal View" by Professor Dowden, entitled "1801-1901."

* * * *

We tender betimes our birthday greetings to Dr. Samuel Smiles, the eighty-eighth anniversary of whose birthday is to-morrow. Dr. Smiles is, we think, since Martineau's death, our senior well-known man of letters. Dr. Smiles was already over forty before he made his literary reputation with the "Life of Stephenson" and the popular "Self-Help," and he has lived to enjoy that reputation for over forty years. It is worth noting that in more than one well-known book of reference no place is found among Dr. Smiles' publications for his admirable "Life of John Murray." Yet it is probably his history of the great publishing house of the Murrays that is likely to prove his most permanent link with literature.

* * * *

The unearthing of the juvenile productions of great authors is often unprofitable. A new instance of the practice will nevertheless afford great pleasure to the admirers of the author of "Madame Bovary." In the number of the Revue Blanche for December 15 have appeared the first pages of an unpublished manuscript of Flaubert. Its existence had often been doubted by the critics, and it now sees the light after sixty-two years. It is thus introduced to the public:—

> The unpublished novel of Gustave Flaubert, of which we now begin the publication, was written about the year 1838 when the author was only 17 years of age. In his zeal for perfection Gustave Flaubert—whose first printed book, "Madame Bovary," was not to appear till 1857—had abandoned all thought of publishing these juvenile productions. But now that twenty years have passed since his death it seems legitimate to exhume them, not only as a literary curiosity and document of the earliest period of production of a great writer, but also because of their autobiographical value. The manuscript of the "Mémoires d'un Fou" belongs to M. Pierre Dauze, the eminent editor of the Revue Biblio-iconographique, who has kindly communicated it to us.

The publishers call this manuscript a "novel." This is hardly the name for it. It is an eloquent youthful confession, with all the abandon of emotion of Rousseau and Chateaubriand—a confession which the strenuous impersonality of Flaubert's subsequent work gave us little reason to expect. It is this revelation that gives the "Mémoires d'un Fou" their value, although Maxime du Camp's reminiscences told us something of the early and unpublished Flaubert. Flaubert was what French critics call a "romantique"; on this M. Faguet, in his monograph in Hachette's collection of "Great French Writers," constantly insists. But how spontaneous and irrepressible a "romantique" he was we should never have known without this new work, which is an invaluable chapter in the history of the artist's temperament.

* * * *

Very instructive, as bearing on the doctrines of the modern school of comparative criticism, are the pages in which the young Flaubert reveals the origin of his romantic passion. Here is the confession of the young dreamer, "cribb'd, cabin'd, and confined" within the prison-house of his college, where contact with his fellows became to him a torture:—

> I wandered off alone with a volume of poems, or a novel. . . . I recall the voluptuous delight with which I devoured Byron and Werther, my transports as I read Hamlet, Romeo, and the most burning productions of our epoch—all those works, in a word, which so sweetly melt the soul, which are so burning with such a fire of enthusiasm. I feed on the rough verse of the North, which resound, like the waves of the sea, in Byron. Often, after a single reading, I recalled whole fragments, and repeated them over and over again to myself, as one hums the haunting melody of a delightful song. . . . The platitude of the French translation disappeared before the thoughts themselves, as if the thoughts had a style of their own quite apart from the words. . . . All these echoes, unknown to the sumptuous dignity of classical literatures, had for me a perfume of novelty, an attraction which drew me continually towards this magnificent poetry, which gives you a veritable giddiness and flings you into the limitless gulf of the infinite.

What an astonishing proof of the tyranny in France of the classical tradition, of that power to repress which resides in what Flaubert calls the "sumptuous dignity of classical literatures," that a man who had once felt and written thus should have so learned to dominate his lyric temper as to pass later on for the very type of the impersonal artist. And what an excellent passage to confirm the thesis of the author of "Jean-Jacques Rousseau et le Cosmopolitisme Littéraire," on the causes of the emancipation of the French mind during the present century. After a publication like this, so conscientious a critic as M.

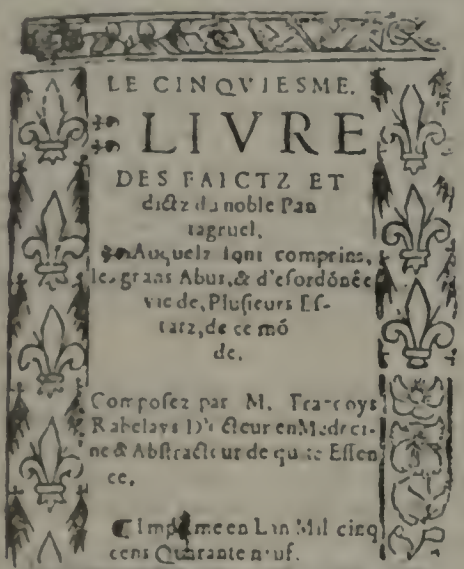
Paget must regret that his valuable little book was not delayed. Here is all he had to say of the early years of Flaubert:—

> He was born in the Rouen hospital, was brought up there, and left it only when 18 years of age, to come to Paris to study law. He was brought up very freely, without constraint, as a pupil at the local lycée—living, however, at home—where he did little work, but reading the while a great deal of literature.

M. Paget's data for these early years were evidently meagre. The "Mémoires d'un Fou" will probably tempt him to revise his work. They confirm him, indeed, in his general appreciation of Flaubert; but they give a precision to judgments which hitherto had only an à priori plausibility.

* * * *

A remarkable find is announced this week from Munich. Herr Rosenthal, a well-known bookseller of antiquarian tastes, has discovered a hitherto unknown edition of the doubtful fifth book of "Gargantua and Pantagruel," dated 1549, and therefore printed during the author's lifetime. We reproduce below the title-page of the newly-discovered volume.



The importance of this will be at once evident to the true Rabelaisian. The earliest known edition of the book is dated 1564, eleven years after Rabelais is supposed to have died. Not many years later it was asserted that it was not the work of Rabelais at all, and the controversy has raged through the centuries. Paul Lacroix made a great discovery in 1840—that of a MS. of this fifth book, written, apparently, 1550-1560, and lying in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris; and he exhaustively discussed the subject in a pamphlet published just thirty years ago. The dissentients point out that the book shows strong Calvinistic leanings inconsistent with what we know of Rabelais. Lacroix thought that the passages in question were not stronger than could be accounted for by Rabelais' bitterness at the treatment he had received at the hands of the Papists. He also found explanations for one or two passages which appear to refer to events which took place after the death of Rabelais; and to the criticism that the book contained repetitions from previous books he attached little importance. On the whole, Lacroix, despite the fact that the editions contained a good many things which did not appear in his MS., accepted the fifth book as genuine. The majority of critics are on his side; but there are not wanting those who see in the book the work of an inferior imitator cleverly piecing together fragments from the Rabelaisian fable. Now, if Herr Rosenthal is right, we shall see what Rabelais really intended the fifth book of his great work to be like, and what is its relation to the MS. of Lacroix.

Captain Brassbound's Conversion, Mr. Bernard Shaw's latest contribution to the gaiety of playgoers and play readers, which was produced by the Stage Society this week, is a curious mixture of melodrama and farce. It is not, like Macaire, a melodramatic farce, nor is it a farcical melodrama. The elements are quite distinct, and each is in its way equally effective. The melodrama concerns the determination of Captain Brassbound, a West African adventurer, to be revenged on a certain English judge, his unacknowledged uncle, who has, he imagines, cheated him out of a certain property. The farce shows how this determination was foiled and the adventurer tamed by the charming manners and kind heart of the judge's sister-in-law. When Brassbound has got both Sir Howard Hallam and Lady Cicely Waynflete into a lonely Moorish castle, and proposes to hand over the former to the justice of an Arab sheikh, Lady Cicely by the exercise of womanly arts turns him from his purpose and actually brings him to her feet as a suitor for her hand. Then having saved Sir Howard from his nephew, she saves Brassbound in his turn from his uncle's natural resentment; and finally he goes off, presumably to lead a new life, converted from his doubtful courses by the combined goodness and cleverness and prettiness of one of the most delightful women created in the modern drama. The play is so full of witty sayings, the characters so observantly outlined, the whole piece written with such complete assurance and whimsical élan that it is irresistible. Here and there are little passages striking the true note of pathos, far removed from the forced sentimentality of the usual stage appeal for tears. As for "criticism of life," the play is full of it. The satire on modern methods of thought and work provoked constant merriment. Not all Mr. Shaw's sallies would bear analysis, but they never failed of their effect. Perhaps, as some matches strike only on the box, they would only win immediate recognition from a special audience.

* * * *

The acting was fair all round, and in a few cases brilliant. Miss Achurch, who made Lady Cicely a most engaging specimen of the class which insists on managing everything, was asked to transform herself into a comedian at a few days' notice. She certainly managed the transformation with great cleverness. Mr. Courtenay Thorpe gave a finished study of the judge, a real judge, not a stage judge. Mr. Granville Barker was good as a United States naval officer. Mr. Laurence Irving, as Captain Brassbound, began badly, and was indistinct and painfully ill at ease; but he improved as the piece went on, and in the last act he played a difficult scene with Lady Cicely in the right tone and with genuine power. You Never Can Tell was seen on the commercial stage soon after the Stage Society produced it last year. Perhaps Captain Brassbound's Conversion will follow the same course. For the next two performances of the Society, Andromache, by Mr. Gilbert Murray, and Ibsen's Lady from the Sea are underlined. The more remote future is uncertain as yet.

* * * *

Last week we alluded to the facsimile of the first folio of Shakespeare which is to be published by the delegates of the Clarendon Press, and to the Chatsworth copy of the folio which the Duke of Devonshire has lent to the Bodleian Library for the purpose. This was bought by the then Duke at the Roxburghe sale, 1812, for £100. Dibdin, who had a commission from Sir Masterman Sykes to bid up to £75 at the sale, relates an interesting incident in the history of the copy. It occurred in a 1790 auction, when a friend was bidding for the Duke of Roxburghe. "His Grace," in the narrator's words, "had retired to a distance to view the issue of the contest. Twenty guineas and more were offered from various quarters for the book; a slip of paper was handed to the Duke, in which he was requested to inform his friend whether he was 'to go on bidding.' His Grace took his pencil and wrote underneath, by the way of reply—

> Lay on, Macduff;
> And d—d be he who first cries, Hold, enough!

Such a spirit was irresistible, and bore down all opposition. His Grace retired triumphant, with the book under his arm." Thirty-four guineas, the price paid, was regarded by George Stevens as extraordinarily high. Twenty-eight years later, when the Grenville copy, now in the British Museum, made 116 guineas, Dibdin remarked, "the highest price ever given, or likely to be given, for the volume"; yet last year a fine example, now in the library of a Glasgow collector, realized no less than £1,700!

* * * *

St. Giles', Cripplegate—one of the most interesting old churches in London—seems likely to fall once more into the hands of the restorer, for it is considered probable that the approaching demolition of the adjoining "Quest-house" and "Four Shoppes" will necessitate a complete restoration of the exterior of the church. St. Giles' is well known as the burial-place of John Milton and the scene in 1790 of the abominable exhumation which roused Cowper's righteous indignation:—

> Ill fare the hands that heaved the stones
> Where Milton's ashes lay,
> That trembled not to grasp his bones
> And steal his dust away.

The question which was raised at the time as to whether the remains uncovered were really those of the poet has never, we believe, been settled. Many distinguished people sleep in St. Giles' Church—John Speed, the antiquary; John Foxe, the martyrologist; and two descendants of Sir Thomas Lucy, Shakespeare's original of Justice Shallow. St. Giles' is also famous as the church in which Oliver Cromwell married Sir James Bourchier's daughter Elizabeth in 1620, when the future Protector was twenty-one years old.

* * * *

The All Around Dickens Club, Boston, U.S.A., founded in honour of "Boz," prospers exceedingly. Mrs. A. H. Garland, the founder and president, in her annual report, explains that "this Society was organized solely for the purpose of studying the writings of Dickens." The principal study for the year ending in May, 1900, was "A Tale of Two Cities," and in November of last year there was a "theatre party," consisting of members and friends, arranged in compliment to Sir Henry Irving, to witness the performance of Robespierre at the time of the visit of Sir Henry, who is one of the club's honorary members. Mrs. Garland entertains the idea of a periodical to be issued by that Society, which "must have behind it originality, talent, accuracy, and support," to be worthy of the place she wishes it to gain among literary ventures; and she suggests "the exercise by the Society of social courtesies towards scholarly visitors" to Boston, "especially English." The club has recently lost by death five of its honorary members, viz., Mr. W. R. Hughes, F.L.S. (of Birmingham), Miss Mamie Dickens, Mr. Charles Dickens, the younger, Mrs. Mary Cowden-Clarke, and Professor John W. Churchill (of Andover, U.S.A.).

* * * *

Dr. Johnson himself was notoriously hazy about Goldsmith's life and was probably little interested about the precise locality of his birth. But an Irishman, Dr. Michael Cox, of Dublin, has made an important contribution to the subject in the second number of the journal of the National Literary Society of Dublin. He brings forward evidence to show that the poet was not born in Co. Longford, but at Elphin in Co. Roscommon. Dr. Thomas Campbell, author of a "Philosophical Survey of Ireland," published in 1779, who met Goldsmith in London, deliberately states that the poet was born in Elphin. Dr. Cox is a Roscommon man, and throws a flood of fresh light on the family history of Goldsmith. The strangely-named tutor of the poet in Trinity College Dublin, whose name, always spelt Cugh, has puzzled many people, turns out to be a distinguished scholar named John Keogh. Dr. Cox, by-the-by, has made a brilliant suggestion, a propos of Goldsmith, in a valuable little work on "The History of the Irish Horse." The poet, in one of his letters, speaks enthusiastically of "The Padareen Mare." Now there was a famous Irish racehorse in Goldsmith's younger days known by this name. But Goldsmith was clearly referring to a ballad on the subject. It is quite certain that there was such a ballad, for it has been pointed out elsewhere that one of the songs in Henry Brooke's "Jack the Giant Queller" (1749), is "to the tune of the Padareen Mare." Dr. Cox's suggestion is that Goldsmith wrote the ballad, and it is a very probable one, for we know that, while a sizar at Trinity College Dublin, he was glad to get five shillings for a production of this kind.

On Monday evening, after Mr. Jenkinson, of the Cambridge University Library, had been appointed President of the Bibliographical Society, in the place of Lord Crawford whose two years of office have expired, Mr. G. F. Barwick read a most interesting paper on a copy of "Ptolemy," printed by Peter de Turre at Rouje in 1490, from the library of Mary Queen of Scots. Quite an air of romance attaches to the volume, which was produced at the meeting. When the Sunderland collection came under the hammer in the eighties, Sir Wollaston Franks, who had seen and admired the volume at Blenheim, could not find the binding described in the catalogue. He learned from Mr. Quaritch, however, that a binding such as the one of which he was in search was included in the collection, but Quaritch would not take a commission for it, since he himself was prepared "to give twice as much as it was worth." But not even the astute Piccadilly bookseller discerned the Mary Queen of Scots' monogram on the binding—the catalogue gave the monogram as I. M. O., instead of the Greek letters M and Σ standing for Mary and Francis. Hence, Mr. Quaritch, having bought the book for £450, gave Sir Wollaston Franks the offer of it at £700. Sir Wollaston paid the money, and not till it was safely in his possession did Mr. Quaritch realize the treasure with which he had parted. Now it is in the hands of Sir Wollaston's successor as Keeper of the British and Mediæval Department at the British Museum, Mr. C. Hercules Read. Besides a portrait of Ptolemy in the first initial letter, some 191 other initials are painted and illuminated, and the sea in the maps is of a peculiarly brilliant blue. The evidence that it belonged to Mary is undoubted. The arms emblazoned on one of its pages show that it originally belonged to the Frescobaldi. Mr. Barwick suggests that as this old Florentine family of bankers had a branch house at Lyons the book probably passed there on its way to Catherine de Medici, who may have had it bound and given it as a wedding present to her daughter-in-law. The beautiful tooling of the cover, the elaborate fanfares, and the "morocain orange du Levant" point to its being the work of the great Nicolas Eve, who was the Court binder during the time of Mary's sojourn in France. How it came into the possession of the Marlborough family there is no record to show. Possibly it was obtained by the great Duke during his Continental wars. It is almost a certainty that it did not come over to Scotland when Mary returned. It does not figure among the "buikis" contained in the "Inventory" of her library. There is no folio mentioned in the list; had the "Ptolemy" been there it would most assuredly have been noted. Apart from the beauty of its setting, the "Ptolemy" was a great book in the days when all men's thoughts were directed towards the unknown West. It was the standard authority on geography till well past the sixteenth century, and in secular literature few books then exercised so wide an influence. According to "Ptolemy" the coasts of India could not be a great distance from the coasts of Spain, and it was this error which tempted Columbus to undertake the voyage into the unknown sea, and to the last that daring navigator believed that the new world which he saw was but a part of the coast of India.

The Nose for Inaccuracy.

Accuracy, it might plausibly be urged, may in some cases easily become the last refuge of an ignoramus. That, at any rate, at the first glance, seems to be the moral of the review mentioned by Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer in the preface to his book on "The Cinque Ports," which we noticed last week. The reviewer in question had to criticize a work by the learned Mr. So-and-So, entitled "The History of the Universe."

> It is a pity [he wrote] that a subject so suggestive should have fallen into the hands of a writer so incompetent as the author. The book is brimming with inaccuracies. As a sample we may quote the following from page 672 of vol. vi.:—"In 1611 Sir Phineas Tregooze Phineas Cupar, 2nd baronet, purchased the Kinmure Estates of Sir Thomas Polwhedle." In this one sentence that we have chosen quite at random there are no less than four unpardonable errors. It was not Sir P. T. P. Cupar, but Sir John Phineas-Tregooze Cupar who added the Kinmure acres to his own; he was not the second, but the third baronet; he made the purchase in 1611, and although the negotiations for the sale commenced in the lifetime of Sir T. Polwhedle they were not completed until death had allowed the lands to pass into the hands of his relict. Blunders like these render Mr. So-and-So's work quite worthless.

This is clever satire, and by no means wanting in aptness to the times. It causes one to reflect upon the proper duties of the reviewer, and at the same time to recognize his temptations—though we hasten to add that there are happily at the present day many journals whose reviewers duly recognize those duties, and resist those temptations. But to formulate principles of really sound and fair criticism and to act upon them must be the ideal of every conscientious critic, and such a person may be inclined to test his practice in the light of Mr. Hueffer's amusing quotation. It may seem absurd enough to drag out of the sixth volume of an history of the universe a trivial error in the biography of an obscure Scotch baronet. The author may have treated his vast subject with the most admirable perspective; he may have described in masterly fashion the passing of the great Empires of the East; but he is to be condemned, forsooth, because he is not right as to the exact date at which one petty Scotch laird sold his barren acres to another. The value of the book may remain unimpaired; even though there be other similar mistakes, nothing depends upon them. The statements referred only the Polwhedles and the Cupars. But, nevertheless, "that way madness lies." A history of the universe should not include Polwhedle at all. He represents an unnecessary display of erudition, and therefore invites criticism. It is impossible to say what importance may hereafter attach to statements authoritatively made in print, however trivial they may appear at the moment, and this reviewer may have taught his author a useful lesson in responsibility. Moreover, inaccuracy even in minor details is an index of mental habits which a learned author should have outgrown. The real fault of the reviewer lies not in what he says but in what he does not say. He seems to have given way to what is the most seductive temptation which a reviewer has to resist. That overworked individual has by a polite convention to support a character for omniscience. To accomplish this end there is one easy and obvious method of procedure. Let him catch his author out in one particular and make the most of it. The importance of the mistake corrected lies not in its gravity, nor in the proof it affords of the author's inaccuracy, but in the fact that it is the only one the reviewer is able to discover. This is hardly fair on the author. "Seeming wisemen," said Bacon, "may make shift to get opinion, but let no man choose them for employment." Another practice not uncommon in the world of criticism may be just as unfair though not a matter of ethics it may be less unprincipled. Mr. Hueffer's reviewer, as we have pointed out, has nothing to say on the general merits of this "History of the Universe." He is only concerned with finding minor mistakes in it. Few books are wholly immaculate, and the reviewer who may, unlike the one just mentioned, have the requisite knowledge, is sometimes tempted to spend his energy in searching merely for errors in detail. The cautious criticism of the sceptic is as much to be deprecated as the superficial review of the "general reader." After all, does one unmask the oracle too much if one confesses that reviewers are not and cannot be omniscient? Even the specialist who on a particular subject may represent omniscience is often, as every editor knows, a dangerous reviewer. Sound and impartial judgment backed by competent knowledge is the real essential, and it is only the reviewer who is known to possess these qualities who can be trusted to use the real bearing of inaccuracy.

Personal Views.

BOOK BORROWERS.

Most things human are parcelled out between the realms of love and money, the borrowing of books with the rest; you may borrow them from your friend for love—not always to the increase of love—or from the library for money.

The theme, it may be remembered, has had earlier treatment by an abler hand; but that was from the point of view of the lender. There is an opening for greater impartiality, or such leaning to the other side as may redress the balance; and then, since 1820, there have arisen a new fact or two which may have their bearing on the matter. The advance of science has shown that microbic perils lurk in the holy volume presented for our salute by clerk or sergeant in Court or orderly room; with the jerry-builder has come the jerry-binder, inadequately clamping together his rotten materials with little hooks of metal, till it is impossible for the impetuous reader to tear the literary heart out of a book without bringing away its literal heart in company; the gutting is physical as well as metaphoric, and what comes to us one goes back many. Moreover, Mr. Passmore-Edwards has been born, the Public Library Act has been passed, readers are legion, and, as for books, it is ever a fresh wonder how the whole world still contains them. Go to, let the venture be made.

Borrowing at its best is but a poor substitute for the full joys of lawful possession; and by borrowing at its best is meant that sort of usufruct which we may hope by lapse of time to convert into undisputed ownership. Some statute of limitations, prohibiting recovery after certain months or years, there should undoubtedly be; but legislation halts, and we are liable—though we may have paid the book's price many times over in twinges of conscience (sharp at first, but by a merciful dispensation easing off as the loan becomes a familiar presence on our shelves)—we are liable to be cast down from our confidence just as we begin to feel secure, bereft of what we had made our own by the pedantic enforcement of an antiquated claim. Some men are cursed (blest, they think, in their curmudgeonly hearts) with a kind of sixth sense, an instinct of property, which will never allow them to forget that the formal owners of such and such articles, however long the separation may have been, are themselves. Such an one is capable of entering your room, and, while he enjoys your hospitality, "by the way," he will say, "that Rabelais is mine, is it not? Shall I take it home and save you the trouble?" Out upon such trouble-saving! Yet, lest the scale decline unduly, be it allowed that such shameless recoverers find excuse in the foolish laziness of the meaner sort of borrowers. How short-sighted to borrow the latest novel or minor poem, a thing that no one desires to possess, which, once read, but cumbers the shelves, and to neglect to return it! True, your laziness has some show of justification; there go two porterages to one loan transaction; you have done your share in conveying the book to your own room; the owner may do his in carrying it back. But reflect; you save your legs at the cost of your friend's character; you initiate him in evil habits; your next loan may be one that you would as lief he should not carry back. There have been men (friends till their meanness was detected; but here "loan oft loses" friend, if not "itself and friend") who would enter book and borrower on a schedule; let such only reflect upon the horrible injustice that may ensue:—Borrower A returns the book; incomings are less punctiliously recorded than outgoings; borrower B possesses himself of it unmarked, and A bears the blame. No, the only course for a book-owner who would keep Esquire to his name is to forget to whom he lends, and thank God if he happen to recover; give all thou canst, said the poet, not lend. Before passing on, it need scarcely be said that every book of which the loan has been pressed on you should, if it is worth harbourage, be retained. You have read it for its owner's pleasure; you keep it for your own.

And now enough of that order of borrowers which takes for its principle that a book's true ownership vests in him who can put it to best use, not him who has disbursed some paltry coins in exchange. But there are other classes which do not rise to this height. One of them deserves no sympathy—the pirates who in hotels and families annex any book which lies open on the table. Its openness is palpable evidence that it is effectively occupied by another power, and all that can be said for them is that the annexation is as temporary as those of ex-President Kruger or Captain Marchand. On the other hand, our hearts go out to the ordinary borrower, too parcimonious to buy, too timid to acquire, contemplating restoration. What searchings of heart when the last page is read! This cover warped and blistered, evidence of heathen fire-worship, these leaves rent from their flimsy retinacula, damning signs of literary gourmandise, the whole scotched and notched like a carbonado, can it be that all was thus when he borrowed it a week ago? Then it is that we hate the poor innocent with the hatred proper to those that we have wronged. In vain that the owner (assuming as before that he claims the addition of gentleman) remembers with strange precision how himself spilt the tea that made the blotch that draws our blushes; we refuse to be comforted. However, we do not refuse to suit ourselves with a relay, nor perhaps remember to take a mental photograph of our new victim's looks, by way of inventory for assessment of wear and tear against ourselves. After all, we reflect, self-reproach need not be too acute; nay, now we think on it, is he not rather our debtor, for contributing to his library its choicest ornament of all, the look of being used?

But, though reason can deal with that hardship, there are many others. Imprimis, a running controversy with the author, carried on in the margin, comes as natural to a man as, to a boy, the inscribing of scornful epithets under the owner's and the author's names. Now it may be disputed whether even an owner is within his rights in adding marginalia, unless he designs his library for the flames and not the dealer; else he defrauds the next owner, at one remove; but it is beyond dispute that the borrower must put away all his pencils before he begins to read. Item, he must refrain from flinging his author on the fire, the orthodox expression of wrath. It has always been a joy to believe that the Sibrandus on which a poet took notable revenge was his own and not another's. Item, he lacks one security for enjoyment. Buy a book, and the British instinct for the best of a bargain sets you down to it in a mood to get your money's worth. But the Briton prefers, for the most part, to borrow gratis or at small cost. The Briton, of all men, parcimonious, do you say? Well, we go to Paris, survey the booksellers' windows, miss the rainbow display of cloth we know, and pronounce that French paper covers are, à la française, cheap and nasty. So it was that an earlier generation accounted France dirty, because her soap-dishes were empty; educational travel has taught us that the Frenchman prefers his own soap to other people's, as we our tooth brushes; and before long we shall give him credit for buying his books, where we borrow them, and exercising his taste on the binding, where we tamely and economically accept the publishers'. Item, what is worst of all, when you have borrowed and read and returned, you are as he that beholdeth himself in a glass and goeth his way; you straightway forget what manner of book it was. A book that is a book should be on your own shelves ready for consultation, and, like Godolphin, "never in the way and never out of the way." Something, indeed, may be done—but it is a pis aller—by him who is content to read, journalist fashion, for the plums, and like Pliny (cenor aliquando, sed non sine pugillaribus) to have his pencil and notebook for ever at hand. But the true use of the library and the friend is not yet realized. The bookseller no more than the butcher and baker will grant us a week's trial of their wares on approval, lest they return diminished or impaired. But you may read your friend's copy to determine your doubts about buying; and, as for Him, he is a churl if he will not venture something to compensate the pleasures that he has tasted.

ANCHORET.

HOLLY.

It is not easy to say off-hand how ancient is the practice of decorating the house universal at Christmastide; it is probably older than the celebration of Christmas itself; but, at least, it can be said that holly, as the old poets show, has always held the premier place in the scheme of decoration. Its only rival, contrary to common expectation, which would presume mistletoe to share the honours, has been the ivy—

> Ivy, chief of trees, it is

as the old carollist of the fifteenth century rapturously sings. Mistletoe is not without its special distinction, of course; and we believe that even with the New Woman its peculiar privileges have not altogether exhaled. But the stately Druidical priesthood, who treasured the mistletoe and thought it had curative powers, dividing it into small sprays, and depending it over the entrances to dwellings as a propitiation and shelter to the sylvan deities during the season of frost and snow, would be appropriately shocked to see the mystic plant merely reverenced for the opportunities it gives for osculation. When the Early Fathers, apostles of expediency, assimilated the Pagan custom and spiritualized it, they left the mistletoe severely alone, and it is a well-known historical fact that the dainty parasite has never been used in the decoration of our churches at the great festival of the year. In only one instance that we know has the mistletoe been permitted inside a church. Stukeley records the practice of the people of York on the Christmas Eve of carrying mistletoe to the high altar of the Minster, and proclaiming "a public and universal liberty, pardon, and freedom to all sorts of inferior, and even wicked people, at the gates of the city, towards the four quarters of Heaven."

Holly profited from being unassociated with the old god Tutanes—the same as the Phœnician god Baal, or the sun, worshipped after so many different names by all the Pagan races of antiquity—and for centuries enjoyed almost as much homage as the sacred mistletoe of the barbarians; with "its berries as red as any rose" it appealed strangely to the simple old folk, who were quite ready to accept the symbolism imposed by the ecclesiastics. Ivy was also largely used—the quaint Tusser, nearly four centuries ago, sang:—

> Get Ivy and Holly and deck up thine house,
> And take this same brawn to scathe and to scorne,
> Provide us good cheer, for thou know'st the old guise;
> Old customs that good be, let no man despise—and the minstrels, in charming verse, made much of the rivalry of the two evergreens, always, with the one exception mentioned above, in favour of "Holly and his merry men, they dance and they sing." The rhymer put it, "Ivy and her maidens are always carrying," and the hostility expressed towards Ivy, with its "berries as black as any sloe," by the household maidens decking the house and chambers for the Yule festivity, may be accounted for by the circumstance that it is used at funerals. The pretty carol "The Contest of the Ivy and the Holly" is assigned by Mr. Hone as from a MS. of Henry IV.'s time, which would make it the earliest of all our carols, but another authority gives the date about the time of Henry VI., when many dainty carols were in use, notably that sweet lullaby "The Virgin and Child," "The First Nowell," and "In Excelsis Gloria." All the delightful versions of the holly and Ivy carols were always sung on festive occasions. The old minstrel in the "Contest" is emphatic:—

Holly stand in the hall
Fair to behold;
Ivy stand without the door
She is full sore a-cold.

Holly hath birdes,
A full fair flock,
The nightingale, the popinjay,
The gentle laverock.

Good Ivy,
What birdies hast thou?
None but the howlet
That cries "how, how!"

Nay, Ivy, nay,
It shall not be, I-wis;
Let Holly have the mastery
As the manner is.

In the "Holly and Ivy" carol, also of the fifteenth century, the argument is not very conclusive, perhaps, but it is very simple and quaint:—

Holly and Ivy made a great party
Who should have the mastery
In birds where they go.
Then spake Holly, "I am free and jolly,
I will have the mastery
In lands where they go."
Then spake Ivy, "I am loud and proud,
And I will have the mastery
In lands where they go."
Then spake Holly, and set him down on his knee,
"I pray thee, gentle Ivy, say me no villany,
In lands where they go."

To holly clearly was given the preference "as the manner is," and sweetness in allegiance were evidently in some danger, indicated in a particularly quaint carol of about the time of Henry VII., "Here comes Holly":—

Whosoever against holly do cry
In a lope (large basket) shall he hang full high.

From this we can imagine the minstrel responsible for "Ivy, Chief of Trees" running some personal risk, and only excused for his controversy by the delicacy of his lines:—

Ivy, chief of trees, it is Yeat Cerosaberis.

Ivy is soft and meek of speech,
Against all bale she is bliss;
Well is he that may her reach,
Yeat Cerosaberis.

Among the minstrels who have sung in praise of holly there have been none to surpass those the Cornish carollist of the early part of the present century, the Rev. Robert Hawker. His charming carol "Sholeyh Marya" has caught the early spirit, and "the birds of the bleeding breast" might well have been sung with pathos of the best versions of the holly carols. Where the nightingale rhymes mentions the old holly birdies—

The nightingale, the popinjay,
The gentle laverock—

Mr. Hawker gives us a sweet picture of the robin and the holly, in lines which touch us nearly, for no holly bush on our lawns is destitute of the perky redbreast with his merry twitter—"the merriest sound upon earth or sea":—

So of all that grow by the king's highway,
I love that tree the best,
'Tis a bower for the birds upon Christmas day,
The bush of the bleeding breast.
O! the holly with her drops of blood for me,
For that is our sweet Aunt Mary's tree.

The phrase "Aunt Mary's tree" is in reference to the old Cornish custom of calling all revered seniors aunt and uncle.

When the Puritans interdicted the festival of Christmas, seeking to abolish the frolic entirely, the decoration of houses and public places was sternly forbidden. In the year 1647 the parish officers of St. Margaret's, Westminster, were fined for dressing the church with holly and bay, and individual householders had no opportunity for merriment. Under date of Christmas, 1651, John Evelyn makes the following note:—"No churches or public assembly"; and the genial Pepys, in 1688:—"At home with my wife, who, poor wretch! sat undressed all day until ten o'clock at night altering and lacing of a noble petticoat." The "light-shoe lords of Cromwell's making" were specially against the masques and pageants in the palaces, in which license ran rampant; but they spared nothing of the quaint old-time customs—Peacock pie, with its bevy of fair maidens carrying holly sprigs, and the Boar's Head, crested with holly, and heralded by the famous Boar's Head carol; even plum pudding was abhorrent to them, and mince-pie—"O, that was flat idolatry." At the Restoration the sprig of holly reasserted itself, and if it no longer decked the august Boar's Head it surmounted the sugared summit of the plum pudding, where it has remained ever since, a joy to many generations of gleeful children. Indeed, what would a plum pudding be without its glad crest of gleaming holly! The holly wields a potent influence, now as ever. Even in the streets, hanging in warm clumps over shop fronts, it imparts an appropriate festive atmosphere, and the merry crowd jostling each other in the loose haste of Christmas shopping seems the merrier and under the mysterious benediction of the spirit of the season; transferred to the homes of the people it assumes new beauties, affording the greatest pleasure to many happy hearts and ministering, in subtle fashion, to the common enjoyment. Holly lends a glow to all the festivity, and fully justifies its ancient selection. Only prudent housewives must be careful to remove their holly leaves before Candlemas Day, otherwise the negligence will involve a direful penalty. The old superstition is that the careless simply people their houses with mischievous sprites; Herrick cautions us to—

Look how many leaves there be Neglected there, maids, trust to me,
So many goblins shall you see.

In Oxfordshire, so Aubrey tells us, if a man declined or neglected to bring in sufficient holly and evergreen to garnish the servants' hall, the said servants stole his breeches and nailed them on the portal gate—a curious piece of vindictiveness; he was also rigidly excluded from the well-known privileges of the mistletoe. As he fully deserved to be, of course. A person who can forget his devotion to the holly branch is certainly too depraved a being to be included in the homage to the mistletoe.

Foreign Letter.

GERMANY.

The Christmas season, the great time for the German publishers, has seen a very large output of books. It must be confessed that a careful survey of the more important volumes leads only to the conviction that in Germany, as elsewhere, there is much good work, but nothing of the highest excellence, and little even that arrests the attention. Speaking generally, books of memoirs increase in number; there is a vast improvement in periodical literature; but the novelists and dramatists show a tendency to repeat themselves. Those who are interested in the literary movement in Germany of the last twenty years should read Adalbert von Hanstein's "Das Jüngste Deutschland: zwei Jahrzehnte Miterlebte Litteratur-geschichte." It is a comprehensive survey, useful and popular, and, so far as we can judge, trustworthy. It brings out certain characteristics special to literary Germany, such as the tendency of authors with new ideas to form themselves into societies or unions, and to start periodicals for the propagation of their views, and the importance of the drama as a distinct branch of literature and a literary influence. As a criticism the book is not perhaps of great importance, but it is thoroughly well planned, and certainly accomplishes all that it professes.

Among recent books of memoirs, Bismarck's "Letters to his Wife," edited by Prince Herbert von Bismarck, take the first place. They supplement the reminiscences, published some two years ago, which gave the world an insight into the intellectual workshop of the creator of the German Empire. The familiar letters reveal something of his inner life known only to his intimates. To his wife he confided all that he thought and felt, and his letters to her tell us much of statesmen and politics, of the social life of the time, and of himself, as lover, husband, and father. They begin in 1846 and end in 1892. Some omissions are, of course, inevitable, but there is quite enough to give importance to these letters. Unfortunately, the letters written during the Franco-German War have not yet been found. Nothing could be of greater interest than the letter dated September 3, 1870, telling of Bismarck's meeting with Napoleon after Sedan. In this book, as in several others of the same kind, there is no index. In such books, above all others, the omission of an index should be a penal offence. It is unpardonable in an English edition—how much more in a German!

Other political memoirs are those of Eduard von Simson and Otto Freiherr von Manteuffel. Simson helped to establish parliamentary life in Germany on a firm basis, and was one of the deputies sent to Versailles in 1870. As a young man he spent some time in England, and studied criminal law and procedure at the Old Bailey. He thought highly of the English methods, and saw that Germany had much to learn from them. He was fond of the theatre, and made a point of seeing Shakespeare on the stage. He saw Macready, Miss Cushman, and Helen Faucit, and yet it was his opinion that Shakespeare was better acted and better understood in Germany. How many Englishmen at the sight of Dover cliffs from a Channel steamer think of the passage in Lear describing them? Simson records how this was uppermost in his mind on his first approach to this country. The first volume of the Memorials of Manteuffel, covering the years 1848-51, has for its chief title "Unter Friedrich Wilhelm." It is edited by Heinrich von Poschinger, who declares that had it not been for Manteuffel Bismarck could never have founded the German Empire. References in the volume to English politics are few. We are told that the idea of the Great Exhibition of 1851 originated with Mazzini, permeated to Palmerston, and finally reached Prince Albert. The book strikes us rather as a collection of documents—documents certainly of the greatest value for the making of history—than as history itself. The memoirs of the statesman Georg von Bunsen have a good deal of interest for Englishmen. Martin Philippson's "Life of the Emperor Frederick III." is written with some insight and much sympathy. His policy is described as that of a man of ideas, impressionable yet determined. A volume entitled "Bismarck in the Caricatures of all Nations" will help future historians. The reproductions are taken from the comic journals of the whole world, and form a capital record of his career. Punch is, of course, the chief English journal represented, and we are glad to see that the editor has not feared to reproduce the famous "Dropping the Pilot."

Of literary memoirs the best are the youthful reminiscences of Paul Heyse and of Julius Rodenberg. Heyse describes his school days in Berlin, his student days at Berlin and Bonn, and relates his youthful love affairs in true Goethe fashion. He draws a very attractive picture of literary and artistic Munich when he settled there in 1854. The men of letters had [illegible] all poor, but filled with great ideas, some of which have been amply realized. Heyse has something to say of his own early efforts in drama, in lyric poetry, in narrative poems or tales in verse. But, as all the world knows, Heyse was to find his fame in the novel and the short prose tale. Julius Rodenberg is the editor of the Deutsche Rundschau, a post for which he is admirably fitted. His judgment of the abilities of others is unerring; and he has the gift of drawing from his contributors their very best work. He tells us how he met George Eliot in Berlin in 1854, and gives an interesting sketch of Emanuel Deutsch, in whose society he chiefly spent his time on his early visits to London.

The shelves of German booksellers are crowded with books on the Transvaal. They are full of uncomplimentary allusions to England and her South African policy, but the subject does not seem to lend itself to the cultivation of literary style. They may be passed over with perhaps one exception. Dr. Alexander Tille was professor of German in the University of Glasgow from 1890 to 1900. He unwisely mingled criticism of English politics with his German lessons, and his resignation became desirable. On his return to his own country he proceeded to write a book entitled "England's Hobbledehoyhood" (Aus England's Flegeljahre). According to the learned ex-Professor, until 1881 England acted as a child and a spoiled child, too, and since has acted as a hobbledehoy. Dr. Tille attacks everything English—politics, commerce, and education alike. We hardly think the book will be taken seriously in Germany. An academic chair may certainly enlighten its possessor in the ways and vagaries of youth, or even in a Scottish university, for example, in the ways of hobbledehoys who develop into most capable men; but it does not, as a rule, give an opportunity for the study of politics and commerce. English professors are wise in their generation, and seldom interfere in such matters.

We can hardly imagine an Oxford professor announcing a course of lectures on Ibsen. Yet Dr. Emil Reich has published the twenty lectures on Ibsen's dramas delivered by him at the University of Vienna. He demonstrates the progress of the poet's mind by treating the plays chronologically. Hans Woerner's book on Ibsen, of which the first volume has just appeared, is even more ambitious. Woerner tries to show Ibsen's debt to his predecessors and to his own age, and devotes an excellent chapter to a survey of Scandinavian literature from the seventeenth century onwards. Both books will help the right comprehension of Ibsen. The twenty-fifth edition of Vilmar's very useful "Litteraturgeschichte" is announced with a continuation from the death of Goethe to the present day. To the valuable series of illustrated literary histories, published under the auspices of the Bibliographisches Institut, a History of French Literature has now been added.

No really great work of fiction has appeared of late. In many of the novels before us men and women marry with the fixed determination to make each other as miserable as possible. The hero as a husband is a brute, as a lover (of other men's wives) perfection. The wife is a bundle of nerves and sickly fancies, unloved if she is usually normal before marriage she becomes abnormal, hysterical, and neurotic immediately afterwards. Such is more or less the theme of Gabriele Reuter's latest novel "Ellen von der Weiden," a dull story, gainless of [illegible] of artistic workmanship. Through the rather crude [illegible] of Wilhelm Hegeler's "Ingenieur Horstmann" there runs an admirable description of a wrecked life, and some excellent character-drawing. Rudolph Stratz's "Die Thörichte Jungfrau" (the foolish virgin) has as usual the high Alps for a background. The story is not thrilling; but the description of the peaks and the glaciers, which are almost as important as the characters, give a high quality to Stratz's novels. Richard Voss also places among Alpine surroundings the catastrophe of the unusual and powerful story "Psyche"—of a wife who sacrifices everything for a fictional ideal to her great qualities, her love, and for ever searching for an impossible ideal in every woman he meets; a husband who only recognises his wife's beauty and nobility after she has relinquished her own depth to secure his happiness. This pathetic theme is treated with true literary art. There is always distinction about Spielhagen's work. "Freigeboren," his new novel, is the diary of a woman, high-born, cultured, and something of a philosopher. She is married to a baptised Jew, a rich financier, of doubtful morals, and she shows her breeding by making the best of the situation. The book contains an interesting description of the German celebrities of the sixties and seventies, who are described as frequenting her salon. There are novel readers even in Germany who are interested in other problems than those which centre round husbands and wives. Such persons always read Konrad Telmann's novels with pleasure. His loss is to be deplored. The novels he left which have been published since his death are among the best he wrote. "Vaterrechte" deals in masterly fashion with a question of paternity, and "Was ist Wahrheit?" with the most profound and far-reaching of all problems. The doctrine that whatever belief helps a man to lead a virtuous and useful life is the truth for him is thoughtfully worked out, and the descriptions of the lives of German mechanics are strongly and sincerely drawn.

It is in his marvellous gift of insight into the hearts of children—at least, so it seems to us—that Ernst von Wildenbruch's talent really lies. We would give nearly all his dramas and all his court poems for more tales like "Kinderthränen," "Das Edle Blut," and "Neid," the latest of these child romances, if we may so call them. The material, the style, the presentment are faultless, and Wildenbruch's prose has a beauty, a simplicity, a literary finish unique among German writers. Isolde Kurz attempts a similar kind of work in her volume of tales "Von Dazumal," but she is scarcely successful. The immature thoughts of children require for their handling the rarest art and sympathy. Without this they become abnormal, and it is the normal child that is interesting. Peter Rosegger has deserted story-telling to relate his religious experiences. "Mein Himmelreich" reminds us of Coppée's "La bonne Souffrance." We fear that the ingenuous confessions of these sufferers from "divine homesickness" will not rank with the "Confessions of St. Augustine," or Bunyan's "Grace Abounding." The story of the mental struggle of such men, earnest yet imaginative, has abiding literary and human interest, while the placid conviction that everything is for the best is apt to pall. The women novelists are active. Clara Viebig and Ilse Frapan, two of the most talented of them, show a tendency to become sentimental over the lives of the fallen, the defenceless, the unprotected among women. Maidservants especially attract them. But the mass of these persons are not able to arouse our interest or sympathy; and we fear in "Wehrlose" and "Das Tägliche Brot" the necessary exceptions have not been found. There are new novels also, all in their customary vein, by Ossip Schubin, Lou Andreas-Salomé, Ida Boy-ed, and Hermine Villinger.

THE BOOKSELLING TRADE.

It is a sorry outlook for the bookseller when the grocer round the corner gives away a copyright novel by a popular author with a quarter of a pound of tea, but that, it seems, is now being done by an enterprising suburban tradesman, who varies the literary gift according to the quantity of tea purchased. The tea merchant is only following in the footsteps of the draper and the dealer in fancy goods, but his development of their idea is not without its hidden meaning. It is significant that this irregular traffic in books is increasing every year, and, if it does not eventually supersede the legitimate trade—as some enthusiasts believe it must do in time—it will undoubtedly make it harder than ever for the bookseller to pay his way. We may discuss the competition of the grocer and the draper as unwarranted, but to a large extent the bookseller has himself to blame. At the last International conference of publishers M. Baranger, of Paris, admitted that the complaints which had been made as to the lowering of the professional level of the book trade were justified by facts. Professional booksellers had deserted, and their places had been taken by men who had rushed into the business unconscious of its difficulties, and possessing neither theoretical nor practical knowledge—often after failing in other things. It is an old complaint, this deterioration of the bookseller. Roger North refers to it in his life of his brother John:—

> Little Britain [he writes] was, in the middle of the last century [the seventeenth], a plentiful emporium of learned authors; and men went thither as to a market. This drew to the place a mighty trade, the rather because the shops were spacious, and the learned gladly resorted to them, where they seldom failed to meet with agreeable conversation; and the booksellers themselves were knowing and conversable men, with whom, for the sake of bookish knowledge, the greatest wits were pleased to converse; and we may judge the time as well spent there as (in later days) either in taverns or coffee-houses, though the latter hath carried off the spare time of most people. But now this emporium is vanished, and the trade contracted into the hands of two or three persons, who, to make good their monopoly, ransack not only their neighbours of the trade, that are scattered over England; aye, and beyond the sea, too; and send abroad their circulators, and in that manner get into their hands all that is valuable; and the rest of the trade are content to take their refuse, with which, and the first scum of the press, they furnish one side of a shop, which serves for the sign of a bookseller rather than a real one; but instead of selling, deal as factors, and procure what the country divines and gentry send for, of whom each one has his book-factor; and when wanting anything, writes to his bookseller, and pays his bill.

Edward Ballard—"honest Ballard, well known for his curious divinity catalogues"—was the last survivor of the old race of booksellers in Little Britain, and he died before the beginning of the eighteenth century.

Not that a revival of the old-world race of booksellers would meet the present needs of the trade. People have little time to gossip over their business nowadays. A bookseller can be well-informed without being garrulous, but, above all, he must be business-like. Unfortunately, as Mr. F. Macmillan has said, the occupation of retail bookselling becomes every day less and less congenial to the very class of men—active, intelligent, and somewhat bookish—which it is desirable to attract to the calling. The extension of the net system is doing something to improve the financial position of the bookseller, but more than that is needed to raise the professional level of the trade. Bookselling is passing through a period of transition; outsiders are gaining a firmer foothold in the business every year; and the regular practitioner must be able to show that he is at least as enterprising and business-like as the go-ahead grocer and draper. The same difficulty has occurred in the retail trade in other countries, especially in the United States and France. The only hope apparently is to raise a new generation of booksellers, and there is much to be said in favour of the proposed professional school which has been discussed at more than one congress of publishers. The English Booksellers' Association once considered the matter seriously, and even went so far, we believe, as to adopt a programme of bibliographical instruction, but the scheme apparently fell through. There are already schools for booksellers' clerks in Leipzig and Milan, and a trade school has been tried in Brussels, but in that case the attempt has been unsuccessful, owing (as M. Vanderveld explained in supporting M. Baranger's proposal at the publishers' conference) to a sentiment of mock dignity which had prevented Belgian booksellers from joining an institution designed to teach them a trade with which, as established business men, they considered themselves fully conversant. Perhaps our booksellers would on similar grounds object to an English school, but many of their assistants would probably think differently, especially if the course of instruction did not last too long, and the programme dealt with technical details and general knowledge which would come into their regular work. Something, at all events, will have to be done if the book trade is to be kept together. That it can be made profitable is proved by the success of the few men who thoroughly understand the business and who are good shopmen into the bargain.

The American bookseller has just the same, and possibly more, difficulties to contend with. These are the large stores all over the country who undersell him, and make it almost impossible for him to earn a satisfactory income. What is a small bookseller to do against such a monopolist millionaire as Wanmaker, who, by reason of his immense capital, is able to dispose of his goods so many cents cheaper? The result is that ere long the small bookseller will probably have to go. One of the objects of the new Publishers' Association which was formed the other day is to watch over the interests of the small bookseller. Their task, it seems, will not be an easy one.

THE DRAMA.

"THE HAPPY HYPOCRITE."

Miss Jenny Mere, an innocent little maiden, wide-eyed, candid-browed, in a Kate Greenaway gown (period 1815), is singing to herself and gathering primroses in Kensington Gardens, when she is scared away by two "bucks" of florid manners and a flamboyant impertinence, Count Hesseldorf in the curly wig of the Prince Regent and the Hessian boots of Kotzebue's Stranger, and Captain Fitzclarence in the mutton-chop whiskers and topheavy shako by which we recognize at Burlington House the pictures of Waterloo. To them enters a still more insolent pair, La Gambogi, a "dashing Cyprian" (it was the phrase of the time) in short muslin skirt and pea-green jacket, and her companion in pleasure, Lord George Hell. Lord George wears three waistcoats, innumerable seals, voluminous trousers, and a shaggy white beaver hat, like that which is still preserved as a curio in a shop window at the bottom of St. James's-street. Lord George wears the dress of a dandy, but his face is the face of a satyr, puffed, scorbutic, rugose, as repulsive as anything in the hideous caricatures of Gillray. Why this face? Because it is the index of the mind, the outward and visible sign of the ruin within, and thereby hangs Mr. Max Beerbohm's little tale. For Lord George perceives Jenny Mere, falls in love with her straightway, and finds that to love her is a liberal education in face-massage. Abashed by her innocence, he addresses her with respect and even humility, but she is terrified by his face and runs away. Then comes fantasy upon the scene, a whiff of the conte philosophique, in the strange, starveling person of a hawker of masks. Here be all faces in wax, dangling from his booth, the lusty, the debonair, the courtly, the grotesque. But has he not the mask of a saint? Lord George would buy one, wherein to go a-courting Jenny Mere pour le bon motif. Well, saints' faces are out of fashion in these Regency days, there is no demand for them in the present state of morals, but if Lord George will just step inside the booth the hawker will try and accommodate him with one. By-and-by the rake emerges with the mask of a (Georgian) angel, drives away the mocking Gambogi woman, and under his changed aspect again tries his luck with Jenny Mere. Now she believes in him, welcomes him as the Prince Charming of her dreams, and even kisses him on the lips, marvelling to find them so cold. She displays her little candid soul to him and confesses her one little sin to him—a wild hunger for buns, the big shiny ones and the little shiny ones, the big dull ones and the little dull ones. In her basket at this moment is a big shiny one, and Lord George (who has "heard of buns" but never seen them) tries to eat through the hole in his mask. His heart is now all Jenny Mere's, he will sell his cabriolet, pension off the Gambogi, retire to a cottage and live on buns. But the "bucks" and the Cyprian do not believe in his conversion and think he has played the hypocrite long enough. So, to show him in his true colours to Jenny Mere, they tear off his mask. But what is this? Under the beautiful mask there is now a face no less beautiful—

Primâ facie avulsâ non deficit altera.

An honest love has purified the rake's soul and restored the boyish innocence of his face. The roysterers slink away while Lord George and Jenny Mere plight their troth on the edge of the Round Pond.

Now is not this a beautiful little story? Was it not a happy idea to place this fairy-tale in the rococo period of the Regency? Is there not a tour de force in expressing the delicate sentiment, the airy fantasy of such a tale in the ornate "Corinthian" rhetoric of that period? And must we forgo the pleasure of all this because here and there Mr. Beerbohm shows some defect of stage-technique or because we are not accustomed to seeing dandies wearing wax masks in Kensington Gardens? The newspapers, I see, have, most of them, been maintaining that we must; most of them have been playing variations on the late M. Sarcey's famous, or rather infamous, "Ça n'est pas du théâtre." For my part, I can put up with any degree of deficiency in mere theatrical quality in work which is a real experiment, which does something to send a current of fresh air through the fusty, musty old playhouse. Here is something new and strange and audacious, something which must give every playgoer with the slightest tincture of letters a distinct "thrill," a trifle if you will, but a trifle of a taking elegance, a trifle which counts, a trifle not unworthy to find a place on the same shelf with Beau Austin. Miss Winifred Fraser as Jenny Mere, Mr. Frank Mills as Lord George, and Mr. George Arliss as the hawker of masks all serve their author very well, and Mr. Albert Fox has contributed some delightful incidental music.

MR. SAINTSBURY'S HISTORY OF CRITICISM.

A History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe. By George Saintsbury, M.A., LL.D. Vol. I. Classical and Mediæval Criticism. (Blackwood. 16s. n.)

Every one knows that Mr. Saintsbury is a critic of high cultivation and large experience, and his opinions on all matters connected with literature are entitled to respectful consideration. He has given us a most scholarly volume. Students will find it a perfect store-house of not very common learning, unfolded with consummate ease, as free from pedantry as any reader has a right to expect, and extremely fertile in suggestion. Mature lovers of literature will admire the courage which prompts him to march into a field little explored and never effectively occupied, tanquam in terram nullius, and hoist his flag in the sight of the world. They will also sympathize with the enthusiasm which has carried him through the first and not least laborious stage of his undertaking, and will look forward with interest to his future volumes. Although Mr. Saintsbury takes no notice of such trifles as historical and textual criticism, and confines himself to "criticism proper," or the "reasoned exercise of literary taste," he gives the term, thus limited, a wide construction. Moreover, he ingeniously draws arguments and illustrations from many authorities which are not usually ranked as critical literature. We do not see why he goes out of his way to disparage historical criticism as illogical, or on what grounds he claims for the "reasoned exercise of literary taste" a specially logical character. The logic of it, as we understand him to expound the matter, comes to this—"I like it, and therefore it must be good." Nor shall we deny that to this extent he is right. Mere literary criticism, when all is said and done, is fundamentally a matter of likes and dislikes. It is also, as Mr. Saintsbury says, and as Longinus said before him, a matter of cultivation and experience; and the likes and dislikes of cultivated and experienced persons constitute the standard of taste, so far as a standard of taste can be said to exist. Some readers will think regretfully that the work tends to inculcate a standard of taste lower than the highest. If it does, it is because its writer has adapted himself to the spirit of his time, and it would be unjust to blame him for that.

Mr. Saintsbury might plead that his taste is in the fullest sense of the word a catholic one. It is catholic because it is frankly hedonistic. It was said by them of old time that true education consists in learning to like the right things and dislike the wrong ones; and so far as morals are concerned Mr. Saintsbury would doubtless assent. But literary taste, according to him, obeys no rigid canon of right and wrong. Like the leaden rule of the Lesbian masons, you can bend it to any angle or curve you choose. He who has a genuine love for literature will abandon himself to the enjoyment of it under all its forms, with an intimacy at once voluptuous and intellectual. He will bask and revel in it, ever striving, and ever failing, to penetrate the secret of its charms. Its luxuriance of fancy, its wealth of colour, its delicate suggestiveness of thought and phrase furnish him with the elements of a perpetual ecstasy. All this, of course, is not new. It is substantially the old Greek view of the dangers and subtle temptations of certain kinds of literature; the view which Plato had in mind when he decided to exclude the poets from his ideal republic, which made Epicurus and his disciples denounce poetry as useless and futile, and drew from Plutarch a sermon in which its pleasures are handled, for the benefit of young men, much as an evangelical divine of the old type might have handled those of the ball-room and theatre for the edification of young ladies. The Greek philosophers, of course, were largely influenced, in taking up this hostile attitude, by the fact that poetry was thought to foster false and degrading ideas of the gods. But the main reason was that it had a fundamental tendency to seduce men from a truthful conception of nature and human life; and this objection strikes us as not wholly inapplicable to the view of literature inculcated by Mr. Saintsbury.

The origins of criticism, according to Mr. Saintsbury, are to be found in the philosophizing tendency of the Greek mind, and in the Greek schools of rhetoric. We should rather look for them in the audiences who crowded the theatre and law-court, or, further back, among those who at public or private festival listened to the recitation of Demodocus or Phemius. Even thus early there must have been a preference on the part of the public for one rhapsodist, or school of rhapsodists, and one legend, or cycle of legends, rather than others; and to some such preference we owe the preservation of the Homeric poems, and the establishment of Homer as the standard of literary taste. The poet, again, is perforce a critic, and succeeds in proportion to the severity with which he judges his own productions; the orator, above all, has to adapt himself to his audience. But, to estimate the force and character of critical opinion, we must survey the whole field of literature. This truth Mr. Saintsbury has laid seriously to heart. Although criticism proper begins with Aristotle, Homer and the tragedians had long established the literary standard; the Sophists had been at work propounding their philosophy of language, their theory of persuasion, their views on the moral character of poetry and oratory; and Plato, who had real literary enthusiasm, had introduced into his works a good deal of critical matter, though it is rhapsodical and erotchety, and his impatience of anything but the pure idea usually leads him astray. But it is in Aristophanes, among pre-Aristotelian writers, that Mr. Saintsbury finds the most striking illustration of the critical spirit. This, of course, is the famous onslaught on Euripides in the Frogs. Here he discovers the prototype of the "slashing review" of modern times. His analysis of it is well conceived and happily expressed; and he pays Aristophanes what is intended as the highest possible compliment in saying that the contest between the two tragedians might easily be thrown into the form of a concerto, "which would anticipate by two thousand years and more the very shrewdest work of Dryden, the most thoughtful of Coleridge, the most delicate and ingenious of Arnold and Sainte-Beuve." But his enthusiasm prompts him to add that, compared with Aristophanes, the pure criticism of Aristotle is vague and desultory, while that of Longinus is scrappy and lacking in grasp. Here we are unable to follow him. The mockery of the stage and the sedate teaching of the chair have no common measure: the one is intended to raise a laugh, the other to establish and inculcate a standard of judgment. Nothing in Aristotle can be truthfully described as vague, although his apparently careless handling may sometimes expose him to the charge of desultoriness. Does not Mr. Saintsbury forget, for the moment, that Aristotle's chief critical treatise has not come down to us complete? But, to tell the truth, he cherishes a grudge against Aristotle. Of the elements which go to the making of tragedy Aristotle assigns the first place to the plot or story, as developed in the action; the second to the portraiture of character; the third to the cast of thought; and "lexis," or diction, comes in, as Mr. Saintsbury indignantly puts it, "a bad fourth." Mr. Saintsbury, though not without an apology for the epithets, tells us in effect that he considers this contempt for words "ignorant and unintelligent," that it comes to this—according to Aristotle, words are no better than "filthy rags"; and he holds up for our admiration the egregious canon of Dionysius that "that diction is necessarily beautiful in which there are beautiful words, and that of beautiful words beautiful syllables and letters are the cause!" This is a little hard on Aristotle. He has not the least intention of derogating from the importance of diction, though he refuses to exalt it, as Mr. Saintsbury seems inclined to do, above the meaning it is intended to express.

Nor does Mr. Saintsbury by any means allow the matter to rest here. He is convinced, for his own part, that the ultimate test of literary value lies in the expression, not in the meaning; and his favourite critical maxim is that of Longinus, who pronounces "a certain consummateness and eminence of words" to be the crown of literary excellence. "Fine words," says Longinus, "are the light of the mind"; and Mr. Saintsbury, recognizing here a great maxim which practically embodies the whole modern gospel of literature, applauds loudly. But taken by itself and understood in an absolute sense, this rhetorical remark is not exactly consistent with the general spirit of the treatise, and Longinus immediately qualifies it by saying that fine words are only appropriate to certain things, and that to use them for little things is like putting the tragedian's mask on the face of a child. This consideration gives Mr. Saintsbury pause; and he adds, on reflection, that Longinus beheld the mighty truth only as in a Pisgah-sight. This same "Pisgah-sight," however, is for Mr. Saintsbury a great epoch in the history of criticism; and he naturally expects to find some traces of a similar revelation elsewhere. But he searches in vain, until, a thousand years later, he comes to the "De Vulgari Eloquio" of Dante, which he ranks as the most important critical document between Longinus and the seventeenth century. The beauties of mediæval Italian, says Dante, are better displayed in prose than in poetry. Poetry is to prose as female beauty encumbered with jewelry and costly raiment is to female beauty in loose undress; and the latter style suits the Italian vernacular best. What possible ground does this trite comparison afford for saying that Dante, of all men in the world, recognizes the ultimate test of literary excellence as lying in expression, not in the meaning? Suppose that the same or a like figure were employed to illustrate the difference between virtue and vice. Would this justify Mr. Saintsbury in saying that the author regarded virtue and vice as mere matters of outward show? Apart from the "Pisgah-sight" and the apotheosis of diction Mr. Saintsbury writes for the most part sensibly, and carries the reader pleasantly over the dull stages of a subject not easily treated in a manner at once scholarly and popular. His readers gain by that broad view which treats poets and miscellaneous writers as critical authorities of equal value with professed rhetoricians and grammarians; and his conception of criticism as a living force permeating all literature, and acting on literature through literature, is, we feel, the right one. We gain a better idea of its real effect from Plutarch and the Greek Anthology, from Petronius and Boccaccio, than from Hermogenes and Dion Chrysostom, from Aristides of Smyrna and Libanius. But Mr. Saintsbury takes us conscientiously, though rapidly, through all the authorities, and gives us many a pleasant interlude by the way. As an instance of his power of exhibiting dull matter in an interesting light, take the chapter which deals with Photius, lexicographer, Patriarch of Constantinople, and contemporary of our own Alfred the Great. Being sent on a political mission to Assyria, Photius took with him a travelling library comprising the works of two hundred and eighty authors, and employed his leisure in writing critical summaries of them. Poetry, at this time, seems to have been rather at a discount; for among the two hundred and eighty it has not a single representative. But there are a certain number of romances, and Mr. Saintsbury claims for Photius the first rank, in point of time, among reviewers of novels. His criticism of the "Aethiopica"—"of many million novel reviews the interesting first"—runs thus:—

> The book (syntagma) is of the dramatic kind, and it usesa style suitable to the plan, for it aboundsin simplicityand sweetness, and in pathetic situations actual or expected. The narrative is diversified and unexpected, and has strange chance salvations ["hairbreadth 'scapes," Mr. Saintsbury well suggests as a parallel], and bright and pure diction. If, as is reasonable, it sometimes indulges in tropes, they too are brilliant, and exhibit the matter in hand. The periods are symmetrical, and, on the whole, arranged with a view to succinctness. The plot and the rest are correspondent to the style. His yarn is of the love of a man and a woman, and he shows an anxious and careful observance of propriety of sentiment.

In Photius there first occurs the familiar phrase "New Edition" (νέα ἐκδόσις). The following delightful specimen of an unfavourable review relates to the "Sophistikê Paraskeuê" of Phrynichus:—

> This writer, if any ever was, is fullest of various knowledge but otherwise redundant and garrulous; for when it was open to him to have got the matter completely finished off, without missing a single important point, in not a fifth part of his actual length, he, by saying things out of season, has stretched it out to an unmanageable bulk; and, while he has collected for others' use the matter of a good and suitable treatise, he cannot be said to have made much use of it himself.

In Mr. Saintsbury's account of Latin criticism, Cicero, Horace, the younger Pliny, Quintilian, Seneca, and Aulus Gellius provide the bulk of the material. There is plenty of critical matter in Cicero, whose remark on the opinion expressed by his brother Quintus about Lucretius has often been commented on, but has been curiously misunderstood:—

> Lucretii poemata, ut scribis, ita sunt, multis luminibus ingenii, multae tamen artis.

The editors with one consent have absurdly interposed "non" before "multis"! The sense is obvious enough. Quintus remarks to Marcus that the newly published poem is blazing with genius, which is perfectly true. Neither of them, we may be sure, would have been blind to that. "Yes," replies Marcus, "as you say, there is a good deal of genius, but there is a good deal of art also (although this is less apparent"). We borrow the words in parenthesis from Mr. Sellar, who perfectly apprehended the meaning of the passage.

It is curious that a work on the lines of Mr. Saintsbury's has never been attempted before in this country; and Continental literature, though not absolutely blank, has but little to show. Mazzarelli's "Della Critica" and Théry's "Histoire des Opinions Littéraires" appear to be of slight value, though Mr. Saintsbury describes the latter as "a work of great liveliness, no small knowledge, and, in its airy French way, a good deal of acuteness"; Professors Gayley and Scott's "Introduction to the Methods and Materials of Literary Criticism," a recent American work, is mainly bibliographical.

"HEROD."

Herod. A Tragedy. By Stephen Phillips. (Lane. 4s. 6d. n.)

When Mr. Phillips published two years ago his volume of poems, there seemed to be between the covers of that book two distinct temperaments—one of the man who wrote "Marpessa," the other belonging to the author of "The Wife." It appeared hardly possible that the artist who elaborated the classic idyll, with such research of ornament, with a luxury almost too exquisite, should have taken pleasure in the crude tragedy of the woman who flies into the crowded, gas-lit thoroughfare to sell herself that her husband may have bread, and returns with food only to find a dead face. In Paolo and Francesca the opposition did not make itself felt, but here in Herod it is strident at points, though when the work reaches its proper level the two natures exhibit themselves in fusion.

Take the first act and you have a piece of work that, as it stands, is, strictly speaking, scarcely poetical; but in common fairness we must allow once for all that the play is produced, as a book, under stress of circumstance which has not permitted adequate labour to be expended on it. As it is, however, what one sees in this act is the stage-craftsman heroically at work on a rather desperate task—to set out on the boards a complicated, violent, almost melodramatic, story. Mr. Phillips is trying to put into an act more than it will hold—first, as is right and natural, the external political situation as it affects Herod; then the internal politics of the Court and city as these affect Herod and Mariamne; then, as a result of these two, Herod's determination to go to Rhodes and his order for the death of Aristobulus; beyond and beside all these, an unmistakable display of Herod's passion for Mariamne. On the top of all this exposition has to be crushed in the enacted tragedy of Mariamne's confrontation with her brother's corpse; then her suspicion of Herod's act and the scene in which by "loveliness more terrible than torture" she wrings confession from Soheemus, the agent of the crime. Broadly speaking, through all this the characters say what is necessary, and say it with commendable brevity, but what they say is not poetry. When their utterance is poetry it is not essential to the action; it is an ornamental passage. Such are the various hints and rumours of a predicted Prince of Peace—notably in Herod's first speech; such is the description by Gadias of Herod's night wanderings through Jerusalem (lines which have an odd echo of a very dissimilar passage in Twelfth Night about "the spinsters and the knitters in the sun"); such is Mariamne's half-maternal, tender dialogue with her brother; such is the passage where Aristobulus, going unconscious to his death, describes a swimmer's delight—

> Ah for the plunge,
> The upward burst, and the long dart through waters, with its amplification a little further on; and such is the charming idyllic scene where Mariamne's women come out to meet the first coolness of night. All these are in a sense poetical; they are verse characteristic of an admirable artist; but they are not poetry in the highest sense; they do not spring directly from the subject. Among the other speeches which contain, perhaps, the raw material of poetry, but material unwrought, there are flashes, as in Herod's soliloquy,

> The first step is with us, then all the road,
> The long road is with Fate, or his soft cry at Mariamne's asseveration of undying love:—

> O liquid language of eternity.

Indeed, wherever Herod speaks he speaks either poetry or what may readily be made into poetry; for he is a poet in action, great shaper of schemes, designer of glories visible and invisible, and withal a builder in words. But save for him, the poetry is not in the fabric of the act; it is tacked on as an ornamentation. At no point could this be said of the poetry in Paolo and Francesca.

In the second act there are still perfunctory passages of what is only versified prose, and would be better as frank prose; but the poetry predominates. The description of Herod's coming as seen by watchers is true poetry instinct with the inspiration of the thing in hand. So is Herod's speech on his entry, addressed to Mariamne and the assemblage, but spoken with only one preoccupation, the desire to stir Mariamne's heart. (We presume, by the way, that Mr. Phillips has not really changed his splendid phrase about Augustus, "a face young and yet weary," "Wary" must be a misprint.) And throughout the act there are continually superb passages of this vital poetry, but almost always Herod speaks them. When Salome suddenly breaks into poetic style, in her description of Mariamne's presumed blandishments that beguiled Soherus till he "gave his soul up in the incense of her hair," the result is incongruous. One has again the sense of deliberate literary ornament. Concerning Mariamne, some reservation must be made. Her utterance demands verse; it is conceived in that key; and nothing could be finer and fiercer than some of her lines, as when she stigmatizes Herod:—

O glib!
The assassin first and then the orator.

Or this again:—

Half suitor and half strangler, with one arm
About the sister's neck, the other hand
About the brother's throat.

And yet when she loses the fierce passion of hate that galvanizes the stage figure into life, she relapses into a speaker of what has only literary excellence, not the vital spirit of poetry. Herod speaks the very language of passion, she answers him with words out of books—beautiful words, but still bookish, except when the spasm of hate recurs. Nothing could better illustrate what we mean than this speech (added to the printed text), so noble—yet so full of echoes from "Antigone" and elsewhere:—

Now farewell
Jerusalem, city of God, farewell,
My cradle first, my home, and now my grave,
For I, the last of all the Maccabees,
I, the lone daughter of that holy line
I perish without fear and without cry!
For a doom is come upon us and an ending.
Brother, I drink and hasten down to you.

Upon the whole, then, up to the end of the second act, you feel that Mr. Phillips is on one side of him interested by the violent melodramatic aspect of a tremendous story which he sets out to tell, over which at the opening the refined and delicate craftsman embroiders beautifully his purple patches; but which as it grows under his hand takes life and fire from the one character with whom the poet has identified himself. When Herod does not speak, there may be poetry in snatches; but when Herod speaks, you find speeches that either have been wrought or have not been wrought into poetry of a very different kind, poetry that is in the very bones of the drama. But when we reach the third act, Herod and the drama are one, Herod is the drama, and there is no calling in the poet to embroider, for dramatist and poet are united. The whole act recalls Marlowe, by no literary echo, but by a likeness of temperament, a similar prodigality of imagination that revels in material splendour. And yet, though Herod is always the Herod whose first thought to solace Mariamne, bending over her brother's dead face, was to picture in promise such a tomb and such funeral rites as might make men ambitious of death: though Herod can cry out:

And I will think in gold and dream in silver,
Imagine in marble and in bronze conceive:

yet all the splendours of his thought are felt only as a voluntary distraction of his nature from one terrible underlying cry of the heart that can only utter itself in the naked repetition of a name:—

Mariamne, Mariamne, Mariamne
Come, come.

And it is only with a thought of the third act that we should say that Mr. Phillips has written in Herod the most remarkable of his poems. Take the play as a whole, it has a patchiness from which Paolo and Francesca was entirely free; even in the last act the verse at the opening is somewhat perfunctory, and is marred by one or two deplorable lapses in style, such as the line which hopes that Herod may yet submit

To the dread fact of Mariamne's death.

But once the passion of the scene is launched by Herod's entry, it neither flags nor fails: all the wealth of Herod's inflamed imagination is poured out, prodigal as a cataract; yet all this ornament only heightens by opposition the central imminent tragedy of the end, which never for one instant ceases to be felt; and when the end comes it comes with dignity and grandeur, not with crashing noise but with a tragic hush, and the soothing voices of distant music. The violence and crude passion is controlled and subdued by the shaping skill of the artist into a whole that lacks neither force nor beauty.

THE RUSTIC YEAR.

Memories of the Months. Second Series. By Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bt. (Edward Arnold. 7s. 6d.)

So modest is the tone of "Memories of the Months" that few of its readers are likely to remember how high the author stands in the estimation of scholars as an authority upon Scottish archæology and history. But we may perhaps pardon him for an occasional interlude on a rustic flute. We are sure that it would have pleased the late Mr. James Payn to be told that "Memories of the Months" contains many passages which recall the gracious, whimsical humour of his "Gleams of Memory." As an illustration of Sir Herbert Maxwell's style when in such a mood we may take the following description of the sham fighting and feather-puffing of two drake golden-eyes before a duck:—

> It looked like courtship: all the elements were there—the lady and the rivals—but at most it can only have been a rehearsal; harmless flirtation is unknown among birds: when they begin they mean business; the suitor is terribly in earnest, the lady becoming coy but quite wide awake, with practical views about a suitable establishment; but the golden-eye is a late nester, and has never been known to breed in this country. It migrates in spring to northern latitudes, where the female lays her eggs generally in a hollow tree. The scene described above took place more than three months before these birds ought to contemplate matrimony. I should greatly like to ask these gallants whether their intentions were strictly honourable.

There are, indeed, no better portions of this most readable book than those which deal with bird life in England and in Scotland. Sir Herbert Maxwell is a true friend of winged folk, and is able to advance practical reasons why certain birds should be treated with consideration by humanity at large. He is severe upon a fashion of some few years ago which led to the slaughter of innumerable owls for the sake of adorning ladies' hats with their "plumes." Sir Herbert points out that the structure of an owl's wing coverts, so obviously adapted to assist in the attainment of the bird's object of noiseless flight, might well remind their "borrower" of the manner in which the owl preys by night upon foes of the farmer which have a particularly keen sense of hearing. As the author says, we too often reward "this beautiful nocturnal police" by shooting it down for the sake of wing and tail feathers—destined to be cast into the rubbish heap long before the bird's useful career would have ended in a natural manner, if shooting were reserved for game and really objectionable "vermin." Upon the subject of "osprey" plumes Sir Herbert Maxwell waxes still more righteously indignant. These delicate sprays are really produced "by two or three species of heron of fairy-like beauty." It is shameful that Ardea alba and Ardea garzetta cannot exhibit their "nuptial dress" in England without being shot down by sportsmen who ought to know better. Sir Herbert fears that the heartless European trade in these plumes must soon end in the total extermination of white herons. We are pleased to find that a true sportsman, such as Sir Herbert Maxwell undoubtedly is, speaks with the greatest confidence of the reasonable demands of the Society for the Protection of Birds, and pointedly calls the attention of his country-gentleman readers to the fact that the address of the secretary is 3, Hanover-square.

Sir Herbert Maxwell breaks a knightly lance in defence of a small quadruped which comes off badly at the hands of many farmers. The mole, which (it may interest Sir Herbert to be told) is still called by its Saxon name of "mouldewarp" in the north of Lincolnshire, is in reality a friend of man. The author tells a good story of his visit to a Somersetshire pasture farm so infested with "daddy-long-legs" that the fields had the appearance of being covered with a film of mist. As he pondered on the fact that each member of this army, some millions strong, had existed for three years underground as a leather grub, impoverishing the pasture by eating the roots of its sweetest grasses, he looked about for mole-casts. To his astonishment, not one was visible. On proceeding to condole with the farmer at this lamentable absence of the lifelong enemy of wireworms and leather grubs, Sir Herbert was staggered by the information that every parish in the district employed a mole-catcher. The remedy for the disease had been deliberately treated as itself an evil.

Gardeners and garden-lovers, sorely afflicted by the attempt to wrestle with the heap of trash which is dumped upon editors of "gardening papers," and some publishers, as "garden literature," will find many serviceable hints scattered among Sir Herbert Maxwell's pleasant pages. He says a deserved good word for Cytisus scoparius Andreusii, which is almost as easily grown and as hardy as the common type of broom. It can be forced into bloom a couple of months before its usual date of flowering in the open, and, as Sir Herbert Maxwell says, guileless visitors to a conservatory are then apt to hail it as some beautiful exotic unknown to them by name. Many practical horticulturists will derive information novel to them from Sir Herbert Maxwell's valuable list of rabbit-proof plants. Both the Spurge Laurel and the Mezereon occupy a prominent place among the shrubs which the rabbit will not taste, and all the "flag" kind of Irises may be added to unprotected "beds" which already contain such old favourites as periwinkles, monkshood, and Eranthis hyemalis. Sir Herbert Maxwell makes some admirable remarks upon the extent to which gardening can be practised in London. He points out the smallness of the expenditure upon window boxes, as compared with that lavished upon table decorations by London society. Why not flowers for a season, he asks, as well as flowers for a night? Sir Herbert Maxwell reminds his readers of the patience with which the common laburnum will do its best to brighten a London garden, informs us that Robinia pseud-acacia may be trained on the wall of a town house, and suggests that the same process should be tried with Magnolia Exoniensis.

"Memories of the Months" contains many word-pictures, but perhaps the most attractive of them is that of Denmark in May. We cordially agree with Sir Herbert Maxwell in his recommendation to English tourists (of the better sort) to try the land of beech-trees (and of pro-English feeling) as a change from repeated visits to Germany. Copenhagen, in itself a place of much interest, lies within easy reach of country which is peculiarly delightful in the spring time. The villages, "each with its church tower like an exaggerated dovecot," are only one degree less charming than the endless vistas of silvery trunks, and carpets of moss, in the great beech-woods. All through Zeeland it is curious to notice that the oxlip takes the place of our cowslip and primrose, and exhibits itself as a striking adornment to the meadows and woods. The landowners are addicted to pheasant-shooting, but on the whole there is little show of game in Denmark. Too many grey crows are wheeling about in the sunny air to leave partridges which are rearing broods much chance of profiting by escapes from the magpies. Hen harriers, now so rare in England, may still be met with somewhat frequently in Denmark, and the buzzard keeps a lookout over many a breeze-stirred copse. But the distinctive bird of Danish landscape is the stork, so dear to the memories of all those good children who have been brought up upon a literary diet of Hans Andersen.

REPRINTS.

Clad in sky-blue, in martial red, and in vernal green—so different from the drabs and browns in which they first appeared—there lie upon our table more books from the inexhaustible store of classics republished. Methuen's "Little Library," among a crowd of booklets in green and blue, leads a revolt against the fashion which keeps red for the larger volumes. Of the latter the most conspicuous is Macmillan's "Library of English Classics," which now contains Shelton's History of Don Quixote, in three vols. (3s. 6d. each), one of these "Tudor Translations"—Mr. Fitzmaurice Kelly has edited Shelton in the series of that name—in which the translator works with the fresh and free enjoyment of one who has just discovered a new literary treasure rather than with the laborious care and accuracy of a modern scholar. In red, too, though not quite so "tall," is the new addition to the "Rochester Edition" of Dickens, which Messrs. Methuen have in hand—viz., Bleak House, in two volumes (6s. n.). This edition is, as those who possess the "Pickwick" know, so far as the notes and illustrations go, chiefly topographical. The former are by Miss Beatrice Alcock, who follows with reverent fidelity the style of Mr. E. H. New; the latter are by Mr. F. G. Kitton, than whom no better authority on the subject exists. Mr. Gissing's preface is as sound and interesting as his book on Dickens would lead one to expect. "Bleak House" has always seemed to us to afford the chief answer to the criticism that Dickens could not draw a "gentleman." Sir Leicester Dedlock and Mr. Jarndyce are gentlemen, as Mr. Gissing recognizes; he might have added the Lord Chancellor, whom Dickens puts in with a few touches which show a true appreciation of "good breeding." Whyte Melville is coming out in red and in blue at the same time. Messrs. Ward, Lock have him in red, and in the new volume, The Interpreter (3s. 6d.), one notes with interest that Miss Lucy Kemp Welch is working as a book illustrator and contributes a couple of pictures—there may be more, but there is no list of them at the beginning. Among larger sized books suitable for presents is Bacon's Essays (Dent, 7s. 6d.), sumptuously dressed and carefully edited with a biographical introduction by Mr. Oliphant Smeaton.

"The Minerva Library" of Messrs. Ward, Lock is capricious in its colours. The Romany Rye (2s.) is in blue, and a light quality of blue cold and passionless as its author; or at least as that picture of its author which Dr. Jessopp would fain draw. Mr. Theodore Watts Dunton in an introduction to this edition defends Borrow against Dr. Jessopp's charges of inhuman passionlessness and rancorous hatred; and in the course of his apology gives interesting and well-told reminiscences of a gipsy mother whom Borrow and a friend persuaded to give up smoking while she was nursing her babe, and of a gipsy girl on whom they tried the experiment of reading Matthew Arnold's "Scholar Gypsy." The stories are meant to show Borrow's interest in children and his susceptibility to feminine charms. We accept and believe all Mr. Watts Dunton's assurances about Borrow, but are they quite relevant? He is speaking of Borrow the man; Dr. Jessopp is speaking of Borrow the writer, and records the impression which Borrow's writings have made upon him. The question is whether they ought to make that impression on an impartial mind. This has nothing to do with the impression which Borrow's personality made upon his intimates, and Mr. Watts Dunton does not address himself at all to Dr. Jessopp's statement that "of anything like animal passion there is not a trace in all his many volumes." Mr. Lane's edition of Borrow in pretty little covers of modest green, without note or introduction, now contains The Romany Rye and The Bible in Spain.

Half-way between the Library and the Pocket Edition and fit for the two-shelved bookcase of the bedroom or the boudoir is

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), not bound in gaudy coloured cloth, but set in pure white vellum with its pages enlarged in rubric as becomes a volume in "The Religious Life Series." It is Dr. Pusey's translation, with a short introduction by Mrs. Meynell. Coming a little further down in the matter of size we have the first volume of a new Keats—THE COMPLETE WORKS OF JOHN KEATS, edited by Buxton Forman, vol. I. (Gowans and Gray, 1s. n.). We welcome the enterprise of these Glasgow publishers in starting with this first instalment an entirely new series of reprints of standard authors under the title of "The Complete Library," to contain the works of standard authors unabridged and complete, giving all the different readings, and edited with notes and biographies, &c. It is enough, perhaps, to say of the present volume that it contains "the main features" of Mr. Forman's Library Edition. But we hasten to entreat Messrs. Gowans and Gray to reconsider the type which they are using for the notes and introduction. It seems to be called "condensed type." It is not too small, but too "condensed"—horizontally. We have been trying to read the editor's interesting preface (by electric light), but we soon began to remember that one's eyesight was too delicate a thing to play tricks with, and we turned to the text of Keats, which is pleasantly readable. We fear other readers may do the same, which in the case of a book annotated by Mr. Buxton Forman would be a pity.

We are rather sorry to see Messrs. Dent experimenting, for the first time we think, with somewhat the same kind of print in a new volume of "Temple Classics for Young People"—George Sand's MASTER MOSAIC WORKERS (1s. 6d.), translated by Charlotte C. Johnston and well illustrated by Charles Robinson. The modern craze for new and so-called artistic founts of type pays much too little heed to the first requisite of print that it should be read not only with perfect ease but with pleasure. In the same series comes an IVANHOE, in two volumes (1s. 6d. each), in the usual pleasant type used in this series, and illustrated in a similar manner by Messrs. C. E. and H. M. Brock. In "The Temple Classics" proper, we have Miss Mitford's OUR VILLAGE and THE INFERNO OF DANTE, edited by Mr. H. Oelsner—the Italian text side by side with Dr. J. A. Carlyle's English version, while Vasari's Lives, Macaulay's Essays, and The Golden Legend, all of which we have noticed before, are now completed. To the navy blue of "The Temple Classics"—which, by the way, is also the colour in which appears a small fine paper edition of THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.), one of a series which is as pleasant to read as any now being published—a striking contrast is provided by the red covers of Methuen's "Little Library" (1s. 6d. n. each). They provide a distinguishing mark for a very useful series, of which two instalments lie before us. One is A LITTLE BOOK OF ENGLISH PROSE—a well selected anthology of prose passages from Mandeville to Matthew Arnold. The only fault we find with it is that the exact sources of the passages selected, which are grouped under authors' names, are not given. The other is JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN, another reprint of which in a small and handier form we are very glad to see. Miss Annie Matheson writes an interesting introduction containing some new personal reminiscences of Mrs. Craik, in the telling of which Miss Matheson is more successful than in putting her own thoughts into words—though these thoughts, so far as we can understand them, are sound enough. In connection with "Little" books, where such pocket editions are meant to be read, one's brain would reel over such a sentence as this—

> It accords with the fashion of our age to deny that there is any reality above or beyond literature; but literature is the fruit of that over-rated effort, which, though a part of the world's testament, is not of itself the immortal heritage testified.

Messrs. A. and C. Black give us in three elegant little volumes bound in a rich and restful green, with a design which we reproduced in a recent article on book covers, Dr. John Brown's HORA SUBSECIVÆ (6s. n.). They are excellently printed, and will, we doubt not, create renewed interest in the work of a man who produced, in the words of Mr. Andrew Lang, "a light but imperishable literature."

ANNUALS.

That invaluable and unique work Who's Who appears in its 1901 issue (A. and C. Black, 5s. n.). Its mass of biographical matter is "swelling visibly," and we doubt the wisdom of referring the reader under the names of peers to other names of families connected with them by marriage. Moreover, the inclusion of a gentleman whose only claim to distinction appears (on the record) to be that he started a preparatory school in 1900 is, perhaps, stretching editorial liberality a little far, especially when no room is found for the name of so eminent a Q.C. as Mr. George Freeman. But the book, nevertheless, is a marvel of exhaustiveness and accuracy. So, in another line, is HAZELL'S ANNUAL (Hazell, Watson, and Viney, 3s. 6d.), which is not quite like any other annual in its combination of tabular information with records of events, and is invaluable as an epitome of current history which one is apt so soon to forget. It is a little niggardly on the subject of journalism—other than daily—and some place should have been found, for instance, for a mention of the founding of Mr. Murray's Monthly. But for its full and yet succinct accounts of the war, of affairs in China, of the election, and of all matters of public interest in 1900, to say nothing of its mass of personal and statistical information, the public may well be grateful.

THE DAILY MAIL YEAR BOOK (1s.) contains a good many of the features of "Whitaker's Almanack," "Who's Who," and "Hazell's Annual," together with certain features of its own. These mainly consist of certain carefully written statistical articles, illustrated in many cases by diagrams, dealing with such matters as the Army and Navy, the state of trade, the speed of ocean greyhounds, and the incidence of taxation. There are also some particulars about the professions open to young men, but these are not as complete and exhaustive as they might be, more especially as regards appointments in the public service open to competition. We find no mention, for example, of the Indian Woods and Forests Department, or of the Indian Engineering Service. The biographies of contemporary celebrities, of which there are a certain number, are unconventionally written. We read with interest that Mr. Max Beerbohm is "a wise youth of the Beardsley period," that Miss Corelli "despises the reviewers and the literary profession generally," and that Mr. C. Arthur Pearson "for diversion gives away £10 notes."

The close of the century lends additional interest to the information to be gleaned from such old favourites among "Peerages" as the magnificent BURKE (Harrison, 42s.) and the handier DOD (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d.). From the former we learn that the number of peers with seats in the House has increased during the century from 305 to 523. Seventy-nine peerages have become extinct since 1800, many of them new creations. Of the new creations of the century as many as 241 still exist. But while the peerages of such men as Nelson, Wellington, Brougham, and Grey still survive as memorials of stirring chapters in the century's history, many great names which enshrine the memory of historical events during the last hundred years, such as Beaconsfield and Melbourne, have no representatives to-day.

In DEBRETT'S PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, AND KNIGHTAGE, for 1901 (Dean, 31s. 6d.), the preface states that since 1864 this excellent work of reference has grown from 400 to over 2,000 pages, and also contains some interesting particulars as to the part played by the holders of titles in the war. It appears that "over fifty peers and thirty baronets" have been engaged in active service. Many of them, like Lord Kensington and the Marquis of Winchester, met their deaths on the battlefield. The number of new creations this year has been comparatively small. There have been made five new peers, nine new baronets, and ninety-six new knights; whereas in 1892 there were seventeen new peers and seventeen new baronets. The record year for knights was 1897, when no fewer than 218 gentlemen attained this honour.

An equally useful book of reference—The English Woman's Year Book and Directory (Black, 2s. 6d. n.)—reaches its majority this year. It is a pity that it should be considered necessary to bring out these books so early. A result is that in a review of novels produced by women in 1900 "Eleanor," by Mrs. Humphry Ward, is not included. The book is none the less an excellent compendium of useful and accurate knowledge. To mention only one of its good features, the section devoted to Employments and Professions should be invaluable to women on the look-out for either work or amusement. Almanach Hachette as usual adds a fund of diverting information and advice to the almanac proper—e.g., an account of "l'automobilisme en 1900," and even hints on "l'art de choisir un fromage."

From these old friends we turn to The Church Directory and Almanack (2s. n.). This is a new undertaking on the part of Messrs. Nisbet, and in addition to the usual lists there are several features of a more special kind, such as a list of the names and stations of the C.M.S. and the S.P.G., and a portion of the volume—"For the Study, the Pulpit, and the Parish," including a series of homiletical outlines.

Among annuals of interest are The Journal of Education, yearly volume (7s. 6d.), a treasure-house of information on current educational matters, and The Reliquary, Vol. VI., a well-produced volume invaluable to antiquarians (Bemrose, 12s. n.).

The Boys' and Girls' Companion is a pleasant little illustrated magazine published by the Church of England Sunday School Institute. The volume for 1900 has varied contents, largely, of course, religious; and the same may be said of The Golden Rule (Sunday School Union, 2s.), Golden Sunbeams (S.P.C.K., 1s. 4d.), and Mothers in Council, edited by Miss Yonge (Wells Gardner, Darton).

ART.

Sir Joshua Reynolds, First President of the Royal Academy. By Sir Walter Armstrong, Director of the National Gallery of Ireland. With seventy-eight Photogravures, and six Lithographic Facsimiles in colour. (Heinemann. £5 5s. n.)

In the superb folio which Mr. Heinemann has this year added to his long list of imposing art-books, we have a companion volume to the Gainsborough, also by Sir Walter Armstrong, which appeared last year and won so deserved a success. The reproductions of the artist's works are both numerous and admirable. Fair Nelly O'Brien, clasping her little white dog in her arms, looks out on us from the frontispiece, with the sunlight playing through the branches of the trees, and the broad hat throwing transparent shadows over her lovely face. Further on in the book we find the famous Duchess of Devonshire dancing her baby in the air, the beautiful Bingham sisters and delightful Crewe children, the great Laurence Sterne and Lord Heathfield, and that enchanting vision of Diana, Lady Crosbie, which Sir Walter pronounces worthy to rank with the masterpiece of Hertford House.

Sir Walter Armstrong displays his usual mastery of style and subject in the monograph which accompanies these beautiful plates. He gives a concise account of Sir Joshua's life, traces the development of his genius, and analyses the peculiar qualities of his art with skill and knowledge, while his views are expressed with a lucidity and terseness that form a pleasant contrast to much of the letterpress which is often considered good enough for works of this class. His estimate of Reynolds' character as a whole is distinctly less favourable than that of former biographers. As he tells us in his prefatory note, he is convinced that it has been customary to regard the painter through an atmosphere of idealization created by enthusiasm for his art, and he has deliberately tried to correct this mistaken impression and to paint Sir Joshua as a consistent human being, alike in his work and in his life. "I do not love a man," said Dr. Johnson to Boswell, "who is zealous for nothing." Sir Joshua, his latest biographer declares, was "zealous for nothing." Nothing that he said or wrote shows the least touch of warmth or enthusiasm. He never quarrelled with any one, but he took little or no interest in others. His intercourse with his own family was of the slightest kind. He rarely knew his pupils' names and remained a mere spectator of life, indifferent to all that lay outside the range of his own art. The epithet of "invulnerable," which Dr. Johnson applied to him, is, in Sir Walter's eyes, a further proof of the coldness of the painter's heart, a reading which is partly justified by Mrs. Thrale's witty lines beginning:—

> Of Reynolds all good should be said, and no harm,
> Though the heart is too frigid, the pencil too warm.

"So far," writes Sir Walter Armstrong, "as the aspect he presented to the world is concerned, all the evidence we have points in one direction. He was imperturbably kind, judicial, and non-impulsive. As to what lay beneath the surface, men held different opinions in his lifetime and have differed ever since. To me it appears indisputable that Sir Joshua's heart was very hard, but his mind just, and that his one passion, if it can be called a passion, was ambition, which, in his case, was a quiet persistent determination to fill as conspicuous a position in the society and art of his time as his abilities and the accident of his birth would allow."

The writer proceeds to show the close connexion between the personality of the master, as he conceives it, and his art. Even as a boy this clear judgment and calculating nature showed itself when he said "I will be a painter if you give me the chance of becoming a good one; otherwise I will sell drugs." Later in life, he declared that study, in his opinion, was the art of knowing other men's minds, and that he was conscious of an inordinate desire to possess every kind of excellence that he saw in the works of others. "Here," writes Sir Walter, "from his own lips, we have the key to Sir Joshua's personality as an artist. He was always gathering both material and ways to use it; his remarkable success with a method which too often leads to insipidity depended on the union in his own person of a fine taste and untiring activity." Both in discussing Sir Joshua's character and his art, the critic refers constantly to his great rival Gainsborough, a comparison that was, indeed, almost inevitable. But, although he makes no secret of his preference for the open and genial nature and spontaneous art of the Suffolk master, he does ample justice to Sir Joshua's merits. He recognizes the marvellous variety and fertile resources of his invention, the wonderful and lasting popularity which he has attained by his skill in suggesting the energy of English men and in recording the loveliness of English women and children. Reynold's portraits of men he pronounces to be absolutely unequalled, from the Admiral Keppel, which in 1752 ensured the artist instant success and marked the birth of modern English painting, to the Lord Heathfield, which he painted within a few years before his death. Here, indeed, Sir Walter owns, he surpassed his rival, and all other masters before or since. But when we come to women and children, it is another matter. Charming as are Sir Joshua's fair women and innocent children, he lacks the deep and real sympathy that we feel in Gainsborough's "Morning Walk," or "Mrs. Sheridan." Sir Joshua painted a little boy or girl as he would a kitten, making them part of a lovely scheme, and often suggesting with rare felicity the germ of the man and woman within them. But Gainsborough's children are real children, whose being he divines by the might of his intense imaginative feeling and whose thoughts he interprets with singular delicacy of perception. This judgment may seem unfair when we recall the "Strawberry Girl," and the many delicious children whose graceful attitudes and sweet innocence live in Sir Joshua's pictures. But to convince ourselves of its truth, we need only compare the "Perdita" of Reynolds in the Wallace collection with that of Gainsborough, which is also at Hertford House. There we shall see the marvellous way in which the last-named artist realizes the individuality of his sitter, the extraordinary charm with which he conveys his impression to the spectator, and seeing these things, we shall acknowledge the truth and discrimination of Sir Walter Armstrong's criticism.

Mr. Caul Aldin's pictures in the Sphere Christmas Number, illustrating the art of lithography in colour, mark something of a new departure in the practice of lithography in this country, and are especially interesting as coming from a London printing house, Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode. The whole number deserves special mention for its well-conceived contents and admirable pictures. It has a mass of good illustrations by well-known artists, a fine reproduction of Gotch's "Alleluia," and a poem by Mr. Thomas Hardy. But its chief feature is its Children's Christmas Supplement, with nine full-page coloured pictures (five by Cecil Aldin), full of life, humour, colour, and individuality.

The "Vanity Fair Album" should have a special mark on its back, for it will undoubtedly be more often taken from the shelf of Albums than any other. Apart from the "General group" which we noticed the other day, it has the chief figures of the war. Lord Roberts' portrait is already a household picture. Kruger is marvellous, and Steyn is just as good. The Album teaches literature with Mr. George Wyndham and a very characteristic Winston Churchill. For the eminence of the men portrayed, for the presence throughout of a slightly more humorous touch of caricature, and for the excellence of the reproductions, this thirty-second Album is perhaps the best of them all.

FICTION.

The Journalist in Fiction.

The writer for the Press has lately received a good deal of attention from the writer of fiction, but in a calling that stretches its length from the leader-writer on a London morning paper to the reporter of tittle-tattle for a country-side journal there are many types of men. Rather than consider the subject broadly most novelists draw their own particular kind of hero under the name of journalist, and the public remains only partially informed as to his true characteristics. Mrs. Leighton, Mr. Cadett, and "Rita" are the latest novelists to take the modern "penster" in hand. We believe each author knows something of journalism, and yet the result of their labours is not flattering to a profession which, we feel sure, these novelists may have in their day helped to adorn. We base this view on no better foundation than their present literary style.

In A Napoleon of the Press (Holder, 6s.) Mrs. Marie Connor Leighton takes the journalist of the "scraps" order, who starts a paper on a small borrowed capital and rises to fame and fortune at an age when most men have failed to earn a shilling. We have seen it hinted that Alfred Chantrey is a portrait from life; but this does not make Mrs. Leighton's book a good novel nor help her to convince us of the truth of her characters or her plot. The hero's attractions are detailed at great length. That he has a small, shiny head, can wear his hat like a gentleman, and that on occasion "his boyish, eager tones once more chopped through the tame atmosphere" we are prepared to believe, but we do not accept these qualities as claims, nor are we inclined to own that his conduct strikes us as being Napoleonic in the slightest degree. The word "cheek" is continually appearing in the early part of the book, and we are inclined to think that the word gives the character of the story better than any lengthy criticism could do.

Mr. Herbert Cadett, in The Adventures of a Journalist (Chatto, 3s. 6d.), has put his stories together with skill, and now and then there is a dash of probability in his acute deductions. "The Incident of the Spotted Dog" is the most amusing and thrilling of the eleven tales. Mr. Gretton, the extraordinarily gifted "special" reporter of the Evening Orb, tells with the fine flavour of romance how he saved the "Mayfairian Empire" and the Prince of Wales from a diabolical plot. As the Prince and Emperor drove through the City a Dalmatian dog rushed from the crowd and took its place under the Royal carriage. The eye of this wonderful journalist notes that the dog is "a bit above the ordinary," and knows by instinct that an infernal machine is artfully fastened to its body. How he saves the situation the reader will like to find for himself. The other stories are light and will bear reading once, but "The Adventures of a Journalist" still leaves something to be told in regard to the inner meaning of that member of society.

The lady journalist it is that suffers most at the hands of the amusing "Rita" in her latest lively book Vanity (Unwin, 6s.). The originally gay, but later sorely-tried heroine of this novel, who takes the name of "Frou-Frou" and goes into the business of Court modiste, is writing her confessions and incidentally explaining how she was interviewed by a lady who "does the fashions" for the Lady's Illustrated. This journalist asks for a new costume from the new establishment, and Frou-Frou has inquired of her friend Mrs. Di Abercroft, an established dressmaker, if this sort of thing is usual in exchange for a flattering article. This is what Mrs. Abercroft says, and perhaps "Rita" thinks, about the lady of the Lady's Illustrated:—

> Has she been levying blackmail? laughed Di, I thought her gown was shabby. Be sure she has done that on her own account. They all try it on. Well, one can hardly blame them, poor souls! They get wretchedly paid, have their meals at an A.B.C. shop, and are obliged to watch any chance as keenly as a cat at a mouse-hole; are bullied by editors, worried by the staff, hated for a success, despised for a failure. All in all, a journalist's life is not a happy one, and there are too many in the field. They're in one another's way; consequently the pay is bad and the competition enormous. We live in an age of women workers, my dear, but the age is none the better for it. The fashion papers only pander to our vanity. The society notes in the daily Press are simply vulgar advertisements of notoriety. You will see the same names appearing day after day. Mrs. "Jack" Nobody was seen driving or walking or lunching, and Lady "Tom" Somebody was exquisitely gowned.

This is a sad picture; but the male journalist fares better. Burke Mahoney, for instance, is spoken of as very good fun. "He's just got on a new paper, The Cynic. Motto—praise nothing, sneer at all things." If "Rita" has not grasped the largest issues of journalism, she at least shows a knowledge of that side of newspaper work which is busy with a particular kind of horror called by the author "spicy pars." To turn to the general story of "Vanity" we find "Rita," as usual, a little melodramatic and very amusing. Her style is journalistic, and the dear old convenient phrases and words—outré, élégante, gracieuse, gentille—spring up on every page. But there is sincerity in her work and tragedy of a sort. As a mere man one is perhaps a little overdone with the great subject of frocks, but novel-readers are, we believe, ladies of leisure, and for such there is much to delight in this volume.

Short Stories.

We often tell one another that in England we have not the art of writing the conte. The mere repetition of this statement has given it weight; the facts are against it. We should find it easy to name some half-a-dozen masters of the novel in little, and we now have before us seven books, all excellent in manner and in matter, but none of them written by Mr. Harland, Mr. Kipling, Miss Hunt, Mr. Jacobs, Miss D'Arcy, or Mr. Hardy. Some exception may be taken to Marshfield, the Observer (Macmillan, 6s.), as an example of a collection of contes, for Mr. Egerton Castle calls his stories "studies of character and action," and makes his puppet, Meldrum Marshfield, the main force as regards the first six—"The Dance of Death," the last story, being in a totally different manner. But in the broader meaning of the term Mr. Castle's book comes within its scope, and he shows uncommonly well that he understands the difficult art for which French writers have so long been praised. All Mr. Marshfield's observations are highly interesting, some, such as "Guests of the Wolfmaster," extremely exciting. "Endymion in Barracks" is the engaging title of a remarkably subtle piece of work. The dreamer, the studious University exquisite, Edward Dalrymple, on leaving Trinity has joined the Army, and the fragile perfection of his build and beauty of his face have passed and settled into the bronzed, wiry type of the British officer. It is only when Dalrymple has been through an Indian campaign that his old college companion Marshfield meets and restudies him. He knows his past and sees his present; he is fain to read his secret. What that may be we leave the fortunate reader of Mr. Castle's book to discover for himself. The psychological misfortunes which befall Dalrymple leave him at last a mere automaton who does his duty. Again comes the summons to active service; the bugle-call disperses the "intellectual phthisis" under which the hero suffers, and the story ends with the following admirable passage:—

> He seemed to take up his life again with enthusiasm; and never, as those said who saw him again on that last day, did any one lay it down with a higher heart. They found his body on the lip of the enemy's trenches; and it was said that the beauty of his dead face was such, the smile upon it so exquisite, that the very soldiers of the burying party, all hardened to their materializing task, begged to look and look again before wrapping him away in that insatiable earth that had already drunk in so much gallant blood.
> Marshfield often wondered whether at that supreme moment his friend had indeed been vouchsafed once again the glory of his Vision, or whether the smile had been called upon his stiffening lips by the knowledge that, through Duty, he had at last and for ever grasped—Peace.

Here we see Mr. Castle's suggestive method in action. Indeed, a fault in Marshfield is that he "often wondered," and that his creator tells us him to be a much more wonderful personage than his observations and deductions would lead us to conclude. Yet the book is full of power and sympathy and of cunning fascinations.

Mr. Frank Harris has touched life on so many sides and won so many victories that one is a little surprised to find in his second volume of fiction, Montes, the Matador, and Other Stories (Richards, 6s.), that he does not write a short story with conspicuous ability. Those who remember "The Elder Conklin," and their name among the readers of fiction is legion, will know that Mr. Harris does not lack strength of subject; the power of artistic treatment, however, is not his in equal degree. The story of Montes, the best in the book, is one of those that an old man who has remained secret and dumb for years tells to a stranger, apparently for no other reason than to grace a writing-man's holiday. The old man's story begins with tedious detail, intended, no doubt, to create an atmosphere which could have been produced far more tersely. It tells how the Matador causes the death of his successful rival in love, and withdraws from a life of glory among los toros, eating out his heart in remorse. He ends:—

> Yet at times now fairly content, save for one thing. Remorse? Yes!—And the old man rose to his feet, while his great eyes, blazing with passion, held me. "Remorse! That I let the bull kill him. I should have torn his throat out with my own hands."

That is Mr. Harris' power, the dramatic climax, the figuration of a horrid passion, the construction of a vital volcanic situation. In another mood, "First Love" shows how barren his work is unless permitted to contain the impassioned touch of drama. "The Interpreter" tells the tale of Mr. Pigott's suicide from the point of view of a Madrid guide who had become devotedly attached to the forger of the Parnell letters—during four days' intercourse. Like the two other stories in the book one recognizes it as the work of a clever man who has yet something to learn in one of the arts that go to make life endurable.

There is, perhaps, no more curiously careful writer of short stories at the present time than Mr. William Waldorf Astor. There hangs about his writing a suggestion of art for art's sake, which comes agreeably into a world of letters where most works of art are produced with the view of getting them put on a West-end stage. In Pharaoh's Daughter, and Other Stories (Macmillan, 6s.), we have twelve essays in fiction which tell of periods from the early dynasties of Egypt to the Napoleonic days, of all men and cities and countries—Memphis, Babylon, Paris, the pride of Venice, and the brave days of Chivalry. Wherever Mr. Astor places his characters he endows them with a reality which requires something more than mere historical research. The men and places he selects have clearly a deep hold upon his sympathy, and that, in itself, is a very sound way to gain ours. The stories are all finely and attractive, careful in plot, yet with an occasional hint of artifice, perhaps inevitable in this sort of [illegible]-constructive kind.

Of short stories there are many kinds, and if the historic story can be engaging and exciting, so may the tale of Oriental modern life be. In Palace Tales (Harpers, 6s.), Mr. H. Fielding proves this modest proposition to our complete satisfaction. All the world will, no doubt, soon have been on the road to Mandalay, but in the meantime Upper Burma still keeps some remnants of the secret of romance, and the glories of the last could still be held in fee when Mr. Fielding studied the kingdom some fifteen years ago. Much is changing out there, old thoughts giving way to new, and before it be too late our author rescues from oblivion at least one phase of life in the Palaces of the Burmese Kings. These records of Burmese amusements and trivialities are a most refreshing addition to the usual order of the short story. From "The King's Joke" to "The Fall of Manny San" the tales are all merriment and delight, fraught with the charming atmosphere of irresponsible fairy-land which belongs by right to the East and is ever welcome to the imaginative Western. There is humour, gaiety, and a touch of cynicism in all Mr. Fielding writes, and we greatly trust that the fount of his early experiences has not run dry with "Thibaw's Queen" and "Palace Tales."

From the Burmese Court to the Indian jungle is a journey of no great distance, though it leaves us in a totally different world. Mrs. Frank Penny's A Forest Officer (Methuen, 6s.) gives us as complete a picture of the life she studies as Mr. Fielding does. The experiences of Mr. Jim Barns, who fights a thousand subtle enemies in the course of his duty to his Government, are full of keen observation and knowledge of native character. "The Forest Fire," "The Jin," "The Bewitched Bride," "The Tom-Tom Beater," give uncommonly good pictures of life as it is lived at one point of the Indian Empire. Mrs. Penny vividly depicts both the native life and the white man's influence; and her book will interest all who know or care to know what may be called the forest side of Indian life.

Although we cannot claim Mr. Joel Chandler Harris as an English writer, the name of the author of "Uncle Remus" is so much a household word here that we need no excuse for mentioning here his delightful collection of stories, On the Wing of Occasions (Murray, 6s.), which we strongly recommend to all lovers of the realistic historical politico-sketch of American life in the early sixties. There is no one else who does this sort of thing quite so well as Mr. Chandler Harris.

Shadows from the Thames, by Edward Noble (Pearson, 6s.), contains five admirable short stories that centre round the grimy and desolate estuary of the Thames, the trading Thames of the Port of London of which the best informed amongst us know so little. Mr. Noble knows it, knows the lightermen, knows the tug-captains, knows underwriters and their dodges, knows the river, as the phrase goes, "backwards and blindfold." Yet the stories are no mere exposition of the river, which affords but a peg upon which to hang some really excellent plots of sensation. The author has made effective use of the method of Dr. Conan Doyle. That is to say he has created Captain Gaskin, the Sherlock Holmes, and Ralston, the Dr. Watson of Conan Doyle. And the similarity extends even to the detail of making Ralston appear possessed of an almost incredible simplicity that brings into strong relief the superlative shrewdness of Captain Gaskin. The stories themselves are characterized by great ingenuity. "Silent Sentinels" and "The Maelstrom" have a gruesome flavour, and, in common with the others, compel interest. Mr. Noble has an apt turn for description and is completely master of the argot of the river.

Mr. Lilly as Novelist.

Mr. W. S. Lilly, as becomes a scholarly and cultured writer, has in A Year or Life (John Lane, 6s.), concerted himself with the loves and hates of an aristocratic circle, in whom pride of lineage supplies a spur to virtue. The Lady Mary Silverton is the only personage who can be said to belong to the "smart set," "the degenerates," and we are made to feel the worthlessness of a woman for whom noblesse oblige has no meaning. The story is that of Sir Philip Savile's redemption by way of the love of Lilian Liddell, the "typical creamy English girl, to whom we all turn at last," of Mr. Pinero. Sir Philip, brilliant and handsome, is harnessed in the toils of the unscrupulous Lady Mary, whose husband, engrossed in high finance, spends his scanty leisure at the feet of a ballet dancer. Mr. Lilly has depicted, with artistic restraint and a thousand happy touches of characterization, the slow undoing of the toils that bind Samson to his Delilah. A well-stored mind is perhaps a besetment to the novelist. At least, it seems to us that Pope and Tennyson and Wordsworth play a rather larger part in the conversations during this "year of life" than is the case in the real world. A Roman Catholic bias, too, and a penchant for clairvoyance are responsible for at least two hardly necessary excursions that deflect the course of the narrative. But it were an inappropriate standard to apply to a novel which is essentially one of characterization and not of incident to demand that it should possess the air of inevitability. So rigorous a rule would have robbed us of many delightful conversational irresponsibilities, the half-intended gaucheries of Kitty Karsdale (the enfant terrible arrived at years of indiscretion), and the rather over-done stories of the mercurial O'Flaherty, journalist. The least successful characters are the heroine, of whom one ought to learn little, and Adolf Kleist, who is, we confess, a little too special for our taste. We are grateful to Mr. Lilly for a rendering of the Rochester-Eyre theme (with variations) abounding in witty dialogue and full of sincere and capable workmanship.

Jules Verne.

The very elaborate and fantastic plots which M. Jules Verne delves in nowadays are less attractive than his bold flights of a generation ago. The Will of an Eccentric (Sampson Low, 6s.) is a huge and most complicated joke. The eccentric—William J. Hypperbone, of Chicago—leaves a fortune of sixty millions of dollars to be competed for in a game by seven people. The game invented by the eccentric testator resembles the Royal Game of Goose, and the seven would-be heirs are enjoined to turn themselves into living pawns and career madly at full speed up and down the United States of America, their moves being determined by the throw of the dice. The player "who first takes possession of the 63rd square, otherwise the 63rd State, which is that of Illinois," is to inherit the entire fortune. These journeyings give M. Verne an excellent opportunity for the display of his talents. We have spoken of Illinois as the 63rd State, and it may occur to some of our young readers that there are only fifty States in the Union. For an explanation we refer the critic to the diagram of "The Noble Game of the United States of America," which stands as a frontispiece to the book and shows how Mr. William J. Hypperbone ingeniously overcomes the difficulty.

Is There a Better Thing? by Jeremiah Vaughan-Emmett (Swan Sonnenschein, 6s.), shows want of experience in the art of narration. Its details are trivial and its particularity wearisome. Yet Dorothoe, the heroine, who is represented as exceptionally gifted with conversational powers, gives no evidence of her gifts, and sometimes the author's powers fail him. "What Rey-dale suffered no one knows. What Frank felt was too intense and too bitter to be recounted." A visit to Rome brings Dorothoe under the influence of the Roman Catholic Church, and her father-confessor has the unenviable privilege of reading her diary. "Mother caught me smoking, and we had a fearful row," and "I was smoking a delightful Havana cigarette, toasting my toes on the fender, with an awfully jolly book, when suddenly some one began to play the Kreutzer Sonata," are samples of this egregious document. The book is entertaining, although possibly not in the way which the writer would have preferred.

Haggith Shy: Quakeress, by Mark Ashton (Hutchinson, 6s.), is a gracefully written story of a girl's struggle against persecution. To expose the machinations of an unscrupulous brother, Haggith can think of nothing more original than to don man's attire, and so attack the task of unravelling a somewhat tangled skein of duplicity. The scene is Paris during the closing days of the Second Empire, and the stirring episodes of the siege and the Commune supply a breathless succession of sensational incidents. They do not always convince, and the device by which Haggith's student-friend is transformed into her lover is far-fetched. But the narrative is bright and vigorous, and the heroine's character is delineated with much skill, affording an effective contrast with the weaker nature of her American lover. The minor characters are clever, but often give the impression of being dragged neck and crop into the picture.

More Books for the Young.

Here is a miscellaneous assortment which has just hurried into covers in time for the season of sales. An immense book heads the pile, called Britain's Sea-Kings and Sea-Fights (Cassell and Co.). It is by all manner of people, two of them Captains in the Royal Navy. The illustrations, too, are by various artists, and are of excellent quality. The book is the very thing for any one of the thousands of English boys who want to be sailors, but it is a little heavy to send by post.

A Trip to Many Lands, by William Forster (Partridge, 2s.6d.), would be a pleasant lesson book for a class of children, but it will be resented just as much as any other lesson book is resented. Children are terribly quick to detect the pill in the jam, and a chapter that begins "A very small country will next claim our attention," settles the place of such a book in a child's mind. Nevertheless, it would be a distinct help to the geography teacher.

Miss Evelyn Everett Green's A Gordon Highlander (Nelson, 2s. 6d.) is the tale of a fine little fellow whose beloved "Daddy" went to the front, and is charmingly written.

Next comes four little shilling books from Messrs. Cassell, all in gay covers and of a convenient size to send and to hold. The first one is The Heiress of Wyvern Court, by G. Searchfield. It begins with a schoolboy of eleven who addresses a strange little girl thus, "Well, little friend, and where do you hail from?" which is perhaps not quite unconvincing. The second is A Pair of Primroses, by Mrs. Pitt—a nice little talk about two children called Primrose. Their Road to Fortune, by Mrs. Houston, is the third. There is a very arbitrary gentleman in it called Mr. Rivers. "Absolute, unquestioning obedience was one thing Mr. Rivers exacted from every person he came in contact with." He must have been a salutary casual acquaintance. Ella's Golden Year, by G. Searchfield, is the last of the quartette, and we like it the best. The children in it are really childlike.

A more ambitious book is The Magic Mist, by Eva Rogers (Melrose, 5s.). It is not exactly unsuitable for children, but we should judge that it was aimed principally at their elders. It is a collection of tales elaborated from Dartmoor legends, and shows some imagination and poetic feeling. The book is handsome and well illustrated by Charles Eldred and P. B. Hickling.

Messrs. Nelson publish a little series of shilling books rather like the Cassell ones. Such are Cradles, by Alice Knight, and The Overtons, by Elsie Orr—both charming little books, with very superior pictures for the money. A Little Ray of Sunshine, by Jennie Chappell, belongs to the series also—a rather pathetic little story, with a blind baby in it.

Then we have three slightly more expensive books, in Ivy and Oak, and Other Stories for Girls, by Dorothea Townshend, S. Gaye, and R. Macdonald (Nelson, 2s.). The stories are of unequal merit, but none are bad, and the same may be said of A Terrible Feud, and Other Stories, by E. Velvin and E. Haverfield (2s.). A Toast Fag, by Harold Avery (1s. 6d.), is for rather older children. All the tales in it are fairly interesting.

Last but one comes a little book in the Green Nursery Series, called Our Holiday in London, by Ellen Velvin (Sunday School Union, 1s.), describing "the sights" as some children saw them. And last of all there is a tiny, thin book by J. R. Miller, D.D., called The Path of Promise (Sunday School Union, 6d.). It is chiefly about the duty of children to their parents. Unfortunately, at Christmas time, children are exclusively occupied with their parents' duty to them! Still, the little book will do good if it gets a hearing.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The newly-elected councillors for Marylebone had a motion before them on the 6th of this month for the adoption of the Public Libraries Acts. When the subject came up, one of those who originally supported the adoption moved the adjournment of the debate, and, with the opposition only too ready to agree, the proposal was shelved. This is the more to be regretted since there was present at the time an absolute majority in favour. It is rumoured that a difference of opinion as to the expediency of the resolution at the moment led to this fiasco. Nothing can be gained by such vacillation, and although it may not have been altogether wise so soon to raise the question, once set in motion the subject should have been upheld with all the strength which the supporters could command. Opposition in Marylebone has been too strong and too unscrupulous for the friends of the library to hesitate at any time in pressing its claims.

Mr. James MacIvor, the librarian of the Honourable Society of King's Inns, Dublin, who died on the 7th inst., might have made an important place for himself in the legal world had not a studious and retiring disposition led him to seek the seclusion of the Inns of Court Library. As a scholar he won honours in such diverse subjects as Arabic and Civil Law. He was a gold medallist in Ethics of Trinity College, and he practised at the Irish Bar for several years with considerable success. The library world has lost a man of learning as well as a man of letters—no common combination.

Mr. Guthrie Vine, assistant librarian in the National Library of Ireland, has been appointed sub-librarian of the John Rylands Library at Manchester, where Mr. Walter Rye, one of the assistant librarians to the Earl of Crawford, becomes senior assistant librarian. We note also that Mr. T. A. Onions has been appointed librarian to the Institute of Chartered Accountants in succession to Mr. Edward Taylor, who died in October last, and that Miss E. J. Southall has been elected as librarian of the Dudley Free Library, where for some years past she assisted her father, the late Mr. William Southall.

What could be done in Norfolk did each village adopt the Acts and combine the several incomes? In an article on "Village Libraries" the librarian of King's Lynn answers the question in the Eastern Daily Press. It is estimated that the combined funds would provide a revenue of more than £5,000 for the working of the branch delivery stations which would be required. The one difficulty is that of forming the library authority. Neither parish nor county councils would prove satisfactory; the former would be too various, and the other too much engaged with other duties. If, however, the several parochial authorities could evolve a central administration from among themselves the problem would be in train for solution.

Reports have reached us from the Manchester Public Libraries, the Sandeman Public Library, Perth, and the Pratt Institute, Brooklyn. At Manchester the valuable musical library presented by Dr. Watson, to which we alluded at the time, has been augmented by other gifts, including upwards of 500 volumes from Dr. C. J. Hall. At Perth there has been a decrease in the lending issues, but a larger use has been made of the reference department, to which 400 volumes of local literature have been added. Miss Plummer, director of the Pratt Institute Free Library, attributes a decrease in circulation of books to the growing appreciation of the Brooklyn Public Library and its branches. The reference library is becoming more popular, but the publication of a monthly bulletin, which continued for some time more or less satisfactorily, has now ceased. Much space is given to an account of the work for children.

John Critchley Prince, "A Wigan Poet," is the subject of an interesting article in the Quarterly Record of the Wigan Public Library. The most striking feature in this Record, as it is in the journal of the Bootle Free Library, Museum, and Technical School, is the careful account of the literary and historical records of the respective towns.

The library movement has reached Orotava, Teneriffe, who we comes an appeal from the English colony for funds to establish a library. The colony is not large, and in spite of liberal subscriptions there is need for further contributions. All who are interested in the island are asked to give some small assistance.

Correspondence.

INTERVIEWING.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the second paragraph of "Notes of the Day" in the current number of Literature, you wonder what is the Greek equivalent for "interviewer." I regret to say that the present journalese equivalent is the somewhat barbaric ἐντερβουβιεύτωρ.

I am, &c., S. E.

PROFESSOR RALEIGH'S "MILTON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your reviewer, in his article on Professor Raleigh's "Milton," comments severely (and more than once) on the affectation and unintelligibleness of the phrase "cycles ferried his cradle"—employed by the author in a certain passage where he has observed that the great works of Milton were the product of the history and literatures of the world. Had Professor Raleigh used the word "cycles" in its most modern sense (that is to say, as equivalent to "bicycles") his language would have been inexcusable; but he did not. The expression is not his at all, but is an adapted quotation from perhaps the best known of Walt Whitman's poems, the "Song of Myself" (section 44). A quotation of the same kind occurs in the passage at the end of the book, cited with high approval by your reviewer, which closes with the words "poems whose beauty, like the world's unwithered countenance, is bright as at the day of their creation." The source is in this case even less recondite, and perhaps the critic may like to amuse himself by tracing it. These literary allusions—for they are not strictly quotations—are a subtle kind of compliment from the writer to the reader, and their occasional occurrence in Professor Raleigh's writings gives, I venture to think, an additional charm to his style.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

December 16. CHARLES STRACHEY.

LORD ROSEBERY'S "NAPOLEON."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I think Mr. Warren's letter needs no reply, since we each view the prism of history from our own angle, but with the spectrum emanating originally from the white light of truth.

Mr. Seton, on the other hand, is one of the type of critics, recently denounced by Mr. Birrell, who think it their duty to ignore the essential, to magnify the trivial, and to ridicule the incidental. The essential fact of the Weimar episode is that Napoleon did not make use of conventional diplomacy, that whited-sepulchre sort of gentility which consists in saying Yes and acting No, "most politely, most politely"—as Hildebrand proposed to hang Gama. Napoleon proved, however, in this instance, that "ob die Wolke die Verhülle, Die Sterne bleibt am Himmelszelt"; but his decision was after due deliberation—not to be hurried even at the dictation of a Duchess.

I suppose Mr. Seton will concede that Johnson and Carlyle were gentlemen, albeit certainly as great boors to the fair sex as Napoleon was. With regard to the insinuation that the Countess de Hatzfeld was personally agreeable to the Emperor, we have the special testimony of General Rapp that the poor woman was in no condition to inspire anything but sympathy. The one lady who did try to make herself agreeable to Napoleon by every kind of flattery was Madame de Staël, and her failure was as complete as it was deserved. Even King Arthur sometimes found it necessary to scold a woman. What else can poor men do, especially against those whose pens and tongues speak poniards, and whose every word stabs? Immune from the ungentlemanly tyranny of physical force, a monopoly of rudeness would give to a monstrous regiment of women the attributes of Infernal Omnipotence.

Yours faithfully, H. F. HALL.

Sheffield, December 15, 1900.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Many busy pens are engaged on a retrospect of progress during the nineteenth century. Next week the newspapers will probably have the field to themselves. The Daily News is bringing out a special illustrated number, and the Daily Chronicle has announced a series of articles by well-known writers on "The Mind of the Century." A series of twenty-five volumes has also been announced under the title of "The Nineteenth Century Series." Mr. Oscar Browning deals with "The Wars of the Century," Sir Richard Temple with "India," Mr. G. McCall Theal with "South Africa," and Mr. Percy Thornton with "Continental Rulers."

Having arrived so near to the end of the year it may be worth while to give a list of some of the more important literary works which have been promised for or may reasonably be expected during 1901. The "General History of Modern Times," which Lord Acton is editing for the Cambridge University Press, will probably make an early start, and before the end of next year Mr. Heinemann hopes to bring out the first volume of his large illustrated history of English literature—the kind of work suggested by Professor Dowden in Literature some months ago—written jointly by Dr. Garnett and Mr. Edmund Gosse. The year should be specially rich in biographical works, especially if Mr. Morley's life of Gladstone is ready in time. The memoir of the late Duke of Argyll, by the present Duke; the life of the late Lord Granville, by Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice; and the life of William Black, by Sir Wemyss Reid, are all in hand, while Mr. Graham Balfour is said to have finished his memoir of Robert Louis Stevenson; and if all these are published it should only need Lord Rowton's "Disraeli" to give to biography the leading place in the literary year. Mr. William Archer's "Poets of the Younger Generation" is, moreover, to be published by Mr. John Lane early in the year. Next year should see a start made with Sir Walter Besant's Survey of London, and Messrs. Chatto hope to publish the two completing volumes of Mr. Justin McCarthy's "History of the Four Georges and of William IV.," in which he has been assisted by Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy. The first volume of the reprint of the Hakluyt Voyages may be expected during the next twelve months; another interesting new edition to be published by the Clarendon Press will be the Complete Works of Bishop Berkeley in four volumes, Professor Campbell Fraser having re-cast his edition published in three volumes about thirty years ago, and now out of print.

The proposal to establish a memorial to Professor Max Müller was made on November 30 by the publication in The Times of a letter signed by the Vice-Chancellor and thirteen Heads of Colleges and Professors in the University of Oxford. Assurances of support have been received from the Prince of Wales, Prince Christian, the Crown Prince of Siam, the Gaikwar of Baroda, and many others, and a committee is being formed to further the scheme. The fund to be raised, after providing for some personal memorial, such as a bust, relief, or portrait, is to be handed over to the University of Oxford, and held in trust for the promotion of the study of ancient India. Subscriptions for the "Max Müller Memorial Fund" may be sent to the Old Bank, Oxford, or to Messrs. Barclay and Co., 1, Pall-mall east, London, S.W., or to Messrs. Coutts and Co., 59, Strand, London, W.C., or to the Hon. Treasurer, C. Grant Robertson, Esq., All Souls College, Oxford. Other communications on the subject of the fund should be addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Prof. A. A. Macdonell, All Souls College, Oxford.

The late Miss Margaret Stokes was engaged, at the time of her death, upon a biography of Sir Frederic Burton, R.H.A., late Director of the National Gallery. It is to be hoped that some one equally competent will complete it. During his long connexion with art matters in England, Sir Frederic met everybody worth meeting, and the Irish side of his career is well worthy of record. He was in his youth one of the most distinguished of Irish artists, and after he left Ireland (at the time of the collapse of the national movement of '48) he retained all his interest in Ireland, and especially in all Irish intellectual activities. Readers of Lady Ferguson's life of her husband will remember the fine letters by Burton on Irish affairs which she quotes. At this moment an exhibition of his works, the first ever held, is on view at the National Gallery in Dublin. In this collection there are over one hundred examples of his skill in water-colour, but perhaps the gem of the collection is the fine portrait of George Eliot, lent by the National Gallery, London.

Dr. Parker's attempt to edit a daily paper on religious lines will disappoint those who expected him to fall into the falsehood of extremes. In place of the sporting intelligence there are texts of Scripture and an appeal to Christians of all denominations to pray that gambling may cease; but this is the only startling innovation. The financial column contains, as usual, advice relating to investments hardly less speculative than the investment which consists in backing the favourite. In the number before us an appeal to a Missionary Society to decline a generous bequest from a brewer is, perhaps, more characteristic, though it might have been supplemented by some suggestion as to the way in which the editor thinks brewers can dispose of their fortunes more profitably. For the rest, the number contains some interesting articles on social subjects, together with the practical proposal that there should be "a constable standing in the shadow of every street lamp to pounce upon guilty people and to take them away to be flogged." We are left wondering how many constables would be needed to carry out this plan in its entirety.

For two years M. Ernest Lavisse, Professor of History at the Sorbonne, has been supervising the preparation of an immense work to be entitled "Histoire de France depuis les origine jusqu'a la Revolution," written by himself and other eminent French historians. Since Henri Martin and Michelet, much has been accomplished in historical studies in France, and the time has arrived for a work embodying the fruits of the investigations of the last 50 years. The vastness of the enterprise must have deterred any less experienced writer than M. Lavisse, or any less daring publishers than MM. Hachette et Cie. There are to be eight volumes of 800 pages each, at 12f. per volume. The work will be published in parts at 1f. 50c. per part. The first section is now ready in very attractive format. This first section, entitled "Independent Gaul and Roman Gaul," is from the pen of M. Bloch, Professor at Lyons and at the Ecole Normale. The general introductions by M. Lavisse and M. Vidal de la Bache are not yet ready. The style is "scientific," there being no "fine writing," but an obvious effort to state the facts with historical precaution, in the spirit of the little treatise of MM. Seignobos and Langlois (the latter is associated with M. Lavisse in the work), called "An Introduction to Historical Studies," which we spoke of some time ago.

We published an obituary notice in Literature last October of M. Hatzfeld, who was joint author, with M. Darmesteter and M. Thomas, of the new dictionary of the French language. Our remarks called forth a vigorous protest from a philologist who would have no "invidious comparison" instituted between their dictionary and that of Littré. We note, however, that, in the last number of the Revue de Paris, an article by M. Michel Bréal, professor at the Collège de France, and author of "La Semantique," devotes to this invidious comparison some pages of the review. M. Bréal says:—

> The "Dictionnaire Général" does not embrace as much matter as that of Littré. Certain conditions made by the publisher, limiting the historical portion to the sixteenth century, and curtailing the number of examples, have reduced the dimensions of the work. One may regret the fulness, the charm of Littré, some of whose articles one is surprised to find oneself reading from one end to the other as if they were biographies, whereas the new dictionary affects the brevity and dryness of a passport. But each of the two books possesses its special sort of utility.

M. Bréal, it may be said en passant, considers Murray's dictionary as "the best arranged" dictionary that exists, and his great ambition is that the Academy of Inscriptions should undertake a "Dictionnaire Historique" of the French tongue worthy of the name.

Messrs. Pickering and Chatto, of the Haymarket, have just issued the first part of an alphabetical catalogue of about 5,000 old and rare books, the first serious attempt, so it is believed, to produce a catalogue with illustrations reproduced systematically in the text, many of them of the actual size of the originals. It will be completed in ten or a dozen parts, to appear every three weeks. The first part comes down to a first edition of Baker's "Chronicles of the Kings of England," and has for its coloured frontispiece a fine specimen of mosaic binding by Le Monnier ("Agenda des Auteurs," 1755), valued at £12 10s. A fine collection of Americana is included, as well as a long list of books on angling.

Many books deal with the internal details of our public schools. Mr. J. G. Cotton Mitchin, who wrote the volume of "Old Harrow Days" (Methuen), has conceived the idea of dealing with their external influence upon public opinion. His book will be entitled "Our Public Schools and their Place in History." It describes the rise of the eight public schools on which the Public Schools Inquiry Commission of 1861 reported, with special reference to the influence they have exercised upon English history, while brief notices are given of "Old Boys" who have fallen in the South African War. Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein will publish the book early in the new year.

"The Dictionary of Statistics," compiled by Mr. Michael G. Mulhall, who died last week, which reached a fourth edition last year, was not only a valuable work of reference for the politician, but in the world of journalism was much used by the compilers of a certain sort of magazine article recently in favour. Mr. Mulhall was also a journalist, the founder of the first English newspaper published in South America, and a constant writer in the Contemporary Review. He was a member of the Committee of the British Association, and a well-known contributor to "Section F."

The new Italian Review (5, Henrietta-street, W.C., 2s.), to judge by its first number, deserves to live. It is well conceived, well written, and well printed, and touches in an attractive way and in a non-partisan spirit on all sides of Italian life. It has interesting reminiscences of King Humbert and of Baron Francesco de Renzis; a long article on Fogazzaro, and much matter on literature, art, archæology, and social life, which seems to be just what intelligent Englishmen who take an interest in Italy will like to read.

English writers maintain their popularity in America to judge from the arrangements made for next year by the leading American magazines. Mr. Rudyard Kipling's new story of Indian life is to appear in McClure's as well as "The Adventures of a Merry Monarch," by Mr. Robert Barr, and the new "Dolly Dialogues." Mr. George M. Smith's reminiscences and a series of articles by Mr. Andrew Lang and Mr. William Archer are to be published in the Critic. Mr. J. M. Barrie's new story is to appear in Scribner's, and Mr. Gilbert Parker is to figure in Harper's. Among well-known American writers the Atlantic Monthly has secured Miss Mary Johnstone, Miss Sarah Anne Jewett, and Kate Douglas Wiggin; Harper's, Miss Mary E. Wilkins; the Century, Mr. Hamlin Garland; and Lippincott's, Mr. Paul Laurence Dunbar and Miss Amelia E. Barr.

To judge from the second number of the Eastern Counties Magazine, edited by Miss Mary Henniker, the new quarterly promises fair to be an excellent addition to the County Magazines. Folklore, natural history, and old customs all find a place, and Mr. Cunningham Woods, a graduate who a few years ago did much to help the Domestic Society at Oxford, contributes an optimistic article on social life in an East Anglian town. Apropos of the recent elections there are some amusing recollections of the polling at Aldeburgh in 1812.

Mrs. Cornwallis-West's (Lady Randolph Churchill) Anglo-Saxon Review (No. 7) will be published immediately by her from the new offices of the review at 49, Rupert-street, W.

Mr. Robert E. Dell resigned the editorship of the Review of the Week on December 15.

It has been decided to publish the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges from January 1, 1901, at net prices. In many instances the prices have been considerably reduced. A new style of binding has also been adopted for the series, but copies in the original style will be supplied when specially ordered, and the volumes already published will be re-bound in the new style as occasion arises.

Count von Moltke, it is well known, was a voluminous author, and an edition of his works containing no less than eight volumes has been published. A new work of his has, nevertheless, been discovered in the shape of a novel written by the Count when he was a lieutenant of twenty-seven. It is being published serially in Die Weite Welt, and excites interest as a piece of autobiography, as well as for its literary excellence.

Messrs. Funk and Wagnall, of New York, whose "Standard Dictionary" of the English Language has attained such great success, have undertaken the task of publishing an enormous book of reference under the title of the "Jewish Encyclopædia." The work is to be completed in twelve volumes, each being similar in size to a volume of Professor Cheyne's "Encyclopædia Biblica." The list of subjects is, as may be expected, very extensive. Authors, artists, actors, printers, philanthropists, and many other classes of Jewish workers are to be included. Space will also be given to individuals of other races who have in one form or another taken an interest in Jewish affairs. The encyclopædia will be sumptuously illustrated.

The Cambridge University Press has issued several new text-books in anticipation of the Cambridge Local Examinations, and two further volumes will be ready shortly. One is "Robinson Crusoe," Part I., edited, with introduction and notes, by Mr. J. Howard Masterman; the other is Book VII. of Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh's edition of "Cæsar's Gallic War."

Early next month the Clarendon Press will publish a concise French Grammar for upper forms in public schools, by Arthur E. Wall, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, Assistant Master at Marlborough. The book includes phonology, accidence, and syntax, with historical notes, and indicates variations in spelling and syntax permitted by the decree of the French Minister of Public Instruction, issued a few months ago.

The latest addition to "La Bibliothèque des Recherches Sociales" is a translation by Messrs. Alfred Naquet and Georges Mossé of "Dawn of Civilization, or England in the XIXth Century," by Mr. J. C. Spence, the author of "The Conscience of the King" (Sonnenschein).

Messrs. Dent will issue early in January "Rome," by Mr. Norwood Young, with illustrations by Miss Nelly Erichsen, as a volume in the Medieval Town Series.

Mr. Macqueen has removed his offices to 49, Rupert-street, W., from Hastings-house.

THE LATE MR. STEINITZ.—We learn from New York that the plans for the publication of a memorial volume during the coming year have assumed a definite shape. But naturally the co-operation of the chess-playing community is necessary in order that the programme may be carried out. The career of Steinitz, for nearly twenty-eight years champion of the world, was in many ways unique and his personality was striking. He left a wife and two young children, and it is hoped that these may be benefited by the forthcoming volume. Preliminary subscriptions are invited. Correspondent, H. Cassel, P.O. Box, 1,207, New York. Mr. Chas. Devide is the editor. The Manhattan C.C. support the scheme.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

New books of the year are the subject of the article in another column. It does not, of course, include new editions; but we cannot omit a reference to one important new edition just out—viz., a second edition, after ten years, of "The Golden Bough." Possibly Mrs. Ward's picturesque account of the Priest of Aricia in "Eleanor" may have awakened a curiosity in the minds of some who had not read Mr. Frazer's study—so fresh, so elaborate, and written in so fine a style—of the King of the Wood

> The Priest who slew the slayer
> And shall himself be slain.

There has been much work done, especially in Australia, in the elucidation of primitive superstitions, and Mr. Frazer, whose views remain the same—save that he now recognizes a fundamental distinction between magic and religion—has much new evidence to incorporate in his volumes. But we hope to return to them very shortly.

Mr. Jerome, in one of his books, tells us how, in a moment of anxiety about his health, he turned to the study of all the medical books he could lay his hands on. The result was that he became firmly convinced that he had every ailment known to science except "housemaid's knee." Something of the same sort seems to have happened to the writer of "Studies in Recent Fiction," one or two of which we have published. An article on "The Modern Ghost Story" was to have been forthcoming as an engaging and seasonable item at the present moment. A nearer approach to the subject, however, or possibly a study of the new edition of that delightful work "The Alleged Haunting of B— House," seems to have had an unexpected effect upon our contributor. Stealthy footsteps were heard in the corridor; sounds "like the falling of a heavy body" were heard in the room above, which, we need hardly say, has been untenanted for years. The proposed article became impossible, and the result is the following verses, written, it is obvious, under the stress of deep emotion:—

> It is not well to talk with ghosts, whose laughter if a mortal hears
> He learns to know what laughter is, love colder far a thing than tears.
> It is not well to talk with ghosts. Their touch is chill as winter rain,
> But she who feels it on her heart will Love no other touch again.
> It is not well to talk with ghosts; and should one look them in the eyes—
> His own will never weep again, but hold a secret till he dies.
> It is not well to talk with ghosts. If mortal woman's mouth they kiss,
> Their frozen lips shall steal away all hope of heaven, all earthly bliss.

Speaking, last week, of the appearance in the Revue Bleue of Flaubert's unpublished "Mémoires d'un Fou," we mentioned that there was something to be learnt about the early work of Flaubert in Maxime du Camp's "Souvenirs Littéraires." We strongly suspect that the work now printed for the first time is the work referred to, under another title, in the following passage:—

> One evening when we had dined together, I walked home with him. On the doorstep he stopped, seemed to hesitate, and then said brusquely, "Come upstairs. I have something to say to you." As soon as he had reached his room, he drew a manuscript out of a locked box, threw it on the table, and exclaimed, "You will listen to that. Only I beg you to keep my secret. The prevailing condition of our ideas obliges one to hide the literary habit as if it were a disgraceful disease. . . ." The book which I then heard read is Flaubert's first work; it is a romance entitled "Novembre." The theme is simple, and it might pass for an autobiography of the inner life. . . . A man, still very young, has exhausted all sensations in his dreams, his meditations, his reflexions. He has not worked, he has not loved, he has not lived; but by the mere effort of thought he is disgusted with love, disdainful of labour, discouraged with existence.

And so forth. There is a long analysis of the plot and matière of the work which at least warrants our suspicion that it is identical with the "novel" now issued as "Mémoires d'un Fou." The critic's surmises as to the literary influences which had inspired it are also interesting:—

> My emotion was genuine, and Gustave did not misapprehend it. When he had finished reading, he said to me: "What do you think that is like?" With hesitation I answered, "It recalls, to a certain extent, the manner of Théophile Gautier." He rejoined, "You are mistaken. It is like nothing whatever."
> Flaubert was right. I was mistaken. But he was mistaken too. His book was not an imitation; but it had been written under a double influence which it was easy to fix when I heard it a second time. Two writers made an impression on Gustave Flaubert, which is still visible even in his latest stories, Châteaubriand and Edgar Quinet.

As for M. Faguet's insistence, referred to in our note, that Flaubert was a "romantique," this criticism also was antici-noted by Maxime du Camp, and even by Flaubert himself:—

It has been said of Flaubert that he was a realist, a naturalist. People have tried to see in him a sort of surgeon of letters, dissecting passions and making the autopsy of the human heart. He was the first to smile at the suggestion; he was a lyric poet, holding the singular theory that the harmonious word is always the right word. To the harmony of his sentences he sacrificed everything—sometimes even his grammar.

And again:—

Flaubert was a "romantique." Need I say it? He said that he felt his heart beat whenever on the yellow cover of a book he perceived the "g" of the name of Victor Hugo.

The book sales of the season came to an end on the 21st. Messrs. Sotheby had various miscellaneous collections, from which mention should be made of the following fine works and the prices at which they sold:—Forbes' "Cantus," Aberdeen, 1682, £6 10s.; "The Gospels," 1571, printed by John Daye, a presentation copy from Archbishop Parker to John Foxe, £14 5s.; Boswell's "The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides," first edition, Horace Walpole's copy with his MS. notes, £31; Lamb's "Essays of Elia," first editions of both series, £19 5s.; "The Booke of the Common Prayer," 1549, printed by Whitchurch, imperfect, £10 15s.; Boccaccio's "Fiametta," 1472, the first book printed at Padua, £10 15s.; Dante's "Divina Commedia," 1487, the first edition illustrated with woodcuts, £40; "Livy," the rare 1515 edition in French, £11; Clement Marot's "Les Œuvres," Lyons, 1545, £14 10s.; Molière's "Œuvres," 1731, with plates by Boucher, 6 vols., £13 13s.; Audubon and Bachman's "Viviparous Quadrupeds of North America," 1845-46, £20 5s.; Elliott's "The Birds of North America," 1866-69, £7; Boydell's "Shakespeare Gallery," 1803, a splendid copy, £15 15s.; Chippendale's "The Gentleman and Cabinet Maker's Director," 1751, £11 15s.; Owen Jones' "The Alhambra," 1842-45, with plates in colours, £10 15s.; Adrian Poyntz's "New and Singular Patternes and Workes of Linnen," 1591, a good copy of this extremely rare work, £19 10s.; "Military Costumes of Europe," 1822, £23 10s.; Sander's "Reichenbachia," 1888-94, £18; Selon's "The Ancient Art Stone-Ware of the Low Countries and Germany," 1892, £2 1s.; Turner's "Picturesque Views in England and Wales," 1838, large paper, £16 10s.; W. B. Scott's "The Little Masters," 1880, extra illustrated by the insertion of 32 plates, £13; Dürer's "Engraved Works," in 2 vols., a splendid collection, £101; "Tapis D'Orient," Venice, 1892, £30; Clutterbuck's "County of Hertford," 1815-27, £18; Hutchins' "County of Dorset," 1796, &c., second edition, £9; Lipscomb's "County of Buckingham," 1847, large paper, £11 10s.; Ormerod's "County Palatine and City of Chester," 1819, £8 10s.; Shaw's "Staffordshire," 1798-1801, £8 10s.; Hodgson's "Northumberland," 1820-58, £20; Nash's "Mansions of England," 1839-49, £19; Saxton's "Maps of the Counties of England and Wales," 1573-79, £27.

At the close of the century the appropriate literary pastime has been started of making the ten books of the century which have exercised the deepest and widest influence. The Times No two players, not collaborating or consulting, that Matter, are likely to compile identical lists, for no two players are likely to be agreed as to the comparative importance of the movements that have taken place in the course of a hundred years in the different departments of human thought and endeavour. It is a question, at the outset, whether the preference should be given to the books which have had a direct and visible influence upon the course of public events, or to those which have only influenced events indirectly through their influence upon the general trend of abstract speculation. On the former theory the list might well begin with "Uncle Tom's Cabin"—a book which had no influence on speculative thought, and little influence on literary art, but was almost as much a result of the abolition of slavery in America as was the preaching by Peter the Hermit of the first Crusade—and might include such works as Mr. Fitzpatrick's "The Transvaal from Within" and Admiral Mahan's discourses on the importance of sea-power. Most of the lists, however—notably that of Professor Bryce which we have in front of us—are compiled on the theory that the greatest events are those which take place in the intellect; and that, on the whole, is the more profitable and interesting point of view. Looking at the matter from that standpoint one perceives at once that, though in a sense the field of choice is wide, the number of books of which the claims are indisputable is small. The century—more particularly the middle of the century—has seen many movements started by energetic prophets, and supported by devoted disciples; but many of the movements have come to nothing, and few of them have owed to books what the French Revolution, for instance, owed to the "Contrat Social." If the Young England Party had gone on from strength to strength, "Coningsby" would have had a place in every list; but the influence of that party, and therefore of its books, is as extinct as that of the Euphuists. Perhaps there might be more to be said for the claims of Tract Number Ninety. But (and this is the great difficulty in all selections of "influential books") to fasten upon one publication only—whatever influence upon thought Tract Number Ninety may have had—is necessarily often a mechanical method of proceeding. In the case of the Free Trade movement, certainly there is no book on which we can lay our hands and say that it set the movement going, crystallized and symbolized it, and helped it to a successful issue. It was not Ebenezer Elliot, but Cobden, Bright, and Villiers who awakened the public mind upon the subject; and they achieved their purpose not by writing books but by making speeches. In the sphere of political economy, in fact, there is only one book indisputably entitled to a place upon our list. A case might be made out for "Looking Backwards," for "Progress and Poverty," and for Malthus' "Principle of the Law of Population" (though this last book really belongs to the end of the eighteenth century), but the one book for which no special pleading is needed is "Das Kapital." It is the Bible of Socialism. It has been often and effectively criticized, but scientific socialism may reasonably be said to date from its appearance. In another field of thought, the claims of Ruskin cannot be ignored. Of the many preachers of the Gospel of beauty as a thing to seek and insist upon in every-day life, he was the one to whom the world most willingly listened. But again the difficulty recurs: it is not influential men, but influential books that we are after, and to which of Ruskin's books are we to assign the palm? In the domain of pure literature it is still more difficult to choose. "Faust" and "The Excursion" are the selections of Mr. Bryce. We have our doubts about "The Excursion," of which the influence is not very discernible in the most characteristic poetry of the present day. We should be disposed to substitute the "Comédie Humaine" of Balzac. Before Balzac fiction was mere story-telling. With him, and after him, it was, in the case of the greatest exponents of the art, the conscious interpretation and deliberate criticism of life. His name marks an epoch far more surely than does the name of Wordsworth, in literary evolution. But there remains one book which figures, we believe, on every list that has been published, and which, in the region of pure thought at all events, has had more influence than all the other books put together. We refer, of course, to Darwin's "Origin of Species by means of Natural Selection." Here, at least, we have a book which, instantly on its appearance, directed thought into fresh channels into which it has not since ceased to flow. Ostensibly nothing more than a contribution to the science of biology, it immediately influenced every branch of thought and speculation. It revolutionized theology and relegated metaphysics to the background. Psychology, sociology, and ethics all had to reckon with it. It contained, by implication, a whole synthetic system of philosophy. It altered the points of view even of the poet and the novelist. Is there any other book of which it is possible to say so much? Can one say it even of the discoveries of Newton, or of the speculations of Descartes or Kant?

Personal Views.

A certain ill-fated manuscript of Eilert Lövborg treated of the civilizing forces of the future, and his friend Tesman was moved to utter for once something more brilliant than his customary "Fancy that!" "But, good gracious," exclaimed Tesman, "we don't know anything about the future!" "No," replied the gratified author, "but there are several things, though, that can be said about it all the same." To say several things about that of which we know nothing may be the task of several literary critics at the present moment, but there is a danger that the future may play the part of the capricious Hedda, who, with unusual discretion, consigned her friend Lövborg's manuscript to the stove.

Perhaps it is wiser to look around us or to gaze backward than to prophesy. Every age is likely to think itself poorer in literary possessions than is actually the case, for while we can form some estimate of our losses in the recent dead, we have not yet learnt to appraise the literary worth of our babies, nor even of our schoolboys and schoolgirls. In 1795 the author of "Night Thoughts," who had died as a poet many years earlier, was "decently buried," and Johnson's biographer followed his illustrious friend to the grave; next year departed Burns; Macpherson and Burke and Cowper were of the past before the century closed. But the general public of 1795 may not have been greatly impressed by the facts that the assistant of a keeper of livery stables in London—one Keats—had a son born to him, whom he named John, and that in the house of a Scottish mason named Carlyle an infant was then making his first indignant protests and spurnings against human society. In 1800 Cowper, the literary interpreter of the Evangelical revival, passed from earth, but in the same year Pusey entered the world, to be followed in 1801 by one of the first men of the century, John Henry Newman—theology, the science of sciences, leading the way—and yet no long shudder passed through the frame of Evangelical piety. When the new century opened Master Shelley and Master Keble—for, as if an ironical Zeitgeist would demonstrate the truth of Taine's doctrine of the race, the milieu, and the moment, the author of "Queen Mab" and the author of "The Christian Year" were of the same moment—probably occupied themselves in chasing the rolling circle's speed or urging the flying ball.

We cannot in 1900, any more than could our forefathers in 1800, calculate our unrealized assets. But a comparison of the literary output of the present year with that of the last year of the eighteenth century would certainly not be to our disadvantage. Perhaps it is safe to say that no volume noteworthy in the history of science or the history of thought was produced in the year 1800. The most remarkable novel was "Castle Rackrent"; the most remarkable non-dramatic poem, "The Farmer's Boy"; the drama of the year if it was not Joanna Baillie's "De Montfort" was Godwin's "Antonio"; the former ran for eleven nights; the latter underwent sudden and final damnation, a violent cough, as Lamb explains, becoming epidemical in the house. Whereas, in 1900—but I leave the contrast to any reader who is familiar with the hundred best books of the present year.

Without, however, entering on a comparison of the personnel of literature in the opening and at the close of the present century, it is possible to compare the impersonal forces—the leading ideas or tendencies—which were then and which are now operative as impulses or as checks. By the year 1800 the [illegible] stage of the romantic movement had reached its term; the [illegible] scenic effects of Mrs. Radcliffe's novels, the coarse apparatus used to produce wonder or terror by Matthew Gregory Lewis, admitted of no development. It remained now not to perish through its own excesses, it must refine its methods and rationalize itself at least by the presence of archæological truth, as in Coleridge's poem of the Ancient Mariner, or it must seek for unity and strength by connecting itself with the soil and the sentiment of history, as in the poems and novels of Scott. At the same time naturalism or realism, which had been represented by Fielding in prose and by Crabbe in verse, needed to be spiritualized, infused with deeper meanings, and illuminated by "the light that never was, on sea or land." Perhaps not many persons at the close of the century were aware that in the little volume of "Lyrical Ballads," published in 1798, something had already been done to justify romance and to interpret reality in its nobler significance.

No persons of intelligence a hundred years ago could be insensible to the electrical state of the atmosphere caused by the thunder-clouds of Revolution on the continent of Europe. The Anti-Jacobin poets and parodists might ridicule the English contingent to the Revolutionary movement, but such ridicule is a storm-signal, and before long Byron and Shelley came as exponents of the forces of change. Thus the chief foreign influence reached our literature indirectly through political and social passions aroused in France. But there was to a certain extent a direct literary influence from Germany, which coalesced with the political influence; the earlier Schiller—Schiller of "The Robbers"—the earlier Goethe—Goethe of "The Sorrows of Werther"—and, perhaps more than either of these, Kotzebue served as auxiliaries both to the cause of Revolution and the cause of romance.

Shall we say that in our own day the spirit of revolution has been replaced by a spirit which seems so alien to that of the Revolution—the spirit of imperialism? The Napoleonic wars at the opening of the century quickened the national self-consciousness of England, and enhanced the national pride and sense of power. But the England of which Wordsworth thought, in his patriotic sonnets, was an island, ringed by the sea and sublime in its isolation:—

> —from this day forward we shall know
> That in ourselves our safety must be sought.

England was not for Wordsworth's imagination the mother of nations, having children armed to speak with her enemies at the gate. It should be remembered, however, that the democratic sentiment, fostered by the revolutionary movement of a century since, has entered largely into the passions of imperialism. Among our chief makers of empire was the champion of the Reform Bill of 1867, who, in his "Coningsby" and "Sybil," had prophesied of a Tory democracy. The "equality" and "fraternity" of the Revolution have been captured by imperialism, not in the form of metaphysical abstractions, but as genuine emotions, if no more, reaching out not to universal humanity but to all men of the blood at all the bounds of empire, and tending more and more to incarnate themselves in action. The emotion is admirable, and where a fellow-feeling exists, it becomes less difficult to attain to a mutual understanding; but at best such an understanding is difficult, and when the outcries of brotherhood become less loud and the first embraces are over, among the tasks of literature not the least will be to carry messages of true intelligence to and fro between the old sea-wife of Mr. Kipling's poem and her sons "in the new and naked lands."

It is a remarkable phenomenon that in recent years three tendencies, which at first sight seem in conflict each with the others, have played conspicuous parts in literature—cosmopolitanism, imperialism, provincialism. The world-literature of which Goethe dreamed has not been attained, but the relations of each people with neighbouring—and even with distant—peoples have grown more intimate and more complex. In each earlier period a single foreign influence arrived on our shores, and for a time sent its voice through the land—in the early Renaissance the Italian influence, at a later date the influence of Spain, in Restoration and subsequent days the French influence. But now wave follows wave as the winds blow from this quarter or from that. Our novel and drama have been affected for good or for evil by the French novel and drama, and in a scientific age the manifestoes of literary realism or naturalism could not but be accepted as containing all the credenda, until the experiment of le roman expérimental was found not to be completely successful. The Russian novel with its new intellectual and social problems, its feeling for simple and profound emotions, its infinite human pity, both widened and deepened our imaginative sense of life. Scandinavia told us tales of old heroic action, and irritated the grey matter of our brains with modern riddles, not always meant to be solved. Winds from the West have reached us, bearing now a whisper of inscrutable subtleties and now a "barbaric yawp." Nor has the East been silent; deeper messages from the mind of India have come to us across the Anglo-Indian gossip and the Anglo-Indian words of command.

Yet out of this cosmopolitan babel has issued at the country's close not cosmopolitanism but the imperial spirit. In attempting to understand the world, we have suddenly discovered that a great piece of the world is occupied by the new nations of Englishmen, and motives both of interest and affection have made England resolve at length to understand her full-grown sons and to make herself understood by them.

In like manner a wise provincialism need not contain within it any element of separatism. The Scottish kail-yard sells its kail in Covent-garden, and potatoes grown hard by an Irish bog may be transported to the London market. The humour of Thrums is possibly a grave affair in Thrums, but it flashes into laughter and tenderness when it touches a different intelligence. "Wessex" has its rights, and will be understood by Lancashire, and underneath all superficial diversities—dear to the artist, lover of the definite and the concrete—a common humanity binds the North and the South together. Nor, indeed, in what seems least provincial is it difficult to discern the play of cosmopolitan forces. Irish writers protest against the brutal materialism of England, seemingly unaware that they are caught into a stream of reaction against the alleged tyranny of the scientific and industrial movements, that is common to England, to France, and to all cultivated Europe—which reaction so far as it leads to the recognition of truths ignored by science and by industry is wholly warrantable, and so far as it would replace truths by illusions must needs come to nought. If science, together with the great good which it has wrought for our country, has wrought some evil, by excluding from view another order of truths, those wrongs will assuredly not be repaired by pseudo-science. And if the pursuit of material prosperity has blinded men for a time to the true romance, which is founded on reality, not on the false or the effeminate romance which will illumine their eyes. But, indeed, the false romance, fed neither by the wholesome realities of earth nor by the lights of heaven, quickly exhausts itself. The chief danger is this—that a chase after wandering marsh-fires may leave men weary, and only too content to take their ease in some ignoble counterfeit of good sense.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

BOOKS OF THE YEAR.

The shadow of war has lain heavily upon the printing presses, as on almost all other branches of national industry, in 1900. The century which came in with war is going out with it, and we should soon have ample materials for settling the vexed question whether the influence of war on literature is good or bad. The Napoleonic wars were followed by a great era of literary production. Will the present war have a similar stimulating effect? The problem is complicated by the diversion of so much of the national talent for book-making into the other channels supplied by the newspapers and the magazines, which hardly existed in sufficient numbers to afford a safety-valve in the age of Wellington and Wordsworth. At present we certainly cannot see any immediate prospect of such an outburst as was within measurable distance of the observer in 1800. Yet the productions of that period, as to which Professor Dowden says something in another column, did not give much reason to foresee the triumphs of Wordsworth, Byron, Shelley, Keats, and Coleridge in poetry, of Scott and Miss Austen in prose fiction, or of Lamb, Hazlitt, and Coleridge in criticism. So we, too, may be on the verge of literary glory though we do not know it.

It is less easy to go astray in picking out the greatest books of a single year than the greatest books of a century, even when one's point of view is so close that the serried ranks of volumes assume an exaggerated perspective. A year is, it must be granted, too short for any single critic to be able to read all the books that are published in it, and the world may be oblivious of just the one book by which the year will be distinguished in the text-books of the twenty-first century. As far as the works of well-known authors go, one is pretty safe, but the rise of a genius may pass unnoticed in days when the "established favourites" and the busy advertisers—this is sometimes a cross-division—occupy every coign of vantage in the literary market.

The great facts of the year, so far as the production of books is concerned, have, of course, been the war in South Africa and the crisis in China. Their influence is to be seen—directly, in the swarm of books dealing with the war itself and a few with China; and, indirectly, in the prevalence of general books on military subjects, in the multiplication of story books and picture books suited for beguiling the leisure of a people in the grip of anxiety, and in the holding-over of many books of importance for which no fair hearing could be obtained while one topic dominated the rest. Hence the year has been barren—but not wholly barren—in books of importance unconnected with rumours of wars.

There are two tests wherewith to discriminate between the books of a single year, and they are summed up in two questions—"If all the books of the year were in a blaze, which would you try to rescue first?" and "If you were to be shut up on a desert island with a single book which one would you choose?" The answers would, of course, vary considerably, according to taste, and they would not necessarily be the same in both cases. The book that you may think best worth saving for posterity is not necessarily the one you would best like to read yourself. If all the books of the year were burning in the garden, like Miss Hester Grosley's library in "Red Pottage," and it was only possible to rescue one of them, we might make a dash for Mr. Stephen Phillips' "Herod" as showing a real note of original genius. But this is by no means the book of the year with which we should prefer to enter solitary confinement. Brilliant as it may be, it is not quite the sort of thing of which one can honestly say

Nocturna versate manu, versate diurna.

For a good solid book, that will stand re-reading, and is full of stuff fit for slow digestion, we might rather choose Mr. Leslie Stephen's account of "The English Utilitarians," which sums up an episode in the history of philosophy that is highly interesting and full of vital lessons. Another book that might be chosen for the same reason is Mr. Leonard Huxley's life of his father—the personal supplement, so to speak, to the History of the Darwinian philosophy. But what of the Dictionary of National Biography, completed in the year just over? We are inclined to think it might be the best companion one could want in a light-house, if there were room for its sixty-three volumes, or on a desert island in the tropics (where they could lie about on the sands), or in a shooting-lodge during the close season, or in any of those hypothetical situations in which one is supposed to be bereft of every book but one. Mr. Leslie Stephen long ago said it was among the most entertaining works in the English language, and we are much inclined to agree with him. Though the compilers of the Dictionary—that illustrious band who, having completed their toil, took the almost unprecedented step of giving a dinner to their publisher—were compelled to devote to the gods of shipwreck much that they would gladly have included, they mostly succeeded in imparting to their brief lives—the very biltong of biography—that human touch without which all attempts at biography are but destined to become the raw material of the trunk-maker or the envelopes of the butter merchant. It is a work that will form an era in our publishing annals. The munificent daring of its projector, Mr. George Smith, has been appreciated in all journals that care for the real interests of literature, and in considering the literary output of the year the conclusion of this truly national work demands a foremost place.

There are two books that one naturally classes together, to which many would assign the next place in the list. They are both studies of statesmen by statesmen—Mr. John Morley's "Oliver Cromwell" and Lord Rosebery's "Napoleon." Many comparisons have been made between Cromwell and Napoleon; the first of all was contained in the pamphlet which Lucien Bonaparte wrote, or at least inspired, and Napoleon himself took the trouble to revise, when it was desirable to indicate to the French people the possibility that the First Consul might soon be called to a post more worthy both of him and of themselves. Napoleon is more interesting to modern readers than Cromwell, since he is nearer to us in time, and has had a greater influence upon the world in which we live—there is hardly a State or custom in modern Europe not touched at some point by his meteoric career—and he is far better known to us. Lord Rosebery, though he only dealt with "the last phase," managed to give the most coherent study of Napoleon's character yet attempted in English. The study of Napoleon's exile in "wild St. Helen's" is complicated by the voluminous memoirs, criticisms of his own battles and actions, explanations of his career, and what not, which he dictated to Las Cases, Montholon, Gourgaud, and the others. They were not designed for the elucidation of the truth so much as for the edification of the Napoleonic legend and the opening of a way to the French throne for the poor little Duke of Reichstadt, whose tragically ineffective figure M. Rostand has lately recalled to the world. Lord Rosebery steered his way through the ocean of legend with a seamanship creditable to one who is not a professed literary pilot, and his book made some sensation in France for the admission it was thought to make that the British Government had behaved with stupid malignity to their fallen foe. Mr. Morley's book stirred no such burning questions. But it stands, with the work of Mr. Firth and Dr. Gardiner, among the most valuable additions made to the study of Cromwell since a new era in that study was inaugurated by Carlyle. And the publishers of it carried out the excellent new plan—already adopted in the case of Mr. Sidney Lee's life of Shakespeare—of issuing two separate editions—one illustrated from contemporary portraits and prints, and another unadorned for the less wealthy book-buyer.

In looking round one's library to see what additions have been made to the books worth keeping in it, the shelves devoted to biography show many other additions. Mr. Basil Champneys' life of Coventry Patmore may stand in that class of literary biographies which has always been conspicuous in our literature since Johnson wrote his "Lives of the Poets," and Boswell showed the way to Lockhart and Sir George Trevelyan and their numerous successors. Mr. Champneys is rather a Boswell than a Lockhart, but he has given us a creditable picture of a curious personality. Another biography, which every one who had time has read, is Mr. W. H. Wilkins' history of the consort of George I., which he called "The Love of an Uncrowned Queen." Three contributions to the biography of living statesmen stand in a different class, and are only handy for the student of affairs to keep on his shelves at the moment. Mr. Coates edited the speeches of Lord Rosebery, and an author, who remains anonymous, the speeches of Mr. Cecil Rhodes, while Mr. Marris wrote a life of Mr. Chamberlain. Autobiographies have been many, but not so many as in some previous years. Mr. Brodrick's "Memories and Impressions" and the late Mr. Thomas Arnold's "Passages in a Wandering Life" formed an engaging contrast, and were both well worth reading. But perhaps the gem among autobiographies is the Amir Abdurrahman's "Apologia pro Vita Sua," an honest if not wholly trustworthy document which has scarcely a parallel since Baber wrote his memoirs. Beside it one naturally places Colonel Durand's account of the "Making of a Frontier" and Sir Robert Warburton's narrative of his life as Warden of the Khyber. The lives of the two first Premiers of Cape Colony and Natal rank among the most valuable of South African documents. The life of Sir J. C. Molteno, by his son, contained a history of the rise of representative institutions at the Cape, and Sir John Robinson, late Premier of Natal, gave us his own recollections of "A Lifetime in South Africa" with great picturesqueness, adding to them his sane views on the prospect of a settlement. Of books on the origin of the war the great majority are already dead. The reprint of Cloete's lectures on the causes of the "Great Boer Trek" supplements all other sources of information, and Mr. Hobson's book on the causes and effects of the "War in South Africa" is the completest and criticism of Mr. Fitzpatrick's statement of the case of the Uitlanders.

The progress of the war itself has produced an unprecedented swarm of books. For the most exhaustive and complete, and the most likely to serve as a permanent record of the whole campaign, is "The Times History of the War in South Africa," if we may judge from its first volume which appeared about a month ago. Mr. Cunliffe, like the editor of The Times History, Mr. Amery, a Fellow of All Souls, has also published a first volume of a record of the war on a large scale; and Dr. Conan Doyle was first in the field with a dashing, vigorous story of the "Great Boer War," which was carried by much of the qualities of his popular novels, and has sold largely. Captain Mahan followed with a careful and impartial strategical essay. Of other works the general level is high enough to make us proud of our war correspondents, though a few of them have gone a little beyond their calling. As a vivid and trustworthy picture of battle the first place must be given, if only in regret for our loss, to the fragment left by Mr. Steevens. Among other men we should be disposed to give the first place to Mr. Winston Churchill and Mr. Donald Mackenzie. In their books there are at least two passages—Mr. Churchill's description of the first night of his captivity among the Boers, and Mr. Macdonald's account of the Action of Ladysmith—which may bear comparison with the best passages of military writers from Napier and Thiebault to Forbes. After these two should rank Major Pollock's "With Seven Generals in the Boer War." But there are some five-and-twenty other books on the war, and we would not quarrel with any one who likes some of them as well as those we have mentioned.

It is partly a coincidence, partly a consequence, that the year has seen an unusually large number of military and naval works. Mr. Fortescue's "History of the British Army" was brought down to the close of the Seven Years' War in two volumes, for which hardly any critic had anything but praise. The History of the Royal Navy which Mr. Clowes is editing has reached its penultimate volume, and come down to the second American war. Mr. Corbett has completed his account of the Tudor Navy with a volume entitled "The Successors of Drake." Mr. Fortescue's account of our share in the Napoleonic wars, called after Pitt's famous utterance, "How England Saved Europe," is more akin to rhetoric than to history, but his breezy style and power of depicting battle makes it acceptable to the young. China has given rise to a good many books, of which the chief are Mr. Colquhoun's "'Overland' to China" and Miss Scidmore's "China, the Long-Lived Empire"; and so has Egypt, notably Mr. Traill's "England, Egypt, and the Sudan."

In history we find the first volume of Mr. Andrew Lang's authentic history of Scotland, his greatest work of the kind, though it appeared at no distance in date from his equally successful "Prince Charles Edward." A work of learned research on the other division of Great Britain was "The Welsh People" of Professor John Rhys and Mr. Brynmor Jones. The second volume has appeared of Sir William Hunter's "History of British India," and another great history has reached its conclusion—Professor Maspero's "Passing of the Empires." Among smaller books Major Hume's history of modern Spain deserves to be noted. Nor must we omit to mention the appearance of the first volumes of the "Victoria Histories" of the English counties, a laborious enterprise which promises to run far into the new century and to be indispensable "to country gentlemen and others."

As to fiction, with the exception of Mr. Hardy and Mr. Meredith, every well-known novel writer seems to have bestirred himself, or herself, to dispel the cloud of public affairs. Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Eleanor" is, perhaps, the novel of the year, unless it be John Oliver Hobbes' "Robert Orange." In "Tommy and Grizel" Mr. Barrie, who has sometimes seemed capable of great things, hardly showed that he had that little more that makes the difference between talent and genius. Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler ran along her familiar lines with "The Farringdons." Miss Corelli sold more copies of her "Master-Christian" than of any preceding work; and Mr. H. G. Wells returned from his excursions into the marvellous to that every-day life which he before showed that he could handle so well, and "Love and Mr. Lewisham" did not make us regret it. Mr. Conrad's "Lord Jim" has been much praised, though it does not seem to our taste quite to deserve all the superlatives lavished on its long-drawn psychology. Mr. Crockett has turned out three or four long stories, and other novels that made their mark were Mr. Zangwill's "The Mantle of Elijah" and Dr. Barry's "Arden Massiter"—both fine books—Mr. Anthony Hope's "Quisanté," Mrs. Atherton's "Senator North," Mrs. Steel's "Hosts of the Lord," Mr. Hewlett's romantic "Richard Yea-and-Nay," Mr. Egerton Castle's "Marshfield the Observer," Mr. Henry James' "The Soft Side," Miss Fiona Macleod's "The Divine Adventure," Mark Twain's ever-delightful stories, and Mr. Street's witty little book, "The Trials of the Bachelor," a contribution to the almost lost art of social satire. Perhaps the most amusing book of all was Mr. W. W. Jacobs' "Master of Craft." And perhaps the most pathetic, if we are to regard it as fiction, is the much discussed "An English-woman's Love Letters."

Of poetry there is not much to be said. There is a great deal of good verse being written but nothing that claims special notice. Nor is there much to detain us in theology unless it be Archbishop Benson's "Apocalypse." There have been, of course, many books under this head—historical, exegetical, doctrinal, and many of them of merit, but hardly of outstanding merit. As a significant record of thought we might perhaps point to two books of essays representing schools of thought—"Lux Mundi," and "Church and Faith."

In the miscellaneous lot retained in the library either for pleasure or profit are Mr. Harrison's essays, "Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill, &c.," Mr. Saintsbury's learned "History of Criticism, Vol. I," which we reviewed last week, Professor Dowden's "Puritan and Anglican," the very interesting letters of T. E. Brown, whose poems are also issued in a collected edition, and Mr. Kipling's early journalistic work collected in "From Sea to Sea." On another shelf one notes Mr. Henry James' "Little Tour in France," which ought to go with every traveller of taste on his next trip to the Riviera, Arthur Symons' studies of "The Symbolist Movement in Literature," and Mr. Boulton's entertaining book on "The Amusements of Old London." Mr. Lillie's book on "Croquet Up-to-Date" and Mr. Beaumont's treatise on "Modern Motor-Cars" both deal with subjects of keen interest in an adequate fashion. Before the art publications, sumptuous, beautiful, and numerous, the heart of a writer of such a summary as this may well quail. They form, perhaps, the most notable feature in English publishing at the present day. Sir Walter Armstrong has been very busy, and has given us works on Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Turner. Then there is Mr. Cust's "Vandyck" and Lord Ronald Gower's "Sir Thomas Lawrence." The Old Masters have been liberally treated. Messrs. Bell's series of Great Masters has kept at a high level; and a special note should be made of Professor Langton Douglas' "Fra Angelico" from the same publishers. From them, too, has come a work on Rembrandt, and from Mr. Heinemann one on Rubens. Among general books on art Lady Dilke's "French Architects and Sculptors of the Eighteenth Century" and Mr. Prior's "History of Gothic Architecture" perhaps stand out from the rest.

If publishers are busy about art, they are almost equally busy in a smaller way with one or two other subjects which mark the changing tastes of readers—and two such subjects are gardening and birds. But the taste for classics re-set seems to be subject to no changes of fashion; and if all the old books now being reprinted are read, there can be no time left for the new ones. Perhaps it would be well to have a year of jubilee when living authors should cease from troubling, or, at any rate, an annual close time of, say, a month, when nothing should be published but new editions of tried and valued friends, and the public taste could be periodically reinvigorated by draughts from the fountain head.

PUBLISHING IN 1900.

From the trade point of view the principal event of the publishing year has been the introduction and consolidation of the improved net system—the most important work, as Mr. Murray has said, ever undertaken by the Publishers' Association. Whether the change will so improve the financial position of the booksellers as to encourage a better class of men (as we suggested last week) to undertake the work remains to be seen, but there is no doubt that the monster of underselling within the trade itself, which was rapidly tearing the heart out of it, has received a check. It is just a year since the plan came into operation, and the promoters wisely went to work gradually, laying a good foundation instead of striving to carry out any revolutionary measure. The result is that the number of books published at net prices is increasing every month, and it is an encouraging sign that the Associated Booksellers want more of them. The fears of those who anticipated opposition on the part of the public were groundless; the public appears to have accepted the change without a murmur.

In other respects 1900 has not been a year which publishers as a whole will remember with any special gratitude. Of the war and the book trade we have heard more than enough, but the fact remains that the war has handicapped both booksellers and publishers throughout the past twelve months. Still, it has been a better year than 1899; the last four or five months have especially shown a marked improvement. One or two firms even assert that it has been the best autumn season they have had for many years. During the summer the great Exhibition—thousands of Americans passed through London to or from Paris—helped to save the booksellers from the long spell of slackness which usually accompanies the "Silly Season." But it was not only the Americans' taste for English books that relieved the slack season. Publishers are realizing the folly of choking the last few months of the year with the bulk of their books, and, though the autumn will always be the busiest season, the tendency to a more even distribution over the twelve months is strongly marked. The crisis in China has not troubled the trade much; the little boom in books on the Far East was insignificant compared with the South African output; and the general election was too short-lived to produce the ruinous effect which some people predicted for the autumn. South African affairs, however, must exercise an evil influence so long as fighting lasts—and probably for many months afterwards, for the war has still to be paid for.

An irresponsible rumour was circulated during the summer to the effect that the six-shilling novel was going the way of the old three-decker, but 1900 closes with the six-shilling novel in stronger force even than when the year began. Fiction has ruled the market throughout. One well-informed authority has estimated that when the annual reckoning is made more than half the number of books published will prove to be novels. The sixpenny novel, too, has been taken up in earnest again, and Mr. Murray, coming forward more prominently as a publisher of fiction, made a success with the first volume of his dainty series of half-a-crown novels—Mr. Oliver Onion's "Compleat Bachelor." The novel with the biggest sale of the year was, of course, "The Master-Christian," and it still seems to head the list. There were not many noticeably successful novels during the spring, "The Farringdons" having, perhaps, the largest circulation of the season. Messrs. Longmans, however, did well with "Savrola," "Parson Kelly," and "Yeoman Fleetwood," as did Mr. Fisher Unwin with "Waters of Edera" and "Arden Massiter"; Messrs. Methuen with "Mirry-Ann," "The Plunderers," and "An Octave"; Mr. Heinemann with "Folly Corner"; Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton with "Feo"; and Messrs. Pearson with "Nell Gwynn."

In the autumn came a flood of fiction from well-known writers, and there seems to have been a good demand for most of their books, to judge from the list of autumn novels which have gone into new editions—a list which includes "Quisanté," "Master of Craft," "The Fourth Generation," "The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg," "Tongues of Conscience," "The Isle of Unrest," "Eleanor," "The Brass Bottle," "The Conscience of Coralie," "Tommy and Grizel," "Old Fires and Profitable Ghosts," "Sons of the Morning," "The Gateless Barrier," "The Lane that had no Turning," "The Realization of Justus Moran," "Men of Marlowe's," and "Rue with a Difference." The book of the moment appears to be "An Englishwoman's Love Letters," which Mr. Murray cannot get printed fast enough to meet the demand.

In other departments the most profitable book has been Lord Rosebery's "Napoleon," the publisher (Humphreys) disposing of the first edition of 10,000 copies almost at once. This, together with Mr. Morley's "Cromwell" and "The Life and Letters of Thomas Huxley" (both published by Macmillan), as well as "The Life of Abdur Rahman" (Murray) and the Life of Mr. Chamberlain published by Hutchinson, made the demand for biographies one of the features of the season. M. De Maulde la Clavière's "Women of the Renaissance" and Clara Tschudi's "Life of the Empress Augusta" (both published by Sonnenschein) were also successful, while the volumes on Cromwell and Richelieu in the "Heroes of the Nations Series" were two of the best selling books of the year so far as Messrs. Putnam were concerned. The "Famous Homes of Great Britain" and the two Christmas volumes of Dickens, from the same publishers, were also in much demand. Among more recent successes have been Mr. Stephen Phillips' "Herod" (Lane)—already in a second edition—and Professor Dowden's "Puritan and Anglican; Studies in Literature" (Kegan Paul). Art books have had a good season, and Christmas books have done fairly well. The South African market has been overdone, but the excellent sales of a few of the war books have been some compensation for the failures.

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

At the beginning of a new century there is no more enjoyable pastime than that of inquiring what the world was like at the beginning of the previous century; and the best way to indulge this innocent curiosity is to get an Annual Register for 1801 and open it at random. We note, to start with, that the year in which we are resolved to take an intelligent interest was the year in which Nelson bombarded Copenhagen, and Sir Ralph Abercromby defeated the French at Alexandria. In investigations of this sort, however, trivial incidents are more illuminating than great events; and the mode in which they are presented by the contemporary chronicler mirrors pleasingly the social conditions of their age. Confining our attention to these, we find our forefathers engaged in many of the same pursuits as ourselves, but following them in a weird fashion of their own. They had their labour difficulties, for instance, much as we have, and they seem to have settled the question of compulsory arbitration on lines recommended by our own advanced economists:—

> The case of the journeymen taylors, who have stood out so long for an increase of their wages, from 25s. to 30s. a week, came on to be heard before Alderman Brook Watson (ex locum tenens for the Lord Mayor), the Recorder, Sir John William Anderson, and three other aldermen. The court having consulted for some time, the Recorder proceeded to give judgment. He then ordered that the journeymen should be allowed 27s. a week; which is a rise of 2s.; and double that sum, or 54s. in case of a general mourning.

To our interest in the development of the motor car corresponded our forefathers' interest in the development of the steam engine. On July 1, 1801,

> An experiment took place on the river Thames, for the purpose of working a barge, or any other heavy craft, against tide, by means of a steam engine on a very simple construction. The moment the engine was set to work, the barge was brought about, answering her helm quickly, and she made way against a strong current, at the rate of two miles and a half an hour.

This was only one of the many mechanical inventions of the year. The list of patents granted covers about eight pages, and includes no fewer than three patents for perpetual motion—one of them obtained by a Professor of Philosophy, whose address is Newington Butts—and one patent for "new invented improvements in the construction of barrel-organs, to prevent them from getting out of order."

Thus did our forefathers labour, after their fashion, with their hands and brains. They also laboured with their pens, though not quite as we do to-day. Their output certainly was less considerable. Nowadays, every year sees the publication of about 2,000 novels, with other books in proportion. But

> The total number of all the new publications, published in London, during the year 1800 was 693. The cost, estimated in boards, amounted to £230 5s.

A select number of the books are reviewed in the Annual Register. It is interesting to find that one of them is "An Account of Travels into the Interior of Southern Africa." We have been flooded with such books during the past twelve months, so that the backwardness of South Africa at the period in question is the more striking. This is the author's description of Graaff Reynet, close to Cape Town—now so civilized—in 1791:—

> The village is chiefly inhabited by [illegible] and such as hold some petty employment under the land rent. Its appearance is more miserable than that of the poorest village in England. The necessaries of life are with difficulty procured in it. No milk, no butter, no cheese, no vegetables of any kind are to be had upon any terms. There is no butcher, no chandler, no grocer, no baker. Every one must provide for himself as well as he can. They have neither wine nor beer; and the chief beverage of the inhabitants is the water of the Sunday river, which, in the summer season, is strongly impregnated with salt.

To turn to another topic; poetry has long since ceased to have matters of the Annual Register, but it was a great feature in the year 1801. And, of course, the Poet Laureate—one Pye, whose lyrics described as "eminently respectable in everything but his poetry"—was to the front. He contributed two odes, one for the New Year and one for his Majesty's birthday. They are "pre-Wordsworthian" in the highest sense; and possibly in these days, so do literary fashions vary, they would have found a resting-place, according to modern custom, in the advertisement columns of the morning papers. Yet his contributions may be taken as proving that a poor poet may be an admirable citizen:—

When thunders roar, when lightnings fly,
When howling tempests shake the sky;
'Tis more endeared the sheltering dome,
More sweet the social joys of home;
Fondly her eye lo! Albion throws
On the tried partner of her weal and woes.
Each tie to closer union draws
By mingled rights and mingled laws;
Then turns averse from Gallia's guilty field,
And tears with generous pride the lillies from her shield.

Albion and Erin's kindred race
Long as your sister isles the seas embrace;
Long as the circling tides your shores that lave,
Waft your united banners o'er the wave;
Wide through the deep commercial wealth to spread,
Or hurl destruction on th' oppressor's head!
May heaven on each unconquered nation shower
Eternal concord, and increasing power;
And as in history's awful page
Immortal Virtue shall proclaim
To every clime through every age
Imperial George's patriot fame,
That Parent care shall win her warmest smiles,
Which rear'd 'mid Ocean's reign the Emperor of the Isles.

It will be admitted that magazine poetry has not perceptibly deteriorated during the century that has elapsed since this was written. In the same period some other arts have improved—among them the art of writing a letter to an editor. Nowadays our correspondents flatter our proper pride by referring to our "valuable space," and our "influential columns." Far different was the tone in which Lord Camelford addressed "the printer of a morning paper" one hundred years ago:—

Mr. Editor, it is with much reluctance that I feel myself called upon to convey sentiments to the public through the medium of a newspaper; but since the subject on which I wish to explain myself is not of a nature to be brought forward in a more appropriate place, I must hope for the indulgence of the public to believe that it is not without a considerable sacrifice of my own private feelings that I have at length yielded to what I conceive to be a public duty.

It is recorded that Mr. Whittier has sometimes invited editors to print personal communications of a somewhat similar tone; but it does not appear that the editors did not avail themselves of the invitation, though Mr. Whittier is something of a classical heroine in such matters; and, on the whole, the Press has improved in politeness enormously since Lord Camelford thought it necessary to express his contempt for newspapers in the very act of availing himself of their convenient opportunities of publicity.

THE DRAMA.

"THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR."

The efforts of Mr. F. R. Benson to make Shakespeare "human among the folly" in the playhouse, instead of an occasional guest there on Ash days and holy days, deserve cordial recognition. He has again opened a Shakespearian season, this time at the Grand Theatre, where his performances are to alternate through the winter with the German plays, and he makes an excellent start with The Merry Wives of Windsor. The most English of Shakespeare's comedies—which is no comedy but a farce-extravaganza—is too rarely seen on the modern stage, for, despite its cardinal defect in showing us a belittled and diluted Falstaff, it abounds in good-humoured fun, in the harmless riot of animal spirits, in delightful little caricatures of the Elizabethan burgesses and housewives whom Shakespeare knew, as the French say, "like his pocket." The Falstaff, I repeat, is a bitter pill to swallow—our genial philosopher, our virtuoso in the art of living, our mellow humorist, our great Rabelaisian stage-figure, degraded to a mere buffoon. Unfortunately, Mr. G. R. Weir makes bad worse. He is that incredible paradox, that contradiction in terms, a desiccated Falstaff. The very way in which he handles the flagon shows that he is no toper! He chuckles when he should roar, has a port that is rather feline than elephantine—in a word, is a dull Falstaff. But remembering his excellent Fluellen, his admirable First Gravedigger, I forgive him and wish him a more suitable part next time. There is nothing dull or tame about the rest of the company. They are full of pranks, of what Lamb called "the grand grotesque of farce." The mad caperings and caracoling of Mr. Benson as Dr. Caius and Mr. Nicholson as Sir Hugh must be seen to be believed, while the Slender of Mr. Lyall Swete is an amazing piece of fantasy. The merry wives, too, at once matrons and minxes, are played with the keenest sense of fun by Mrs. Benson and Miss Elsie Chester. For smug humour there is the Mrs. Quickly of Miss Alice Denvil, and for fresh English beauty the Anne Page of Miss Lillian Braithwaite. The jealous Ford of Mr. Frank Rodney is capital, and even the minor characters, servitors and pages, are competently filled, the Simple of Mr. Quartermaine being particularly good. We all know the reason for this general excellence. Mr. Benson's is a stock-company of the old-fashioned kind, with all the merits of that kind, the harmony, the esprit de corps, the conscientious observance of trifles. And the plain truth is that Mr. Benson is doing as valuable work as any one now on the stage, the popularization of Shakespeare as an acted dramatist, the task of bringing him home to "men's business and bosoms." Our great need is to cease to regard Shakespeare as a classic only to be approached with bated breath and whispering humbleness (not to mention extravagant mounting and "star" performers); our need is to recognize in him a live, work-a-day, practical dramatist. Mr. Benson is helping us to do that, and we must all wish him every success.

Reviews.

LONDON GOSSIP.

There is little that is new to be said about Old London, and every new book upon the subject must be drawn from the same old sources. And yet it is a subject, so fascinating and so near to all of us, that it can be written about and read about over and over again with delight. There is never a year which does not produce a fresh batch of literature upon the subject, segments of which seem likely to form the theme of magazine articles until the end of time. Mr. Heckethorn's book of LONDON MEMORIES (Chatto, 6s.), a companion volume to his "London Souvenirs" published last year, has probably already seen the light elsewhere. Its disconnected chapters on such themes as "Horrors of Old London Executions," "Queer London Street-names," and "Savage Old London" smack of the airy pages of the magazines; so does the absence of dates in the text, and the author's way of slipping from the past to the present, and back again to the far past with a thoroughly metaphysical disregard for time. But, nevertheless, he has given us a pleasant, chatty, garrulous book, which will supply the reader, hitherto unacquainted with the subject, with all kinds of loose ends of information, and will leave him with a sense of having read to some purpose, even although he may never be able to knit up those loose ends into a useful, connected whole.

Mr. Boulton's two handsome volumes on THE AMUSEMENTS OF OLD LONDON (Nimmo, 30s. n.) may be read with equal amusement and more profit, for the work is limited to a survey of the amusements of Londoners during the period between the Restoration of King Charles II. and the accession of Queen Victoria, and the author sticks steadily to the matter in hand. Those persons who delight in speaking of "the good old times" may learn from Mr. Boulton that those present times, bad as they may be in many ways, are yet infinitely better than the times which they regret; and if the standard of a people is to be gauged from its amusements, just as the standard of an individual is to be gauged from the causes which excite his laughter, then we have made extraordinary progress in the last hundred, indeed, in the last fifty years.

Even the brutal horseplay of the "Hooligans" pales before the brutality of the patrons of Hockley-in-the-Hole, of the Cockpit, and of the insanely cruel sport of duck-hunting which was carried on in the early years of the nineteenth century in St. James's-park, and from which, according to Mr. Boulton, modern pigeon-shooting is derived. The ducking-pond was boarded in to the height of the spectators' knees, and a pinioned duck was then put into the water to be hunted by a spaniel, or spaniels, to death. "It escaped so long as it was able by diving." Sometimes it was tormented in a different manner by having an owl tied upon its back, when it would dive to escape from the burden, and on rising, the miserable owl, half-drowned, shaking itself and hooting, would frighten the duck, which, of course, dived again, and the sport generally concluded with the death of both victims. Pigeon-shooting is bad enough, but it is not quite so insensate as this. But the joys of one generation are seen in their true nature to be mere follies by the next. Take, for instance, those of bell-pulling and knocker-wrenching, which, if we are not mistaken, were still considered to be witty and gentlemanly diversions even in the fifties. A young man would adorn his rooms in those dark days with a score of knockers wrenched from inoffensive doors on his nocturnal ramblings, just as he now adorns them with photographs of actresses; and to tie two knockers together by a piece of string across a quiet street, and then from some hiding-place to watch the mystification and growing anger of two maid-servants, each of whom as she closed her own door inflicted a smart rap on the door of her vis-à-vis, was an achievement which he would mention to his friends with the same modest pride that he now mentions the number of miles he has bicycled on a Saturday afternoon. Certainly the amusements of London become year by year more intelligent, more humane, and more beneficial to the nation's health. We could wish that the pleasant old tea-gardens had not, owing to the ever-increasing size of London, been swept away; the modern teashop, noisy and stuffy, is a poor substitute. Mr. Boulton gives a pretty account of the Marylebone-gardens on the present site of Harley-street, of the New Tunbridge-wells at Islington, of Bagnigge-wells at Clerkenwell, and of the Mulberry-gardens where Buckingham Palace now stands.

In the chapter on The Masked Assembly, that favourite amusement of the upper classes, we get glimpses of such notorieties as Mrs. Cornelys, a most disreputable, yet in the end somewhat pitiable, figure, and of the much-married Miss Chudleigh. But Mr. Boulton has not got the latter's story quite correct. At the Jubilee Ball in 1749 he speaks of her as masquerading as Miss Chudleigh and maid of honour to the Princess of Wales when all the time she was Countess of Bristol and mother of a son. He goes on to say that "old Tiger Thurlow ordered her to be burnt on the hand for masquerading as Duchess of Kingston." Now her first husband, Captain Hervey, was not Earl of Bristol in 1749, and Mr. Thurlow, who was merely counsel for the prosecution when she was tried for bigamy with the Duke of Kingston in 1776, had no power to make any order respecting her. After the verdict of "Guilty," he humorously argued that she was liable to be either hanged or branded on the hand with a hot iron, knowing well that such a penalty could not be enforced, every peer in those days enjoying the benefit of a First Offender's Act. "Old Tiger Thurlow," by the-by, was only forty-four at the time of the trial, while the Duchess herself was over fifty.

Mr. Boulton's volumes are well bound and well printed, and have some charming illustrations, from contemporary sources all coloured by hand. They should serve as a valuable and interesting gift-book.

GARDENING.

SYLVANA'S LETTERS TO AN UNKNOWN FRIEND, by E. V. B. (Macmillan & Co. 6d. n.), is, as its name denotes, written in the form of letters, to an American lady whom the writer has never seen and to whom she gave the fanciful name of Amaryllis, beginning, in happy ignorance of Virgil and Milton, that it was her own invention. Letter-writing has several advantages over other forms of literary composition. Your sentences can lack finish—and even beginning—your information need not be accurate, and you may pop about as your pleasure, without any regard for order or coherence. You need not know any Latin—indeed it is better to profess ignorance of the language, and then such words as flos, corallu, and papaver will come as a pleasant surprise, while your more scientific readers will have to take such harmless eccentricities as Gorreya, Trelius, and Gesneria, and be thankful it is no worse. Add a spice of the intimacy which made "Elizabeth and her German Garden" so delightful and the dish can be served lukewarm.

From this point of view, Sylvana's letters are completely successful, and she has put in some very charming photographs. An enthusiastic lover of flowers, birds, and animals is always a pleasant companion, and one little incident she describes might have been worked up by Mayne Reid or Rider Haggard into something very gruesome.

> It was on this very pathway that one of the keepers had a strange experience. He was met by an army of weasels on the march. The man could not pass, as the vast numbers of them blocked the way, so he threw down his plaid in the midst. The weasels fell to so fiercely on the plaid, tearing it to pieces, that for fear of his life should they attack him he turned aside and ran. Another keeper told me exactly the same thing; that once when he met them in a narrow path he had to flee, jumping down the bank and plunging into the river. . . . The young weasels are such playsome little beings, with no fear of man. Alas! this early fearlessness too soon ages into ferocity.

To judge from this book and others now before us, "Go for the pictures rather than the matter" seems to be the maxim on which most gardening books are nowadays produced. What interest THE CHRONICLE OF A CORNISH GARDEN, by Harry Roberts (John Lane, 5s. n.), possesses is almost wholly due to the exquisite taste with which it is printed and bound, and to some charming illustrations "of an ideal garden by F. L. B. Griggs." The tide of writing about gardens must be high, indeed, if it carries such books to the level of a popular success. Pretty prattle about the most ordinary features of the most ordinary rustic garden, such as might be penned by the young daughter of any country vicar, is mingled therein with such practical information as to horticulture as could easily be compiled in a few hours from standard works by a writer whose whole life had been passed in London. Even seven children of tender years hardly need such information as that "a beautiful rose no matter how it has been produced is a beautiful object."

Another book is HOW THE GARDEN GREW (Longmans, 3s. n.), by "Maud Maryon." There are five subjects which the fiction writer does not take upon himself to expound. We have lately had an economic treatise wrapped in that guise, and it only remains to revive the "lover of the triangles" in a novel expounding the principles of pure mathematics. Gardening is, perhaps, as pretty a subject as any to choose for romantic treatment and that is the idea of "Maud Maryon," whose book belongs to that class for whose existence "Elizabeth" has incurred a rather serious responsibility. The story suffers from the gardening and the gardening from the story; and we should hesitate to recommend the book to an advanced horticulturist. But it is a pretty book to run through, and many country folk, we dare say, will like to read how the heroine turned her hand to making the flowers grow in her father's garden and ended by marrying the curate. Anyhow, Mr. Gordon Browne's capital illustrations, of which we reproduce one, add immense attraction to the book.

Much more instructive is 'Twixt Town and Country, by Rose White (Harpers, 6s.)—a book that all owners of gardens in or near London should be glad to possess. It is full of good hints on the management of the suburban patch, and, in addition, is written pleasantly and with a literary grace of its own. Even in the midst of London—witness the garden of the Bank of England, of which a photograph appears here as frontispiece—much more can be done than many imagine; and this pleasant book will no doubt incite many to attempt something more than the patch of grass surrounded by a gravel path that too often does duty for a London garden.

Still more scientific and having nothing in common with all these feline prettinesses with which the English garden is trying to rival the German is A Handy Book of Horticulture, by F. C. Hayes (John Murray, 3s. 6d.)—a good elementary guide for amateurs; many gardeners would gain by a study of the chapter on fruit-growing.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The War.

Major A. W. A. Pollock, the author of With Seven Generals in the Boer War (Skeffington, 6s.), was one of the representatives of The Times. He seems to write with a better knowledge of his subject than most of the correspondents, and he is seldom at any pains to hide his opinion of the strategy and tactics of general officers. His most interesting chapters relate to the operations which culminated in the disaster of Stormberg, where he considers that "the only marvel is that the force escaped annihilation"—a fate from which it was only saved by the bad shooting of the Boers, and their neglect to follow up the advantage they had gained. He adds that > Something in the climate of South Africa has clearly produced an epidemic of mental aberration amongst our superior officers. Africa is proverbially the grave of military reputations, and with these sink also the bodies of brave officers and men. We have beaten the Boers in the end, but by sheer weight of numbers, not by the superior skill and efficiency that should have given the advantage to an army composed chiefly of highly-trained Regular troops.

The inefficiency of our officers and men as horse masters is another theme on which Major Pollock has a good deal that is vigorous to say; and he does not mince matters in speaking of Lord Kitchener's frontal attack at Paardeberg:—

> Let it be granted that for some reason, which has never been satisfactorily explained, an attack was necessary—yet even this does not excuse its being badly organized and directed. The lives of the gallant Colonel Hannay, and very many others, seem to have been simply thrown away.

Major Pollock does not aim at being graphic; and he is rather too fond of describing at great length and in technical language the points of a horse. But he has written a thoroughly sound and informing book.

One Thousand Miles with the C.I.V., by J. Barclay Lloyd (Methuen, 6s.), may be dismissed briefly as a war book which will be welcome to those who wish to gratify a specific curiosity, but will hardly interest those whose interest in the war is of a more general character.

Literary Causeries.

Conferences on Books and Men (Smith, Elder, 6s.), is a set of causeries reprinted from Cornhill, where many readers looked out for and welcomed them. We have often referred to and quoted them. Now that they come up for judgment it is not very easy to decide by what standard to judge them. Proceeding by negatives one may say that they do not prove things to the same extent as the causeries of the late Mr. J. F. Nisbet, and hardly amuse to the same extent as the causeries of Mr. Andrew Lang. Still they are both instructive and amusing, and they are better tempered than the causeries of Mr. W. E. Henley. The author starts upon any subject; it suggests another and he pursues it; he is reminded of some verse or prose that bears upon the subject, and he copies out a good deal of it. In one causerie alone we compute that the quotations amount to about 3,000 words—perhaps an excessive use of an excellent literary labour-saving appliance. Yet the causeur has hundreds of good things of his own to say, and many quite new good stories. Sometimes his manner is a little academic—and occasionally his matter errs in that direction too, as though the causeur does not always seem to recognize the difference between the University and the universe. The causeries should not be read at a sitting. The reader may now and then be inclined to turn from their anecdotes of College "gaudies" even to the accounts of Gargantuan meals partaken of at Eastbourne and Southend by another causeur whose compositions we sometimes read indolently on Sunday mornings. But this Oxonian flavour ensures one merit which would, were it necessary, atone for the absence of many others—viz., that the causeur of the "Conferences" is a scholar, and all his pages breathe the fine flavour of scholarship—a quality rare among the causeurs of to-day.

In view of the events of next week there is much to be said for investing a modest sixpence in the third volume of the "Bijou Biographies" (Drane) on Lord Roberts of Kandahar and Waterford, by Ernest Russell, a very readable little life which will remind the public how much greater things in his life Lord Roberts has done than the successful tackling of Cronje. Two other of these booklets (which will just fit into the waistcoat pocket) may be equally commended—viz., Mr. W. F. Aitken's Lord Kitchener of Khartoum and Mr. A. Wallace's Joseph Chamberlain.

We regret that the invaluable "Whitaker's Almanack," which first showed how complete an annual could be, did not arrive in time for inclusion among our "Annuals" last week. "Whitaker" gained a place at once, from which nothing subsequently published has really dislodged it, and it is the interest of the public to keep it going on the road to perfection. We, for our part, should like to see in it lists of Q.C.'s, of Fellows of the Royal Society, and a much fuller list of periodicals. Also among lady novelists we should like to see some names besides those of Miss Braddon and Miss Corelli; and surely the Poet Laureate might be included among "prominent poets"? Among good new features are a summary of the history of the Dutch colonies and a treatise on voters' qualifications. On the whole, our respect for "Whitaker" and our sense of its utility remains unimpaired.

ART.

Holbein's "Ambassadors": The Picture and the Men. An historical study by Mary F. S. Hervey. (G. Bell and Sons. 10s. 6d. n.)

This handsome volume of 260 pages, decorated with the royal fleur-de-lys and illustrated with nineteen plates, is devoted to the history of a single picture—the great double portrait painted by Holbein, which, after being the pride of Longford Castle during eighty years, was acquired for the National Gallery in 1890. Our readers will remember the lively controversy at the time as to the identity of the two personages represented on Holbein's canvas. At length the courtly and richly clad figure on the left, wearing the collar of the Order of St. Michael, was discovered by Mr. Sidney Colvin to be Jean de Dinteville, Lord of Polisy and Bailly of Troyes, and French Ambassador at the Court of Henry VIII. in 1533. The age of the French Ambassador, who was born in September, 1504, and was therefore twenty-nine when he came to England in February, 1533, agrees with the words "Aet. suae 29," which are written on the sheath of this gentleman's dagger, while the name of Polisy, Dinteville's Burgundian chateau, is marked on the globe introduced in the background of Holbein's painting. Still the identity of the second personage in the picture remained wrapt in mystery until, in 1895, the author of the present volume, Miss Mary Hervey, was fortunate enough to discover a seventeenth century parchment in the possession of a bookseller of Pré-Saint-Gervais, in which the picture was fully described. This precious document is now the property of the Trustees of the National Gallery, and has been translated as follows:—

> In this picture is represented, life size, Messire Jean de Dinteville, Chevalier, Sieur de Polizy, near Bar-sur-Seine, Bailly de Treyes, who was Ambassador in England for King Francis I., in the year 1533. . . . There is also represented in the said picture Messire George de Selve, Bishop of Lavaur, a personage of great learning and virtue, who was Ambassador with the Emperor Charles V.; and son of Messire Jean de Selve, Premier President of the Parliament of Paris. The said Bishop died in 1541, having in the above-mentioned year, 1532 or 1533, gone to England, by permission of the King, to visit the said Sieur de Dinteville, his intimate friend and also of all his family; and they two, having met in England an excellent Dutch painter, employed him to make this picture, which was carefully preserved at the said place, Polizy, up to the year 1653.

Miss Hervey thus successfully solves the problem and establishes the identity of both personages in Holbein's double portrait. She goes on to trace the fortunes of Holbein's masterpiece—described by M. Méry de Vic, Keeper of the Privy Seal at the French Court in 1621, as "la plus belle pièce de peinture qui soit en France, au jugement des meilleurs peintres"—from the time it left the Sieur de Polisy's house in Burgundy until it was sold by the French collector Le Brun, in the last century, to an English dealer and found its way to Longford Castle. We are given a full and accurate history of the Ambassadors themselves, based on contemporary documents and compiled with scholarly care. Finally, in the concluding chapters, which are perhaps the most interesting part of her work, Miss Hervey describes the details of the picture and explains the meaning of the curious symbols introduced, the musical and mathematical instruments, the globe, compasses, and book of German hymns, the devices on the Sieur's dagger and the skull or death's head distorted by reflection in a curved mirror, which forms so prominent an object in the central foreground and has already provoked so much animated discussion. In these we have, according to Miss Hervey's ingenious explanation, a record of the thought and studies, the hopes and fears, which swayed the mind and influenced the generation of this cultured French gentleman of the sixteenth century, wrought together by the skill and genius of Hans Holbein into the enduring unity of a great work of art.

However much the President of the Royal Academy of Arts may fail to satisfy the modern school there is no doubt that for a certain elegant classicism he is one of the best of living English designers. The new stamp which Sir Edward Poynter has designed for New Zealand is a most felicitous example. The design is emblematic and distinctive, and worthily marks the inauguration of the New Zealand scheme for universal penny postage—which comes into force with the new century. As a nation, we are not generally successful with our own stamps, but the present is a rare occasion in the history of our colonies when they may rise artistically superior to the mother country. They appear to be making an effort to do so.

A committee, consisting of Sir L. Alma-Tadema, Marcus Stone, Luke Fildes, Frank Dicksee, Val Prinsep, J. S. Sargent, G. A. Storey, S. J. Solomon, Alfred East, Edwin Bale, Geo. Simonds, C. F. A. Voysey, and W. Reynolds-Stephens, with J. Cother Webb as honorary secretary and H. A. Voysey as legal adviser, has been considering the possibility of forming an Artists' Association, which shall have for its object the binding together of members of the profession in every branch of the fine and applied arts for the advancement of their common interests. These common interests are inter alia the protection of copyrights, the introduction of producers to vendors or purchasers, and the photographic registration of work by the members. It is believed that if the membership reaches 700 a subscription of one guinea from each will be sufficient to launch the scheme properly. Any one interested in the proposed association can obtain information from Mr. J. Cother Webb, 111, Clifton Hill, St. John's Wood, N.W. Those who have had experience of a similar enterprise in France—the Syndicate Artistique—will recognize its usefulness.

Amongst other good works which are being so usefully and unobtrusively done by Mr. Charles W. Mitchell, of Newcastle—who has recently offered to make himself responsible for the whole of the debt on the Aberdeen University buildings—is the Handicrafts' Company. This is intended to assist craftsmen and mechanics who show artistic taste to follow the higher paths of their calling. Besides being given to philanthrophic good works, Mr. Mitchell is an artist of no mean achievement, and his "Hypatia," it will be remembered, created considerable attention at the Grosvenor Gallery some fifteen years ago.

FICTION.

"The Doctor Speaks."

Since Mr. W. J. Dawson made his bow to the world of novel-readers with his "Redemption of Edward Strahan," he has persevered in his attempt to win a favourable hearing. Conscientious and persistent as his efforts have been they cannot be said to have entirely succeeded. The reason appears to be that Mr. Dawson does not possess the necessary equipment. He [illegible]; a style occasionally diffuse or gaudy, yet founded on the best models; a poet's sense of the tragedy of life; a modest competency of humour; and a real desire to sympathize with human nature—a desire which, to our thinking, outruns his ability to plumb its depths. Some of these qualities have won for him success in other fields. He has written many verses that are poetry; he can expound a poet; he can indite essays polite and urbane. It is the gift of the story-teller that he lacks, and this is the most important item in the equipment of the story-writer. In THE DOCTOR SPEAKS (Grant Richards, 6s.) this remark finds illustration. The tales purport to be experiences that have come within the ken of a doctor. The possibility of "a double life" is granted, of course, by every one. With Mr. Dawson the idea is a perfect obsession. Five of the fifteen stories are more or less intimately concerned with it. This points either to a cynical view of life, or to a lack of invention. The dialogue is not very strong. No old workhouse man, so far as we know, could ever say "'Waiting for what,' says she, with a flash of her black eyes." This is a piece of the conventional novelist's "descriptive" work straying out of the wrong mouth. It is one of the many instances of incongruity. Novelists and prize-fighters traditionally "go for" the eyes, and Mr. Dawson is no exception. If he would control his tendency towards rhetoric, and could discover a mine of suggestions that would enable him to replace mere sketches by stories his outfit for such work as is attempted here would be more complete.

THE LADY OF DREAMS, by Una L. Silberrad (Heinemann, 6s.), is a powerful but rather gloomy tale, enlivened, however, by one or two able and humorous character sketches. The picture of slum life in Walton-street and the unlovely network of streets in its neighbourhood reveals an observant artist; and the village life at Hollford is indicated with an equally firm touch. But the story of the wife, who found that she could not love the husband who loved her so fondly, is painful and yet fails of being a tragedy. We are conscious chiefly of a sense of unnecessary gloominess mingled with some little irritation at the perversity of Mrs. Tancred.

The dainty ways and artistic "climate," as Mr. Balfour might say, of Japan, are underlined very emphatically in Mr. John Luther Long's THE FOX-WOMAN (Macqueen, 6s.). It is the story of an artist, who runs after false gods, in the shape of an American mimicry's daughter. One consequence is that his art suffers, and the story reads us a parable on the value of fidelity in art. Another consequence is that Yasakuji, his friend and future brother-in-law, quarrels with him, and we have naked primitive Japanese drama. But for the most part Ali-San's love for the little girl is the motive of a beautiful idyl, the four principal characters being clearly "visualized" and entertainingly presented.

BRITAIN'S GREATNESS FORETOLD, by Marie Trevelyan (Hogg, 5s.), is an historical novel, with Boadicea for its heroine. There is a long introduction by Mr. Edwin Collins, who takes for his text Cowper's famous ode, and shows how the prediction "Regions Cæsar never knew Thy posterity shall sway" has been fulfilled by the expansion of the Empire and the devotion of the Colonies. Occasionally Mr. Collins' enthusiasm leads him to make statements which are more patriotic than accurate. The statement that Britain beyond the seas produces "wine as good as ever came from France" indicates either a strange taste in vintages or else an imperfect acquaintance with them. Nor is it the highest art to rake up the statistics collected in "Whitaker's Almanack" and the articles of Mr. W. Holt Schooling, who is quoted, with the strenuous assertions of a work of fiction. However, the book is well meant and not badly written.

THE CONVERSION OF MISS CAROLINE EDEN, by Maude Egerton King (Digby, Long, & Co., 3s. 6d. n.), relates how an elderly spinster, a member of the Church of England, was impressed by a Congregational minister of the modern, well-educated stamp. It is an unpretentious little book, lacking nowhere, but pleasantly written. The story may not be well imagined, but it is at any rate well observed.

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.

Cornhill is full of interesting features. Poetry is represented by Mr. George Meredith, fiction by Mr. Stanley J. Weyman and Miss Mary E. Wilkins, humour by Mr. Andrew Lang, who writes of "Examinations in Fiction," and history by the Rev. W. H. Fitchett, who begins to tell the tale of the Indian Mutiny. Dr. Conan Doyle replies to the military critics of his recent military criticisms. In spite of these attractions one turns first to Mr. George M. Smith's account of the origin of the Cornhill in 1860, headed "Our Birth and Parentage." It appears that Mr. Smith "had at first no idea of securing Thackeray as editor," the novelist being merely invited to contribute serials at £350 a month. His services in the former capacity were only sought after an attempt to obtain those of Tom Hughes had failed; and Mr. Smith seems to have helped to a great extent to do the work which he paid Thackeray £1,000 a year for doing. He made overtures to Tennyson among other authors:—

> Tennyson listened to my proposal with entire calmness. He asked me to smoke with him and chatted pleasantly; but gave me no idea as to whether my offer was acceptable. Mrs. Tennyson presently came into the room, and Tennyson, addressing her, said:—"My dear, we are much richer than we thought we were. Mr. Smith has just offered me five thousand guineas for a book the size of the 'Idylls.' And," he continued, "if Mr. Smith offers five thousand, of course the book is worth ten!" A remark at which we all laughed. Nothing came of this proposal, which I had no temptation to renew after the rapid success achieved by the magazine. But Thackeray obtained from Tennyson his fine poem "Tithonus" for the second number.

Mr. Smith records that the highest price he ever paid for a novel was £7,000 to George Eliot for "Romola." Another novelist who had to be well paid was Trollope. Concerning the negotiations to fix Trollope's price a good story is told:—

> Trollope came to me in Pall-mall, where we now had a branch office, to arrange for a new serial. I told him my terms, but he demurred to my offer of £2,000, and said that he had hoped for £3,000. I shook my head. "Well," he replied, "let us toss for that other £1,000." I asked him if he wished to ruin me, and said that if my banker heard of my tossing authors for their copyrights he would certainly close my account; and what about my clerks? How I should demoralize them if they suspected me of tossing with an author for his manuscript! We ultimately came to an agreement on my terms, which were sufficiently liberal. But I felt uncomfortable—I felt mean—I had refused a challenge. To relieve my mind I said, "Now that is settled, if you will come over the way to my club, where we can have a little room to ourselves for five minutes, I will toss you for £1,000 with pleasure." Mr. Trollope did not accept the offer.

The article is full of literary gossip of the right sort, and we hope Mr. Smith will go on working the vein he has struck. Altogether an important and interesting number.

The Monthly Review, so far as it touches current military and political topics, is cautious, and not inclined to drift with the many. Its second article may be commended as the best and most serious attempt yet made to get to the inner meaning of Little Englandism. Little Englandism is venerable, for it includes Burghley, Queen Elizabeth, and Walpole; and its creed, so the writer urges, rests on the affirmation that the vital need of Empire is the greatness of England, for on this "the unity and vitality of the Empire ultimately rests." Then a "sometime gunner in the C.I.V. battery," Mr. Basil Williams, has much to say on behalf of the Boers and against farm burning. Literature is recognized in two articles on Coventry Patmore and Cowley; and there are other items; but perhaps the most important article contains some unpublished Napoleon matters—the papers of Colonel Wilks, Governor of St. Helena when Napoleon landed, which among other things do much to excuse Sir Hudson Lowe by showing that he at once discovered Napoleon in an attempt to tamper with Wilks and with the officer in command of the naval squadron.

Three of the items in Longman's Magazine are fiction, one of them coming from Mr. W. E. Norris, and another is the beginning of a story by "M. E. Francis." "Nature in London" is always a pleasant subject, and Mr. G. A. B. Dewar writes well upon it; he has nothing, however, remarkable in the way of "finds" to record unless it be a "red admiral" sailing down the Queen's-road, Chelsea. Mr. H. W. Fowler has a timely word to say against the hackneyed quotation, and Mr. Lang, among the various matters discussed in "The Sign of the Ship," makes, we are glad to see, the remark that "the American new-born love of American historical romances is, I think, a very pleasant and hopeful symptom." We think so, too, despite Mr. Howell's strictures on its bloodthirstiness.

Macmillan's Magazine this month, perhaps wisely, avoids the actual. It has nothing to say about either the war or the servant problem. Mr. A. G. Bradley reviews the two recent books on the history of the Hudson Bay Company, and an anonymous critic traces an ingenious, but fanciful, parallel between the temperaments of Edward FitzGerald and T. E. Brown. A wider interest perhaps will be taken in Madame Ristori's observations "on various subjects relating to my art and more particularly on the question as to whether I should advise a young woman to dedicate herself to it?" Because "next to the pulpit nothing is more productive of good than the stage, if it be understood as the Talmas, the Modenas, the Siddonses, and other great actors have understood it." The number also includes Chapters VIII.-X. of Mr. Eric Parker's serial "The Sinner and the Problem."

The new editor of the Pall Mall Magazine has hardly had time, as yet, to assert his individuality otherwise than by getting rid of serial stories and giving Mr. G. S. Street's causerie to Mr. A. Kinnear. The magazine does not despise the trick article—there is one on "Assassinations of the Century" and another on "The New House of Commons," illustrated by Mr. G. R. Halkett, the editor, whose draughtsmanship has very much improved. But we must also note Mr. Stephen Gwynn's poem "A Death Mask," and a well illustrated article on Rodin, the sculptor.

The Badminton Magazine is improving. Colour-printing in monthly magazines is not, of course, an innovation, but we have never seen it better done than it is in the four pictures given in this magazine. Some may find a touch of humour in an Imperial Yeoman who went out to South Africa to shoot Boers writing a screed to describe how he incidentally shot some antelope; but the Badminton is not a military magazine. There are good articles, as usual, about hunting and shooting and one on the pursuit of caribou.

The Gentleman's Magazine maintains its renown as a medium for presenting out-of-the-way information collected for the most part by authors who have yet to win their spurs. It is probably the only magazine still flourishing in which it would be possible to get inserted an article on "West Pyrenean Lawyers in the Past"—a subject certainly lacking in the actuality on which most modern editors insist, but interesting to some of us, all the same. An article by Mr. Albert M. Hyamson on "False Messiahs" must also have involved a good deal of research, as must the account of the historical associations of Boulogne contributed by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald. Le Sage and Thomas Campbell are the names that loom largest among the city's literary memories; though it might have been added that Dickens, Mr. David Christie Murray, and Mr. Frank Mathew have also written books there.

The Century Magazine is as good as usual—which is high praise. Some of the subjects treated are naturally more interesting to American than to English readers, who can hardly be expected to feel overwhelmingly curious to know, for instance, what Mr. E. V. Smalley has to say about the United States Patent Office; but a good many of the articles will appeal successfully to a wider public. The element of actuality is furnished by an account, by Cecile E. Payen, of the siege of the Peking Legations. Miss Payen was there as a member of Minister Conger's household. Readers whose interest is in literary associations will turn to the paper by Mr. Jacob A. Riis on "Hamlet's Castle"—a description of Kronberg, Elsinore. The illustrations are redrawn from photographs, and leave us wishing that the magazines on this side were more in the habit of having their photographs redrawn. Other admirable illustrations are those contributed by Mr. Raven Hill and Mr. Joseph Pennell to Sir Walter Besant's "Shadow and Sunlight in East London." In the way of travel and adventure there is a chapter on "Roping the Cañons of the Rio Grande" by Robert T. Hill; and the serial is from the pen of Mr. Hamlin Garland.

In the United Service Magazine Colonel Maude continues his remarks on the Evolution of Cavalry; an anonymous writer proposes that we should offer the Germans Cyprus in exchange for their East African possessions; and Dr. T. M. Maguire ransacks history for instructive examples of "strategic devastation." He does well in recalling the precise details of Sherman's famous march, and reminding us that that great General "ordered out of their homes all the population of a town of 10,000 inhabitants, old and young, male and female, and then blew it up."

New serials begin in both the magazines of the house of Isbister; in Good Words a serial by Mr. Neil Munro, and in the Sunday Magazine a serial by Miss Christabel Coleridge. In the former publication we may also draw attention to an article on "The Earliest Scottish Newspaper," the Mercurius Caledonius of 1661.

In the Imperial and Colonial Magazine, Canon Rawnsley, whose ubiquity (as a poet) during the war has almost equalled that of De Wet himself, salutes the C.I.V.'s with a sonnet: "We give you greeting, City Volunteers!" The magazine keeps strictly to its last. Sir Charles Dilke continues his series of articles on "The Century in our Colonies," writing this month of the West Indies and the Dominion of Canada. Then an equally high authority, Professor A. H. Keane, concludes his historical survey of British South Africa; and the case for Imperial Telegraphic Communication is summed up by Sir Edward Sassoon. The only article that gives the mind a temporary respite from Imperial and colonial affairs is an essay on D'Annunzio by Mr. Arthur Symons.

The Universal Magazine contains an indignant, but belated, reply to Mr. Clement Scott's strictures on the morality of the stage, a well-illustrated account of "Stage Coaches, Old and Modern," and photographs of the drawing room, dining room, and evening gowns of Miss Ellis Jeffreys, the actress. A serial story by Mr. Clive Holland also progresses slowly but surely to its conclusion.

The most notable articles in the Home Counties Magazine are those on the Whitgift Hospital, Croydon, by Walter H. Godfrey, and on Old St. Albans, by F. G. Kitton. A most satisfactory feature of the publication lies in the fact that the pictures include black and white drawings as well as photographs. Some of these drawings are of a high order of merit.

Miss Edith Henrietta Fowler begins a serial in the Woman at Home—the paper in which Miss Annie S. Swan answers the questions of correspondence respecting courtship, marriage, and etiquette. We ponder the dark saying that "it is usual for a gentleman to leave his hat in the hall."

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The Times of December 31, 1900, and of January 1, 1901, will contain special supplements giving extracts from the paper for every year of the nineteenth century.

"Kim"—for that is now to be the name of Mr. Kipling's new Indian story—which begins to appear in Cassell's Magazine next month, and is the author's longest novel, will be illustrated in a remarkable way. Mr. Lockwood Kipling, C.I.E., the author's father, has modelled in clay a series of illustrations, and they will be reproduced by photography. From the specimen sent us, these photographs appear likely to be of much interest. There are also to be pictures by Mr. E. L. Weeks.

MM. Hachette have for the holiday season two very attractive, one may almost say impressive, publications—M. Muntz's "Florence et la Toscane" and an anonymous work professed chiefly as a sort of museum of illustrations of the century—"Le XIXème Siècle, les Mœurs, les Arts, les Idées"—a pendant to the delightful "Eighteenth Century," which appeared at the same season two years ago. The abundance and beauty of the illustrations enlivening M. Muntz's well-known volume and his notes us Pius, Siena, Monte Oliveto, Florence, with the neighbouring convents, Arezzo, Fiesole, and the other storied towns of this portion of Italy, really render this work, of which the text has been revised and brought up to date, a new one. And the volume costs, unbound, only fifteen francs. There are something like 300 illustrations. Scarcely a monument or plastic document of any sort is neglected. In the "Nineteenth Century" the text is evidently subordinated to the rôle of commentary upon the illustrations, which give us in rapid visions the most typical moments of the century. Writers, artists, and statesmen, from the First Empire down almost to Fashoda, are here revived, and all the little documentary details of dress and furniture and social shibboleths are reproduced. It is a resplendent résumé of all that is most essentially typical in the Parisian social existence of the century.

The miner poet is to have a monthly magazine all to himself. It will be called the Thrush, it will cost fourpence, and it will contain nothing but poetry. The idea is a little alarming. Most educated people who have read much poetry can write verse pretty well. But it is generally a weariness to read. If all the great poets of all ages were alive to-day they would scarcely produce enough really good poetry to keep a monthly magazine going. We would advise the Thrush to draw partly upon the past. Nevertheless, it will undoubtedly stimulate an interest in poetry. We wish it well and shall look out for the first numbers with curiosity.

From the beginning of next year the Westminster Review will be issued by Mr. R. Brimley Johnson, of 8, York-buildings, Adelphi.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

IDEAL CHESS.—The last year of the century has been a period in which what is called master-play and ideal chess has receded more and more into the background. The ideal, according to some authorities, is a game in which every move is well considered; a dead-level contest in which after hours of hard mental labour one side triumphs magnificently by the gain of "the opposition" in a pawn ending. Let us begin to realize the truth. Such chess may be very acceptable to a few dry-as-dusts; it will not suit the rank and file. Life is quite too short for it; and if the game could be limited in such manner its influence would indeed be small. Let us by all means have good chess, but let it be such as the ordinary mortal can appreciate. Let us do our best to encourage chess as a pure recreation, emphasizing the fact that we may all turn to the board and to the problem as a relief from the graver affairs of life, without feeling the "game" to be depressing or becoming so fascinated by its depths that we lose ourselves in endeavouring to fathom its infinite variety.

White mates in three moves.

THE ORIGIN OF CHESS. In the November and December numbers of the British Chess Magazine there are papers of special interest bearing on this subject, called forth mainly by the contributions of Mr. W. S. Branch. An eight-column letter by W. F. in the New York Nation puts one point in a nutshell thus:—"To sum up, the most ancient documentary indications of the existence of chess date from about the beginning of the seventh century, A.D.; the possibly earliest and certainly least dubious mention of it occurs in a Persian biographical romance styled the 'Kârnamâk.' The dialect is Middle-Persian, disguised by the medium in which it is written—a cryptogramic and otherwise bizarre form of orthographic expression known as Pahlavi." It appears there are no assured references to chess earlier than that above referred to.

Mr. Branch writes to us as follows:—"Referring to your last note on the origin of chess, the Egyptian theory of that Spanish writer is considered out of Court by the other authorities. I have read of it, indirectly, but there is no English translation. It may be asked, who are the authorities, and why? As to the origin of chess and earliest references to it in extant literature, there are those who combine an interest in the subject with a knowledge, either original or derived from experts, of Sanscrit, Persian, and Arabic literature, with side-lights from Chinese and the East generally. The verdict is—India almost certainly. If not India, then, at a very remote period indeed, some country east of Arabia (Egypt is west).—W. S. BRANCH."

CHESS IN SCANDINAVIA.—We have already called attention to the advances chess is making in Sweden and Denmark. The following is a brilliancy-prize game in a recent tourney conducted through the excellent chess column in Aftonbladet (Stockholm). White, F. Englund (Stockholm); Black, Captain G. Axelsson (Jönköping). Game 53:—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.

(a)—Kt–K B 3 is recommended as best here.
(b)—And at this point Kt–Kt is recommended.
(c)—Black might play [illegible]—castles: 11. B–B 3, B–K 3; 12. R–K sq, Q–Q 2; 13. Q–Q 2, Q R–Q sq; 14 Q R–Q sq, K R–K sq; 15. Kt×B, P×Kt; 16. Q–K 2, &c.
(d)—There is some good play from this point.
(e)—It does not appear that this capture is good, but usually in correspondence chess a pawn should be secured when possible.
(f)—This advance seems to lose eventually. Q–Q 2 is suggested as better. The conclusion is excellently managed by White. Note especially 26 B–K 6.
